Elsewhere in Massachusetts, the eight-weekend Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf. Among the guest conductors will be Aaron Copland, Josef Krips, Charles Munch, the orchestra's director-emeritus, and William Steinberg, who will succeed Leinsdorf in the fall of 1969. Soloists at Tanglewood will include pianists Cliburn, Jorge Bolet and Gina Bachauer and opea singers Beverly Sills, Rosalind Elias, Jess Thomas and Giorgio Tozzi.

The Oberlin College Players will stage Gilbert and Sullivan operettas at Highfield and Falmouth. Chamber music, intrumental, vocal or orchestra concerts are planned also at Gloucester, Ipswich, Nantucket, New Marlboro, Northampton, Pittsfield and Provincetown.

In Rhode Island, the four-day Newport Jazz Festival will open July 4, featuring Count Basie, Duke Ellington, Ramsey Lewis, Nina Simone and Dionne Warwick.

The Newport Folk Festival from July 23 to 28 has booked Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Pete Seegar, Roy Acuff, Arlo Guthrie and Bikel.

More Musicals

The other New England states also scheduled many musical and dramatic events. Summerlong Pops concerts will be held at the Yale Bowl in New Haven.

In Maine, Bar Harbor Festival concerts will be given July 24 to Aug. 2; the Monteaux Festival, named for the late conductor of the Boston Symphony, will be held in Hancock from July 14 to Aug. 25; and Bowdoin College will offer chamber music concerts from July 11 to Aug. 15.

The New Hahpshire Music Festival will run from July 11 to Aug. 15 at Center Harbor and the Hopkins Center of Dartmouth College has scheduled chamber music and orchestra concerts through Aug. 31.

Four major concert series are announced for Vermont. They are the Lane Summer Series at the University of Vermont in Burlington; the Composers Conference and Chamber Music Center at Bennington; the Marlboro School of Music chamber music series; and the Southern Vermont Art Center programs at Manchester.

The Evening Gazette Worcester, Tues., June 25, 1968 31

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350
JUN 25 1968
New England Newsclip

Straw Hat, Turtleneck Sweater Circuit

Stage, Screen and TV Stars to Visit N. E. Area

BOSTON (UPI) — Attractions ranging from Imogene Coca to Tiny Tim and Carmel Quinn to Van Cliburn will enliven New England's straw hat and turtleneck sweater circuit this summer.

Pick about any star from Broadway, television, night clubs, the movies or the concert stage. More than likely the name will appear on a poster somewhere in the six states.

Music and drama, as usual, will dominate the entertainment scene, but a circus from Europe will be one added feature in Boston - area summer theaters this year.

One of the most - anticipated pre - Broadway events will be the five-week premiere engagement in Boston of Ervin Drake's new musical, "Her First Roman," opening July 29 at an in-town theater. Based on George Bernard Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," it stars Tony Award winners Richard Kiley and Leslie Uggams.

Hans Conreid and Dody Goodman will offer "Don't Drink the Water" and Chita Rivera will headline "Sweet Charity."

Leslie Uggams

Imogene Coca

Charles Munch

Carmel Quinn

Other Broadway Hits

Also from Broadway, John Raitt will star as "The Music Man." Ann Corio and Sherry Briton each will have a burlesque show. And there will be in-the-round revivals of the perennial hits, "The Sound of Music" and "West Side Story."

Noel Harrison will represent the English music halls in "Half a Sixpence."

Hollywood favorites Tom Poston and Dan Dailey will compete with their own medium by appearing in "The Odd Couple," which now also is a current feature picture.

Also from the night club and TV world come Danny Kaye; Ed Ames; Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca; Allan Sherman and Carmel Quinn; the New Christy Minstrels; the Cowsills; Judy Collins; Liberace; Tiny Tim; Theodore Bikel; the Young Rascals; Ray Charles, and Andy Williams with Peter Nero.

For younger showgoers there will be Hetzer's European Circus; The Mad Shoe; Jimmi Hendrix; Vanilla Fudge; The Union Gap; the Ultimate Spinach, and Tammy Grimes.

Elsewhere in Massachusetts, the eight - weekend Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf. Among the guest conductors will be Aaron Copland, Josef Krips, Charles Munch, the orchestra's director — emeritus, and William Steinberg, who will succeed Leinsdorf in the fall of 1969. Soloists at Tanglewood will include pianists Cliburn, Jorge Bolet and Gina Bachauer and opera singers Beverly Sills, Rosalind Elias, Jess Thomas and Giorgio Tozzi.

The Oberlin College Players will stage Gilbert and Sullivan operettas at Highfield and Falmouth. Chamber music, instrumental, vocal or orchestral concerts are planned also at Gloucester, Ipswich, Nantucket, New Marlboro, Northampton, Pittsfield and Provincetown.

In Rhode Island, the four-day Newport Jazz Festival will open July 4, featuring Count Basie, Duke Ellington, Ramsey Lewis, Nina Simone and Dionne Warwick. The Newport Folk Festival from July 23 to 28 has booked Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Pete Seegar, Roy Acuff, Arlo Guthrie and Bikel.

More Musicals

The other New England states also scheduled many musical and dramatic events. Summer-long Pops concerts will be held at the Yale Bowl in New Haven.

In Maine, Bar Harbor Festival concerts will be given July 24 to Aug. 2; the Monteux Festival, named for the late conductor of the Boston Symphony, will be Festival will run from July 11 to Aug. 25; and Bowdoin College will offer chamber music concerts from July 11 to Aug. 15.

The New Hampshire Music Festival will run from July 1 to Aug. 15 at Center Harbor and the Hopkins Center of Dartmouth College has scheduled chamber music and orchestra concerts through Aug. 31.

Four major concert series are announced for Vermont. They are the Lane Summer Series at the University of Vermont in Burlington; the Composers Conference and Chamber Music Center at Bennington; the Marlboro School of Music chamber music series; and the Southern Vermont Art Center programs at Manchester.

Summer Scene to Be Kaliedescope Of Music, Dance, Drama, Films, Art

By LINDA SHAPIRO

Everything's coming up excitement on the summer scene of music, drama, the dance, films, and a kaliedescope of art presentations. Step right up and take your choice. There's something for every taste and special interest. The hills will echo with the sounds of music from southern Vermont all the way down through the Berkshire Hills to northern Connecticut and east and west as well.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony will take up residence at Tanglewood in Lenox and present an eight-week season with such outstanding performers as Grant Johannesen, Van Cliburn, and Joseph Silverstein, and famed guest conductors Aaron Copeland, William Steinberg, and Charles Munch. A new addition will be four Wednesday concerts representing contemporary trends in music at the highest level: musical satire, folk-rock music, non-western music, and jazz.

Chamber music in the contemporary as well as the classic style will abound in quantity as well as quality. Pablo Cassals will again conduct for the Marlboro Music Festival players who include such luminaries as Rudolph Serkin. Two new chamber groups are scheduled in the Lenox area. High Point will present quartet concerts by the Berkshire Chamber Players featuring internationally known performers Ruth and Herbert Tichman. The Music Inn will now swing over from its former place as a jazz festival to host the Talin Music Festival created by Daniel Antoun, who will present baroque and contemporary chamber music by orchestra and soloists. Mr. Antoun hopes to use the festival as a study program for musicians who will eventually form an orchestra which will tour Europe and South America as well as the United States.

The resident quartet at Music Mountain, The Berkshire Quartet, will celebrate its 20th anniversary at the Connecticut 10-week series by asking a large number of guest artists to appear, including the Magg family and David Dawson.

Split Season

In Saratoga, the Performing Arts Center will present a split season of New York City Ballet, through July, under the brilliant direction of George Balanchine and The Philadelphia Orchestra under the baton of Eugene Ormandy through August.

Scattered in and among these classic art forms will be concert performances by such diversified talents as The Fifth Dimension, Ravi Shankar, Simon and Garfunkel, Pete Seegar, and a Rowan and Martin "Laugh-In."

The 27th year of the famous and renowned Ted Shawn Dance Festival at Jacob's Pillow in Lee will offer some highly exciting programs including dances from Spain, Japanese and Hindu dancers, and the leading dancers of the Royal Danish Ballet, Solveig Oestergaard and Niels Kehlet. The 1968 Vestris Competition prize winning ballet "Apollo" by Balanchine and Stravinsky will be performed by the Boston Ballet Company; a must for all students of the dance.

Just coming into their own as an art form and festival event are films, both American and foreign. The continuing series at the Little Cinema in Pittsfield is one of the finest anywhere. The collection is varied as well as selective. This season they have introduced a collection of British revivals including such favorites as "Great Expectations," "The Lavendar Hill Mob," and "The Ladykillers." Saratoga will also present a collection of 40 old favorites at the Spa Summer Theatre including stars W. C. Fields, Harold Lloyd, Rudolph Valentino, Clara Bow and work of directors Fellini, de Sica, Rosselini, and Bergman.

The University of Massachusetts has gone to another film extreme by scheduling old favorites under the title Summer Camp for obvious reasons: "King Kong" with Fay Wray, "Bride of Frankenstein" with Boris Karloff and Elsa Lancaster, "Gold Diggers of 1933" with Dick Powell, Joan Blondell, and Ginger Rogers. The first group are low camp, the second, middle camp, and the third considered high camp. Enough said.

Sights of Art

The view from everywhere will be adorned with sights of art: sculpture, ceramics, oils, watercolors, lithographs; originals and reproductions; abstracts, pop, impressionistic, woodcuts and on and on to represent every art form available today to the collector and viewer. There are new galleries opening throughout the area and provide some excellent days entertainment visiting from one to another. There are working galleries like the Lavenda Door in Stockbridge, galleries run by artists themselves such as Image Gallery in Stockbridge and Tempo in Lenox, and those by talented directors and directresses.

The sudden and explosive boom in the art market as an investment and as status symbols has made the galleries an important part of one's cultural outlook. The range of professional work from The Southern Vermont Art Center in Manchester all the way through the heart of collector's country in the Berkshires to Tyringham Galleries in the south varies with the gallery.

Each are, however, worth a visit if only for a good lesson in the contemporary doings in the art world.

With the Williamstown Theatre as one of the finest in the country anchoring a splendid season of plays ranging from the Greeks to the now-English writers of great success, the theater season hereabouts promises to be very special.

New Concert

The Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge deserves some attention, too, however, if only because the concept is new. Founders William Gibson and Arthur Penn, author and director respectively of great note, have established this theater as a prelude to Broadway. Here new shows by both old and new writers can be performed before Broadway. With both men actively participating along with such well-known performers as Elaine May and Anne Bancroft, it, too, promises to be an excellent season for the theater.

A summer's worth of cultural activities, with some special events thrown in every here and there, requires the interested person to spend some time with all the schedules laid out before him. Carefully pick and choose that which you will enjoy; or that about which you know nothing and wish to learn, or that which is new and requires some investigation. The area is bountiful with a galaxy of sounds and sights awaiting the eyes and ears of all.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
JUN 28 1968
New England Newsclip

BAY STATE BANNER
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY
MAY 9 1968
New England Newsclip

Letters From Our Readers

To the Editor:

As you have read in the Banner, almost two years of negotiations have ended in acquisition of the former Temple Mishkan Tefila and the Lubavitz Yeshiva as a home for the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts, Inc.; we can now develop a vast cultural complex to service our community and be a model to America. Bringing this property transfer to pass and planning the beginning of this center has been the most difficult task I have faced to date. As we got to the place where the transfer was imminent, the officers and staff of Combined Jewish Philanthropies began to anticipate opposition from organizations and individuals within our community. To all those who quickly rallied around and affixed their names to a petition endorsing my efforts, and also to all those who sent letters to Combined Jewish Philanthropies, many thanks. Congratulations also for demonstrating that while we do a great deal of family fighting, we can unite for a common purpose.

Now, after seventeen years of a continuous operation, it was necessary to cease all classes during this eighteenth year to re-appraise and advance. Sometimes as many as thirty phone calls came in one day asking when classes would resume. While I was immeasurable saddened by disappointed students, I had to make a decision to sacrifice a few students whose careers were ended this year in order that many young people should have a brighter tomorrow. Although those students we have had in the past have been benefited and some have even become professionals in the theater (performing here and abroad), there is much more that I would have desired for them--much more that would have made them "world beaters". I flatter myself, however, that our school did offer them much, for they constantly work at their professions; indeed, they are never out of work. However, as I have moved about in professional art circles here and in New York, as I have participated in educational explorations, and as I have viewed economic situations in the white community, it became obvious to me that our entire operation would have to be restructured. The black student, as all other black citizens, must be given the best equipment available to go into this uneven contest. In our case, the equipment is artistic and cultural. We, therefore, are happy to announce the beginning of plans for a cultural complex which will operate at the community level, and the completely professional level.

The new Temple building will house the professional operations when it has been renovated. In it will be a museum, mainly funded by the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, with a black curator; it will meet the standards of the Museum of Fine Arts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is offering concerts by the Pops Orchestra and the smaller chamber orchestra group. They are also offering to train one or two young men in the management of a symphony orchestra at Tanglewood this summer. One of the major foundations is working with us to develop by fall a fully professional dance company. At present, we have not worked out the skeleton for a drama repertory, but we will start by bringing in worthwhile productions from the New York professional theater. This building will also have a room for memorabilia--things which may or may not have great monetary value, but will be pertinent to black life, and a room for important functions.

The school building will be the one which gets the most vigorous use. A new academic school, which has been two years in the making, will be tenant for at least two years. In the late afternoon and evening hours, the very best training in the arts will exist. Gunther Schuller president of the New England Conservatory, and Todd Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are now discussing with me the teaching program The teachers willbe made available from the teaching staff of the Conservatory, and some members of the orchestra will teach their instruments. Scholarships are also offered to community children for the school at Tanglewood this summer; cultural day trips are available for children of the South End-Roxbury-North Dorchester communities. The same national foundation which is developing the dance teaching program that will train dancers who will be potential members of the company. There will also be classes in creative writing taught by writers of note. In fact, every possible art and humanity is being subsidized by local art organizations. We will, of course, show equal interest in those students who have no desire to follow a professional career in the arts. Modern art forms such as jazz, modern painting and drawing, modern dance, and all of the others are to receive equal emphasis. I think it goes without saying that we will state and re-state all of the beauty which we brought from Africa, developed all over the western world and shaped into Afro-American culture.

We will have in the school a beautiful eight-hundred seat auditorium which we know will be constantly busy with community productions. It is also our desire to make the complex a home for every non-commercial art enterprise in our community. So that we may be totally relevant to the lives of those in the community, please let some member of the board or staff of the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts, Inc., or some one of the parents who has been in constant touch with the development of the center, come to a meeting of your group to tell you of our plans, hear what you would have us do, and ask you for your support.

After May 15 we will be accepting registrations for enrollment in the school for anyone from six to sixty. Classes will start at the YMHA-Hecht House and continue throughout the summer until Labor Day. At the same time we'd like to hear from those who would like to appear at the Playhouse in the Park, or who would like to see some particular event happen there.

Again, thank you for your support over the years. Now that we have the buildings, the trick is going to be to get the money to support them. Program money is only a part of the answer; the complete answer will be in endowment. One segment of our vast racial problem in America can receive a frontal attack frm the efforts of Boston's Black Community; thank you for having the vision to participate.

Yours in the arts,
Elma Lewis

Hartford Times
T. July 12

Bostonians Open Berkshire Festival Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the 31st Berkshire Festival at its summer home, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Friday. Erich Leinsdorf, who begins his sixth season as the festival's director, will conduct the opening concert, a Mozart program, in the 6,000-seat Music Shed.

Each weekend through Aug. 25 the orchestra presents concerts on Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m., and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

As in the past two summers the orchestra again offers Weekend Preludes beginning at 7 p.m. for early arrivals to the Friday evening symphony concerts.

* * *

On Sunday mornings this summer the ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chamber groups of symphony players, will give chamber music programs at 10:30 in the Tanglewood Theater.

The initial two weeks of the Tanglewood season will consist of chamber orchestra concerts with three all-Mozart programs and three to include works by Bach, Boccherini, Handel, Haydn, and Telemann. David Zinman will conduct the concert of July 12, and Leinsdorf the five others.

Other guest conductors at this summer's Berkshire Festival will be Aaron Copland (Aug. 23), Sixten Ehrling (Aug. 2), Josef Krips (July 28), Charles Munch (Aug. 17), Stanislaw Skrowaczewski (July 19), William Steinberg (Aug. 4), and the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson (Aug. 9).

Krips', Wilson's and Zinman's appearances will be their first with the orchestra at Tanglewood. Charles Munch will conduct Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" with Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, and Georgio Tozzi as soloists Aug. 17.

* * *

Leinsdorf will conduct a performance of Haydn's Nelson Mass on July 13, Brahms' Requiem on July 27, and an all-Wagner program on Aug. 24 to include the first concert performance of the Finale of "Das Rheingold" with Hanne-Lore Kuhse and Jess Thomas. Pianist Gina Bachauer is to play at each of the Aug. 9, 10, 11 concerts, and on Aug. 3 Malcolm Frager will play a version of Schumann's Piano Concerto he recently discovered.

Arthur Fiedler will make his annual appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra for the Boston Symphony Pension Fund on Aug. 14 and the Berkshire Music Center benefit, Tanglewood-on-Parade, is scheduled Aug. 21.

A brochure with Berkshire Festival programs and ticket information may be obtained by writing: Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

The complete Boston Symphony Orchestra programs for the 1968 Berkshire Festival:

July 5, 9 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Mozart program: "Marriage of Figaro" Overture, Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207, with James Oliver Buswell IV, soloist; Serenade in D major, K. 320, "Posthorn."

July 6, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Mozart program: Symphony No. 28, K. 200; "Exsultate, Jubilate," K. 165; "Alma grande e nobil core," K. 578; "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," K. 525; Arias from "Zaide" and "Il Seraglio" with Beverly Sills, soprano soloist.

July 7, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Mozart program: Symphony No. 36, K. 425 "Linz"; Piano Concerto K. 453, Symphony No. 38, K. 504 "Prague."

* * *

July 12, 9 p.m.—David Zinman conducting. Boccherini, Symphony in A, Op. 1, No. 3; Bach, Violin Concerto in E major, Joseph Silverstein, soloist; Handel, Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 4. Haydn, Symphony No. 83.

July 13, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Bach, Jauchzet Gott, Cantata No. 51, Saramae Endich, soprano soloist; Haydn, Lord Nelson Mass, with Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di Giuseppe, Paul Plishka and Tanglewood Choir.

July 14, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Telemann, Triple Concerto for flute, violin, cello; James Pappoutsakis, Alfred Krips, Martin Hoherman; Bach, Cantata No. 35, Beverly Wolff, mezzo soprano; Handel, Suite from The Water Music.

* * *

July 19, 9 p.m.—Stanislaw Skrowaczewski conducting: Berlioz, Le Corsaire, Overture; Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra; Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

July 20, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn, soloist.

July 21, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Beethoven program: Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 8, Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor" with Grant Johannesen, soloist.

July 26, 9 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Kraft, Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra; Weber, Konzerstuck, Jorge Bolet; Rimsky-Korsakov, Antar; Liszt, Hungarian Fantasy, Jorge Bolet, soloist.

July 27, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Brahms' Requiem with Saramae Endich, Sherrill Milnes, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir.

July 28, 2:30 p.m.—Josef Krips conducting: Beethoven, Symphony No. 6; Strauss, Don Juan; Stravinsky, Firebird Suite.

* * *

Aug. 2, 9 p.m.—Sixten Ehrling conducting: Berlioz, Benvenuto Cellini, Overture; Ravel, Pavane for a dead Infanta; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5.

Aug. 3, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Nicolai, The Merry Wives of Windsor; Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 3, "Scottish"; Schumann, Piano Concerto (Frager Version), Malcolm Frager, soloist; Strauss, Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

Aug. 4, 2:30 p.m.—Steinberg conducting: Rachmaninoff, Paganini Variations, Jorge Bolet, soloist; Mahler, Symphony No. 1.

* * *

Aug. 9, 9 p.m.—Charles Wilson conducting: Glinka, Ruslan and Ludmilla; Rimsky-Korsakov, Scheherazade; Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto No. 3 with Gina Bachauer, soloist.

Aug. 10, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Bizet, Excerpts from L'Arlesienne; Strauss, Also sprach Zarathustra; Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto No. 2 with Gina Bachauer, soloist.

Aug. 11, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Brahms' program: Tragic Overture; Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Three Hungarian Dances; Piano Concerto No. 2, with Gina Bachauer, soloist.

* * *

Aug. 16, 9 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Mendelssohn program. Scherzo from Octet for Strings; Piano Concerto in G Minor, with Lilian Kallir, soloist; A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Aug. 17, 8 p.m.—Charles Munch conducting: Berlioz' "Romeo et Juliette" with Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, Giorgio Tozzi, soloists, and Chorus Pro Musica.

Aug. 18, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Beethoven program: "Fidelio," Overture; Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein, soloist; Symphony No. 5.

* * *

Aug. 23, 9 p.m.—Aaron Copland conducting: Carter, Holiday Overture; Faure, "Pelleas et Melisande" Suite; Chavez, Sinfonia India; Copland, Inscape; Stravinsky, Ode; Copland, "Billy the Kid."

Aug. 24, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Wagner program: "Tristan Und Isolde" Prelude; "Das Rheingold," Finale, Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, David Ward, soloists; "Die Walkure," Act I, Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, David Ward, soloists.

Aug. 25, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Brahms' program: Gesang der Parzen, Schicksalslied Op. 54, Nanie Op. 82, Symphony No. 1 Op. 68, with Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

It is suggested that readers clip this schedule and keep it for reference.

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director,
the Faculty, and
The Friends of Music at Tanglewood
request the honour of your presence at the Opening Exercises of the Twenty-Sixth Season
of the
Berkshire Music Center
in the Theatre
at Tanglewood
Lenox, Massachusetts
Sunday, June thirtieth, nineteen sixty-eight at three o'clock in the afternoon

Tea will be served in the Garden
following the Exercises

Tanglewood Open For 27th Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center Sunday at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Leinsdorf spoke in the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm."

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period of the session, and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Several new faculty appointments and guest lecturers are announced for 1968. Ernst Krenek will be teacher of composition and contemporary music. Guest lecturers include Robert Cogan, Earle Brown, Mario Davidovsky, and Andrew Imbrie. Mac Morgan joins the faculty as teacher of voice. John Oliver will teach choral music and Paul Zukofsky, chamber music. Gilbert Kalish, William Kroll, Roman Totenberg and Zukofsky will participate in a series of faculty recitals.

Joseph Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Assistant director is Louis Speyer. Gunther Schuller is head of contemporary music activities, and Charles Wilson will head vocal music activities. Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, will return as a guest conductor of the B.M.C. orchestra.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood will be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented Aug. 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. A series of contemporary trends concerts will be given July 17, 24 and 31. The programs include jazz, music from India and rock.

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts."

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 2 1968

New England Newsclip

Music

Boston Symphony Opens Berkshire Festival Season

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, formally opened the 27th season of the Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, last Sunday, and a highlight of the Music Center initial get-together was the traditional singing of Randell Thompson's "Alleluia" with the orchestra's assistant director, Charles Wilson, directing.

Aaron Copland

In making the principal address Erich Leinsdorf asserted that the Berkshire Music center has played a major role in the music world, calling its contribution "a great orchestra's great educational arm" and stated in addition that "there is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made by one of our alumni, nor a community in which the Berkshire Music center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American music life."

Several distinguished educators and contributors to the world of music will participate in the coming session, and among those who will add to the cause of the students will be the eminent composer, Aaron Copland. He will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony during the concert of August 23. Recently Mr. Copland was given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for "distinguished achievement," in American music, including establishment of the composition department of Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and for teaching there for more than two decades.

Next Wednesday evening in the Memorial Music hall in Methuen, Lewis Bruun, organist-director at the Old First Presbyterian church in Newark, N.J., will present his third concert in the summer organ series. Lewis Bruun holds B.A. and M.M. degrees from Westminister Choir college where he has been a member of the faculty for several years. Composers he has chosen to represent his program include Maurice Durufle, Mozart, J.S. Bach, Robert Schumann and Olivier Messiaen.

BALLAD ENTHUSIASTS will hear many a tale, happy and sad, when the Newport Folk Festival presents a number of today's outstanding balladeers in a concert Saturday evening, July 27. Leading the contigent from this country will be Pete Seeger who is probbaly the most famous balladeer in the world. Jean Ritchie will thrill her fans with a delightful and traditional list of songs from the hills of old Kentucky, where she learned them as a small girl. The south style ballad will also find another outstanding interpreter in the person of Frank Warner.

The British Isles have made a contribution to this world famous festival by sending to our shores such delightful entertainers as Louis Killen, from Newcastle; red-headed Norman Kennedy from Aberdeen, Scotland, and from Dublin, Ireland, Joe Heany. These three are regarded by many to be the best singers ever to come here from their countries. Newport will be the first community anywhere in the world to feature all three.

Joining the above named, and highly reputed in their individual right, will, be New York State's Dan Smith who needs no introduction to the American scene; Sara Cleveland who also hails from that area and who has gained a fabulous following, and the sensational young folksinger, Mike Cooney who has in a short space proven his talent to grasp every facet of the exciting and not too simple style of the American folk song. The Festival will open on July 24 and conclude on Sunday, July 28.

Frederick Jagel, former leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Co. and faculty member of this summer's session at Castle Hill, Ipswich, which is being conducted by the New England Conservatory, will present a recital next Friday evening in the Great Hall, and he will be accompanied by a fellow faculty member, Allen Rogers. His program will include "Poeme de l'Armour et de la Mer" by Ernest Chausson; "In Praise of Harmony" by G. F. Handel and songs by Hugo Wolf, Frank Bridge, Charles Griffes and Samuel Barber.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

JUL 6 1968

New England Newsclip

Hartford Times
T. July '12

Bostonians Open Berkshire Festival Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the 31st Berkshire Festival at its summer home, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Friday. Erich Leinsdorf, who begins his sixth season as the festival's director, will conduct the opening concert, a Mozart program, in the 6,000-seat Music Shed.

Each weekend through Aug. 25 the orchestra presents concerts on Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m., and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

As in the past two summers the orchestra again offers Weekend Preludes beginning at 7 p.m. for early arrivals to the Friday evening symphony concerts.

* * *

On Sunday mornings this summer the ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chamber groups of symphony players, will give chamber music programs at 10:30 in the Tanglewood Theater.

The initial two weeks of the Tanglewood season will consist of chamber orchestra concerts with three all-Mozart programs and three to include works by Bach, Boccherini, Handel, Haydn, and Telemann. David Zinman will conduct the concert of July 12, and Leinsdorf the five others.

Other guest conductors at this summer's Berkshire Festival will be Aaron Copland (Aug. 23), Sixten Ehrling (Aug. 2), Josef Krips (July 28), Charles Munch (Aug. 17), Stanislaw Skrowaczewski (July 19), William Steinberg (Aug. 4), and the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson (Aug. 9).

Krips', Wilson's and Zinman's appearances will be their first with the orchestra at Tanglewood. Charles Munch will conduct Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" with Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, and Georgio Tozzi as soloists Aug. 17.

* * *

Leinsdorf will conduct a performance of Haydn's Nelson Mass on July 13, Brahms' Requiem on July 27, and an all-Wagner program on Aug. 24 to include the first concert performance of the Finale of "Das Rheingold" with Hanne-Lore Kuhse and Jess Thomas. Pianist Gina Bachauer is to play at each of the Aug. 9, 10, 11 concerts, and on Aug. 3 Malcolm Frager will play a version of Schumann's Piano Concerto he recently discovered.

Arthur Fiedler will make his annual appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra for the Boston Symphony Pension Fund on Aug. 14 and the Berkshire Music Center benefit, Tanglewood-on-Parade, is scheduled Aug. 21.

A brochure with Berkshire Festival programs and ticket information may be obtained by writing: Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

The complete Boston Symphony Orchestra programs for the 1968 Berkshire Festival:

July 5, 9 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Mozart program: "Marriage of Figaro" Overture, Violin Concerto No. 1, k. 207, with James Oliver Buswell IV, soloist; Serenade in D major, K. 320, "Posthorn."

July 6, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Mozart program: Symphony No. 28, K. 200; "Exsultate, Jubilate," K. 165; "Alma grande e nobil core," K. 578; "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," K. 525; Arias from "Zaide" and "Il Seraglio" with Beverly Sills, soprano soloist.

July 7, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Mozart program: Symphony No. 36, K. 425 "Linz"; Piano Concerto K. 453, Symphony No. 38, K. 504 "Prague."

* * *

July 12, 9 p.m.—David Zinman conducting. Boccherini, Symphony in A, Op. 1, No. 3; Bach, Violin Concerto in E major, Joseph Silverstein, soloist; Handel, Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 4. Haydn, Symphony No. 83.

July 13, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Bach, Jauchzet Gott, Cantata No. 51, Saramae Endich, soprano soloist; Haydn, Lord Nelson Mass, with Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di Giuseppe, Paul Plishka and Tanglewood Choir.

July 14, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Telemann, Triple Concerto for flute, violin, cello; James Pappoutsakis, Alfred Krips, Martin Hoherman; Bach, Cantata No. 35, Beverly Wolff, mezzo soprano; Handel, Suite from The Water Music.

* * *

July 19, 9 p.m.—Stanislaw Skrowaczewski conducting: Berlioz, Le Corsaire, Overture; Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra; Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

July 20, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn, soloist.

July 21, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Beethoven program: Symphony No. 1, Symphony No. 8, Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor" with Grant Johannesen, soloist.

July 26, 9 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Kraft, Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra; Weber, Konzerstuck, Jorge Bolet; Rimsky-Korsakov, Antar; Liszt, Hungarian Fantasy, Jorge Bolet, soloist.

July 27, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Brahms' Requiem with Saramae Endich, Sherrill Milnes, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir.

July 28, 2:30 p.m.—Josef Krips conducting: Beethoven, Symphony No. 6; Strauss, Don Juan; Stravinsky, Firebird Suite.

* * *

Aug. 2, 9 p.m.—Sixten Ehrling conducting: Berlioz, Benvenuto Cellini, Overture; Ravel, Pavane for a dead Infanta; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5.

Aug. 3, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Nicolai, The Merry Wives of Windsor; Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 3, "Scottish"; Schumann, Piano Concerto (Frager Version), Malcolm Frager, soloist; Strauss, Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

Aug. 4, 2:30 p.m.—Steinberg conducting: Rachmaninoff, Paganini Variations, Jorge Bolet, soloist; Mahler, Symphony No. 1.

* * *

Aug. 9, 9 p.m.—Charles Wilson conducting: Glinka, Ruslan and Ludmila; Rimsky-Korsakov, Scheherazade; Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto No. 3 with Gina Bachauer, soloist.

Aug. 10, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting: Bizet, Excerpts from L'Arlesienne; Strauss, Also sprach Zarathustra; Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto No. 2 with Gina Bachauer, soloist.

Aug. 11, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Brahms' program: Tragic Overture; Variations on a Theme by Haydn.; Three Hungarian Dances; Piano Concerto No. 2, with Gina Bachauer, soloist.

* * *

Aug. 16, 9 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Mendelssohn program. Scherzo from Octet for Strings; Piano Concerto in G Minor, with Lilian Kallir, soloist; A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Aug. 17, 8 p.m.—Charles Munch conducting: Berlioz' "Romeo et Juliette" with Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, Giorgio Tozzi, soloists, and Chorus Pro Musica.

Aug. 18, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Beethoven program: "Fidelio," Overture; Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein, soloist; Symphony No. 5.

* * *

Aug. 23, 9 p.m.—Aaron Copland conducting: Carter, Holiday Overture; Faure, "Pelleas et Melisande" Suite; Chavez, Sinfonia India; Copland, Inscape; Stravinsky, Ode; Copland, "Billy the Kid."

Aug. 24, 8 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Wagner program: "Tristan Und Isolde" Prelude; "Das Rheingold," Finale, Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, David Ward, soloists; "Die Walkure," Act I, Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, David Ward, soloists.

Aug. 25, 2:30 p.m.—Leinsdorf conducting all-Brahms' program: Gesang der Parzen, Schicksalslied Op. 54, Nanie Op. 82, Symphony No. 1 Op. 68, with Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

It is suggested that readers clip this schedule and keep it for reference.

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director,
the Faculty, and
The Friends of Music at Tanglewood
request the honour of your presence at the Opening Exercises of the Twenty-Sixth Season
of the
Berkshire Music Center
in the Theatre
at Tanglewood
Lenox, Massachusetts
Sunday, June thirtieth, nineteen sixty-eight
at three o'clock in the afternoon

Tea will be served in the Garden
following the Exercises

Tanglewood Open For 27th Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center Sunday at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Leinsdorf spoke in the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm."

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period of the session, and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Several new faculty appointments and guest lecturers are announced for 1968. Ernst Krenek will be teacher of composition and contemporary music. Guest lecturers include Robert Cogan, Earle Brown, Mario Davidovsky, and Andrew Imbrie. Mac Morgan joins the faculty as teacher of voice. John Oliver will teach choral music and Paul Zukofsky, chamber music. Gilbert Kalish, William Kroll, Roman Totenberg and Zukofsky will participate in a series of faculty recitals.

Joseph Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Assistant director is Louis Speyer. Gunther Schuller is head of contemporary music activities, and Charles Wilson will head vocal music activities. Asron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, will return as a guest conductor of the B.M.C. orchestra.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood will be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented Aug. 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. A series of contemporary trends concerts will be given July 17, 24 and 31. The programs include jazz, music from India and rock.

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts."

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Music

Boston Symphony Opens Berkshire Festival Season

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, formally opened the 27th season of the Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, last Sunday, and a highlight of the Music Center initial get-together was the traditional singing of Randell Thompson's "Alleluia" with the orchestra's assistant director, Charles Wilson, directing.

Aaron Copland

In making the principal address Erich Leinsdorf asserted that the Berkshire Music center has played a major role in the music world, calling its contribution "a great orchestra's great educational arm" and stated in addition that "there is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made by one of our alumni, nor a community in which the Berkshire Music center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American music life."

Several distinguished educators and contributors to the world of music will participate in the coming session, and among those who will add to the cause of the students will be the eminent composer, Aaron Copland. He will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony during the concert of August 23. Recently Mr. Copland was given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for "distinguished achievement," in American music, including establishment of the composition department of Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and for teaching there for more than two decades.

Next Wednesday evening in the Memorial Music hall in Methuen, Lewis Bruun, organist-director at the Old First Presbyterian church in Newark, N.J., will present his third concert in the summer organ series. Lewis Bruun holds B.A. and M.M. degrees from Westminister Choir college where he has been a member of the faculty for several years. Composers he has chosen to represent his program include Maurice Durufle. Mozart, J.S. Bach, Robert Schumann and Olivier Messiaen.

BALLAD ENTHUSIASTS will hear many a tale, happy and sad, when the Newport Folk Festival presents a number of today's outstanding balladeers in a concert Saturday evening, July 27. Leading the contigent from this country will be Pete Seeger who is probbaly the most famous balladeer in the world. Jean Ritchie will thrill her fans with a delightful and traditional list of songs from the hills of old Kentucky, where she learned them as a small girl. The south style ballad will also find another outstanding interpreter in the person of Frank Warner.

The British Isles have made a contribution to this world famous festival by sending to our shores such delightful entertainers as Louis Killen, from Newcastle; red-headed Norman Kennedy from Aberdeen, Scotland, and from Dublin, Ireland, Joe Heany. These three are regarded by many to be the best singers ever to come here from their countries. Newport will be the first community anywhere in the world to feature all three.

Joining the above named, and highly reputed in their individual right, will, be New York State's Dan Smith who needs no introduction to the American scene; Sara Cleveland who also hails from that area and who has gained a fabulous following, and the sensational young folksinger, Mike Cooney who has in a short space proven his talent to grasp every facet of the exciting and not too simple style of the American folk song. The Festival will open on July 24 and conclude on Sunday, July 28.

Frederick Jagel, former leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Co. and faculty member of this summer's session at Castle Hill, Ipswich, which is being conducted by the New England Conservatory, will present a recital next Friday evening in the Great Hall, and he will be accompanied by a fellow faculty member, Allen Rogers. His program will include "Poeme de l'Armour et de la Mer" by Ernest Chausson; "In Praise of Harmony" by G. F. Handel and songs by Hugo Wolf, Frank Bridge, Charles Griffes and Samuel Barber.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

JUL 6 1968 New England Newsclip

8.

BEACON HILL NEWS
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Highlights Of Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968-69 Season

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's eighty-eighth season, 1968-69, will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, September 27 and 28, in Symphony Hall, Boston, with a program comprising Mozart's SYMPHONY IN E FLAT, K. 543, Beethoven's concert aria Ar, Perfido, and excerpts from Wagner's DIE GOTTERDAMMERUNG. Marilyn Horne will be soloist in the Beethoven and Wagner works.

Highlights of the season's repertoire, in addition to the Wagner excerpts, include major works, two seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, choral and vocal and a concerto last heard by Boston Symphony Orchesra audiences 55 years ago. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first Boston and New York performances of the original version of Strauss' ARIADNE AUF NAXOS on January 3, 4 and 7, 1969, in Symphony Hall and January 18 in Carnegie Hall. Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, sopranos, and Robert Nagy, tenor, will be featured soloists. Debussy's THE MARTYRDOM OF ST. SEBASTIEN will be conducted by the Orchestra's former Music Director, Charles Munch. The seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, both to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, are the FOURTH SYMPHONY, which was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in November, 1930, and the FIFTH PIANO CONCERTO in which John Browning will be soloist. On the program with the Prokofieff symphony will be Robert Schumann's FOURTH SYMPHONY, to be heard in its original version. Another DeBussy work to be played is the infrequently-programmed RHAPSODY FOR SAXOPHONE AND ORCHESTRA. The soloist will be Felix Visuglia. A point of interest of the Rhapsody is that it was commissioned (in 1901) by Elise Coolidge Hall, a Boston lady who played the saxophone. It was once performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the saxophone part played by Louis Speyer on the English horn. A novelty of the season will be the performance with Earl Wild as soloist, of Scharwenka's FIRST PIANO CONCERTO, in b flat minor, by the Orchestra in 1913 with Scharwenka playing and Otto Urack conducting.

The season will end on April 18 and 19, 1969, with Beethoven's NINTH SYMPHONY, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. These concerts will be his last winter season concerts as Music Director; he will retire as Music Director at the end of the 1969 Berkshire Festival, although he will return to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest conductor during each of the following five years.

Guest Conductors, in addition to Charles Munch, include: Georg Semkow, the Polish conductor, making his American debut in Boston; Georges Pretre and Pierre Boulez, both making their Boston Symphony Orchestra debuts; Colin Davis and Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One other Guest Conductor will be announced later.

Soloists include pianists Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank, and Jorge Bolet, in addition to John Browning and Earl Wild; violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and singers Herman Prey, Sherill Milnes, and Sarmae Endich, in addition to Marilyn Horne, Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, and Robert Nagy. Choruses and other soloists will be announced later.

The Annual Pension Fund Concert will be December 15, 1968. Joan Sutherland will sing; Richard Bonynge will conduct.

1968 SESSION OPEN AT TANGLEWOOD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., greeted the students in the Tanglewood Theatre - Concert hall. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the B.S.O., led the students in the traditional singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." The Thompson "Alleluia" was composed for the opening exercises at the founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and has been sung at the opening of each session since then.

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Leinsdorf spoke on the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm." Mr. Leinsdorf added that its work had affected the history of American music: "There is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni," he said, "nor a community in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." At the Berkshire Music Center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, August 25, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival.

POST GAZETTE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 21,500

JUL 12 1968 New England Newsclip

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,900

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsclip

27th Season Opens At Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

Of the 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

New faculty appointments and guest lecturers for 1968 include the distinguished composer Ernst Krenek who will teach composition and contemporary music; guest lecturers in contemporary music Robert Cogan, Earle Brown, Mario Davidovsky, and Andrew Imbrie. John - Oliver will teach choral music, and Paul Zukofsky, chamber music. Gilbert Kalish, William Kroll, Roman Totenberg, and Mr Zukofsky will participate in a series of faculty recitals.

Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, will return to the Berkshire Music Center as a guest conductor of the BMC orchestra. Mr Copland, who will also appear as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 23, was recently given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for "Distinguished Achievement" in American music, including establishing the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and teaching there for more than two decades.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented August 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. Composers Mark DeVoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival Within A Festival."

On July 17, 24, and 31, a series of contemporary trends concerts will be given under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The program titles are: July 17, Jazz/Folk: July 24, Music from India; July 31, Rock.

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children, primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." At the Berkshire Music Center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, August 25, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Regional Roundup

Berkshire Music Center Opens Its 27th Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center Sunday at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in Lenox.

The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., greeted the students in the Tanglewood theater - concert hall. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the BSO, led the students in singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." The "Alleluia" was composed for the opening exercises at the founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and has been sung at the opening of each session since then.

Affected History

The principal address was given by Eric Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Leinsdorf spoke on the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm." Leinsdorf added that its work has affected the history of American music: "There is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni," he said, "nor a community in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

Out of the 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The fellowship program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight - week period and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. More than 200 students will particpate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. The Boston University Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theater and dance. The New England Conservatory offers two programs, contemporary composition, and a seminer in non - western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory and advanced instrumental techniques.

Several new faculty appointments and guest lecturers are announced for 1968. The composer Ernst Krenek will be teacher of composition and contemporary music. Lecturers in contemporary music will be Robert Cogan, Earle Brown, Mario Davidovsky and Andrew Imbrie. Cogan and Davidovsky are alumni of the Berkshire Music Center. Mac Morgan, also an alumnus of the BMC, joins the faculty as teacher of voice. John Oliver will be teacher of choral music, and Paul Zukofsky, teacher of chamber music. Gibert Kalish, William Kroll, Roman Totenberg and Zukofsky will participate in a series of faculty recitals. Joseph Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the center. Silverstein is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Assistant director is Louis Speyer. Gunther Schuller is head of contemporary music activities, and Charles Wilson is head of vocal music activities.

Copland Will Conduct

It was also announced that Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, will return to the center as a guest conductor of the orchestra. Copland, who will also appear as a guest conductor of the orchestra Aug. 23, was recently given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for distinguished achievement in American music, including establishing the composition department of the center in 1940 and teaching there for more than two decades.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood this summer will be the festival of contemporary music, presented Aug. 5 to 10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. Composers Mark DeVoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman and Richard Trythall were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the festival within a festival, as Leinsdorf refers to it.

On July 17, 24 and 31, a series of contemporary trends concerts will be given under the auspices of the center. The program titles are: July 17, jazz folk; July 24, music from India; July 31, rock. Commenting that "a wide spectrum of ethnic and popular musics" has in recent years become increasingly available to musicians and the interested musical audience, Schuller added that he thought it "significant and necessary that the center institute a series of concerts delineating these new trends and introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

Children Will Visit

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." At the center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session will conclude Sunday, Aug. 25, the final day of the orchestra's festival.

Beverly Wolff, mezzo-soprano, will be featured in the concert this weekend.

On Friday evening, July 12th, David Zinman, Conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony in a concert of works by Broccerini, Bach, Handel and Haydn.

Season opens at

Tanglewood

Springfield is indeed fortunate to be so close to one of the country's finest music festivals, the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. As Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf said on opening day this year: "There is probably not a community anywhere in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt," and Springfield must certainly head the list.

Now in its 28th season, the Center provides both enjoyment for the thousands of music lovers who come to hear its fine concerts, and instruction and enrichment for young musicians.

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stripend for the eight-week period of the session, and is designed for young musicians who have

Continued on Page 10

Saramae Endich, soprano, will sing a solo in Haydn's 'Lord Nelson Mass' on Saturday, July 13th.

Enrico di Guiseppi performs a tenor solo during Saturday's performance of the mass.

Tanglewood season

Continued from Page 1

completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. The Boston University Tanglewood Institute programs in music, art, theatre, and dance. The New England Conservatory offers two programs, contemporary composition, and a seminar in non-western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, and advanced instrumental techniques.

Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, returns to the Berkshire Music Center as a guest conductor of the B.M.C. orchestra. Mr. Copland, who will also appear as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orcestra on August 23, wes recently given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for "Distinguished Achievement" in American music, including establishing the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and teaching there for more than two decades.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented August 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. Composers Mark DeVoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival Within A Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

On July 17, 24, and 31, a series of contemporary trends concerts will be given under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The program titles are: July 17, Jazz/Folk; July 24, Music from India; July 31, Rock. Commenting that "A wide spectrum of ethnic and popular musics" has in recent years become increasingly available to musicians and the interested musical audience, Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the B.M.C. added that he thought it "significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center institute a series of concerts delineating these new trends and introducing some aspects of them in it's curriculum."

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of children primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." at the Berkshire Music Center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, August 25,

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
P. WEEKLY CIRC. 111,000

JUL 11 1968 New England Newsclip

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE,

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUL 4 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER OPENS AT TANGLEWOOD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center last Sunday at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., greeted the students in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the B.S.O., led the students in the traditional singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." The Thompson "Alleluia" was composed for the opening exercises at the founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and has been sung at the opening of each session since then.

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Leinsdorf spoke on the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm." Mr. Leinsdorf added that its work had affected the history of American music: "There is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni," he said, "nor a community in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provdies free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period of the session and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. The Boston University Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theatre and dance. The New England Conservatory offers two programs, contemporary composition, and a seminar in non-western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, and advanced instrumental techniques.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented August 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. Composers Mark DeVoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman and Richard Tryhall were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival Within A Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

On July 17, 24 and 31, a series of contemporary trends concerts will be given under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The program titles are: July 17, Jazz/Folk; July 24, Music from India; July 31, Rock. Commenting that "A wide spectrum of ethnic and popular musics" has in recent years become increasingly available to musicians and the interested musical audience, Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the B.M.C. added that he thought it "significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center institute a series of concerts delineating these new trends and introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." At the Berkshire Music Center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, August 25, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival.

JOURNAL-COURIER (m)
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 28,250

JUL 6 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 1-413-637-1600, presents concerts by the Boston Symphony in the music shed through Aug. 20. Concerts scheduled for 9 p.m. Friday, 8 p.m. Saturday; 2:30 p.m. Sunday. Tickets: $3.50 to $7.50. (admission to lawn $2.50), tickets sold two hours before concert. Open rehearsals at 10:30 a.m. each Saturday ($2).

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Opens Tanglewood Season

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center this afternoon at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., greeted students in the Tanglewood Theatre Concert Hall. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the B.S.O., led the students in the traditional singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." The Thompson "Alleluia" was composed for the opening exercises at the founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and has been sung at the opening of each session since then.

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Leinsdorf spoke on the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm." Mr. Leinsdorf added that its work had affected the history of American music: "There is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni," he said, "nor a community in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period of the session, and is designed for young musicians who have completed there formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

RIDGEFIELD PRESS
RIDGEFIELD, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,450

Berkshire Festival Boston Symphony Orchestra with guest conductors and artists, July 5 through Aug. 25, performances on the weekends, Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

RIDGEFIELD PRESS
RIDGEFIELD, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,450

JUL 11 1968 New England Newsclip

BULLETIN
WILTON, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,250

JUN 26 1968 New England Newsclip

10.

Berkshire Music Center Opens At Tanglewood

Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center this afternoon at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr., greeted the students in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the B.S.O., led the students in the traditional singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." The Thompson "Alleluia" was composed for the opening exercises at the founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and has been sung at the opening of each session since then.

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Leinsdorf spoke on the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm." Mr. Leinsdorf added that its work had affected the history of American music: "There is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni," he said, "nor a community in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period of the session, and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. The Boston University Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theatre, and dance. The New England Conservatory offers two programs, contemporary composition, and a seminar in non-western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, and advanced instrumental techniques.

Several new faculty appointments and guest lecturers are announced for 1968. The distinguished composer Ernst Krenek will be teacher of composition and contemporary music. Guest lecturers in contemporary music will be Robert Cogan, Earle Brown, Mario Davidovsky, and Andrew Imbrie. Mr. Cogan and Mr. Davidovsky are alumni of the Berkshire Music Center. Mac Morgan, also an alumnus of the B.M.C., joins the faculty as teacher of voice. John Oliver will be teacher of choral music, and Paul Zukofsky, teacher of chamber music. Gibert Kalish, William Kroll, Roman Totenberg, and Mr. Zukofsky will participate in a series of faculty recitals. Joseph Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Silverstein is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Assistant director is Louis Speyer. Gunther Schuller is head of contemporary music activities, and Charles Wilson is head of vocal music activities.

It was also announced that Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, will return to the Berkshire Music Center as a guest conductor of the B.M.C. orchestra. Mr. Copland, who will also appear as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 23, was recently given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for "Distinguished Achievement" in American music, including establishing the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and teaching there for more than two decades.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented August 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. Composers Mark DeVoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival Within A Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

On July 17, 24, and 31, a series of contemporary trends concerts will be given under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The program titles are: July 17, Jazz-Folk; July 24, Music from India; July 31, Rock. Commenting that "A wide spectrum of ethnic and popular musics" has in recent years become increasingly available to musicians and the interested musical audience, Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the B.M.C. added that he thought it "significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center institute a series of concerts delineating these new trends and introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." At the Berkshire Music Center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, Aug. 25, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

JUL 2 1968 New England Newsclip

sight and sound

Music Changes in Berkshires

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

Winds of change are always blowing. This summer, at Tanglewood in Lenox, for 37 years a seat of so-called serious music, there will be three concerts of jazz, folk music and rock; and at the nearby Music Inn, for about 20 years a seat of jazz and folk music, there will be a series of small-ensemble baroque concerts.

The Tanglewood concerts are being called "Trend Concerts" and are scheduled for three consecutive Wednesdays.

Some of Performers

To appear July 17 are Judy Collins, folk singer; the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Don Ellis Orchestra. Scheduled July 24 is Ravi Shankar, the Indian sitar player, and on July 31 the walls will rock with the sound of the youth group called The Association.

Presumably none of these events will ripple the bland waters of the traditional Berkshire Festival.

The changes at the Music Inn farther down the slope in the Stockbridge Bowl are more profound.

The attached Music Barn has been known for its summer jazz since World War II and many world-famous jazz figures (Dave Brubeck, for instance) attracted attention there at the beginning of their careers.

Inn Has New Owner

A few weeks ago the inn changed hands, and the new owner, Leopoldo Romero, owner of the Casa Mexico, a restaurant in Cambridge, abandoned the Music Barn and rebuilt a section of the inn to form a 608-seat concert hall.

He enlisted the aid of Daniel Antoun, who studied conducting with Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin in Boston and founded the Contemporary Baroque Ensemble, which has presented concerts in the New York area.

Antoun has collected a group of 24 musicians which he hopes to establish as "a sort of repertory orchestra." He has launched a season of concerts called the "Talin Music Festival."

It started last Saturday with a concert of music by Handel and Alan Hovhaness. The "Talin Viola Concerto" by Hovhaness was on the program, which accounts for the name of the festival.

Eight-Week Series Starts

Talin (pronounced taleen) is the name of a 7th-century cathedral in Armenia which inspired the concerto.

There were two more concerts Sunday, one a solo performance of Bach's "Goldberg Variations" and the other an all-Bach program of instrumental ensemble works.

The festival settled down in earnest Thursday, however, to begin an eight-week series of concerts on Thursdays at 8, Saturdays at 3 and Sundays at 8 of mostly baroque works with an occasional contemporary piece.

The Thursday series is planned to consist of works for small ensembles. . .duets, trios, quartets. . .and the weekend concerts of larger works calling for a chamber orchestra of up to 24 players.

Program Survey

A survey of programs may give a hint of the festival's intentions:

Thursday there were five concertos by Vivaldi.

Saturday there will be three concertos by Vivaldi, a canon by Purcell, a concerto by Locatelli and Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2."

Sunday there will be two concertos by Vivaldi, a canon by Purcell, a concerto by Abaco and Britten's "Simple Symphony."

July 11 the program will consist of music for one and two harpsichords by Scarlatti, Martinu, Hassler, LeRoux, Couperin and Pinkham (which seems to be more 20th than 18th-century).

Some Seldom Heard

The program July 13 will be all baroque: Bach, Vivaldi, Handel and Alessandro Scarlatti.

Although some of the programmed music will be familiar (like Brandenburg Concertos), much of it will be seldom-heard material.

But unless the list of some of the forthcoming programs issued by the press representative contains a serious error, some of the works will be repeated on succeeding programs: three of the pieces listed for Saturday also appear on the Sunday list.

Anyway, I shall be there to collect information for a first-hand report of this newest of music festivals in the Berkshires.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsclip

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 221,738 SUN. 321,833

JUN 2 1968 Bagkeller

Tanglewood Opens June 30

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center will open its 1968 session at Tanglewood on Sunday, June 30.

The Music Center again will be under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Special Events Spell SRO For Bay State

By LAWRENCE FLYNN
Deputy Commissioner
Mass. Dept. Of Commerce & Development

As we shift the scenes on our exciting seasons and make ready to raise the curtain on our summer extravaganza, Massachusetts looks forward to hanging out its "standing room only" sign throughout 1968.

The contribution of tourism to the Comonwealth's economy is substantial. Expenditures by visitors during the fiscal year 1967 were estimated at better than $1 billion. Tourists — defined as travelers not on business who stay away from home overnight—contributed some $78 million in taxes to the state's revenue during that period.

Meals and room occupancy taxes went to $12 million. Retail sales and sales of cigarettes and tobacco exceeded $10 million. Income taxes from employes serving the tourist industry reached $20 million.

In addition to our wealth of recreational pleasures, Massachusetts will play host this year to the world's foremost amateur tennis championships when the Longwood Cricket Club in Chestnut Hill stages the first combined National Singles and Doubles in its long history.

Another world famous event that will emblazon the name of Massachusetts in the press and over nationwide television this year will be the 1968 Kemper $150,000 open invitational golf tournament at Pleasant Valley Country Club in Sutton from Sept. 9 to Sept. 15.

On the more aesthetic side, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to its summer home in Tanglewood contemporary trends concerts on four consecutive Wednesday evenings beginning July 10.

These unusual presentations will explore several contemporary trends in modern music at the highest artistic level — jazz, non-western, folk-rock and musical satire. The concerts will be an extension of the festival of contemporary American Music presented by the BSO in cooperation with the Fromm Music Center of Chicago.

The charm of our Massachusetts villages, the excellence of our educational institutions, the opportunities afforded by growing industrial and oceanographic enterprises, induce many to seek employment here or businessmen to relocate a branch plant here or our existing industries to further expand, encouraged by their ability to obtain and retain highly talented staffs.

Tourism, therefore, benefits our economy in many ways in addition to providing over $78 million in tax receipts and furnishing employment for thousands of our citizenry.

LODGING AND FOOD-SERVICE NEWS
BOSTON, MASS.
047
JUN 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Opens 1968 Session at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center last week at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., greeted the students in the Tanglewood Theater-Concert Hall. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the B. S. O., led the students in the traditional singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." The Thompson "Alleluia" was composed for the opening exercises at the founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and has been sung at the opening of each session since then.

Principal Address

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Leinsdorf spoke on the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm."

Mr. Leinsdorf added that its work had affected the history of American music: "There is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni," he said, "nor a community in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period of the session, and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers.

Student Participation

Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. The Boston University Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theater, and dance. The New England Conservatory offers two programs, contemporary composition, and a seminar in non-western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, and advanced instrumental techniques.

Several new faculty appointments and guest lecturers are announced for 1968. The distinguished composer Ernst Krenek will be teacher of composition and contemporary music. Guest lecturers in contemporary music will be Robert Cogan, Earle Brown, Mario Davidovsky, and Andrew Imbrie. Cogan and Davidovsky are alumni of the Berkshire Music Center. Mac Morgan, also an alumnus of th B. M. C., joins the faculty as teacher of voice. John Oliver will be teacher of choral music, and Paul Zukofsky, teacher of chamber music. Gilbert Kalish, William Kroll, Roman Totenberg, and Mr. Zukofsky will participate in a series of faculty recitals. Joseph Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Silverstein is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Assistant director is Louis Speyer. Gunther Schuller is head of contemporary music activities, and Charles Wilson is head of vocal music activities.

Guest Conductor

It was also announced that Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, will return to the Berkshire Music Center as a guest conductor of the B. M. C. orchestra. Copland, who will also appear as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 23, was recently given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for "Distinguished Achievement" in American music, including establishing the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and teaching there for more than two decades.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented Aug. 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. Composers Mark DeVoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival Within A Festival," as B. M. C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

On July 17, 24, and 31, a series of contemporary trends concerts will be given under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The program titles are: July 17, Jazz-Folk; July 24, Music from India; July 31, Rock.

New Trends

Commenting that "A wide spectrum of ethnic and popular musics" has in recent years become increasingly available to musicians and the interested musical audience, Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the B. M. C. added that he thought it "significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center institute a series of concerts delineating these new trends and introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." At the Berkshire Music Center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, Aug. 25, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival.

Claude Frank, pianist, will be featured in an all Mozart program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, this afternoon. Mr. Frank will play Mozart's piano concerto No. 17 in G major K.453.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 7 1968 New England Newsclip

10.

Berkshire Music Center Opens At Tanglewood

Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center this afternoon at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr., greeted the students in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the B.S.O., led the students in the traditional singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." The Thompson "Alleluia" was composed for the opening exercises at the founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and has been sung at the opening of each session since then.

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Leinsdorf spoke on the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm." Mr. Leinsdorf added that its work had affected the history of American music: "There is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni," he said, "nor a community in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period of the session, and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. The Boston University Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theatre, and dance. The New England Conservatory offers two programs, contemporary composition, and a seminar in non-western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, and advanced instrumental techniques.

Several new faculty appointments and guest lecturers are announced for 1968. The distinguished composer Ernst Krenek will be teacher of composition and contemporary music. Guest lecturers in contemporary music will be Robert Cogan, Earle Brown, Mario Davidovsky, and Andrew Imbrie. Mr. Cogan and Mr. Davidovsky are alumni of the Berkshire Music Center. Mac Morgan, also an alumnus of the B.M.C., joins the faculty as teacher of voice. John Oliver will be teacher of choral music, and Paul Zukofsky, teacher of chamber music. Gibert Kalish, William Kroll, Roman Totenberg, and Mr. Zukofsky will participate in a series of faculty recitals. Joseph Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Silverstein is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Assistant director is Louis Speyer. Gunther Schuller is head of contemporary music activities, and Charles Wilson is head of vocal music activities.

It was also announced that Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, will return to the Berkshire Music Center as a guest conductor of the B.M.C. orchestra. Mr. Copland, who will also appear as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 23, was recently given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for "Distinguished Achievement" in American music, including establishing the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and teaching there for more than two decades.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented August 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. Composers Mark DeVoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival Within A Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

On July 17, 24, and 31, a series of contemporary trends concerts will be given under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The program titles are: July 17, Jazz-Folk; July 24, Music from India; July 31, Rock. Commenting that "A wide spectrum of ethnic and popular musics" has in recent years become increasingly available to musicians and the interested musical audience, Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the B.M.C. added that he thought it "significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center institute a series of concerts delineating these new trends and introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." At the Berkshire Music Center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, Aug. 25, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

JUL 2 1968 New England Newsclip

sight and sound

Music Changes in Berkshires

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

Winds of change are always blowing. This summer, at Tanglewood in Lenox, for 37 years a seat of so-called serious music, there will be three concerts of jazz, folk music and rock; and at the nearby Music Inn, for about 20 years a seat of jazz and folk music, there will be a series of small-ensemble baroque concerts.

The Tanglewood concerts are being called "Trend Concerts" and are scheduled for three consecutive Wednesdays.

Some of Performers

To appear July 17 are Judy Collins, folk singer; the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Don Ellis Orchestra. Scheduled July 24 is Ravi Shankar, the Indian sitar player, and on July 31 the walls will rock with the sound of the youth group called The Association.

Presumably none of these events will ripple the bland waters of the traditional Berkshire Festival.

The changes at the Music Inn farther down the slope in the Stockbridge Bowl are more profound.

The attached Music Barn has been known for its summer jazz since World War II and many world-famous jazz figures (Dave Brubeck, for instance) attracted attention there at the beginning of their careers.

Inn Has New Owner

A few weeks ago the inn changed hands, and the new owner, Leopoldo Romero, owner of the Casa Mexico, a restaurant in Cambridge, abandoned the Music Barn and rebuilt a section of the inn to form a 608-seat concert hall.

He enlisted the aid of Daniel Antoun, who studied conducting with Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin in Boston and founded the Contemporary Baroque Ensemble, which has presented concerts in the New York area.

Antoun has collected a group of 24 musicians which he hopes to establish as "a sort of repertory orchestra." He has launched a season of concerts called the "Talin Music Festival."

It started last Saturday with a concert of music by Handel and Alan Hovhaness. The "Talin Viola Concerto" by Hovhaness was on the program, which accounts for the name of the festival.

Eight-Week Series Starts

Talin (pronounced taleen) is the name of a 7th-century cathedral in Armenia which inspired the concerto.

There were two more concerts Sunday, one a solo performance of Bach's "Goldberg Variations" and the other an all-Bach program of instrumental ensemble works.

The festival settled down in earnest Thursday, however, to begin an eight-week series of concerts on Thursdays at 8, Saturdays at 3 and Sundays at 8 of mostly baroque works with an occasional contemporary piece.

The Thursday series is planned to consist of works for small ensembles. . .duets, trios, quartets. . .and the weekend concerts of larger works calling for a chamber orchestra of up to 24 players.

Program Survey

A survey of programs may give a hint of the festival's intentions:

Thursday there were five concertos by Vivaldi.

Saturday there will be three concertos by Vivaldi, a canon by Purcell, a concerto by Locatelli and Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2."

Sunday there will be two concertos by Vivaldi, a canon by Purcell, a concerto by Abaco and Britten's "Simple Symphony."

July 11 the program will consist of music for one and two harpsichords by Scarlatti, Martinu, Hassler, LeRoux, Couperin and Pinkham (which seems to be more 20th than 18th-century).

Some Seldom Heard

The program July 13 will be all baroque: Bach, Vivaldi, Handel and Alessandro Scarlatti.

Although some of the programmed music will be familiar (like Brandenburg Concertos), much of it will be seldom-heard material.

But unless the list of some of the forthcoming programs issued by the press representative contains a serious error, some of the works will be repeated on succeeding programs: three of the pieces listed for Saturday also appear on the Sunday list.

Anyway, I shall be there to collect information for a first-hand report of this newest of music festivals in the Berkshires.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsclip

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 221,733 SUN. 321,833

JUN 2 1968

Tanglewood Opens June 30

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center will open its 1968 session at Tanglewood on Sunday, June 30.

The Music Center again will be under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Special Events Spell SRO For Bay State

By LAWRENCE FLYNN
Deputy Commissioner
Mass. Dept. Of Commerce & Development

As we shift the scenes on our exciting seasons and make ready to raise the curtain on our summer extravaganza, Massachusetts looks forward to hanging out its "standing room only" sign throughout 1968.

The contribution of tourism to the Comonwealth's economy is substantial. Expenditures by visitors during the fiscal year 1967 were estimated at better than $1 billion. Tourists — defined as travelers not on business who stay away from home overnight—contributed some $78 million in taxes to the state's revenue during that period.

Meals and room occupancy taxes went to $12 million. Retail sales and sales of cigarettes and tobacco exceeded $10 million. Income taxes from employes serving the tourist industry reached $20 million.

In addition to our wealth of recreational pleasures, Massachusetts will play host this year to the world's foremost amateur tennis championships when the Longwood Cricket Club in Chestnut Hill stages the first combined National Singles and Doubles in its long history.

Another world famous event that will emblazon the name of Massachusetts in the press and over nationwide television this year will be the 1968 Kemper $150,000 open invitational golf tournament at Pleasant Valley Country Club in Sutton from Sept. 9 to Sept. 15.

On the more aesthetic side, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to its summer home in Tanglewood contemporary trends concerts on four consecutive Wednesday evenings beginning July 10.

These unusual presentations will explore several contemporary trends in modern music at the highest artistic level — jazz, non-western, folk-rock and musical satire. The concerts will be an extension of the festival of contemporary American Music presented by the BSO in cooperation with the Fromm Music Center of Chicago.

The charm of our Massachusetts villages, the excellence of our educational institutions, the opportunities afforded by growing industrial and oceanographic enterprises, induce many to seek employment here or businessmen to relocate a branch plant here or our existing industries to further expand, encouraged by their ability to obtain and retain highly talented staffs.

Tourism, therefore, benefits our economy in many ways in addition to providing over $78 million in tax receipts and furnishing employment for thousands of our citizenry.

LODGING AND FOOD SERVICE NEWS
BOSTON, MASS.
047
JUN 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Opens 1968 Session at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center last week at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., greeted the students in the Tanglewood Theater-Concert Hall. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the B. S. O., led the students in the traditional singing of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia." The Thompson "Alleluia" was composed for the opening exercises at the founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and has been sung at the opening of each session since then.

Claude Frank, pianist, will be featured in an all Mozart program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, this afternoon. Mr. Frank will play Mozart's piano concerto No. 17 in G major K.453.

Principal Address

The principal address was given by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Leinsdorf spoke on the role of the Berkshire Music Center in the music world, calling it "a great orchestra's great educational arm."

Mr. Leinsdorf added that its work had affected the history of American music: "There is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni," he said, "nor a community in which Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

Out of the total of 400 students attending the 1968 session, some 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship Program provides free tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week period of the session, and is designed for young musicians who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers.

Student Participation

Over 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. The Boston University Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theater, and dance. The New England Conservatory offers two programs, contemporary composition, and a seminar in non-western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, and advanced instrumental techniques.

Several new faculty appointments and guest lecturers are announced for 1968. The distinguished composer Ernst Krenek will be teacher of composition and contemporary music. Guest lecturers in contemporary music will be Robert Cogan, Earle Brown, Mario Davidovsky, and Andrew Imbrie. Cogan and Davidovsky are alumni of the Berkshire Music Center. Mac Morgan, also an alumnus of th B. M. C., joins the faculty as teacher of voice. John Oliver will be teacher of choral music, and Paul Zukofsky, teacher of chamber music. Gilbert Kalish, William Kroll, Roman Totenberg, and Mr. Zukofsky will participate in a series of faculty recitals. Joseph Silverstein is chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Silverstein is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Assistant director is Louis Speyer. Gunther Schuller is head of contemporary music activities, and Charles Wilson is head of vocal music activities.

Guest Conductor

It was also announced that Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty emeritus, will return to the Berkshire Music Center as a guest conductor of the B. M. C. orchestra. Copland, who will also appear as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 23, was recently given the 1968 Laurel Leaf Award of the American Composers Alliance for "Distinguished Achievement" in American music, including establishing the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and teaching there for more than two decades.

Among the special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented Aug. 5-10 in association with the Fromm Music Foundation. Composers Mark DeVoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival Within A Festival," as B. M. C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

On July 17, 24, and 31, a series of contemporary trends concerts will be given under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The program titles are: July 17, Jazz-Folk; July 24, Music from India; July 31, Rock.

New Trends

Commenting that "A wide spectrum of ethnic and popular musics" has in recent years become increasingly available to musicians and the interested musical audience, Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the B. M. C. added that he thought it "significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center institute a series of concerts delineating these new trends and introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

This summer, a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities will make it possible for up to 32 busloads of disadvantaged children primarily from the urban areas of Massachusetts, to visit Tanglewood as part of a program to be called "A Day in the Arts." At the Berkshire Music Center, the children will witness rehearsals and concerts and talk with faculty and students.

The 1968 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, Aug. 25, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 7 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to Feature Choral Music

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music

Choral music will be an important part of the forthcoming Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood to be held from July 5 through August 25.

Seven concerts of the eight weekends' regular 24 concerts will have music for chorus and-or vocal soloists.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony may consider choral music to be some of the festival's most important fare.

Prominent space and mention are given choral music in a complete listing of programs.

Special emphasis is placed on the Saturday evening, Aug. 24 program, which includes the "first concert performance of the Finale from Wagner's opera, "Das Rheingold."

Soloists will be Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas and David Ward.

Closing Music

The opera's closing music, "Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla" is frequently heard at symphony concerts and was performed, without voices, at the 1917 Worcester Music Festival.

The Berkshire Music Festival has the services of three choral groups — the Tanglewood Choir, a smaller number of selected voices from the Berkshire Music Center, a larger group called the Berkshire Chorus, and the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston which is regularly conducted by Alfred Nash Patterson of the Worcester Festival.

Because the center's students do not assemble until June 30, they will not make an appearance at the festival until Saturday, July 13, when Leinsdorf conducts Haydn's "Lord Nelson" Mass.

The Tanglewood Choir will take part in the Haydn, with soloists Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di Giuseppe, and Paul Plishka.

Tanglewood Choir

Berkshire Chorus will join the Tanglewood Choir for the first time on Saturday evening, July 27, for the Brahms Requiem. Leinsdorf will conduct and the soloists are Miss Endich and Sherrill Milnes.

Patterson's Chorus Pro Musica will be heard Saturday evening, Aug 17, in Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet." The conductor will be Charles Munch, and soloists, Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, and Giorgio Tozzi.

Soprano Beverly Sills will be soloist at the Mozart concert on Saturday evening, July 6. Other choral music will be Bach's Cantata No. 51 on Saturday evening, July 13 (Miss Endich, soloist), Bach's Cantata No. 35 on Sunday afternoon, July 14 (Miss Wolff, soloist), and Brahms' "Gesang der Parzen," "Schicksalsleid," and "Nannie" at the festival's closing concert on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 25.

FESTIVAL DUPLICATE

The Cleveland Orchestra's new summer home, Blossom Music Center, is patterned conspicuously after the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, summer home of the New York City Ballet and Philadelphia Orchestra.

July 19 is the housewarming and George Szell in their new for the Cleveland Orchestra $6,605,000 home.

The orchestra will give 18 concerts under seven conductors from the opening through Aug. 25. New York City Ballet will perform three programs on Aug. 30 and 31, and Sept. 1.

Guest conductors are Munch, Louis Lane, William Steinberg, Robert Shaw, Aaron Copland, and Karel Ancerl.

As at Saratoga, a number of "special attractions" will punctuate the orchestral and ballet programs.

These include Judy Collins and Arlo Guthrie, a "Mod" night, Herb Albert and the Tijuana Brass, Ravi Shankar, The Young Americans and Serendipity Singers, and Harry Belafonte.

The festival will end with a jazz night, Sept. 2, featuring Louis Armstrong and his All Stars.

Blossom Center accomodates 4,600 listeners in its sheltered pavilion and 10,000 on its sloping lawn.

AVANT GARDE

In 1958, after Alberto Ginastera's opera, "Bomarzo," had been banned in his native Argentina for being naughty, it received an eager and highly successful performance at the first Inter-American Music Festival in Washington D.C.

The same organization will embark on its fourth festival June 19, presenting ten concerts of new, avant garde music from more than 50 composers of Canada, United States, Spain and 12 Latin American countries.

Programs will be given through June 30 in three locations — Merriweather Post Pavilion, Coolidge Auditorium of the Library of Congress, and Department of Commerce Auditorium.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

MAY 12 1968 New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,425

JAN 21 1967

Boston Symphony Seeks Singers For New Chorus at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is seeking singers for a new Berkshire Chorus which will join with the Festival Chorus to participate in this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts. During the eight-week Tanglewood season the chorus will sing works by Bach, Beethoven and Verdi.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will train the chorus, will begin auditions for all interested persons over the age of 18 on February 1, at the Windsor Mountain School theater located on West Street, Lenox. Members of the chorus will be drawn from western Massachusetts, the tri-city area of New York and environs. M. Lewis Spratlan Jr. an instructor at Baypath Community College and teacher of choral music at the Berkshire Music Center, will assist Mr. Wilson.

Rehearsal dates for the Berkshire Chorus will be announced shortly.

Those interested in singing in the new chorus should write immediately to Berkshire Chorus, Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts, 02115.

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 79,331

JAN 21 1967

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

JAN 21 1967 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200

JAN 23 1967 New England Newsclip

New Chorus Sought for Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is seeking singers for a new Berkshire Chorus which will join the Festival Chorus in this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, who will train the chorus, will begin auditions Wednesday at the Windsor Mountain School Theater in Lenox, Mass. The members of the chorus will be drawn from western Massachusetts and the Capital District. Auditions are limited to persons over 18.

During the eight-week Tanglewood season the Berkshire Chorus will sing in works by Bach, Beethoven and Verdi. Rehearsal dates will be announced later.

Further information may be obtained by writing to Berkshire Chorus, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

JAN 27 1967

Places Are Still Open In Berkshire Chorus

Positions in the Berkshire Chorus, particularly for male voices, are still open, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced.

Members of the chorus are to be drawn from Western Massachusetts, the tri-city area of New York and environs. During the eight-week Tanglewood season the Berkshire Chorus will perform works by Bach, Beethoven, and Verdi. All rehearsals have been scheduled in the evening so that they will not interfere with normal working hours.

M. Lewis Spratlan, teacher of choral music at the Berkshire Music Center, will assist Wilson in the preparation of the chorus. Audition appointments and further information may be obtained by writing or calling Berkshire Chorus Symphony Hall, Boston.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

FEB 8 1967 New England Newsc

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

FEB 21 1967 New England Newsclip

AUDITIONS MARCH 30

Auditions for instrumentalists, singers and pianists for the Berkshire Music Center conducted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, will be held March 30 from 1 to 4 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Applicants must be at least 18 years old.

TIMES (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 635,600

FEB 21 1967 New England Newscl

Tanglewood Audition Dates Listed by Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony has announced that New York auditions for fellowships to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be held from March 1 to 4 and from April 12 to 15 in Room 856 of Carnegie Hall.

The auditions are open to singers, pianists and players of string, woodwind or brass instruments who are at least 18 years old.

Berkshire Music Center Fellows take part in the center's chamber-music and orchestra programs and may attend rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony. The 1967 session will run from June 25 through Aug. 19.

Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500

FEB 22 1967 New Engl News

Regional Audition For Music Grants

The Berkshire Music Center, summer educational center for advanced study in music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., has announced locations for its 1967 fellowship program. The minimum age for full fellows is 21 and for 18 for associate fellows.

Auditions in Boston will take place on Thursday, March 30, at Symphony Hall from 1 to 4 p.m. for instrumentalists, singers and pianists. Other regional auditions will also be held in March and April in New York City, Rochester, N.Y., Bloomington, Ind., Chicago, Ann Arbor, Mich., and Philadelphia.

BSO Seeking Male Voices For Tanglewood

Positions in the Berkshire Chorus, particularly for male voices, are still available, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced. The first auditions took place on Feb. 1 with others scheduled within a few days.

Members of the chorus are to be drawn from Western Massachusetts, the tri-city area of New York and environs. During the eight-week Tanglewood season with Berkshire Chorus will perform works by Bach, Beethoven and Verdi. All rehearsals have been scheduled in the evening so that they will not interfere with normal working hours.

M. Lewis Spratlan, teacher of choral music at the Berkshire Music Center, will assist Mr. Wilson in the preparation of the chorus. Audition appointments and further information can be obtained by writing or calling immediately: Berkshire Chorus, Symphony Hall, Boston.

11.

Ravi Shankar To Teach At Tanglewood

BOSTON — Sitar performer Ravi Shankar, leading exponent of Indian music, is one of several musical authorities who will serve as faculty instructors at the NKEW England Conservatory's annual summer Institute at Tanglewood, according to a Conservatory president, Gunther Schuller.

Under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center, the Institute is to be held in Lenox from July 14 through Aug. 25. The twin points of emphasis will be music education and contemporary music, according to its director, Donald Harris.

The six-week Institute program is designed for the benefit of music educators, composers, professional musicians, and graduate students in music.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

MAY 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Shankar To Teach

Ravi Shankar, the Indian sitar player whom a cartoonist once characterized as the Lawrence Welk of the Hippie set, will teach a course at the New England Conservatory's annual summer institute at Tanglewood.

The courses will carry graduate credit at the Conservatory. Tanglewood, in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, has been the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1936.

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

MAY 16 1968 New Englanc Newscli

Boston Symphony Seeks Singers

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is seeking singers for a new Berkshire Chorus, which will join the festival chorus to participate in this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts. During the eight-week Tanglewood season, the chorus will sing in works by Bach, Beethoven and Verdi. Auditions for all interested persons above the age of 18, will begin at Windsor Mountain School theater Feb. 1.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,300

JAN 23 1967 N En Nev

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 1 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200

FEB 9 1967 New England Newsclip

400 Students Open Season At Tanglewood

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center, with a total of 400 students signed up for the 1968 season.

Of these 165 will be fellows of the Center. Under the fellowship program, tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week season are paid.

More than 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. Among these programs are those in art, theatre, dance, contemporary composition, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, advanced instrumental techniques and a seminar in non-Western music.

Speaking at yesterday's opening were Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO), and Erich Leinsdorf, who will retire at the end of this season as BSO conductor.

Tanglewood to Feature Choral Music

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music

Choral music will be an important part of the forthcoming Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood to be held from July 5 through August 25.

Seven concerts of the eight weekends' regular 24 concerts will have music for chorus and-or vocal soloists.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony may consider choral music to be some of the festival's most important fare.

Prominent space and mention are given choral music in a complete listing of programs.

Special emphasis is placed on the Saturday evening, Aug. 24 program, which includes the "first concert performance of the Finale from Wagner's opera, "Das Rheingold."

Soloists will be Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas and David Ward.

Closing Music

The opera's closing music, "Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla" is frequently heard at symphony concerts and was performed, without voices, at the 1917 Worcester Music Festival.

The Berkshire Music Festival has the services of three choral groups — the Tanglewood Choir, a smaller number of selected voices from the Berkshire Music Center, a larger group called the Berkshire Chorus, and the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston which is regularly conducted by Alfred Nash Patterson of the Worcester Festival.

Because the center's students do not assemble until June 30, they will not make an appearance at the festival until Saturday, July 13, when Leinsdorf conducts Haydn's "Lord Nelson" Mass.

The Tanglewood Choir will take part in the Haydn, with soloists Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di Giuseppe, and Paul Plishka.

Tanglewood Choir

Berkshire Chorus will join the Tanglewood Choir for the first time on Saturday evening, July 27, for the Brahms Requiem. Leinsdorf will conduct and the soloists are Miss Endich and Sherrill Milnes.

Patterson's Chorus Pro Musica will be heard Saturday evening, Aug 17, in Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet." The conductor will be Charles Munch, and soloists, Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, and Giorgio Tozzi.

Soprano Beverly Sills will be soloist at the Mozart concert on Saturday evening, July 6. Other choral music will be Bach's Cantata No. 51 on Saturday evening, July 13 (Miss Endich, soloist), Bach's Cantata No. 35 on Sunday afternoon, July 14 (Miss Wolff, soloist), and Brahms' "Gesang der Parzen," "Schicksalsleid," and "Nannie" at the festival's closing concert on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 25.

FESTIVAL DUPLICATE

The Cleveland Orchestra's new summer home, Blossom Music Center, is patterned conspicuously after the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, summer home of the New York City Ballet and Philadelphia Orchestra.

July 19 is the housewarming and George Szell in their new for the Cleveland Orchestra $6,605,000 home.

The orchestra will give 18 concerts under seven conductors from the opening through Aug. 25. New York City Ballet will perform three programs on Aug. 30 and 31, and Sept. 1.

Guest conductors are Munch, Louis Lane, William Steinberg, Robert Shaw, Aaron Copland, and Karel Ancerl.

As at Saratoga, a number of "special attractions" will punctuate the orchestral and ballet programs.

These include Judy Collins and Arlo Guthrie, a "Mod" night, Herb Albert and the Tijuana Brass, Ravi Shankar, The Young Americans and Serendipity Singers, and Harry Belafonte.

The festival will end with a jazz night, Sept. 2, featuring Louis Armstrong and his All Stars.

Blossom Center accomodates 4,600 listeners in its sheltered pavilion and 10,000 on its sloping lawn.

AVANT GARDE

In 1958, after Alberto Ginastera's opera, "Bomarzo," had been banned in his native Argentina for being naughty, it received an eager and highly successful performance at the first Inter-American Music Festival in Washington D.C.

The same organization will embark on its fourth festival June 19, presenting ten concerts of new, avant garde music from more than 50 composers of Canada, United States, Spain and 12 Latin American countries.

Programs will be given through June 30 in three locations — Merriweather Post Pavilion, Coolidge Auditorium of the Library of Congress, and Department of Commerce Auditorium.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

MAY 12 1968 New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,425

JAN 21 1967

Boston Symphony Seeks Singers For New Chorus at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is seeking singers for a new Berkshire Chorus which will join with the Festival Chorus to participate in this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts. During the eight-week Tanglewood season the chorus will sing works by Bach, Beethoven and Verdi.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will train the chorus, will begin auditions for all interested persons over the age of 18 on February 1, at the Windsor Mountain School theater located on West Street, Lenox. Members of the chorus will be drawn from western Massachusetts, the tri-city area of New York and environs. M. Lewis Spratlan Jr. an instructor at Baypath Community College and teacher of choral music at the Berkshire Music Center, will assist Mr. Wilson.

Rehearsal dates for the Berkshire Chorus will be announced shortly.

Those interested in singing in the new chorus should write immediately to Berkshire Chorus, Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts, 02115.

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 79,331

JAN 21 1967

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

JAN 21 1967 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200

JAN 23 1967 New England Newsclip

New Chorus Sought for Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is seeking singers for a new Berkshire Chorus which will join the Festival Chorus in this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, who will train the chorus, will begin auditions Wednesday at the Windsor Mountain School Theater in Lenox, Mass. The members of the chorus will be drawn from western Massachusetts and the Capital District. Auditions are limited to persons over 18.

During the eight-week Tanglewood season the Berkshire Chorus will sing in works by Bach, Beethoven and Verdi. Rehearsal dates will be announced later.

Further information may be obtained by writing to Berkshire Chorus, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

JAN 27 1967

Places Are Still Open In Berkshire Chorus

Positions in the Berkshire Chorus, particularly for male voices, are still open, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced.

Members of the chorus are to be drawn from Western Massachusetts, the tri-city area of New York and environs. During the eight-week Tanglewood season the Berkshire Chorus will perform works by Bach, Beethoven, and Verdi. All rehearsals have been scheduled in the evening so that they will not interfere with normal working hours.

M. Lewis Spratlan, teacher of choral music at the Berkshire Music Center, will assist Wilson in the preparation of the chorus. Audition appointments and further information may be obtained by writing or calling Berkshire Chorus, Symphony Hall, Boston.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

FEB 8 1967 New England Newsc

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

FEB 21 1967 New England Newsclip

AUDITIONS MARCH 30

Auditions for instrumentalists, singers and pianists for the Berkshire Music Center conducted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, will be held March 30 from 1 to 4 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Applicants must be at least 18 years old.

TIMES (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 635,600

FEB 21 1967 New England Newscl

Tanglewood Audition Dates Listed by Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony has announced ~~that New York~~ auditions for fellowships to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be held from March 1 to 4 and from April 12 to 15 in Room 856 of Carnegie Hall.

The auditions are open to singers, pianists and players of string, woodwind or brass instruments who are at least 18 years old.

Berkshire Music Center Fellows take part in the center's chamber-music and orchestra programs and may attend rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony. The 1967 session will run from June 25 through Aug. 19.

Complete information may be obtained by writing to the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500

FEB 22 1967 New Engl News

Regional Audition For Music Grants

The Berkshire Music Center, summer educational center for advanced study in music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., has announced locations for its 1967 fellowship program. The minimum age for full fellows is 21 and for 18 for associate fellows.

Auditions in Boston will take place on Thursday, March 30, at Symphony Hall from 1 to 4 p.m. for instrumentalists, singers and pianists. Other regional auditions will also be held in March and April in New York City, Rochester, N.Y., Bloomington, Ind., Chicago, Ann Arbor, Mich., and Philadelphia.

BSO Seeking Male Voices For Tanglewood

Positions in the Berkshire Chorus, particularly for male voices, are still available, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced. The first auditions took place on Feb. 1 with others scheduled within a few days.

Members of the chorus are to be drawn from Western Massachusetts, the tri-city area of New York and environs. During the eight-week Tanglewood season with Berkshire Chorus will perform works by Bach, Beethoven and Verdi. All rehearsals have been scheduled in the evening so that they will not interfere with normal working hours.

M. Lewis Spratlan, teacher of choral music at the Berkshire Music Center, will assist Mr. Wilson in the preparation of the chorus. Audition appointments and further information can be obtained by writing or calling immediately: Berkshire Chorus, Symphony Hall, Boston.

11.

Ravi Shankar To Teach At Tanglewood

BOSTON — Sitar performer Ravi Shankar, leading exponent of Indian music, is one of several musical authorities who will serve as faculty instructors at the NKEW England Conservatory's annual summer Institute at Tanglewood, according to a Conservatory president, Gunther Schuller.

Under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center, the Institute is to be held in Lenox from July 14 through Aug. 25. The twin points of emphasis will be music education and contemporary music, according to its director, Donald Harris.

The six-week Institute program is designed for the benefit of music educators, composers, professional musicians, and graduate students in music.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

MAY 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Shankar To Teach

Ravi Shankar, the Indian sitar player whom a cartoonist once characterized as the Lawrence Welk of the Hippie set, will teach a course at the New England Conservatory's annual summer institute at Tanglewood.

The courses will carry graduate credit at the Conservatory. Tanglewood, in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, has been the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1936.

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

MAY 16 1968 New Englanc Newscli

Boston Symphony Seeks Singers

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is seeking singers for a new Berkshire Chorus, which will join the festival chorus to participate in this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts. During the eight-week Tanglewood season, the chorus will sing in works by Bach, Beethoven and Verdi. Auditions for all interested persons above the age of 18, will begin at Windsor Mountain School theater Feb. 1.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,300

JAN 23 1967 N En Ne

400 Students Open Season At Tanglewood

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday opened the 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center, with a total of 400 students signed up for the 1968 season.

Of these 165 will be fellows of the Center. Under the fellowship program, tuition and a basic stipend for the eight-week season are paid.

More than 200 students will participate in programs offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. Among these programs are those in art, theatre, dance, contemporary composition, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, advanced instrumental techniques and a seminar in non-Western music.

Speaking at yesterday's opening were Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO), and Erich Leinsdorf, who will retire at the end of this season as BSO conductor.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 1 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200

FEB 9 1967 New England Newsclip

Around the Arts

12.

Music and Dance

Ravinia Festival (Ravinia Pavilion, Chicago; June 27-Aug. 10). Four world premieres, including Ernest Krenek's Perspectives (July 6) and Easley Blackwood's Symphony No. 4 (Aug. 4), punctuate the standard fare at Chicago's annual outdoor series, played by the Chicago Symphony under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

San Diego Ballet Company (Ballet Center, San Diego; July 5-Aug. 24). Previews of a new ballet choreographed by Eugene Loring and premieres of new works by Wayne Davis and Canda Roush are featured in the West Coast troupe's summer season.

Berkshire Music Festival (Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass.; July 5-Aug. 25). The Boston Symphony Orchestra is back at its familiar sylvan stand, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf and others, in the nation's best-known series of hot-weather concerts.

Shakespeare Opera Festival (Glens Falls, N.Y.; July 13-Aug. 25). On a thrust stage reminiscent of the Bard's Globe Theatre, the Lake George Opera Company presents the world premiere of David Amram's Twelfth Night (Aug. 1) and four other operas based on Shakespearean plays.

Music at Saratoga (Performing Arts Center, Saratoga, N.Y.; Aug. 1-25). The Argentine Alberto Ginastera's Psalm 150, for Chorus and Orchestra will receive its North American premiere during this four-week season by the Philadelphia Orchestra, led by Eugene Ormandy and others in the fabled racing community.

Television Highlights

Monday, June 10

The Champions. The premiere of a summer series on an international crime-fighting outfit in Geneva (NBC: 8-9 p.m., EDT).

Friday, June 14

The Art Game. A worth-while documentary on the ways to make money, and lose it, in the international world of buying original art works (NBC: 8:30-9:30 p.m., EDT).

American Profile: Music From the Land. A repeat look at the fantastically successful world of country music, with performances by many country-and-Western stars (NBC: 10-11 p.m., EDT).

On the Screen

Boom (Universal, color). The Burtons jaw through a Tennessee Williams morality play. Drama.

Trans Europ Express (Trans American). Grand fun in a movie about the making of a movie. Comedy.

The Swimmer (Columbia, color). Burt Lancaster on a metaphysical trip through suburbia. Drama.

The Odd Couple (Paramount, color). Walter Matthau interprets Neil Simon. Comedy.

War and Peace (Continental, color). Tolstoy's novel in 6½ hours. Drama.

Hour of the Wolf (Lopert). Director Ingmar Bergman leads a trip into madness. Drama.

Belle de Jour (Allied Artists, color). Shocks and insight from a parable of modern woman. Drama.

The Young Girls of Rochefort (Warner Bros.-Seven Arts, color). Happy melodies, mellow hues, pretty girls. Musical.

Closely Watched Trains (Sigma III). The Oscar foreign-language winner, and deservedly so. Comedy-drama.

Elvira Madigan (Cinema V, color). The last word in color cinematography. Drama.

The Graduate (Embassy, color). A young man grows up. Comedy.

The Fox (Claridge, color). A sensitive treatment of D. H. Lawrence's triangular novella. Drama.

Berkshires Offer Variety Of Cultural Activity

By FRANCINE TREVENS

There are four major attractions in the Berkshires to lure culturally inclined visitors.

The Berkshire Theater Festival in Stockbridge, one of the newer ventures, is showing only original plays this season. It is an opportunity to see pre-Broadway in-process productions. Elaine May's show, "A Matter of Position," which closed last week, is a clear indication of the sort of experimental work that is being done, with superior stars and directors, and scripts very much in the state of flux. Other plays in this unique series are: William Gibson's "A Cry of Prayers" July 24 to Aug. 3; "Next," a night of comedy by Elaine May and Terrence McNally Aug. 7-17; and Jack Gelber's "The Cuban Thing," Aug. 21 to Sept. 1.

The Berkshire Music Festival, long standing tradition at Lenox, continues its eight weeks of musical enjoyment with such greats as Erich Leinsdorf, Aaron Copland, Charles Munch, Van Cliburn, Jorge Bolet, Beverly Sills, Rosalind Elias, Jess Thomas and Giorgio Tozzi.

Williamstown, a bit further out along the road and a great deal further advanced than one would expect, offers a wide range of plays, with such sharp contrasts as Greek tragedy and the contemporary, Tennessee Williams' "Camino Real" is next, July 23 to 27; and "Galileo," "The Seagull" and a musical follow.

Incidentally a most extensive and unforgettable collection of Impressionistic art is permanently on display at the Sterling and Francine Clark Museum in Williamstown. With its white walls reflecting ideal lighting, this museum is another unforgettable visual experience.

On the museum trail, hit the Crane Museum in Dalton, Mass., which offers a complete exhibit on the phases of paper making from Revolutionary to present times. Stop in at Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. on State Street, Springfield, in the next week to see the special exhibit in the library of the abstract art of city artist Murray Pertchik.

Frequent special exhibits also can be seen at George Walter Smith Art Museum and the Museum of Fine Arts, both in Springfield.

Hartford Children's Museum offers diverse interesting exhibits with live animals, historical and geographical items and delightful gardens.

Also for children, there are shows at Storrowton under the direction of Waldo Goodermote and plays by and for children at Holyoke's Theater Camp led by Marylou Carrol, now in its second season in the Mt. Tom Playhouse.

Oakdale in Wallingford, Conn., offers the famous Prince Street Players on various Thursdays.

There are other interesting and exciting events which we'll talk about later. One thing is certain, theater, music and art do not take a summer vacation in the Connecticut Valley or Berkshire Hills!

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 98,600

JUL 22 1968 New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Saturday, June 1, 1968

Art and entertainment

ART

SCHENECTADY MUSEUM GALLERY—459 State St., Monday-Friday, 10 a.m. 4 p.m.; Saturday, noon-4 p.m. Print show. Including a Rembrandt, two Goyas and local artists. Also plates and engravers' tools and exhibit. This week only.

ALBANY ART GALLERY—191 Allen St., Albany. Tuesday - Saturday, 1-9 p.m., Sunday, 2-6 p.m. Mildred Beaudette, Lora Lee Jekkals and Edward Gustove Jacobson through June.

ALBANY INSTITUTE OF HISTORY AND ART—125 Washington Ave., Albany, Tuesday-Saturday, 10 a.m.-4:30 p.m., Sunday, 2-6 p.m. Main Floor: "Operation Palette," exhibit of Navy combat art, through June 6. Second floor: Paintings, Frederic Knight, through June. Opens June 9: 33rd Annual Regional Exhibition by Artists of the Upper Hudson.

ALBANY STATE UNIVERSITY ART GALLERY — Fine Arts Building, university campus, Monday-Saturday, 9-5; Sunday, 2-5; Wednesday, 7-10 p.m. Rubbings of English monumental brasses by Townsend Rich. Work of A. William Clark, Student-faculty art show, through June 9.

CAMPUS CENTER GALLERY, Albany State University campus—Third Annual Art Show of State Art Teachers Association, Eastern Region, through June 14.

STOCKADE GALLERY—St. George's Episcopal Church Great Hall, 30 N. Ferry St., Schenectady. Opening Sunday. Collection by Paul Kent.

FLOWERLAND ART GALLERY—85 E. High St., Ballston Spa. Monday-Friday, 9-5; Saturday, 9-4. Collie Dickerson will give a demonstration of watercolor painting at a meeting of the Saratoga County Art Association Wednesday at 7:30 p.m. Exhibition of Ballston Spa High School students' art work opens June 9, and continues through June 22.

ALL SOULS UNITARIAN CHURCH—Works of Mr. and Mrs. James Lafferty. Through June 6.

COBLESKILL SIDEWALK ART SHOW—June 8. Sponsored by the Cobleskill Merchants Bureau. Paintings, ceramics and other art work of students, amateurs and professionls.

ARTS FESTIVAL—Rensselaer County Council for the Arts Annual Arts Festival, Washington Park, Second Street, Troy, June 8, 1-6 p.m.

FILMS

"KID HEARTS AND CORONETS"—Union College, Social Sciences Bldg., Rm. 16, Sunday, 7 and 9 p.m.

"SATURDAY NIGHT AND SUNDAY MORNING" — Union College, see above. June 5.

LECTURES AND DISCUSSIONS

DIALOGUE COFFEE HOUSE — 121 Ferry St., Schenectady. Open 8 p.m.-midnight, Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

MUSEUMS

BALLSTON SPA MUSEUM — West High Street. Open Saturdays and Sundays, 2-5 p.m.

STATE MUSEUM — Educational Building, Albany. Exhibits of history and anthropology. Open daily 9 a.m.-5 p.m. and Sundays 10 a.m.-5 p.m.

SCHENECTADY MUSEUM—37 Steuben St. Permanent exhibits in history, science and American Indian lore, also planetarium shows. Hours: Tuesdays-Fridays, noon-5 p.m.; Saturdays, 10 a.m.-4 p.m.; Sundays, 2:30-5 p.m. Planetarium Show, Sundays at 3 p.m.

MUSIC

SARATOGA PERFORMING ARTS CENTER — Brochures containing complete programs for the July 4-Aug. 25, 1968 season, ticket prices and order forms available from the Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y. 12866. Pre-season special events begin June 25. Mail orders for performances now being accepted.

TANGLEWOOD - BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., July 5-Aug. 25. Brochures available. Information may be obtained by writing the Festival Ticket Office at Lenox 01240.

SCHUBERT MASS IN E-FLAT MAJOR—Trinity United Methodist Church, Lark and Lancaster Sts., Albany. June 7 at 8 p.m. Allen R. Mills of Schenectady, conductor. 50-voice area chorus, 25-piece orchestra. Eleanor Bailey, Harriet Comfort, Marvin Burke, Raymond Wilson, James Kranendonk, soloists.

CAFFE LENA—45 Phila St., Saratoga Springs. Patrick Sky, folksinger and songwriter of American Indian heritage. Tonight and Sunday.

MOHONASEN—Elementary and Junior-Senior High Bands will play at Strawberry Festival, June 5, 5-8 p.m., Mohonasen High School.

"THE SHADY SULTAN"—The Schenectady Regional Ballet and Performing Arts Company will appear as guest artists in this production at Scotia-Glenville High School June 8 at 7:45 p.m.

BURNT HILLS-BALLSTON LAKE—Band festival featuring two junior high bands, senior high band, and the junior and senior high stage bands. June 4 at 8 p.m., BH-BL High School.

SARATOGA ALL-COUNTY MUSIC FESTIVAL—12 schools participating. All-conty chorus, band and orchestra. June 8, 8 p.m., at Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

JACOB'S PILLOW — Dance Festival. June 27-Aug. 31. Lee, Mass. Boston Ballett Company with Edward Villella and Patricia McBride, Pennsylvania Ballet, Maria Alba Spanish Dance Company, India's Ritha Devi, Niels Kehlet and Solveig Oestergaard of Denmark, Jean Cebron, Nala Najan, Norman Walker Company, Lotte Goslar & Others. For Brochure: Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, Box 287, Lee, Mass. 01238

THEATER

"THE AMERICAN DREAM" — And "Zoo Story," by Edward Albee, plus "Victims of Duty," by Eugene Ionesco. Tonight at 8:30, Nott Memorial Theater, Union College Mountebanks.

EVENING INDEPENDENT
MASSILLON, O.
P. M. - CIRC. 18,437

AUG-5--68 047

NX

"Ask the teacher"

By Shirley Schraub

SYMPHONY:

"Music Festival At Tanglewood" starring the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If you are anywhere in the vicinity of Tanglewood, don't miss this annual summer presentation. Ages: All. Grade: Excellent.

N.E. Vignettes

By JANICE ELLIOTT

BOSTON (AP)—The man who belonged to the "Cherry Hill gang," which led one of the most notorious prison uprisings in Massachusetts history, is now a successful car salesman.

Teddy Green, 53, and three other convicts staged an 83-hour rebellion at the old Charlestown State Prison in 1955. They held five guards hostage, but released them unharmed.

Green's former specialty was robbing banks, because, as he once told a woman social worker, "that's where the money is."

He once rode out of prison — before his term was up — in a case of rags. When apprehended four days later in Hackensack, N.J., he told the court he suffered a mental blackout and didn't realize who he was until he saw the FBI closing in on him.

That was the time he borrowed a dollar from the warden for cigarettes and paid him back the next day.

Since his parole more than a year ago, Green had turned to a life of anticrime.

He took part in a recent national police seminar at Northeastern University in Boston.

"I'm not nervous," Teddy told the 300 law enforcement officials in the audience, "but I feel like a mouse in a room full of cats."

Ravi Shankar, the Indian sitar player whom a cartoonist once characterized as the Lawrence Welk of the Hippie set, will teach a course at the New England Conservatory's annual summer institute at Tanglewood.

The courses will carry graduate credit at the Conservatory. Tanglewood, in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, has been the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1936.

A total of 200 persons and six dogs climbed Mt. Ascutney, Vt., on the second annual Ascutney Day hike and picnic.

The youngest hiker was David Pieter Hoekstra, 3, of Hanover, N.H. The oldest was Harold Austin, 72, of Woodstock, Vt., who was also the oldest when he made the first annual climb.

There was no word on the age of the dogs.

Somebody pushed the wrong button at the firehouse in Fall River, Mass., and put one fire truck, one car and an overhead door temporarily out of commission.

The door was damaged when someone pushed a button causing it to close on the roof of a department car.

A report to the City Council said the man who pushed the button didn't know the door was already open and thought he was opening it.

The damage to the truck, on loan from another department, occurred when it was moved to a different berth because of the broken door.

In backing into the new berth, the report said, the driver ran into the station, causing more than $500 damage to the truck.

When John Briggs took over the Scout Troop—while the regular scoutmaster was on his honeymoon—it was to be a temporary thing.

That was in 1910 and Briggs, 81, is still scoutmastering in Ashburnham, Mass.

One of his proudest possessions is a certificate of merit, signed by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, for the rescue of two boys from icy waters.

Briggs was 71 at the time.

NEWS-TRIBUNE (e)
WALTHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 16,400

MAY 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Around the Arts

12.

Music and Dance

Ravinia Festival (Ravinia Pavilion, Chicago; June 27-Aug. 10). Four world premieres, including Ernest Krenek's Perspectives (July 6) and Easley Blackwood's Symphony No. 4 (Aug. 4), punctuate the standard fare at Chicago's annual outdoor series, played by the Chicago Symphony under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

San Diego Ballet Company (Ballet Center, San Diego; July 5-Aug. 24). Previews of a new ballet choreographed by Eugene Loring and premieres of new works by Wayne Davis and Canda Roush are featured in the West Coast troupe's summer season.

Berkshire Music Festival (Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass.; July 5-Aug. 25). The Boston Symphony Orchestra is back at its familiar sylvan stand, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf and others, in the nation's best-known series of hot-weather concerts.

Shakespeare Opera Festival (Glens Falls, N.Y.; July 13-Aug. 25). On a thrust stage reminiscent of the Bard's Globe Theatre, the Lake George Opera Company presents the world premiere of David Amram's Twelfth Night (Aug. 1) and four other operas based on Shakespearean plays.

Music at Saratoga (Performing Arts Center, Saratoga, N.Y.; Aug. 1-25). The Argentine Alberto Ginastera's Psalm 150, for Chorus and Orchestra will receive its North American premiere during this four-week season by the Philadelphia Orchestra, led by Eugene Ormandy and others in the fabled racing community.

Television Highlights

Monday, June 10

The Champions. The premiere of a summer series on an international crime-fighting outfit in Geneva (NBC: 8-9 p.m., EDT).

Friday, June 14

The Art Game. A worth-while documentary on the ways to make money, and lose it, in the international world of buying original art works (NBC: 8:30-9:30 p.m., EDT).

American Profile: Music From the Land. A repeat look at the fantastically successful world of country music, with performances by many country-and-Western stars (NBC: 10-11 p.m., EDT).

On the Screen

Boom (Universal, color). The Burtons jaw through a Tennessee Williams morality play. Drama.

Trans Europ Express (Trans American). Grand fun in a movie about the making of a movie. Comedy.

The Swimmer (Columbia, color). Burt Lancaster on a metaphysical trip through suburbia. Drama.

The Odd Couple (Paramount, color). Walter Matthau interprets Neil Simon. Comedy.

War and Peace (Continental, color). Tolstoy's novel in 6½ hours. Drama.

Hour of the Wolf (Lopert). Director Ingmar Bergman leads a trip into madness. Drama.

Belle de Jour (Allied Artists, color). Shocks and insight from a parable of modern woman. Drama.

The Young Girls of Rochefort (Warner Bros.-Seven Arts, color). Happy melodies, mellow hues, pretty girls. Musical.

Closely Watched Trains (Sigma III). The Oscar foreign-language winner, and deservedly so. Comedy-drama.

Elvira Madigan (Cinema V, color). The last word in color cinematography. Drama.

The Graduate (Embassy, color). A young man grows up. Comedy.

The Fox (Claridge, color). A sensitive treatment of D. H. Lawrence's triangular novella. Drama.

Berkshires Offer Variety Of Cultural Activity

By FRANCINE TREVENS

There are four major attractions in the Berkshires to lure culturally inclined visitors.

The Berkshire Theater Festival in Stockbridge, one of the newer ventures, is showing only original plays this season. It is an opportunity to see pre-Broadway in-process productions. Elaine May's show, "A Matter of Position," which closed last week, is a clear indication of the sort of experimental work that is being done, with superior stars and directors, and scripts very much in the state of flux. Other plays in this unique series are: William Gibson's "A Cry of Prayers" July 24 to Aug. 3; "Next," a night of comedy by Elaine May and Terrence McNally Aug. 7-17; and Jack Gelber's "The Cuban Thing," Aug. 21 to Sept. 1.

The Berkshire Music Festival, long standing tradition at Lenox, continues its eight weeks of musical enjoyment with such greats as Erich Leinsdorf, Aaron Copland, Charles Munch, Van Cliburn, Jorge Bolet, Beverly Sills, Rosalind Elias, Jess Thomas and Giorgio Tozzi.

Williamstown, a bit further out along the road and a great deal further advanced than one would expect, offers a wide range of plays, with such sharp contrasts as Greek tragedy and the contemporary. Tennessee Williams' "Camino Real" is next, July 23 to 27; and "Galileo," "The Seagull" and a musical follow.

Incidentally a most extensive and unforgettable collection of Impressionistic art is permanently on display at the Sterling and Francine Clark Museum in Williamstown. With its white walls reflecting ideal lighting, this museum is another unforgettable visual experience.

On the museum trail, hit the Crane Museum in Dalton, Mass., which offers a complete exhibit on the phases of paper making from Revolutionary to present times. Stop in at Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. on State Street, Springfield, in the next week to see the special exhibit in the library of the abstract art of city artist Murray Pertchik.

Frequent special exhibits also can be seen at George Walter Smith Art Museum and the Museum of Fine Arts, both in Springfield.

Hartford Children's Museum offers diverse interesting exhibits with live animals, historical and geographical items and delightful gardens.

Also for children, there are shows at Storrowton under the direction of Waldo Goodermote and plays by and for children at Holyoke's Theater Camp led by Marylou Carrol, now in its second season in the Mt. Tom Playhouse.

Oakdale in Wallingford, Conn., offers the famous Prince Street Players on various Thursdays.

There are other interesting and exciting events which we'll talk about later. One thing is certain, theater, music and art do not take a summer vacation in the Connecticut Valley or Berkshire Hills!

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 98,600

JUL 22 1968 New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Sunday, June 1, 1968

Art and entertainment

ART

SCHENECTADY MUSEUM GALLERY—459 State St., Monday-Friday, 10 a.m. 4 p.m.; Saturday, noon-4 p.m. Print show. Including a Rembrandt, two Goyas and local artists. Also plates and engravers' tools and exhibit. This week only.

ALBANY ART GALLERY—191 Allen St., Albany. Tuesday - Saturday, 1-9 p.m., Sunday, 2-6 p.m. Mildred Beaudette, Lora Lee Jekkals and Edward Gustove Jacobson through June.

ALBANY INSTITUTE OF HISTORY AND ART—125 Washington Ave., Albany, Tuesday-Saturday, 10 a.m.-4:30 p.m., Sunday, 2-6 p.m. Main Floor: "Operation Palette," exhibit of Navy combat art, through June 6. Second floor: Paintings, Frederic Knight, through June. Opens June 9: 33rd Annual Regional Exhibition by Artists of the Upper Hudson.

ALBANY STATE UNIVERSITY ART GALLERY — Fine Arts Building, university campus, Monday-Saturday, 9-5; Sunday, 2-5; Wednesday, 7-10 p.m. Rubbings of English monumental brasses by Townsend Rich. Work of A. William Clark. Student-faculty art show, through June 9.

CAMPUS CENTER GALLERY, Albany State University campus—Third Annual Art Show of State Art Teachers Association, Eastern Region, through June 14.

STOCKADE GALLERY—St. George's Episcopal Church Great Hall, 30 N. Ferry St., Schenectady. Opening Sunday. Collection by Paul Kent.

FLOWERLAND ART GALLERY—85 E. High St., Ballston Spa. Monday-Friday, 9-5; Saturday, 9-4. Collie Dickerson will give a demonstration of watercolor painting at a meeting of the Saratoga County Art Association Wednesday at 7:30 p.m. Exhibition of Ballston Spa High School students' art work opens June 9, and continues through June 22.

ALL SOULS UNITARIAN CHURCH—Works of Mr. and Mrs. James Lafferty. Through June 6.

COBLESKILL SIDEWALK ART SHOW—June 8. Sponsored by the Cobleskill Merchants Bureau. Paintings, ceramics and other art work of students, amateurs and professionls.

ARTS FESTIVAL—Rensselaer County Council for the Arts Annual Arts Festival, Washington Park, Second Street, Troy, June 8, 1-6 p.m.

FILMS

"KID HEARTS AND CORONETS"—Union College, Social Sciences Bldg., Rm. 16, Sunday, 7 and 9 p.m.

"SATURDAY NIGHT AND SUNDAY MORNING" — Union College, see above. June 5.

LECTURES AND DISCUSSIONS

DIALOGUE COFFEE HOUSE — 121 Ferry St., Schenectady. Open 8 p.m.-midnight, Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

MUSEUMS

BALLSTON SPA MUSEUM — West High Street. Open Saturdays and Sundays, 2-5 p.m.

STATE MUSEUM — Educational Building, Albany. Exhibits of history and anthropology. Open daily 9 a.m.-5 p.m. and Sundays 10 a.m.-5 p.m.

SCHENECTADY MUSEUM—37 Steuben St. Permanent exhibits in history, science and American Indian lore, also planetarium shows. Hours: Tuesdays-Fridays, noon-5 p.m.; Saturdays, 10 a.m.-4 p.m.; Sundays, 2:30-5 p.m. Planetarium Show, Sundays at 3 p.m.

MUSIC

SARATOGA PERFORMING ARTS CENTER — Brochures containing complete programs for the July 4-Aug. 25, 1968 season, ticket prices and order forms available from the Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y. 12866. Pre-season special events begin June 25. Mail orders for performances now being accepted.

TANGLEWOOD - BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., July 5-Aug. 25. Brochures available. Information may be obtained by writing the Festival Ticket Office at Lenox 01240.

SCHUBERT MASS IN E-FLAT MAJOR—Trinity United Methodist Church, Lark and Lancaster Sts., Albany. June 7 at 8 p.m. Allen R. Mills of Schenectady, conductor. 50-voice area chorus, 25-piece orchestra. Eleaner Bailey, Harriet Comfort, Marvin Burke, Raymond Wilson, James Kranendonk, soloists.

CAFFE LENA—45 Phila St., Saratoga Springs. Patrick Sky, folksinger and songwriter of American Indian heritage. Tonight and Sunday.

MOHONASEN—Elementary and Junior-Senior High Bands will play at Strawberry Festival, June 5, 5-8 p.m., Mohonasen High School.

"THE SHADY SULTAN"—The Schenectady Regional Ballet and Performing Arts Company will appear as guest artists in this production at Scotia-Glenville High School June 8 at 7:45 p.m.

BURNT HILLS-BALLSTON LAKE—Band festival featuring two junior high bands, senior high band, and the junior and senior high stage bands. June 4 at 8 p.m., BH-BL High School.

SARATOGA ALL-COUNTY MUSIC FESTIVAL—12 schools participating. All-conty chorus, band and orchestra. June 3, 8 p.m., at Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

JACOB'S PILLOW — Dance Festival. June 27-Aug. 31. Lee, Mass. Boston Ballett Company with Edward Villella and Patricia McBride, Pennsylvania Ballet, Maria Alba Spanish Dance Company, India's Ritha Devi, Niels Kehlet and Solveig Oestergaard of Denmark, Jean Cebron, Nala Najan, Norman Walker Company, Lotte Goslar & Others. For Brochure: Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, Box 267, Lee, Mass. 01238

THEATER

"THE AMERICAN DREAM" — And "Zoo Story," by Edward Albee, plus "Victims of Duty," by Eugene Ionesco. Tonight at 8:30, Nott Memorial Theater. Union College Mountebanks.

EVENING INDEPENDENT
MASSILLON, O.
P. M. CIRC. 18,437

6-5-68

"Ask the teacher"

By Shirley Schraub

SYMPHONY:

"Music Festival At Tanglewood" starring the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If you are anywhere in the vicinity of Tanglewood, don't miss this annual summer presentation. Ages: All. Grade: Excellent.

N.E. Vignettes

By JANICE ELLIOTT

BOSTON (AP)—The man who belonged to the "Cherry Hill gang," which led one of the most notorious prison uprisings in Massachusetts history, is now a successful car salesman.

Teddy Green, 53, and three other convicts staged an 83-hour rebellion at the old Charlestown State Prison in 1955. They held five guards hostage, but released them unharmed.

Green's former specialty was robbing banks, because, as he once told a woman social worker, "that's where the money is."

He once rode out of prison — before his term was up — in a case of rags. When apprehended four days later in Hackensack, N.J., he told the court he suffered a mental blackout and didn't realize who he was until he saw the FBI closing in on him.

That was the time he borrowed a dollar from the warden for cigarettes and paid him back the next day.

Since his parole more than a year ago, Green had turned to a life of anticrime.

He took part in a recent national police seminar at Northeastern University in Boston.

"I'm not nervous," Teddy told the 300 law enforcement officials in the audience, "but I feel like a mouse in a room full of cats."

Ravi Shankar, the Indian sitar player whom a cartoonist once characterized as the Lawrence Welk of the Hippie set, will teach a course at the New England Conservatory's annual summer institute at Tanglewood.

The courses will carry graduate credit at the Conservatory. Tanglewood, in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, has been the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1936.

A total of 200 persons and six dogs climbed Mt. Ascutney, Vt., on the second annual Ascutney Day hike and picnic.

The youngest hiker was David Pieter Hoekstra, 3, of Hanover, N.H. The oldest was Harold Austin, 72, of Woodstock, Vt., who was also the oldest when he made the first annual climb.

There was no word on the age of the dogs.

Somebody pushed the wrong button at the firehouse in Fall River, Mass., and put one fire truck, one car and an overhead door temporarily out of commission.

The door was damaged when someone pushed a button causing it to close on the roof of a department car.

A report to the City Council said the man who pushed the button didn't know the door was already open and thought he was opening it.

The damage to the truck, on loan from another department, occurred when it was moved to a different berth because of the broken door.

In backing into the new berth, the report said, the driver ran into the station, causing more than $500 damage to the truck.

When John Briggs took over the Scout Troop—while the regular scoutmaster was on his honeymoon—it was to be a temporary thing.

That was in 1910 and Briggs, 81, is still scoutmastering in Ashburnham, Mass.

One of his proudest possessions is a certificate of merit, signed by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, for the rescue of two boys from icy waters.

Briggs was 71 at the time.

NEWS-TRIBUNE (e)
WALTHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 16,400

MAY 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Wednesday, June 26, 1968

WAMC-FM Broadcasts at Tanglewood

WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc., will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., starting Friday, July 5, at 9 p.m.

★ ★ ★

CONTINUING through the middle of August, the Berkshire Festival concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with three all-Mozart programs. On Friday, July 5, an exciting young violinist, Oliver Buswell IV, makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207 anl Serenade in D, K. 320. Buswell, a Harvard undergraduate, was featured in a television special in Boston during June.

On Saturday, July 6, at 8 p.m. the noted American soprano, Beverly Sills, joins the orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the popular "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program are Symphony No. 28, K. 200 and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525.

★ ★ ★

CLAUDE FRANK, noted pianist, will be featured in a performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 453 on Sunday, July 7. The concert, which begins at 2:30 p.m., will also include the "Linz" Symphony No. 36, K. 425 and the "Prague" Symphony No. 38, K. 504.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gian Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steniberg and Charles Munch.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Tanglewood Series Live on WGBH-FM

WGBH radio will broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, starting Friday, July 5 at 9 p.m.

Concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m. Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with two all-Mozart programs. On Friday young violinist James Oliver Buswell IV makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207 and Serenade in D, K. 320.

On Saturday, July 6 at 8 p.m., the noted soprano Beverly Sills joins the Orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program will be Symphony No. 28 and Eine Kleine Nachtmusik.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gina Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Charles Munch.

CHRONICLE SUN
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,850

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concerts Live

WGBH radio will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, starting Friday, July 5 at 9 pm.

Continuing through the middle of August, the concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 pm, Saturdays at 8 pm and Sundays at 2:30 pm.

Tanglewood On Home Radios

WGBH radio will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, from Friday, July 5, at 9 p.m., through the middle of August.

The concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with two all-Mozart programs. On Friday an exciting young violinist, James Oliver Buswell IV, a Harvard undergraduate who had his own special on Channel 2 last month, makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207, and Serenade in D, K. 320.

On Saturday, July 6, at 8 p.m., the noted American soprano Beverly Sills joins the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the always popular "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program will be Symphony No. 28, K. 200, and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gina Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias, and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Charles Munch. WGBH hopes many mf the concerts from Tanglewood this summer will be broadcast in stereo, but since the necessary additional stereo equipment may not be ready by July 5, some of the early programs will probably be in mono.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

WAMC-FM to Again Air Concerts at Tanglewood

WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc., will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood starting Friday, July 5, at 9 p.m.

* * *

Continuing through the middle of August, the Berkshire Festival concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with three all-Mozart programs. On Friday, July 5, an exciting young violinist, Oliver Buswell IV, makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207 and Serenade in D, K. 320. Buswell, a Harvard undergraduate, was featured in a television special in Boston during June.

On Saturday, July 6, at 8 p.m. the noted American soprano, Beverly Hills joins the orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the popular "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program are Symphony No. 28, K. 200 and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525.

* * *

Claude Frank, noted pianist, will be featured in a performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 453 on Sunday, July 7. The concert, which begins at 2:30 p.m., will also include the "Linz" Symphony No. 36, K. 425 and the "Prague" Symphony No. 38, K. 504.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gina Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Charles Munch.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

JUN 28 1968

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

JUN 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Broadcast Boston Symphony Live Starting July 5

ALBANY, N.Y., June 25 — WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc., will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood starting Friday, July 5, at 9 p.m.

Continuing through the middle of August, the Berkshire Festival concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2.30 p.m.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with three all-Mozart programs. On Friday, July 5, an exciting young violinist, Oliver Buswell IV, makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207 and Serenade in D, K. 320. Buswell, a Harvard undergraduate was featured in a television special in Boston during June.

On Saturday, July 6, at 8 p.m. the noted American soprano, Beverly Sills joins the orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the popular "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program are Symphony No. 28, K. 200 and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525.

Claude Frank, noted pianist, will be featured in a performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 453 on Sunday, July 7. The concert, which begins at 2.30 p.m., will also include the "Linz" Symphony No. 36, K. 425 and the "Prague" symphony No. 38, K. 504.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gina Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Charles Munch.

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 98,600

JUL 2 1968 New England Newsclip

To Broadcast From Tanglewood if . . .

AMHERST — WFCR FM (88.5 mc), the Five College Radio Station at the University of Massachusetts, will broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer — if $1,270 can be raised to pay the cost for telephone lines.

The station is asking donations of one dollar or more from all regular listeners with the aim of reaching the fund goal on the opening date of the 1968 Berkshire Festival on July 5.

That night Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the symphony in an all - Mozart program with James Oliver Buswell, 4th, as soloist beginning at 9 p.m.

A successful fund - raising campaign will assure the symphony broadcast over WFCR every Friday at 9 p.m. Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. from July 5 to Aug. 25.

Tax - deductible contributions may be sent to WFCR, Hampshire House, University of Massachusetts, Amherst 01002.

SEEKS FUNDS TO AIR TANGLEWOOD CONTESTS

WFCR-FM, the Five College Radio Station at the University of Massachusetts, is trying to raise $1,270 to enable it to broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer.

The station is asking donations of $1 or more from all regular listeners with the aim of reaching the fund goal on the opening date of the 1968 Berkshire Festival July 5.

A successful campaign will assure the symphony broadcast over WFCR every Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. from July 5 to Aug. 25. Tax-deductible contributions may be sent to WFCR, Hampshire House, University of Massachusetts, Amherst 01002.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.

JUN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Broadcasts Await Funds

AMHERST — WFCR-FM (88.5 mc), the Five-College radio station at the University of Massachusetts, will broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer — if $1270 can be raised to pay the cost for telephone lines.

The station is asking donations of one dollar or more from all regular listeners with the aim of reaching the fund goal on the opening date of the 1968 Berkshire Festival July 5.

A successful fund-raising campaign will assure the symphony broadcast over WFCR every Friday at 9, Saturday at 8 and Sunday at 2.30 from July 5 to Aug. 25.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Listeners Chip in To Help WFCR Air Symphony Concerts

AMHERST—A successful fund-raising campaign has assured the broadcast of 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts from Tanglewood, live and in stereo, over WFCR, the Five-College Radio station at the University of Massachusetts.

400 Contribute

More than 400 listeners contributed between $1 and $50 each to pay for telephone lines. A special grant also was made by Amherst Savings Bank.

The broadcasts began Friday night with an all-Mozart program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will continue over WFCR every Friday at 9 p. m., Saturdays at 8 p. m. and Sundays at 2.30 through Aug. 25.

A Boston Pops extra is scheduled for late August.

WFCR Station Manager Al Hulsen, commenting on the fund drive, said, "We were amazed and pleased at the extent of listener support—from Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire and New York—for the Tanglewood broadcasts." Funds received in excess of the $1270 needed for audio lines will be used to underwrite the cost of Cleveland Orchestra concerts in the fall, Hulsen said.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 7 1968 New England Newsclip

Wednesday, June 26, 1968

WAMC-FM Broadcasts at Tanglewood

WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc., will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., starting Friday, July 5, at 9 p.m.

★ ★ ★

CONTINUING through the middle of August, the Berkshire Festival concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with three all-Mozart programs. On Friday, July 5, an exciting young violinist, Oliver Buswell IV, makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207 anl Serenade in D, K. 320. Buswell, a Harvard undergraduate, was featured in a television special in Boston during June.

On Saturday, July 6, at 8 p.m. the noted American soprano, Beverly Sills, joins the orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the popular "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program are Symphony No. 28, K. 200 and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525.

★ ★ ★

CLAUDE FRANK, noted pianist, will be featured in a performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 453 on Sunday, July 7. The concert, which begins at 2:30 p.m., will also include the "Linz" Symphony No. 36, K. 425 and the "Prague" Symphony No. 38, K. 504.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gian Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steniberg and Charles Munch.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

WAMC-FM to Again Air Concerts at Tanglewood

WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc., will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood starting Friday, July 5, at 9 p.m.

* * *

Continuing through the middle of August, the Berkshire Festival concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with three all-Mozart programs. On Friday, July 5, an exciting young violinist, Oliver Buswell IV, makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207 and Serenade in D, K. 320. Buswell, a Harvard undergraduate, was featured in a television special in Boston during June.

On Saturday, July 6, at 8 p.m. the noted American soprano, Beverly Hills joins the orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the popular "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program are Symphony No. 28, K. 200 and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525.

* * *

Claude Frank, noted pianist, will be featured in a performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 453 on Sunday, July 7. The concert, which begins at 2:30 p.m., will also include the "Linz" Symphony No. 36, K. 425 and the "Prague" Symphony No. 38, K. 504.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gina Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Charles Munch.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

JUN 28 1968

Broadcast Boston Symphony Live Starting July 5

ALBANY, N.Y., June 25 — WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc., will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood starting Friday, July 5, at 9 p.m.

Continuing through the middle of August, the Berkshire Festival concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2.30 p.m.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with three all-Mozart programs. On Friday, July 5, an exciting young violinist, Oliver Buswell IV, makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207 and Serenade in D, K. 320. Buswell, a Harvard undergraduate was featured in a television special in Boston during June.

On Saturday, July 6, at 8 p.m. the noted American soprano, Beverly Sills joins the orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the popular "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program are Symphony No. 28, K. 200 and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525.

Claude Frank, noted pianist, will be featured in a performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 453 on Sunday, July 7. The concert, which begins at 2.30 p.m., will also include the "Linz" Symphony No. 36, K. 425 and the "Prague" symphony No. 38, K. 504.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gina Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Charles Munch.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

JUN 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Tanglewood Series Live on WGBH-FM

WGBH radio will broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, starting Friday, July 5 at 9 p.m.

Concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m. Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with two all-Mozart programs. On Friday young violinist James Oliver Buswell IV makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207 and Serenade in D, K. 320.

On Saturday, July 6 at 8 p.m., the noted soprano Beverly Sills joins the Orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program will be Symphony No. 28 and Eine Kleine Nachtmusik.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gina Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Charles Munch.

CHRONICLE SUN
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,850

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concerts Live

WGBH radio will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, starting Friday, July 5 at 9 pm.

Continuing through the middle of August, the concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 pm, Saturdays at 8 pm and Sundays at 2:30 pm.

Tanglewood On Home Radios

WGBH radio will once again broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, from Friday, July 5, at 9 p.m., through the middle of August.

The concerts will be heard Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf begins the 1968 Berkshire Festival with two all-Mozart programs. On Friday an exciting young violinist, James Oliver Buswell IV, a Harvard undergraduate who had his own special on Channel 2 last month, makes his Tanglewood debut in a program which includes the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Violin Concerto No. 1, K. 207, and Serenade in D, K. 320.

On Saturday, July 6, at 8 p.m., the noted American soprano Beverly Sills joins the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform three Mozart concert arias, including the always popular "Exultate Jubilate." Also on the program will be Symphony No. 28, K. 200, and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525.

Among the outstanding artists who will be appearing at Tanglewood this summer will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Gina Bachauer, soprano Rosalind Elias, and conductors Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Charles Munch. WGBH hopes many mf the concerts from Tanglewood this summer will be broadcast in stereo, but since the necessary additional stereo equipment may not be ready by July 5, some of the early programs will probably be in mono.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 95,600

JUL 2 1968 New England Newsclip

To Broadcast From Tanglewood if . . .

AMHERST — WFCR FM (88.5 mc), the Five College Radio Station at the University of Massachusetts, will broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer — if $1,270 can be raised to pay the cost for telephone lines.

The station is asking donations of one dollar or more from all regular listeners with the aim of reaching the fund goal on the opening date of the 1968 Berkshire Festival on July 5.

That night Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the symphony in an all - Mozart program with James Oliver Buswell, 4th, as soloist beginning at 9 p.m.

A successful fund - raising campaign will assure the symphony broadcast over WFCR every Friday at 9 p.m. Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. from July 5 to Aug. 25.

Tax - deductible contributions may be sent to WFCR, Hampshire House, University of Massachusetts, Amherst 01002.

SEEKS FUNDS TO AIR TANGLEWOOD CONTESTS

WFCR-FM, the Five College Radio Station at the University of Massachusetts, is trying to raise $1,270 to enable it to broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer.

The station is asking donations of $1 or more from all regular listeners with the aim of reaching the fund goal on the opening date of the 1968 Berkshire Festival July 5.

A successful campaign will assure the symphony broadcast over WFCR every Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. from July 5 to Aug. 25. Tax-deductible contributions may be sent to WFCR, Hampshire House, University of Massachusetts, Amherst 01002.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.

JUN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Broadcasts Await Funds

AMHERST — WFCR-FM (88.5 mc), the Five-College radio station at the University of Massachusetts, will broadcast all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer — if $1270 can be raised to pay the cost for telephone lines.

The station is asking donations of one dollar or more from all regular listeners with the aim of reaching the fund goal on the opening date of the 1968 Berkshire Festival July 5.

A successful fund-raising campaign will assure the symphony broadcast over WFCR every Friday at 9, Saturday at 8 and Sunday at 2.30 from July 5 to Aug. 25.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Listeners Chip in To Help WFCR Air Symphony Concerts

AMHERST—A successful fund-raising campaign has assured the broadcast of 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts from Tanglewood, live and in stereo, over WFCR, the Five-College Radio station at the University of Massachusetts.

400 Contribute

More than 400 listeners contributed between $1 and $50 each to pay for telephone lines. A special grant also was made by Amherst Savings Bank.

The broadcasts began Friday night with an all-Mozart program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will continue over WFCR every Friday at 9 p. m., Saturdays at 8 p. m. and Sundays at 2.30 through Aug. 25.

A Boston Pops extra is scheduled for late August.

WFCR Station Manager Al Hulsen, commenting on the fund drive, said, "We were amazed and pleased at the extent of listener support from Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire and New York—for the Tanglewood broadcasts." Funds received in excess of the $1270 needed for audio lines will be used to underwrite the cost of Cleveland Orchestra concerts in the fall, Hulsen said.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 7 1968 New England Newsclip

14.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 139,700

JUL 10 1968 New England Newsclip

NIGHT WATCH

Stereo Tanglewood Innovation at WGBH

By PERCY SHAIN
Globe TV Critic

Behind the announcement that Station WGBH-TV (Ch. 2) will present four musical programs from Tanglewood next week live and in color and with stereo sound is a technological breakthrough that has been a year in the making and is a historic first in high-quality transmission—for New England, for the nation, and probably for the world.

By a complicated system of relays, using both land lines and microwave points, the tones will come into your living room so full and rich that you will swear the orchestra or musical group is playing in the next room.

Of course, you will need FM stereophonic multiplex equipment to get the maximum benefit from this full-fidelity achievement. Television sets are not equipped for this kind of true reception.

So, if you have stereo in your home, the best way to drink in these concerts in all their beauty would be to turn the TV sound down and pick up the music on the WGBHFM band.

Now Ch. 2 has done this kind of stereocasting before from Boston's Symphony Hall. The trick here is to duplicate the feat from a point as distant as Stockbridge, in the western part of the state, 120 miles away.

It took a concentrated effort by WGBH and New England Tel and Tel engineers, starting a year ago when the 1967 concerts were being broadcast, to get the full, glorious sound intact—on two tracks—right into the Boston studio.

It was finally done by a very complicated arrangement which carries the signal—in left and right duplicate—via highly sophisticated equipment from Tanglewood to Pittsfield on regular phone lines, to Springfield via a microwave relay of the "L" carrier type, another "L" hop to Boston, by land line to the studio, and then to the transmitter by the station's own microwave system.

It's the first time such a setup has ever worked anywhere, so far as is known here.

For that matter, the video picture takes quite a complex ride, too, to get to your home set live and in color. It's beamed from the top of the shed at Tanglewood to a truck with a portable 75-foot microwave receiving tower parked on the Mass. turnpike thence to a fire tower on the top of Lenox Mountain, from there to a receiver-transmitter in Austerlitz, N.Y., and finally to Boston by phone line.

When you see and hear it on the screen, it will look as if it is coming in simultaneously.

The four concerts, incidentally, will be aired on Wednesday, July 17, from 8 to 10, on Chs. 2 and 44 as well as WHDH-FM; Thursday, July 18, 8-10, on Ch. 44 only and FM; Saturday, July 20, 8-9:15 on Ch. 2 only and FM; and Sunday, July 21, 2-4:30, also on Ch. 2 and FM.

The first will be a jazz session, the second a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert, the last two full Boston Symphony performances. The times are tentative and subject to clearances.

For FM fans the new system is already in effect, having been successfully tried last week. The new thing next week is the addition of the TV picture.

Also very much in the Ch. 2 spotlight is the premiere of its new all-black show, "Say, Brother," tomorrow night at 8:30. This hour-long weekly stanza is entirely the work of Boston's black community, and a full and varied menu has been prepared for the initial repast.

There will be a little bit of everything—news of the community, entertainment, a billboard of cultural and social events, Afro-American history, and a teen-ager segment.

The young will get their chance at recognition in this show. In fact two 17-year-olders will be in the spotlight.

One will be a series regular, Stewart Thomas, who will give the teen slant on events of the day. His opening report will be on two festival features, Summerthing and the Alma Lewis Playhouse-in-the-Park. The other is Cynthia Mack, a young poet who will recite some of her quite remarkable black-oriented verses.

There will be two musical segments, featuring the Nine Lords, a Roxbury combo that has been performing together for five years. Five are vocalists and four instrumentalists.

The newscaster will be Bryant Rollins, former Boston Globe reporter and Bay State Banner editor, now with the Urban League. Sarah Ann Shaw will report on political events and activities and invite community personalities to share their views with her.

A discussion on the need of black history and culture will be led by Roosevelt Weaver, Claude Weaver, Marcus Mitchell and Dr. Adelaide Hill. A number of guest lecturers and personalities will contribute to the show.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

JUL 8 1968 New England Newsclip

On the Dial

Two Channels Offer Pete Seeger Series

By JAMES A. GOURGOURAS

Pete Seeger is giving folk music buffs a rare treat this summer. He and a galaxy of contemporary stars are appearing for an hour each week on Channels 2 and 44. They started on the Fourth of July, combining the Clancy Brothers, Tommy Makem and Tom Paxton in a medley of Irish songs. In particular, there was "Butcher Boy" and "I Will Never Play the Wild Rover No More". Seeger didn't overlook a chance to deliver his trademark song, "This Land Is My Land." Next week, he features Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee, who appeared with Pete on Channel 2's "Roomful of Music" two years ago.

That's at 7:30 p.m., Thursday night, on Channels 2 and 44, with Terry on harmonica and McGhee on guitar. And if you want a grand finale, Seeger joins the pair to offer that old-time favorite, "When the Saints Go Marching In."

Gourgouras

The Convention

WTAG's Dol Brissette, telling of NBC News' latest in communications devices for the 1968 national political conventions, covered another interesting aspect; Years ago when radio was just coming into its own as a medium in broadcast journalism, it impressed the public on the flexibility and the depth of coverage radio could provide. Today's audience is more sophisticated, Brissette explained, and the concentration will be on one thing — telling the story as completely and as simply as it can be told.

"Floor reporters," Brissette explained, "will be used a little differently this time. When there is a vital part of the overall story of the convention taking place on the podium, NBC Radio will give it its undivided attention, and not interrupt to go to a floor reporter.

"Unlike television, which is visual, radio must describe the scene and the people in concise and descriptive words to give the listener a word picture of what is happening."

WGBH Radio again is broadcasting all Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from Tanglewood. The first program was Friday night, and others are slated for 9 p.m. Fridays, 8 p.m., Saturdays, and 2:30 p.m. Sundays, through the middle of August.

Some of the world's fastest race horses will be on Channel 2's "Adventure" at 8:30 tonight on Channel 2, and if you track fans miss it that night, catch the same show at 6:30 p.m. Wednesday, same station, or on Channel 44. The program takes place in the lands of ancient Persia, where horses have been bred for centuries

Reputed to be able to cover 150 miles a day, the horses are found only in northeast Persia, where 300,000 Turcomans live today, cut off from the rest of the world by the Iron Curtain.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUL 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Radio Concerts Listed

WGBH-FM radio begins the second week of live Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts on Sunday, July 7, direct from Tanglewood, starting at 2:30 p.m.

For this concert Erich Leinsdorf has chosen an all-Mozart program: Symphony No. 36, "The Linz;" Piano Concerto No. 17, K. 453, with Claude Frank as soloist and Symphony No. 38.

The following Friday, July 12, at 9 p.m., guest conductor David Zinman will lead the orchestra in a program that features Bach's Violin Concerto in E Major, with BSO concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. And on Saturday, July 13 at 8 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts Cantata No. 51 by Bach, with Saramae Endich as soprano soloist; and Haydn's "Lord Nelson" mass, with Miss Endich, contralto Beverly Wolff, tenor Enrico Di Giuseppe, bass Paul Pushka and the Tanglewood Choir.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS - First Week

THREE MOZART CONCERTS OPEN TANGLEWOOD '68

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

An educated man of the Renaissance was, ipso facto, a man "of infinite variety." This ideal held right up through the Romantic Period of the late 18th century and early 19th. Our "Classic" composers—Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and a host of lesser are very much involved in the Romantic Revolution—in the arts a benign revolution that never forgot its Baroque lessons (see Handel-Beethoven).

Late 19th century composers carried on from there but split like amoebae (only not into new amoebae, rather into more specialized creatures: song writers, symphonists, operatists). Chamber music came off second best with the symphony and opera composers; there are no great quartets, etc., after Brahms until Bartok. The forward-thinking moderns—some of them—are rediscovering the broad field of musical function, limited somewhat by the small number of commissions. Patronage for the classic composers was always dependent on the fact that enough aristocrats with lucre were also musical amateurs, even connoisseurs and performers. Some, of course, were stupid enough to hire artists merely for show; Mozart got so fed up with the Archbishop of Salzburg that he called him "the Archbooby" and soon shook off the stultifying town.

Mozart, himself, was irrepressible, traveled widely, responding to the character of all environments; sold-out to none, created where he happened to be, if wanted and as needed, and (this inspired bum of gallantry and revolution) in his "short day of frost and sun," spun incredible webs of viable music, like the thousand "handkerchiefs" that spiders spin, in a night of dew, linking the grasses and holding up the shining drops. He met the challenge of every situation involving music for church, court, city (how Prague loved its commissioned works, while Vienna cheered only with weak bravoes) opera house and garden party, or even the needs of some lovely student.

Some of Mozart, mostly early stuff, is deft tiddeywinks, reminiscent of the charming boy who sat on the laps of grand ladies, no disturbance to complacency or threat to their virtue. But the "later" Mozart, learned in experience as well as in experimental twists to old forms, (keenly aware of the dramatic aspect of all human life, including the psychological drama in individuals ("characters") himself so naked to response, no wonder that he burned out so early. "Later" Mozart is still the creation of a young man.

I have never heard the Boston Symphony play better (and that means best in the world market). The chamber orchestra, well-chosen; Leinsdorf's disciplinarian control, sympathetic to the composer (understanding his center in opera—or better, in dramatic imagination touching it off with wit or pathos, and sometimes both at once.) Mr. Leinsdorf's tempi freed the musical ideas and allowed strong contrasts without fff blare, expressive phrasing that preserved the singing line and kept movement in dramatic chord sequences, etc., etc. And instrumentalists who played like the good chamber music musicians they mostly are—no vacation in the let-down sense, although they and their families enjoy freedom from the fumes of Boston and a great piece of country.

Which leads me to the setting.

Where music happens makes a great difference badly obfuscated by our present reliance on radio and recording. String quartets at home afford an experience different from those in Carnegie Hall. The Tanglewood shed that organizes sound by triangular clouds and canny screens so that it not only spreads clearly to the whole large under-cover piesegment but radiates from the circular mouth of the Shed to a great area of lawn and trees. (I tested the projection when I had to leave my seat after intermission of two concerts to stir sluggish arteries and recover from dizziness, finding that 100, 200, 300 yards away Mozart came out clean and concentrated like the image through a reversed telescope. Much more than 6000 within are those who spawn out on the lawns, equipped with blankets, food and good companionship, they accept and probably want a lesser impact, and even on this Sunday afternoon sometimes turned pages of the Times randomly, as if the radio at home or in the car made soothing animation to vacant mind.

Mozart is a fortunate choice for all of concerts. Judicious programming made a balance of light and serious; "entertainments" (as Greene called his mystery stories) and works of drama and deep sentiment, climaxing on Sunday with three of the richest works of Mozart's last ten years.

The big farm bell on Friday called us in to the Overture to Figaro, always a sparkling reflection of Mozart's own comic genius, the chamber orchestra playing it like a new piece. Leinsdorf wore his best smoking jacket and lapsed, in many lilting moments, into his swing underwater crawl. James Oliver Buswell IV, a Harvard sophomore, did an excellent job with Mozart's first solo violin concerto. The way the conductor managed the orchestra, Buswell's clean tone could always be easily heard. And it was worth hearing—phrasing of a high order, within a taut line, vibrato calculated for color as needed. I can't see the traditional point of raising the orchestral voice so sharply when the soloist is silent. It makes for strong contrasts but obscures certain continuities. Mr. Buswell can stand on his own feet now without recalling his teachers, but this first with the Boston might be interpreted as Homage to Stasseyavich, the late, lamented violinist and conductor who taught talent with musical genius.

Buswell's style has inner concentration and is unusually adequate technically. There was one moment in one cadenza when a double stop lost its bearings, and sometimes rapid figurations could have been cleaner, but I think he was avoiding too light a staccatto. The handsome chap kept excellent poise, and ensemble was no trouble for conductor and orchestra.

Serenade No. 9 in D major ("Posthorn") I had to miss by leaving early but I was all for performance of this entertaining novelty. Sir Thomas Beecham always approved the use of easy music, in balance, but well-played, he insisted, and so it was.

Saturday's clanging assembled us for another light program. Symphony no. 28 in C begins with a virtual serenade (in sonata form) and continues with rococco sentiment (Andante — lovely phrasing by the orchestra), an allegretto Menuetto (if Mozart survived only in minuets, like Strauss in walzes, he would still be major for the rich variety of expressive development in different contexts) and an inconsequential Presto thickene by occasional counterpoint. (Just so, Boccherini and Haydn often ended with a skittering play of anti-climax). Beverly Sills, soprano appeared as if for the role of Zaide (a harem beauty) in modern dress, vivid in hair and general shapliness—which also describes her voice. Her wide vibratto adds a color very different from that of the famous castrate for whom Mozart wrote; but the colorful music could take it, and if figurations often seemed clouded though essentially accurate, it made for the impressionistic effect one sometimes hears in the rapid figures of, Bach, when played on a large harpsichord or organ.

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik separated two groups of songs with its inspired simplicities. It should be heard over water (like Handel's Water Music played from a barge on the Thames) or as I heard it over the shaved lawn, its dance-romance spirit made more poignant by distance and the fitfull wind. I should like to have heard Beverly Sills rampant in "Martern aller Artern," a show-piece expressing the raving of a captured noblewoman incarcerated in (again) a Turkish harem.

Sunday afternoon of an ideal Berkshire day (cool mountain air and biting sun) brought the fattest program of the three, with two symphonies and a piano concerto from the maturity of Mozart's last ten years on earth. The orchestra in white, Leinsdorf in natty fitted grey, set a tone of summer elegance. Symphony no. 36, the "Linz," after a Haydnesque Adagio, slips into a spirituoso Allegro, taken deliberately enough to allow for wit as well as excitement, a richness of theme and a striking contrast between lyrical and chordal passages. The Adagio (poco) sang with expressive interplay of winds and strings, the Menuetto (Allegro) enlived with a trio devoted to woodwind solos and another Presto to home-and-mother.

The Piano Concerto No. 17 in G was the summit of the three day ascent. Claude Frank was born for chamber music, on small scale or large. (He is the designated pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Orchestra.) His Mozart was both introspective and dynamic (like the composer himself). The winds took a well-deserved bow for their sensitive part in the chamber music interplay. The final Allegretto reminded me of the parallel ones in the two Piano Quartets in spite of orchestra body, a "fine careless rapture."

I was puzzled why Mr. Frank and Mr. Leinsdorf chose to make the Andante into an Adagio. At first it seemed to suggest Schnabel on Beethoven or Brahms and, indeed, there was a passage that invoked Brahms. At first I resented an unnecessary striving for profundity but the principals and orchestra justified the tempo so consistently that I enjoyed a "suspension of disbelief." Woodwinds took lovely part in the counterpoint, and the piano gave the illusion that it could sing as well as percuss. Mozart is perhaps the only composer whose concertos are as original and inwardly rich as his best chamber works, all of which really sounded on Sunday.

Symphony no. 38 in D (Prague)" in its three movements (Why always four?) is among the finest of Mozart's young latter-day works, shadowed with melancholy and irony for all its virtuosity of wit and brilliance. All I can say about the Boston's realization is that it achieved what Alfred Einstein used to call Mozart's "naturalness" — with all the artfulness implied.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUL 11 1968 New England Newsclip

All-Mozart Program Tonight At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its Berkshire Festival tonight with an all-Mozart concert under the direction of its music director, Erich Leinsdorf. James Oliver Buswell will play the violin concerto No. 1, K. 207. The other works on the program are the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the "Posthorn" Serenade, K. 320.

Saturday evening Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 28, K. 200, and "Fine Kleine Nachtmusik." Beverly Sills will sing "Exsultate, Jubilate," K. 165, "Ah Se in Ciel, Benigne Stelle," K. 538, and arias from "Zaide" and "Die Entfuehrung." "Ah Se in Ceil' and the "Zaide" and "Entfuehrung" excerpts are first performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Claude Frank

The all-Mozart program of Sunday afternoon will feature Claude Frank in a performance of the piano concerto in G Major, K. 453. Leinsdorf will again conduct, also leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the symphonies Nos. 36, "Linz," and 38, "Prague."

Chamber music will be heard for the first time at this year's festival on Sunday morning at 10:30 when the Boston Symphony Chamber Players present a concert in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall. Music by Poulenc and Dvorak will be played.

The first of the open rehearsals, for the benefit of the BSO pension fund, will take place Saturday morning at 10:30 with Leinsdorf conducting.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director
WEEKEND PRELUDE
Friday July 5 at 7 pm
LILIAN KALLIR piano
JAMES OLIVER BUSWELL IV violin
MOZART
Sonata for piano and violin in E flat K. 302
Allegro
Rondo: andante grazioso
Sonata for piano and violin in B flat K. 454
Largo — allegro
Andante
Allegretto
Lilian Kallir plays the Steinway piano
BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Mozart Concert Starts Season At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) — The Berkshire Music Festival, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) gets underway at Tanglewood tonight with a Mozart concert.

Eight guest conductors will share the podium during the eight - week program with Erich Leinsdorf, now in his final season as conductor of the BSO.

The 24 major concerts run one each on Friday, Saturday and Sunday nights through Aug. 25, and with the addition of the four Wednesday concerts the program ranges from folk rock to grand opera and from Indian raga to the Brahms requiem.

Guest artists include pianist Van Cliburn on July 20, violinist Alfred Krips next weekend and soprano Beverly Sills Saturday night.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival opens tonight

The Berkshire Festival opens at Tanglewood tonight. The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, has an all-Mozart program for the week-end, James Oliver Buswell, Beverly Sills, and Claude Frank will be the soloists.

Tonight, Buswell will play the violin concerto No. 1, K 207. The other works on the program are the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the "Posthorn" Serenade, K 320.

The festival — the 31st — will comprise 24 concerts through Aug. 25.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

New England Newsclip

16.

GPL 7/7/68

The Fine Art Of Mozart At Tanglewood

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — Summer music festivals are popping up nowadays like mushrooms over the American countryside. Soon it may become feasible to festival-hop across the continent.

Here in the rolling green Berkshire Hills is more or less where it began. Tanglewood is to the American festival scene what Salzburg is to the European festivals, and to its spacious, manicured grounds each summer comes a galaxy of musical talent — the young to study at the Berkshire Music Center; older established artists to perform and teach.

Continuing the practice of recent years, Erich Leinsdorf selected a sampling of the vast output of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart for the first weekend of the 31st Tanglewood season. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented symphonies, serenades, concerti and vocal works by the Austrian master.

Sunday's concert, attended by 5,967, was devoted to compositions of Mozart's mature years — the "Linz" and "Prague" Symphonies, in C, K. 425 and in D, K. 504, respectively, and the Piano Concerto No. 17 in G, K.453 for which Claude Frank was soloist.

It's Easy

Smoothness and clarity are the marks of Leinsdorf's Mozart, and these qualities predominated in Sunday's "big" symphonies.

Moments of tension and repose blended seamlessly into each other in a seemingly effortless flow, even in the swiftest of passages. It seems almost too easy, one can forget the struggles of lesser ensembles to cope with what is, after all, difficult and dangerously exposed music.

The G Major Concerto is a triumph of close orchestral-piano teamwork, requiring split-second entrances and immaculate balances. Leinsdorf and Frank enjoyed a happy collaboration, one that in parts of the first movement came close to finding the solo piano merging altogether in the orchestra fabric.

It never really happened, but that closeness of teamwork demonstrates the nuance of performance. Frank, a popular pianist with the BSO, has always been noteworthy for the crispness and clarity of his playing. In this concerto, he seems to have added an extra depth of subtlety. The andante, an exquisite movement with prismatic alterations of key and moods delicately touched with woodwinds, was particularly enchanting. And the finale — the theme of which is said to have been inspired by the song of Mozart's pet songbird — had its share of gay banter among the variations.

Soprano With Style

Saturday night's concert was dominated by the extraordinary vocalism of soprano Beverly Sills (a Milton resident). Miss Sills in recent years has bloomed into an imposing singer whose technical polish, strong, wide-ranging soprano and musical taste place her at the peak of her profession.

She sang four works of Mozart — the early motet, "Exsultate, Jubilate," K 165; two operatic arias, "Ruhe Sanft, Mein Holdes Leben" ("Aide", K. 344); "Martern Aller Arten" ("Die Entfuerrung," K. 384) and the late concert aria, "Ah Se In Ciel, Benigne Stelle," K. 538. The audience of 6,045 would have liked to hear more.

Mozart's vocal music, of course, is devlish in its demands on the singer. The pieces were written for sopranos of exceptional range, power and agility. Miss Sills amply qualifies for the task, her coloratura is precise and honest: the runs are even and flowing; her trills sparkle. Moreover, she has a grace of phrasing that makes her singing far more than just vocal acrobatics. Mozart stylists are rare: Beverly Sills can be placed with the best.

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony gave her considerate, often superb accompaniment, notably in the motet and in "Martern Aller Arten" with its fine concertante sections for violin, cello, flute and oboe.

Also on the program were the Symphony No. 28 in C, K.200, a work of elegant flourishes by the 18-year-old Mozart, and the ever-popular "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," K 525, which displayed the perfection of the Boston strings. The violins especially gave a lesson in unison playing.

'Posthorn' Sounds

Friday night's opening concert, attended by 6,380 on a pleasant but cool evening, featured brisk performances of the "Posthorn" Serenade, No. 9 in D, K 320, and the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." James Oliver Buswell IV made his debut with the Orchestra in the Violin Concerto No. 1 in B flat, K 207.

It was the "Posthorn" Serenade that carried the evening's honors. Spaciously-conceived, with generous concertante passages for woodwinds, the Serenade is among the largest of Mozart's Salzburg "party music" scores. It derives its name from the abrupt entrance of the posthorn — played by Armando Ghitalla in round, sweet tones — in the second trio of the second minuet (the first trio finds Mozart effectively employing piccolo).

But it is the mixture of flute, oboe and bassoon in the second and fourth movements that makes this Serenade a particularly delicious confection, especially when performed by players of the distinction of Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Ralph Gomberg and Sherman Walt. Mozart adds a more serious section in the Andantino, predominantly for strings.

Violins For Virtuosi

First of Mozart's five Violin Concerti, the B Flat, is melodious and sufficiently brilliant to give the soloist a good workout in the outer movements. But its chief beauty lies in the Adagio, magically scored by Mozart.

Buswell is only 21, already a concert veteran, a Harvard senior with a brush of blond hair. He is a cool and assured violinist, well prepared, but not yet even enough technically or musically to challenge the top rank. His best playing came in the Adagio, nobly backed by Leinsdorf's controlled accompaniment, and in parts of the romping finale. In the first movement, he had trouble staying in tune with articulation. More irksome were the conclusions of unidentified (Kreisler?) and inappropriate c a d e n z a s that sounded spliced onto Mozart's rococo style. The first cadenza was nearly as long as the rest of the opening movement and was not especially well played.

Earlier, Buswell joined with pianist Lilian Kallir to get the festival off to a relaxing mood with the Mozart Sonatas in E Flat, K. 302, and B Flat K. 454, during the weekend prelude.

JAMES OLIVER BUSWELL IV DEBUTED OVER THE WEEKEND WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AS THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL BEGAN.

MASSACHUSETTS

HYANNIS (Cape Cod Melody Tent) — Allan Sherman and Carmel Quinn, July 1-6.

LENOX (Berkshire Festival) — Erich Leinsdorff will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Mozart program on Friday at 9 p.m., featuring the overture from the Marriage of Figaro, Violin Concerto No. 1 and Serenade in D Major. On Saturday at 8 p.m. Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in another Mozart program including Symphony No. 28, Exsuitate Jubilate and Eine Kleine Nachtmusik.

WEST YARMOUTH (West Yarmouth Auditorium)—Somkey Robinson and the Miracles, July 4 and 5.

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

JUN 30 1968 New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY ~~GAZETTE~~
Monday, July 8, 1968

3 All-Mozart Concerts Open Tanglewood Fare

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI NL

Three all-Mozart concerts were in the offering as Tanglewood opened its 1968 season this past weekend. Last year Leinsdorf detained the traditional Bach-Hayden-Mozart programs for a week in order to offer works of larger fare to concert-goers on vacation for the holiday weekend, but this year the two weeks of pre-Beethovenian music are back in their customary position as season openers.

* * *

The summer series almost began on a sour note Friday evening, in which Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, Violin Concerto No. One, and "Posthorn" serenade were featured. Whenever Leinsdorf has an interpretive problem with Mozart it's usually because the texture he defines is too sparing or the wrong tempo has been selected. Both ailments afflicted the overture, which could've sounded a lot brighter (I don't mean more trumpets!) and should've sounded a lot better throughout.

In the Violin Concerto, problems were compounded by adding soloist James Oliver Buswell IV, who not only was out of tune but had no idea what was expected from him as a Mozart soloist. Leinsdorf deserves a severe reprimand for not letting the young violinist re-tune his instrument between the first and second movements. As it was, the "catch your breath and let's get this over with" attitude left Buswell with about five seconds to compose himself, hardly enough time to correct so obvious an error. Being out of tune is one thing, but not fitting in with the ensemble is another. I strongly suggest that Buswell emulate 18th century practices a little more closely and not try to gas everyone out with hard-sell bravura.

Following the intermission the "Posthorn" serenade was given a fairly successful reading by Leinsdorf. Although it began not broadly enough, by the time the Minet rolled around, both conductor and orchestra were sufficiently relaxed to give the music the attention it deserves. In fact, the remainder of the performance was very pleasing indeed, perhaps due to the less arbitrary decisions that ruined the first half of the concert.

Saturday evening's event included the Symphony No. 28; "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" the early motet, "Exultate, Jubilate;" a concert aria, "Alma Grande Nobil Core;" and two operatic arias from "Zaide" and the "Seraglio." Beverly Sills was the soprano solist in the last three works.

The concert began with the Symphony No. 28, a delightful piece I expected Leinsdorf to run away with. He didn't. The first movement proceeded uneventfully and with very little involvement on the conductor's part. The slow movement was better, but one still got the impression that this was just a performance by a crack orchestra merely doing its job. With the third movement, things got much worse again, for Leinsdorf took the music at half the proper tempo. This movement presents an interpretive problem to every conductor in search for a tempo: there are repeated horn passages that echo the strings, and it is here one should get a clear picture of what Mozart means by playing these note values at so slow a tempo; the horns lack sustaining power in much the same way the piano does. The result is an awkward step-and-go feeling which can only be corrected by lengthening the note values (a violation of the score) or choosing a swifter tempo. Leinsdorf did neither. In the finale, tempo was a lot better, but the compact movement lacked any new insights.

* * *

Next on the program was "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben," an aria from the opera "Zaide." It was interesting to hear this work from an opera left uncompleted at age 21. Regrettably, Miss Sills was not in perfect voice for the piece, her high register sounding somewhat strained on occasion.

She was considerably better in the motet, "Exultate, Jubilate." Suddenly no vocal feat seemed beyond her, and I don't think anyone will easily forget the outstanding vocal cadenza. Besides superb singing, she also gave to the music a sense of refinement and commitment not usually found when this (truthfully) minor piece is performed. Leinsdorf repented his prior sins of omission and gave a sparkling accompaniment, bringing an intermission time laden with great expectations for the second half.

* * *

This time he did not fail us. The s t r i n g serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," was given a highly sensitive and satisfying interpretation, one of the finest in my listening experience.

Following this perennial favorite was the concert aria, "Ah se in ciel, benigne stelle." This was a first hearing for me, but again Miss Sills was in good voice, and the conductor appeared to continue with his glowing accompaniment. There was still plenty of ammunition left for the last number on the program, the aria "Martern aller Arten" from "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Delicacy and control were everywhere evident, and contributions by the solo flute, oboe and cello were matchless. The real praise, however, goes to Miss Sills, who made the vengeful, almost violent aria sound so realistic.

* * *

The final concert, on Sunday afternoon, paired the Linz and Prague symphonies and offered the Piano Concerto No. 17 as well. I would have liked to hear a broader, more solemn introduction in the Linz symphony, but Leinsdorf obviously saw things a different way. With the main tempo, the conductor still kept things m o v i n g. There should have been more flexibility here and there, however, to get the music's full content across. For instance, those soft, mock-militant chorales in the winds would sound a lot better if they weren't rushed quite so quickly. The slow movement was an improvement, but the Minuet that followed requires more study on the part of the conductor. The b r i s k tempo could work very well if more inflection were given to the strings. I suspect that if the bowing were reversed (upbowing is not decisive enough for the solid sound this movement needs and is better suited for conveying anxiety than stateliness), things would've sounded a lot differently. The finale was very good and brought the piece to a positive conclusion.

Next we were given the Piano Concerto No. 17, with Claude Frank as soloist. This is a very demanding concerto emotionally, and its second movement certainly ranks among the "ten best" the composer ever wrote. Now and then the orchestra would get a bit sleepy, but on the whole the players performed brilliantly. The sincere, intimate dialogues achieved b e t w e e n piano and orchestra were due as much to the superior wind playing as the soloist. Frank was inspiration personified. Throughout, he was admirable in his handling of the score, especially in the difficult slow movement. He must be forgiven a frequent use of the pedal because a necessary evil of playing in the Music Shed is that piano sound threatens not to carry in such an open area.

A single work was offered after intermission, the Prague symphony. Again, the introduction could have been broaded, but I'd been getting used to Leinsdorf's way of doing things by this time.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 100,000

JUL 3 1968 New England Newsclip

JAMES OLIVER BUSWELL IV, violinist, will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto in B flat, K. 207, during the Boston Symphony's opening Tanglewood concert Friday night, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

CONCERT REVIEW

All-Mozart Program Opens 40th Year of Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass.—The Boston Symphony entered its fourth decade at the Berkshire Festival Friday (5) with an all-Mozart weekend. The opening evening's concert marked the Tanglewood debut of James Oliver Buswell IV, a talented Harvard undergraduate whose career as a top concert violinist seems assured.

Buswell, who has yet to record, played the "Concerto No. 1" with discipline and authority. The work mainly requires responses on the lower two strings, with the violin given a relatively minor role. But Buswell distinguished himself behind the superb direction of Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston, RCA artists. Although the concert began Leinsdorf's last Tanglewood season as the orchestra's music director, he will continue to record for RCA.

And the Boston performed the "Posthorn Seranade" with its customary excellence and imagination. The opening night's program opened with the overture from the "Marriage of Figaro."

The best weather of the season greeted the Tanglewood opening, and the crowd filled the shed and took over most of the adjacent lawn area.

Beverly Sills, soprano, was featured soloist Saturday night (6), while pianist Claude Frank was soloist for the Sunday afternoon (7) program. Miss Sills appears on RCA and Heliodor. Frank records for RCA.

AARON STERNFIELD

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUL 20 1968

6,000 at Tanglewood

Mozart Still Best-Seller

By McLAREN HARRIS

LENOX — "The thing that depresses me," said a composer of contemporary music recently. Lamenting the non-acceptance of his product, "is that Mozart is still the best-seller."

The composer had indeed cause for worry, and if evidence were required to support his contention, Tanglewood provided it last weekend. More than 6,000 listeners turned out for each of the three all-Mozart Boston Symphony concerts opening the 1968 Berkshire Festival.

Three symphonies, two concerti, one serenade, an overture and four vocal pieces were performed by the orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf and three soloists: violinist James Oliver Buswell IV; Beverly Sills, soprano; and Holdes Leben," a tender declaration of love sung by a pianist Claude Frank. Perhaps predictable, though not undeservedly, Miss Sills' work on Saturday night elicited the warmest response.

THE MOTET, "Exsultate, jubilate," and three arias selected by the soprano were all of a very impressive variety.

"Ah Se In Ciel, Benigne Stelle," K. 538, a sort of ode to love, and "Martern Aller Arten," a courageous plea for mercy from "The Abduction from the Seraglio," are both technical tours de forces, The former containing a spectacular shower of coloratura and the latter of more heroic, resilute bent. "Exsultate, Jubilate" is, if anything, a joyful combination of the above qualities; and in contrast came "Ruhe Sanft, Mein sultan's slave to her sleeping lover in Mozart's early and unfinished opera, "Zaide."

Miss Sills' vocal form was truly a thing for admiration. Her soprano quality, smooth and full everywhere except at its lowest extremes, retains its focus to the peak of her range; if anything, it seems to improve with altitude. Rock-solid support and accurate placement enabled her to sustain clarity through long roulades as well as brief flourishes. Even lightning leaps in excess of an octave did not intimidate her.

Yet the singer's technical accomplishment did not shade her interpretive sensitivity or dramatic purpose. The strength of "Martern Aller Arten" and the ebullience of the "Exsultate" were balanced by Miss Sills' eloquent restraint and delicate quiescence of the aria from "Zaide"; she touched each phrase with almost prayerful gentility.

Restraint was in some way a notable attribute of the other weekend soloists as well. Buswell's performance of the violin concerto in B flat, K.207, on Friday night was soft-pedalled and self-effacing; Clause Frank's painstaking care with the G major piano concerto, K.453. Etched a classicist's dream.

BUT WHILE FRANK is mticulous to the last semiquaver he is anything but dry. The emotionalism of the andante, built almost as much by the silences between variation-phrases as by the music itself was keenly felt yet far from maudlin. His (and the orchestra's) work in the finale became virtually the ultimate in cheerful contrast, emphasizing metric points so as to give the rhythm a slightly satiric lilit. Again, somehow, it avoided overstatement.

It has been stated before (by me, among others) Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony constitute one of the finest accompanying units available to a soloist. They reaffirmed their standing in unmistakable terms with unexcelled alertness, dynamic deference when called for, robust orchestral textures for heightened contrast.

Their performance of the G Major Piano Concerto with Frank, especially the finale, carried a distinct air of spontaneity, as if the decision to add a humorous spice were not made during rehearsal but occurred simultaneously to all players as the music leapt nimbly forward.

The pure-orchestra works — the "Linz" and "Prague" Symphonies on Sunday, the Symphony No. 28 and "Eine Kleine Nacht-Musik" on Saturday, the overture to "Figaro" and the "Posthorn" serenade on Friday — were remarkable for exquisite dynamic contrasts. Melodic reprises were toned down nearly to bare whispers, evoking an almost ethereal charm. This was particularly appreciated in the familiar "Nachtmusik," and although, I still prefer this work as a quintet I discovered no loss of internal clarity or perspective.

This was a weekend of the sublime, the exciting, the tender, the brilliant in music. As long as Mozart can bring a retreat from perplexity, an excursion into cheerfulness and order, neither his popularity, nor that of these Bach-Mozart weekends, will dimish.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JUL 8 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Friday July 5 at 9 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART

Overture to 'Le nozze di Figaro' K. 492

Concerto no. 1 in B flat for violin K. 207
- Allegro moderato
- Adagio
- Presto

JAMES OLIVER BUSWELL IV

intermission

Serenade no. 9 in D major K. 320 'Posthorn'
- Adagio maestoso — allegro con spirito
- Menuetto: allegretto
- Concertante: andante grazioso
- Rondeau: allegro ma non troppo
- Andantino
- Menuetto
- Finale: presto

ARMANDO GHITALLA posthorn

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 17

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JUL 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival opens at Tanglewood

By Clifford Barnes

Lenox, Mass.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra displayed its Fourth-of-July spectacular on Saturday evening at Tanglewood during the opening weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival season. The magnetic roman-candle-power of soprano Beverly Sills attracted fans from all over Massachusetts, as well as New York City. Those who had never heard her before were also dazzled by her vocal brilliance.

Music director Erich Leinsdorf devoted the four scheduled concerts to the music of Mozart—a perfect choice for Miss Sills, who is at her best in the classic and baroque repertoire. Reversing the order of the solos without announcing it proved a bit disconcerting at first, but the quiet beauty of "Ruhe sanft" from "Zaide" charmed the audience by its bel canto lines. The limpid ornamentation on repeated phrases was a wonder to hear.

The motet "Exsultate, jubilate" was another occasion for the soprano to show her authoritative ease with coloratura. Charles Wilson provided organ support during the recitative and the arias. After intermission came the concert aria "Ah se in ciel, benigne steele," with long phrases in a single breath that left the listener breathless.

The pièce-de-résistance was the concluding "Martern aller Arten," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail." The aria calls for a concertino of violin, cello, flute, and oboe in addition to the orchestra. Joseph Silverstein, Jules Eskin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and Ralph Gomberg shared in the standing ovation afterwards, and rightfully so. This is one of the most difficult vocal works that Mozart wrote, because of the incredible leaps and extremes of range.

With Miss Sills, chest tones blend naturally into the rest of the voice. Vocal technique is wedded to musicianship, assuring correct stylistic interpretation. This stunning red-headed beauty was thanked by standing ovations after each group. Members of the orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf eagerly joined in the applause.

Ornamented pillars

Friday night's soloist, James Oliver Buswell IV, is a fine, competent violinist, but he doesn't play in the same league. Making his BSO debut with Mozart's Concerto No. 1 in B flat was not the best showcase. The work is slim on real musical substance. The cadenzas added to each movement were long and tended to blur the overall style.

Mr. Buswell, who will be a senior at Harvard next fall, performs with the wide-eyed look of youth and a self-assurance that tends to be alarming. The technique is secure, in spite of occasional intonation problems with double stops. Tone quality varied, and was not always winning.

Friday's Prelude concert showed him off to better advantage in violin sonatas by Mozart, K. 302 and K. 454. Here his partner was pianist Lilian Kallir, an established interpreter of that composer. Rising to meet the musicianship of the pianist, phrases were carefully laid out with a sensitivity to nuance. Ornamental frills were placed as decorations on solid melodic pillars.

Leinsdorf's orchestral selections featured two serenades, the "Posthorn" (K. 320), and the "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." During the first one Armando Ghitalla played the posthorn solo sections in the second trio of the second minuet. The first minuet and the ear-tickling rondeau were marked by some excellent woodwind solo passages. The more familiar "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" had an occasional flair in contrasting dynamics.

A spirited Symphony No. 28 and the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" completed the Friday and Saturday programs. Claude Frank was scheduled to play the Mozart Piano Concerto No. 17 on Sunday, and the orchestra to perform the "Linz" and "Prague" Symphonies. Leinsdorf reduced the size of the orchestra to classic proportions, and Mozart buffs had a holiday treat.

CONCERT REVIEW

All-Mozart Program Opens 40th Year of Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass.—The Boston Symphony entered its fourth decade at the Berkshire Festival Friday (5) with an all-Mozart weekend. The opening evening's concert marked the Tanglewood debut of James Oliver Buswell IV, a talented Harvard undergraduate whose career as a top concert violinist seems assured.

Buswell, who has yet to record, played the "Concerto No. 1" with discipline and authority. The work mainly requires responses on the lower two strings, with the violin given a relatively minor role. But Buswell distinguished himself behind the superb direction of Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston, RCA artists. Although the concert began Leinsdorf's last Tanglewood season as the orchestra's music director, he will continue to record for RCA.

And the Boston performed the "Posthorn Seranade" with its customary excellence and imagination. The opening night's program opened with the overture from the "Marriage of Figaro."

The best weather of the season greeted the Tanglewood opening, and the crowd filled the shed and took over most of the adjacent lawn area.

Beverly Sills, soprano, was featured soloist Saturday night (6), while pianist Claude Frank was soloist for the Sunday afternoon (7) program. Miss Sills appears on RCA and Heliodor. Frank records for RCA.

AARON STERNFIELD

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUL 20 1968

6,000 at Tanglewood

Mozart Still Best-Seller

By McLAREN HARRIS

LENOX — "The thing that depresses me," said a composer of contemporary music recently. Lamenting the non-acceptance of his product, "is that Mozart is still the best-seller."

The composer had indeed cause for worry, and if evidence were required to support his contention, Tanglewood provided it last weekend. More than 6,000 listeners turned out for each of the three all-Mozart Boston Symphony concerts opening the 1968 Berkshire Festival.

Three symphonies, two concerti, one serenade, an overture and four vocal pieces were performed by the orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf and three soloists: violinist James Oliver Buswell IV; Beverly Sills, soprano; and Holdes Leben," a tender declaration of love sung by a pianist Claude Frank. Perhaps predictable, though not undeservedly, Miss Sills' work on Saturday night elicited the warmest response.

THE MOTET, "Exsultate, jubilate," and three arias selected by the soprano were all of a very impressive variety.

"Ah Se In Ciel, Benigne Stelle," K. 538, a sort of ode to love, and "Martern Aller Arten," a courageous plea for mercy from "The Abduction from the Seraglio," are both technical tours de forces, The former containing a spectacular shower of coloratura and the latter of more heroic, resilute bent. "Exsultate, Jubilate" is, if anything, a joyful combination of the above qualities; and in contrast came "Ruhe Sanft, Mein sultan's slave to her sleeping lover in Mozart's early and unfinished opera, "Zaide."

Miss Sills' vocal form was truly a thing for admiration. Her soprano quality, smooth and full everywhere except at its lowest extremes, retains its focus to the peak of her range; if anything, it seems to improve with altitude. Rock-solid support and accurate placement enabled her to sustain clarity through long roulades as well as brief flourishes. Even lightning leaps in excess of an octave did not intimidate her.

Yet the singer's technical accomplishment did not shade her interpretive sensitivity or dramatic purpose. The strength of "Martern Aller Arten" and the ebullience of the "Exsultate" were balanced by Miss Sills' eloquent restraint and delicate quiescence of the aria from "Zaide"; she touched each phrase with almost prayerful gentility.

Restraint was in some way a notable attribute of the other weekend soloists as well. Buswell's performance of the violin concerto in B flat, K.207, on Friday night was soft-pedalled and self-effacing; Clause Frank's painstaking care with the G major piano concerto, K.453. Etched a classicist's dream.

BUT WHILE FRANK is mticulous to the last semi-quaver he is anything but dry. The emotionalism of the andante, built almost as much by the silences between variation-phrases as by the music itself was keenly felt yet far from maudlin. His (and the orchestra's) work in the finale became virtually the ultimate in cheerful contrast, emphasizing metric points so as to give the rhythm a slightly satiric lilit. Again, somehow, it avoided overstatement.

It has been stated before (by me, among others) Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony constitute one of the finest accompanying units available to a soloist. They reaffirmed their standing in unmistakable terms with unexcelled alertness, dynamic deference when called for, robust orchestral textures for heightened contrast.

Their performance of the G Major Piano Concerto with Frank, especially the finale, carried a distinct air of spontaneity, as if the decision to add a humorous spice were not made during rehearsal but occurred simultaneously to all players as the music leapt nimbly forward.

The pure-orchestra works — the "Linz" and "Prague" Symphonies on Sunday, the Symphony No. 28 and "Eine Kleine Nacht-Musik" on Saturday, the overture to "Figaro" and the "Posthorn" serenade on Friday — were remarkable for exquisite dynamic contrasts. Melodic reprises were toned down nearly to bare whispers, evoking an almost ethereal charm. This was particularly appreciated in the familiar "Nachtmusik," and although, I still prefer this work as a quintet I discovered no loss of internal clarity or perspective.

This was a weekend of the sublime, the exciting, the tender, the brilliant in music. As long as Mozart can bring a retreat from perplexity, an excursion into cheerfulness and order, neither his popularity, nor that of these Bach-Mozart weekends, will dimish.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JUL 8 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Friday July 5 at 9 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART

Overture to 'Le nozze di Figaro' K. 492

Concerto no. 1 in B flat for violin K. 207

Allegro moderato
Adagio
Presto

JAMES OLIVER BUSWELL IV

intermission

Serenade no. 9 in D major K. 320 'Posthorn'

Adagio maestoso — allegro con spirito
Menuetto: allegretto
Concertante: andante grazioso
Rondeau: allegro ma non troppo
Andantino
Menuetto
Finale: presto

ARMANDO GHITALLA posthorn

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 17

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JUL 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival opens at Tanglewood

By Clifford Barnes

Lenox, Mass.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra displayed its Fourth-of-July spectacular on Saturday evening at Tanglewood during the opening weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival season. The magnetic roman-candle-power of soprano Beverly Sills attracted fans from all over Massachusetts, as well as New York City. Those who had never heard her before were also dazzled by her vocal brilliance.

Music director Erich Leinsdorf devoted the four scheduled concerts to the music of Mozart—a perfect choice for Miss Sills, who is at her best in the classic and baroque repertoire. Reversing the order of the solos without announcing it proved a bit disconcerting at first, but the quiet beauty of "Ruhe sanft" from "Zaide" charmed the audience by its bel canto lines. The limpid ornamentation on repeated phrases was a wonder to hear.

The motet "Exsultate, jubilate" was another occasion for the soprano to show her authoritative ease with coloratura. Charles Wilson provided organ support during the recitative and the arias. After intermission came the concert aria "Ah se in ciel, benigne steele," with long phrases in a single breath that left the listener breathless.

The pièce-de-résistance was the concluding "Martern aller Arten," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail." The aria calls for a concertino of violin, cello, flute, and oboe in addition to the orchestra. Joseph Silverstein, Jules Eskin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and Ralph Gomberg shared in the standing ovation afterwards, and rightfully so. This is one of the most difficult vocal works that Mozart wrote, because of the incredible leaps and extremes of range.

With Miss Sills, chest tones blend naturally into the rest of the voice. Vocal technique is wedded to musicianship, assuring correct stylistic interpretation. This stunning red-headed beauty was thanked by standing ovations after each group. Members of the orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf eagerly joined in the applause.

Ornamented pillars

Friday night's soloist, James Oliver Buswell IV, is a fine, competent violinist, but he doesn't play in the same league. Making his BSO debut with Mozart's Concerto No. 1 in B flat was not the best showcase. The work is slim on real musical substance. The cadenzas added to each movement were long and tended to blur the overall style.

Mr. Buswell, who will be a senior at Harvard next fall, performs with the wide-eyed look of youth and a self-assurance that tends to be alarming. The technique is secure, in spite of occasional intonation problems with double stops. Tone quality varied, and was not always winning.

Friday's Prelude concert showed him off to better advantage in violin sonatas by Mozart, K. 302 and K. 454. Here his partner was pianist Lilian Kallir, an established interpreter of that composer. Rising to meet the musicianship of the pianist, phrases were carefully laid out with a sensitivity to nuance. Ornamental frills were placed as decorations on solid melodic pillars.

Leinsdorf's orchestral selections featured two serenades, the "Posthorn" (K. 320), and the "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." During the first one Armando Ghitalla played the posthorn solo sections in the second trio of the second minuet. The first minuet and the ear-tickling rondeau were marked by some excellent woodwind solo passages. The more familiar "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" had an occasional flair in contrasting dynamics.

A spirited Symphony No. 28 and the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" completed the Friday and Saturday programs. Claude Frank was scheduled to play the Mozart Piano Concerto No. 17 on Sunday, and the orchestra to perform the "Linz" and "Prague" Symphonies. Leinsdorf reduced the size of the orchestra to classic proportions, and Mozart buffs had a holiday treat.

18.

ELLIOT NORTON WRITES:

Another Season Gets Under Way At Berkshire Music Center

AT TANGLEWOOD, the Berkshire Music Festival got under way on the weekend, with the first of 24 weekend performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. More than 10,000 people—possibly twice that number in the course of three days—saw and heard the orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf, with appropriate and distinguished soloists, in the huge Music Shed. In various other places on the Tanglewood estate, other kindred activities of the project called the Berkshire Music Center, which is part of the Festival, were busily active in various arts.

The music program began Friday evening early at a "weekend prelude," given by pianist Lillian Kallir and James Oliver Buswell, IV, a young fiddler of considerable distinction; he is only 21 years old and has just completed his junior year at Harvard College.

Elliot Norton

The same evening at nine o'clock, the orchestra took over, with Mr. Leinsdorf presiding in his usual modest and pertinent way, in three works of Mozart: the overture to "Figaro," the Concerto No. 1 in B Flat for violin, in which the remarkable Mr. Buswell played with remarkable precision and feeling, and the sensuously beautiful "Posthorn" Serenade.

It all sounded wonderful in the big shed and on the surrounding green, where thousands of concert-goers preferred to sit and where they stayed till the end despite a cool breeze which made Friday evening less pleasant than the day had been in the Berkshires.

Weekend Devoted to Mozart

The entire weekend was devoted to Mozart, with additional concerts on Saturday and Sunday which the Record American observer didn't attend because of other commitments in such other places as the Cape Playhouse, in Dennis, on Cape Cod, where Joan Fontaine was appearing in Noel Coward's "Private Lives."

The Saturday program at Tanglewood featured the singing of Beverly Sills, who has long since been one of the most notable American operatic soloists and has begun in the last two years to be recognized as one of the great ones. Miss Sills, with the orchestra, was down for several Mozart selections. The Sunday Mozart program utilized the talents of Pianist Claude Frank.

On the coming weekend, the BSO will be playing in the Music Shed again Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, music by Bach, Handel, Haydn, with various soloists; and in the small theater on the grounds there will be other concerts by various groups attached to the Music Center.

Anyone interested in an exact schedule of performances by the orchestra and the others can get it by writing or telephoning to the Festival Ticket office at Tanglewood, Lenox Mass., 01240.

Anyone who has ever been to Tanglewood, one of the most beautiful places in North America, need only be reminded. New Englanders who have never spent a day or an evening, or a weekend at this home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are respectfully recommended to consider it regardless of how much or how little they know about music. More than any festival we have, this is for everyone of every age. You can bring entire families for picnicking on the grounds, overlooking Lake Mahkeenac, which is as beautiful as anything they have in Wisconsin.

Concert by Student Orchestra

This year, the Festival will present, in addition to the long hair concerts by the BSO, a Festival of Contemporary Music, from Aug. 4-10, with a concert by the student orchestra of the Music Center, under Gunther Schuller, including new works written for the occasion by composers of note.

The Music Center, under Administrator Harry J. Kraut, sponsors a constellation of other cultural activities, which take place more or less inconspicuously in various parts of the estate or in such nearby institutions as the Winsor Mountain School and the Lenox School.

At Winsor Mountain, just up the road from Tanglewood, Boston University is conducting a Symposium-Seminar for selected young playwrights, four of whom will have their work in progress acted by members of a professional company, and evaluated.

The playwrights, all young professionals with Off-Broadway credits, are Kenneth H. Brown, whose "The Brig" created some controversy when it was first produced at the Living Theater in New York; Maria Irene Fornes, whose "The Office" was washed out just before a Broadway opening last winter; Joseph Caldwell and Thomas Oliver. Each of these dramatists is working with a professional director, all under the guidance of Robert Lewis, who has staged some of Broadway's most impressive plays and has guided more than one playwright of distinction in the past.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

JUL 8 1968

New England Newsclip

STATEN ISLAND ADVANCE
Sunday, July 21, 1968

The Boston Symphony perform at Tanglewood with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Byron Belt on the arts

Take a trip to Tanglewood for a weekend of fine music

By BYRON BELT

Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center, is probably one of the most influential cultural facilities in the world. In 1938 Miss Mary Aspinwall and Mrs. Gorham Brooks gave 210 acres and a handsome frame estate house to the Boston Symphony. Coming two summers after initial experimental concerts by the orchestra and its famed conductor Serge Koussevitsky, the gift assured Lenox, Mass. of culturally active summers for time to come.

The huge music shed was erected at Tanglewood for the 1938 season, and its 6,000-seat capacity has been one keg to the Berkshire Festival success through the years. Unlike Saratoga, where the New York City Ballet is in residence in July and the Philadelphia Orchestra in August, Tanglewood is completely dominated by the magnificent Boston Symphony.

Erich Leinsdorf, the present music director, will relinquish his post at the conclusion of the Berkshire season in 1969. Meanwhile, his tremendous energy and talents are everywhere felt, from the fact that he conducts a majority of the concerts, to his influence as head of the school, which is run in cooperation with New England Conservatory and Boston University.

The orchestra performs each Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons through Aug. 25.

A general admission ticket on Fridays provides a particularly excellent Tanglewood buy. For $2.50 visitors may attend a "weekend prelude" featuring music and artists appearing during the orchestral concerts, in performances for small ensemble.

On the Friday of the festival opening the 7 p.m. prelude featured two sonatas for violin and piano of Mozart, performed by pianist Lillian Kallir and violinist James Oliver Buswell IV. The 9 p.m. orchestral program was also all-Mozart, with young Buswell as soloist in the First Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, and with Leinsdorf directing the Marriage of Figaro Overture and the "Posthorn" Serenade.

Lillian Kallir is an outstanding pianist, and her strength, taste and forward thrust lent great vitality to the two conatas. For his part, Buswell is a technically sure but extremely bland performer. Perhaps playing comes too easily for him, and certainly he has been vastly over-promoted by his commercial management. In recent performances in recital, and with the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony, he has failed to strike a sympathetic chord with his listener, and does not seem to communicate overly well to audiences as a whole.

On Aug. 19 and 20 Miss Kallir, with her pianist husband, Claude Frank, will be a welcome guest at Philharmonic Hall as part of the "Midsummer Serenades" devoted to Mozart and Haydn. I would urge readers not to miss them.

Leinsdorf has many detracters, and he is not always a warm and communicative musician himself. But for the Tanglewood opening, he and his orchestra were in fine fettle. Both the Figaro overture and the serenade bubbled along with a lithe buoyancy to be marveled at. This was Mozart at once aristocratic and human, totally delightful. The solo performers and ensemble were impeccable.

While the accoustics of the shed are outstanding, and hearing on the lawn is remarkably clear and strong, the building itself and the hard folding chairs are real horrors. Eero Saarinen designed two handsome smaller theaters for the school, and it is a tragedy that he could not have lived to provide a new concert hall.

Great music and performances blend into a setting of such pastoral beauty as to inspire poets. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived on the grounds for a year in 1850, and wrote the House of Seven Gables and planned his Tanglewood Tales while in Lenox. A replica of his house may be seen on the grounds. The view overlooking Lake Mahkeenac is simply great, and wandering the grounds, and eating one of the traditional box suppers are part of the special delights of any visit to Tanglewood.

Weekend visitors to the Tanglewood area will find such a wealth of things to see and do that they will promise, as I have been doing for years, to go up for an entire summer one year. From the many riches, I would say three things are absolute musts: the Saratoga and Berkshire festivals, and Williamstown.

Williamstown is named for a revolutionary colonel, Ephraim Williams Jr., who set up a trust in his will for the establishment of a free school in West Hoosuck, provided the town change its name to Williamstown.

The school was opened in 1791, and Williams College is one of the oldest and finest of America's smaller universities.

The town of Williamstown is exceptionally lovely, with tree-lined streets, and almost movie-set old houses of great character and charm. And Williamstown is fortunate enough to have become the home of possibly the finest small art museum in the country, the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute.

The Clarks built their bomb-proof museum in Williamstown because they feared the dangers of nuclear war for their home, New York City. The museum was opened in 1955, and fully lives up to its donors' dedication "not for the noisy applause of today, but for the quiet appropriation of eternity."

The Clark museum is almost exactly the right size. Each room has a number of treasures, each of which is ideally displayed for relaxed contemplation and enjoyment.

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

JUL 10 1968

New Engla

Concerts Featured Weekly

Waterbury (Conn.) Republic 7/10/68

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood last weekend with three concerts devoted to Mozart.

A total attendance of 20,928 comprised the largest audiences for the opening weekend in the past five years.

The all-Mozart weekend was conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony. Friday evening started with the intimate Prelude concert at 7 p.m. featuring the Tanglewood debut of violinist James Oliver Buswell IV performing Mozart Sonatas E flat (K.302) and B flat, (K 454) for piano and violin with Lillian Kallir, well known pianist familiar to Tanglewood audiences for her virtuosity as soloist and in duets with her husband, Claude Frank, who was also featured as piano soloist in Sunday afternoon's concert.

These intimate prelude concerts were inaugurated last year at Tanglewood, and will continue to be featured on Fridays at 7, followed by the major concert on Fridays at 9 p.m. Holders of tickets for the Friday evening concerts can attend the Prelude concerts. A boxed supper is available at the canteen or concert-goers can bring their own picnic and dine al fresco on the Tanglewood grounds in-between the two performances.

Friday evening's program started with the "Marriage of Figaro" Overture, followed by a brilliant performance of Mozart's Concerto No. 1 in B flat for violin K. 207 by Mr. Buswell, and the "Posthorn" Serenade completed a program of grace, beauty and sheer musical delight.

It was this reviewer's privilege to her Beverly Sills' magnificent performance of "Exsultate, jubilate" moete for Soprano K. 65 and "ah se in ciel, benigne stelle" K. 538. She sings with such dramatic feeling, expert phrasing and has a superb upper register. Her tremolos were so at one with the orchestra that her musicanship was inspring and brought the enthusiastic audience to their feet in a standing ovation. The orchestra started the concert with Mozart's delightful Symphony No. 28 in C major K. 200 and after intermission they performed the light, lively, sparkling, gay and ever so popular Eine kleine Nachtmusik, and Miss Sills thrileld the audience once again in her rendition of "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from Zaide K. 344 and completed her performance with "Martern aller Arten" from Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail K. 384, for one of the most memorable concerts ever presented at Tanglewood.

The audience brought Miss Sills out again and again in appreciation of her brilliant performance.

She is well known to opera lovers as she is one of the leading sopranos a the New York City Opera Company. Sunday afternoon brought the gifted pianist Claude Frank before a large audience in the performance of Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 17 in G major K. 453. The orchestra started with Symphony No. 36 in C major K. 425, "The Linz" and the final work on the program was "The Prague" Symphony.

SSM

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTING.

Tanglewood Opens Its Season with a Mozart Weekend

By EDWARD FRENCH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the first of three Mozart programs to open the Thirty-first Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood last night. With favorable weather conditions, this opening night crowd was the largest in five years, totaling some six thousand four hundred listeners.

★ ★ ★

THE PROGRAM which was selected for this first concert was both interesting and entertaining. The Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro" is Mozart at his effervescent best and was given the kind of performance this music deserves and seldom gets.

The other purely orchestral work was one of Mozart's more elaborate serenades the ninth which is in D major, K.320 and is known as the "Posthorn", because in the scoring he used the posthorn, a valveless brass instrument made in either oblong coils or straight which can produce notes of the harmonic series only. Mailcoach guards used it to announce their approach to the next stop, hence its name. They rhythmic appeal, buoyant pace and detightful melodies in this music were given full expression in Mr. Leinsdorf's reading. Special mention should be made of the superlative work of the woodwind section. The posthorn as played by Armando Ghitalla has a mellow golden quality which is completely different from other more conventiona brass instruments.

★ ★ ★

THE VIOLIN soloist, James Oliver Buswell IV was heard in the Concerto No. 1 in B flat, K.207. This was Mozart's first violin concerto, a youthful work of melodic charm which keeps the soloist always to the fore, with the orchestra limited for the most part to a light chordal accompaniment. The soloist played as though this concerto had been written specifically for him. His tone was always lovely, his technique effortless and impeccable, and his sense of style made the whole a beautifully proportioned performance. This young man who has just completed his junior year at Harvard has already won a major prize. The Merriweather Post Competition in Washington D.C. and is well on his way to becoming one of our major violinists.

Many of the audience arrived early in order to hear the Weekend Prelude which is scheduled at 7 p.m. each Friday. For this first weekend prelude, Lilian Kallir, pianist and James Oliver Buswell IV, violinist played two sonatas for vioin and piano by Mozart. In the Sonata in E flat, K.302 the piano is very much the dominant partner, but in the later Sonata in B flat, K.454, Mozart achieved a true dialogue between the instruments. Both sonatas were played with excellent ensemble, a good sense of style and a subtle control of dynamics. Throughout the evening the audience was most enthusiastic.

Saturday night the program will include the Symphony No. 28 in C major K.200, and Eine Kleine Nachtmusik for orchestra. The soprano soloist, Beverly Sills will be heard in "Exsultate jubilate" motet for soprano, the "Ah se in cie, benigne stelle", "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from Zaide and "Martern aller Arten" from Die Entfuhrrung aus dem Serail.

Sunday afternoon's program will have Claude Frank as soloist in the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in G major K.453. Other works will be the Symphony No. 36 in C major K.425 "The Linz" and the Symphony No. 38 in D major K.504 "The Prague".

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, July 6, 1968

6380 Hear Mozart Works At Tanglewood Opening

SU 7/6/68

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The gentle lyricism of Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 1, (K.207) opened the season at Tanglewood Friday night with James Oliver Buswell IV playing the solo part.

Recalled in Springfield

Those in Springfield who remember Buswell's appearance with the Springfield Symphony Orchestra two or three years ago may find it a bit of a surprise to hear that he played gently and with modesty. He is older now, a senior at Harvard.

But he did . . . and beautifully, too. His music was cool for the most part, however, and couched in semi-dry tones . . . accurate, precise and unemotional.

The middle movement was warmer . . . like the orchestra. It was a beauty, full of subtle expression and grace.

The program opened with the 10-minute overture to "Figaro," a light-footed gaiety nimbly performed by the reduced orchestra. There were about 55 playing the overture, 33 playing the concerto.

The rest of the orchestra plays at the Esplanade in Boston during the first two weekends of the Tanglewood season while the program in Lenox is taken up with the Mozart and Baroque programs which use a reduced orchestra.

The size was back up to about 55 after intermission for the seven-movement, 45-minute "Posthorn" Serenade (K.320) so named for the short appearance of a posthorn, a valveless brass instrument used in the 18th century to announce the arrival of the mail coach. It was played Friday by Armando Ghitalla, first trumpet.

The long, involved serenade renewed my faith in the orchestra's string section. It was a chilly, sweater-weather evening, and Boston's strings were as elegantly silky as ever.

There were, also, many satisfying moments as the woodwind players took their turns with lilting melodies, sometimes alone, but frequently in tidy little ensembles.

Earlier Buswell played a

See 6380
Page Seventeen

6380 at Tanglewood Opening

Continued From Page 1

couple of Mozart sonatas for nearly an hour for the 7 p.m. prelude program. They were in E flat (K.302) and in B. flat (K.454), and he played them with the same semi-dry tonal quality and self-effacing manner.

Approched With Respect

He approached Mozart's lyricism with respect, without trying to introduce a power the gentle sonatas don't have and a light, easy no-strain touch.

His accompanist, Lillian Kallir, was superb. She, like her husband, Claude Frank, has a special kind of understanding for the liquidity of Mozart's piano music.

They have been regulars on the Tanglewood staff the last few summers, and I never have heard either of them play Mozart's piano music without being specially impressed.

Concerto No. 17

Frank is scheduled to play the Concerto No. 17 (K. 453) Sunday afternoon with the orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf.

The Friday attendance was 6380, the largest opening-night audience (except for 1966, which was a Saturday) for more than five years.

Leinsdorf will be back again tonight with another all-Mozart program and with Beverly Sills, soprano.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Opening at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The Tanglewood season opened last night with a duo of concerts following the policy adopted last year in which the Friday evening programs begin at 9 o'clock but are preceded by a shorter and more intimate program at 7 o'clock which holders of tickets to the later event may attend for the one admission fee.

The earlier program was of special interest, for the artists were the young violinist James Oliver Buswell IV, who was making his Tanglewood debut, and Lillian Kallir, the pianist who has earned her niche in Berkshire Festival archives by previous appearances as soloist and in duets with her husband, the pianist Claude Frank. Their program, as well as the three other programs of the weekend, was devoted solely to Mozart, a procedure which was inaugurated many years ago back in the Koussevitzky days.

Violin Squelched

Of all the Mozart sonatas for violin and piano, I can't imagine a less fortuitous choice than the E flat (K. 302). To play such a sonata in the hippodrome of the Tanglewood Shed, the work dominated as it is by the piano, (which was used with the top completely raised) was unfortunate for Mr. Buswell. He was required to play responses mainly on the two lower strings and the subservience of the violin in this case was thus doubled. In the following sonata (B flat, K. 454), the violin has a more substantial role, and here Buswell asserted himself in ample glory.

The Mozart literature is so ample that, despite the years of devoting the first week of the season to his works, there is still always first performances possible each year. The young violinist with the name that one would normally least associate with practitioners of fiddledom (although there seems to be no law about such things), showed at once that he easily deserves to be inscribed in the list of outstanding violinists or, if not that, to start one of his own.

Orchestra As Usual

The five Mozart violin concertos all date from one year, 1775, and the one Buswell played (K.207) is the first, and has never before been played at Tanglewood. All Mozart's music may be placed in the category of pure music as distinguished from music with a literary or artistic reference. The young Salzburgian's imagination was always superabundant and his invention facile and felicitous beyond any possible demand.

In the concerto, Buswell played with taste, poise and security. In the exquisite slow movement, he demonstrated a naive poignancy in the most favorable sense, and in the last movement played with glistening suavity. The cadenzas were his own in all three movements, and while they were simple in construction, they were very effective. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave him an accompaniment of the greatest consideration.

The orchestral program was conducted by Leinsdorf and in the "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the "Posthorn Serenade," the clarity and balance of the orchestra's coherence and its sonority was up to the top levels we have come to take probably too much as a matter of course.

An early evening of Berkshire's best weather greeted an audience whose cordial acceptance of the program was in the best Festival spirit.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Ensemble Concerts Offer Varied Repertoire Sundays

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is presenting a series of eight Sunday morning ensemble concerts in the Theatre-Concert-Hall at Tanglewood.

The series, which in former seasons was scheduled on Tuesday evenings, features first-desk members of the Boston Symphony in programs ranging from the standard repertoire to contemporary.

Tickets to the concerts were previously $2 to anyone but, this season, seats will be free to individual and family season members of the Friends of Tanglewood (membership fees of $15 and $25 respectively go into a tuition fund for students of the Berkshire Music Center). Seats are available to non-members for $2.

On Sunday morning at 10:30, the Violone Ensemble will present a program consisting of Rossini's String Sonata in D, No. 6; the Second Suite of Skorzeny; and the Quintet in G, Op. 77 by Dvorak. The following Sunday, July 21, the New England Wind Quintet will play works by Cambini, Lefebre, Milhaud and Bergsma; and on July 28, the Music Guild String Quartet will present a program of quartets by Haydn, Bartok, and Ravel.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

OPENING CONCERT of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood last night was followed by a reception in the Main House. Among the more than 300 attending were William L. Shirer, author and correspondent, left, who is spending the summer in Lenox, Miss Suzanne Pelton of Lenox and Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO, conducted.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 12 1968 New England Newsclip

20.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Saturday July 6 at 8 pm
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
BEVERLY SILLS soprano

MOZART

Symphony no. 28 in C major K. 200
- Allegro spiritoso
- Andante
- Menuetto: allegretto
- Presto

'Exsultate, jubilate' motet for soprano K. 165

'Ah se in ciel, benigne stelle' K. 538

intermission

Eine kleine Nachtmusik K. 525*
- Allegro
- Romanze: andante
- Menuetto: allegretto
- Rondo: allegro

'Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben' from Zaide K. 344

'Martern aller Arten' from Die Entführung aus dem Serail K. 384

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 20

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Miss Sills Triumphs At Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The biggest success of the Berkshire Music Festival's opening weekend of all-Mozart music at Tanglewood was achieved by Beverly Sills, soprano, at the Saturday night concert.

Standing ovations are not common at Tanglewood. Miss Sills received one for her brilliant singing of the motet, "Exultate, jubilate."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor Erich Leinsdorf contributed a good share of the applause.

After a rather dim start on Friday night, the Mozart programs gained in familiarity and momentum through yesterday afternoon's concert.

Total attendance for the three concerts and open rehearsal Saturday morning was 20,928.

Saturday night's instrumental works were Symphony No. 28 in C major, K.200, and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

Yesterday afternoon it was the "Linz" and "Prague" Symphonies, also conducted by Leinsdorf. Claude Frank was piano soloist in Concerto No. 17 in G major, K.453.

Dizzling Technique

Miss Sills turned the concert aria, "Ah se in Ciel," into a personal communication with her luscious, controlled voice, and unforced carrying power.

Music Review

Her dazzling technique was fully employed in "Rest Peacefully" from "Zaide" and "Torments of Every Kind" from "Abduction from the Seraglio."

Anyone who has seen Miss Sills in opera is convinced of her dramatic talents. Although repressed by concert formality, her heroines were still possessed of beautiful voices.

"Exultate" was pure singing without theatrical purpose.

There Miss Sills rose to great vocal heights. She went through hazardous passagework as if it didn't exist. Her "Alleluias" were afire with enthusiasm and lustrous tone.

Piano Concerto

An occasionally overly loud orchestra did little damage to Frank's sensitive and tasteful performance of the piano concerto.

Its first advantage was interpretive acumen. To this Frank added technical neatness, rich singing tone, rhythmic drive, and an unmistakable flair for the music.

He kept the work within the framework of melodic appeal. It was devoid of excess in speed volume, and (most happily) of the pianist's disconcerting mannerisms.

The andante was an ardent conversation between piano and orchestra, filled with mixed feelings but leaning toward gentleness. The finale was a fine mixture of digital brilliance and poetic interludes.

Distinctions

Leinsdorf and the orchestra made valid and vital distinctions between the three symphonies and the "Nachtmusik."

Swift phrase repartee in Symphony No. 28 was prompt. Ornaments were finely polished, and put across the "fun poking" that Mozart intended.

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" sounded like a huge string quartet without commensurate volume.

The "Linz" and "Prague" symphonies were discreetly handled in all things indicated on the scores. Notes were accurate, phrasing polished, volume changes clear.

It was all meticulous but only moderately stimulating.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350
JUL 8 1968
New England Newsclip

31st Opening Weekend of Berkshire Festival Concludes Today

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, July 7, 1968

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

The opening weekend of the 31st season of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood concluds this afternoon with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Claude Frank playing Mozart's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 17.

As is the tradition, the first two weeks of the Festival are devoted to works for chamber rather than symphony orchestra. The three concerts of this opening weekend have been given over entirely to the works of Mozart.

Erich Leinsdorf lead the orchestra in the first concert Friday night introducing the season with the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" providing the festival motif.

Guest soloist for the performance was violinist James Oliver Buswell IV who played the Concerto No. 1 in B Flat. Buswell is an extremely young performer but nevertheless has several years of concert appearances to his credit. His tours are currently planned around his studies at Harvard where he's enteing his senior year.

The Concerto is more a serenade than orchestral, and gave all of the work to Buswell who was quite equal to the technical demands. His long solo passages were well-played but fell short on intuitive presentation. In this respect, it was a young performance.

The orchestra concluded the abbreviated concert (Friday performances begin at 9 p.m. rather than 8 p.m.) with the "Serenade No. 9 in D Major, called the "Posthorn."

The Serenade maintained the light, entertaining concentration ofthe evening's selections. Written as background music, it employs the solo posthorn which derives its name from its use on the post or mail coach of Mozart's time.

Soloist was Armando Ghitalla, trumpet player with the Boston Symphony.

"Boston Touch"

Like the remainder of the program, the Serenade was played with the thorough "Boston touch." There were no problems and there were no moments of brilliance. The musicians went beyond the purely superficial possibilities of the music to plumb the full genuis which Mozart brought to bear on even his most light compositions, thus providing more satisfaction than there might otherwise have been for the audience.

Due to the limited nature of the posthorn, solos were restricted to harmonies but were clear and sharp against the texture of the orchestra which tended toward a thick resonance.

Saturday night's concert, also conducted by Leinsdorf, featured soprano Beverly Sills who sang several works inluding the exquisite "Exsultate, jubilato." This program opened with the Symphony No. 28 in C. Major, also in a happy and celebrating mood.

The second week of concerts at Tanglewood will have a range of Baroque composers with special emphasis on the music of Bach and including Haydn's "Lord Nelson Mass" on Saturday night.

The remaining six weeks of the season will resume full symphony orchestra proportions for the most part.

Large but not capacity audiences with moderat-size lawn crowds took advantage of the cooperating weather to enjoy the opening Tanglewood concerts which began with a Mozart "Prelude" on Friday nigth at 7 p.m. performed by pianist Lillian Kallir and violinist Buswell.

The "Preludes" are offered each Friday evening as pre-weekend concerts to entertain early arrivals until the official opening at 9 p.m.

For its 31st season, the Berkshire Festical has developed a very definite role and personality and it is one that has not changed even with the general evolution in summer festivals. It remains to ge seen how much of a difference will be made by the introduction of three popular concerts this season in a series entitled "Contemporary Trends."

The performances will be given on successive Wednesday's beginning July 17 and are considered extraneous to the regular concert schedule. The three special performances will be devoted uccessively to folk-rock, Indian music and rock.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Saturday July 6 at 8 pm
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
BEVERLY SILLS soprano

MOZART

Symphony no. 28 in C major K. 200
- Allegro spiritoso
- Andante
- Menuetto: allegretto
- Presto

'Exsultate, jubilate' motet for soprano K. 165

'Ah se in ciel, benigne stelle' K. 538

intermission

Eine kleine Nachtmusik K. 525*
- Allegro
- Romanze: andante
- Menuetto: allegretto
- Rondo: allegro

'Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben' from Zaide K. 344

'Martern aller Arten' from Die Entführung aus dem Serail K. 384

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 20

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Miss Sills Triumphs At Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The biggest success of the Berkshire Music Festival's opening weekend of all-Mozart music at Tanglewood was achieved by Beverly Sills, soprano, at the Saturday night concert.

Standing ovations are not common at Tanglewood. Miss Sills received one for her brilliant singing of the motet, "Exultate, jubilate."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor Erich Leinsdorf contributed a good share of the applause.

After a rather dim start on Friday night, the Mozart programs gained in familiarity and momentum through yesterday afternoon's concert.

Total attendance for the three concerts and open rehearsal Saturday morning was 20,928.

Saturday night's instrumental works were Symphony No. 28 in C major, K.200, and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

Yesterday afternoon it was the "Linz" and "Prague" Symphonies, also conducted by Leinsdorf. Claude Frank was piano soloist in Concerto No. 17 in G major, K.453.

Dizzling Technique

Miss Sills turned the concert aria, "Ah se in Ciel," into a personal communication with her luscious, controlled voice, and unforced carrying power.

Her dazzling technique was fully employed in "Rest Peacefully" from "Zaide" and "Torments of Every Kind" from "Abduction from the Seraglio."

Anyone who has seen Miss Sills in opera is convinced of her dramatic talents. Although repressed by concert formality, her heroines were still possessed of beautiful voices.

"Exultate" was pure singing without theatrical purpose. There Miss Sills rose to great vocal heights. She went through hazardous passagework as if it didn't exist. Her "Alleluias" were afire with enthusiasm and lustrous tone.

Piano Concerto

An occasionally overly loud orchestra did little damage to Frank's sensitive and tasteful performance of the piano concerto.

Its first advantage was interpretive acumen. To this Frank added technical neatness, rich singing tone, rhythmic drive, and an unmistakable flair for the music.

He kept the work within the framework of melodic appeal. It was devoid of excess in speed volume, and (most happily) of the pianist's disconcerting mannerisms.

The andante was an ardent conversation between piano and orchestra, filled with mixed feelings but leaning toward gentleness. The finale was a fine mixture of digital brilliance and poetic interludes.

Distinctions

Leinsdorf and the orchestra made valid and vital distinctions between the three symphonies and the "Nachtmusik."

Swift phrase repartee in Symphony No. 28 was prompt. Ornaments were finely polished, and put across the "fun poking" that Mozart intended.

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" sounded like a huge string quartet without commensurate volume.

The "Linz" and "Prague" symphonies were discreetly handled in all things indicated on the scores. Notes were accurate, phrasing polished, volume changes clear.

It was all meticulous but only moderately stimulating.

TELEGRAM [m]
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

JUL 8 1968

New England Newsclip

31st Opening Weekend of Berkshire Festival Concludes Today

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

The opening weekend of the 31st season of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood concluds this afternoon with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Claude Frank playing Mozart's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 17.

As is the tradition, the first two weeks of the Festival are devoted to works for chamber rather than symphony orchestra. The three concerts of this opening weekend have been given over entirely to the works of Mozart.

Erich Leinsdorf lead the orchestra in the first concert Friday night introducing the season with the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" providing the festival motif.

Guest soloist for the performance was violinist James Oliver Buswell IV who played the Concerto No. 1 in B Flat. Buswell is an extremely young performer but nevertheless has several years of concert appearances to his credit. His tours are currently planned around his studies at Harvard where he's enteing his senior year.

The Concerto is more a serenade than orchestral, and gave all of the work to Buswell who was quite equal to the technical demands. His long solo passages were well-played but fell short on intuitive presentation. In this respect, it was a young performance.

The orchestra concluded the abbreviated concert (Friday performances begin at 9 p.m. rather than 8 p.m.) with the "Serenade No. 9 in D Major, called the "Posthorn."

The Serenade maintained the light, entertaining concentration ofthe evening's selections. Written as background music, it employs the solo posthorn which derives its name from its use on the post or mail coach of Mozart's time.

Soloist was Armando Ghitalla, trumpet player with the Boston Symphony.

"Boston Touch"

Like the remainder of the program, the Serenade was played with the thorough "Boston touch." There were no problems and there were no moments of brilliance. The musicians went beyond the purely superficial possibilities of the music to plumb the full genuis which Mozart brought to bear on even his most light compositions thus providing more satisfaction than there might otherwise have been for the audience.

Due to the limited nature of the posthorn, solos were restricted to harmonies but were clear and sharp against the texture of the orchestra which tended toward a thick resonance.

Saturday night's concert, also conducted by Leinsdorf, featured soprano Beverly Sills who sang several works inluding the exquisite "Exsultate, jubilato." This program opened with the Symphony No. 28 in C. Major, also in a happy and celebrating mood.

The second week of concerts at Tanglewood will have a range of Baroque composers with special emphasis on the music of Bach and including Haydn's "Lord Nelson Mass" on Saturday night.

The remaining six weeks of the season will resume full symphony orchestra proportions for the most part.

Large but not capacity audiences with moderat-size lawn crowds took advantage of the cooperating weather to enjoy the opening Tanglewood concerts which began with a Mozart "Prelude" on Friday nigth at 7 p.m. performed by pianist Lillian Kallir and violinist Buswell.

The "Preludes" are offered each Friday evening as pre-weekend concerts to entertain early arrivals until the official opening at 9 p.m.

For its 31st season, the Berkshire Festical has developed a very definite role and personality and it is one that has not changed even with the general evolution in summer festivals. It remains to ge seen how much of a difference will be made by the introduction of three popular concerts this season in a series entitled "Contemporary Trends."

The performances will be given on successive Wednesday's beginning July 17 and are considered extraneous to the regular concert schedule. The three special performances will be devoted uccessively to folk-rock, Indian music and rock.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
7, 1968

1-4141 SCHENECTADY GAZETTE,

3 All-Mozart Concerts Open Tanglewood Fare

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Three all-Mozart concerts were in the offering as Tanglewood opened its 1968 season this past weekend. Last year Leinsdorf detained the traditional Bach-Hayden-Mozart programs for a week in order to offer works of larger fare to concert-goers on vacation for the holiday weekend, but this year the two weeks of pre-Beethovenian music are back in their customary position as season openers.

* * *

The summer series almost began on a sour note Friday evening, in which Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, Violin Concerto No. One, and "Posthorn" serenade were featured. Whenever Leinsdorf has an interpretive problem with Mozart it's usually because the texture he defines is too sparing or the wrong tempo has been selected. Both ailments afflicted the overture, which could've sounded a lot brighter (I don't mean more trumpets!) and should've sounded a lot better throughout.

In the Violin Concerto, problems were compounded by adding soloist James Oliver Buswell IV, who not only was out of tune but had no idea what was expected from him as a Mozart soloist. Leinsdorf deserves a severe reprimand for not letting the young violinist re-tune his instrument between the first and second movements. As it was, the "catch your breath and let's get this over with" attitude left Buswell with about five seconds to compose himself, hardly enough time to correct so obvious an error. Being out of tune is one thing, but not fitting in with the ensemble is another. I strongly suggest that Buswell emulate 18th century practices a little more closely and not try to gas everyone out with hard-sell bravura.

Following the intermission the "Posthorn" serenade was given a fairly successful reading by Leinsdorf. Although it began not broadly enough, by the time the Minet rolled around, both conductor and orchestra were sufficiently relaxed to give the music the attention it deserves. In fact, the remainder of the performance was very pleasing indeed, perhaps due to the less arbitrary decisions that ruined the first half of the concert.

Saturday evening's event included the Symphony No. 28; "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" the early motet, "Exultate, Jubilate;" a concert aria, "Alma Grande Nobil Core;" and two operatic arias from "Zaide" and the "Seraglio." Beverly Sills was the soprano soloist in the last three works.

The concert began with the Symphony No. 28, a delightful piece I expected Leinsdorf to run away with. He didn't. The first movement proceeded uneventfully and with very little involvement on the conductor's part. The slow movement was better, but one still got the impression that this was just a performance by a crack orchestra merely doing its job. With the third movement, things got much worse again, for Leinsdorf took the music at half the proper tempo. This movement presents an interpretive problem to every conductor in search for a tempo: there are repeated horn passages that echo the strings, and it is here one should get a clear picture of what [redacted] means. [redacted] playing these note values at so slow a tempo the horns lack sustaining power in much the same way the piano does. The result is an awkward step-and-go feeling which can only be corrected by lengthening the note values (a violation of the score) or choosing a swifter tempo. Leinsdorf did neither. In the finale, tempo was a lot better, but the compact movement lacked any new insights.

* * *

Next on the program was "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben," an aria from the opera "Zaide." It was interesting to hear this work from an opera left uncompleted at age 21. Regrettably, Miss Sills was not in perfect voice for the piece, her high register sounding somewhat strained on occasion.

She was considerably better in the motet, "Exultate, Jubilate." Suddenly no vocal feat seemed beyond her, and I don't think anyone will easily forget the outstanding vocal cadenza. Besides superb singing, she also gave to the music a sense of refinement and commitment not usually found when this (truthfully) minor piece is performed. Leinsdorf repented his prior sins of omission and gave a sparkling accompaniment, bringing an intermission time laden with great expectations for the second half.

* * *

This time he did not fail us. The string serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," was given a highly sensitive and satisfying interpretation, one of the finest in my listening experience.

Following this perennial favorite was the concert aria, "Ah se in ciel, benigne stelle." This was a first hearing for me, but again Miss Sills was in good voice, and the conductor appeared to continue with his glowing accompaniment. There was still plenty of ammunition left for the last number on the program, the aria "Martern aller Arten" from "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Delicacy and control were everywhere evident, and contributions by the solo flute, oboe and cello were matchless. The real praise, however, goes to Miss Sills, who made the vengeful, almost violent aria sound so realistic.

* * *

The final concert, on Sunday afternoon, paired the Linz and Prague symphonies and offered the Piano Concerto No. 17 as well. I would have liked to hear a broader, more solemn introduction in the Linz symphony, but Leinsdorf obviously saw things a different way. With the main tempo, the conductor still kept things moving. There should have been more flexibility here and there, however, to get the music's full content across. For instance, those soft, mock-militant chorales in the winds would sound a lot better if they weren't rushed quite so quickly. The slow movement was an improvement, but the Minuet that followed requires more study on the part of the conductor. The brisk tempo could work very well if more inflection were given to the strings. I suspect that if the bowing were reversed (upbowing is not decisive enough for the solid sound this movement needs and is better suited for conveying anxiety than stateliness), things would've sounded a lot differently. The finale was very good and brought the piece to a positive conclusion.

Next we were given the Piano Concerto No. 17, with Claude Frank as soloist. This is a very demanding concerto emotionally, and its second movement certainly ranks among the "ten best" the composer ever wrote. Now and then the orchestra would get a bit sleepy, but on the whole the players performed brilliantly. The sincere, intimate dialogues achieved between piano and orchestra were due as much to the superior wind playing as the soloist. Frank was inspiration personified. Throughout, he was admirable in his handling of the score, especially in the difficult slow movement. He must be forgiven a frequent use of the pedal because a necessary evil of playing in the Music Shed is that piano sound threatens not to carry in such an open area.

A single work was offered after intermission, the Prague symphony. Again, the introduction could have been broaded, but I'd been getting used to Leinsdorf's way of doing things by this time.

Beverly Sills Highlights Tanglewood Fete Opening

By Al Cohn

Lenox, Mass.—It is good to see Tanglewood again. It is good to sit among the trees and escape reality for a while to the music of the Boston Symphony. The weekend's opening of the 31st Berkshire Festival was particularly soothing, offering four all-Mozart concerts.

Yet not even Tanglewood has managed to remain untouched by disruption in what Erich Leinsdorf described recently as this "year of thunderstorms." One watches the small, vigorous man on the podium knowing that this is the prelude to the final season as music director. Leinsdorf complained of being overworked and announced his resignation in December. He will serve through the end of next summer's festival before William Steinberg takes over.

Those who have always considered the festival a haven for classical music will note the addition of three "contemporary trend" concerts coming up, featuring the work of the Modern Jazz Quartet, Ali Akbar Khan on something called the sarod, and an evening simply entitled "Rock," starring the Association. Even several of the nearby lakes have been upset by an unusual attack of spring pollution.

Nevertheless, the essentials of Tanglewood remain, and this should be more than enough for the most conservative—and the fussiest—of music lovers. The past weekend was another model of musical perfection. Friday evening's two concerts, which attracted an opening night record crowd of 6,380, got off well with pianist Lilian Kallir and violinist James Oliver Buswell IV performing two sonatas in the Weekend Prelude. Buswell returned for the main concert, with a deft interpretation of the first violin concerto.

Two years ago, New York Opera soprano Beverly Sills, in an interview, made no secret of her bitterness toward the Metropolitan Opera and what she referred to as the Met's disdain for American-born singers. Of course, the Brooklyn-born singer has since risen to great heights with the City Opera, and her appearance here Saturday night was the highlight of the weekend. She sang a motet for soprano and arias from "Zaile" and "Die Entfuhrung." Rounding out the program were the Symphony No. 28 and the popular "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

Symphonies No. 36 and 38 and the piano concerto No. 17, with Claude Frank, closed things out yesterday. Lawn-sitters had the bonus of three healthy babies crying.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

JUL 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Beverly Sills Is Exemplary

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Beverly Sills, who has become the darling of the vocal connoisseurs, won a deserved ovation for herself at Tanglewood Saturday night in an all-Mozart program.

With the suave collaboration of the Boston Symphony, suitably reduced in size for the occasion by Erich Leinsdorf, she sang with the assured skill of an instrumentalist in four Mozart settings, including the familiar "Exultate, Jubilate."

Miss Sills chose the concert aria, "Ah, se in ciel, benigne stelle" (K. 538) for her opening number. Scored for strings, oboes, bassoons, and horns, it is the last of eight concert arias written for Aloysia Weber, the girl with whom Mozart fell violently in love. She turned him down but he continued to write music for her throughout his life.

With an exemplary display of legato singing, Miss Sills won over her audience. And her command of the florid style in the "Exultate, Jubilate" made an even more electrifying impact, particularly in the "Alleluia" finale which was taken at a quicksilver tempo. It was impeccably articulated.

The coloratura demands of "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" (from "Zaide") were met with an equally secure technique. It was a wonderful primer for the great aria — "Martern aller Arten" (from "Die Entfurung") that concluded her contribution. It was sung with a technical elan and dramatic flourish that inspired many to give her a standing ovation.

For the purely symphonic portion of the program there was the comparatively early Mozart Symphony (No. 28) in C major (K. 200) and the beloved "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." Leinsdorf's crisp, business-like approach to the music was more apropos to the symphony than the serenade, which profits from a more relaxed "gemutlichkeit" treatment.

This second event of the new Tanglewood season in the Music Shed drew some 6,000 auditors. Most of the audience, needless to say, was concentrated inside the Shed for this all-Mozart affair, although the weather was beautifully cooperative outside on the lawn.

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

JUL 3 1968 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Joyous Voice of Beverly Sills Complements Mozart Works

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Beverly Sills is one of the most joyous of sopranos. She was Saturday night, anyway, at Tanglewood, where she sang four pieces with the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by ~~Erich Leinsdorf.~~

She is a mainstay of the New York City Opera and has appeared with most of the leading orchestras and opera companies of the western world.

Saturday she sailed onto the stage buoyantly and sang her Mozart program with a lusty grin and great good will. She put heart into the music that Mozart richly deserves.

Which is not to say she sang without impeccable control and musicianship. Her trills and musical decorations were crystal clear, intonation exact and wide leaps and coloratura acrobatics precise.

And her tones, as her fans have learned to expect, were smooth and pearly. They rewarded her with shouts, most of them standing. (The audience totaled 6045.)

She sang excerpts from a couple of operas. "Die Entfuhrung Aud Dem Serail" (K.384) and "Zaide" (K.344), a concert aria titled "Ah Se Ciel, Benigne Stelle" (K.538) and the Motet "Exultate, Jubilate" (K.165).

The orchestra, in the meantime, produced one of the most pleasing performances I have heard of one of Mozart's most popular pieces, "Fine Kleine Nachtmusik" (K.525).

If the Boston string section is not the very best orchestral string section in the world, I don't know what the best could sound like. . . Even making allowances for personal preference.

The Philadelphians are justly famous for their vevelty tone. It is unmatched. But velvet tone is not always appropriate. The Bostonians can be velvety or silky or brilliant, according to stylistic demand.

They were, for me, ideal for Mozart Saturday, and so was Leinsdorf's controlled flexibility.

Today they are scheduled to play Mozart's Symphonies Nos. 36 and 38 (The "Linz" and "Prague") and, with Claude Frank as soloist, the No. 17 Piano concerto (K.453. It should be a fine day.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 421,356

JUL 8 1968

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 7 1968 New England Newsclip

BEVERLY SILLS, soprano, will be featured in an all Mozart program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Saturday evening at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

REPUBLICAN (m)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 26,100

JUL 3 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Sunday July 7 at 2.30 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART

Symphony no. 36 in C major K. 425 'The Linz'

- Adagio — allegro spiritoso
- Poco adagio
- Menuetto
- Presto

Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 17 in G major K. 453

- Allegro
- Andante
- Allegretto

CLAUDE FRANK

intermission

Symphony no. 38 in D major K. 504 'The Prague'

- Adagio — allegro
- Andante
- Finale: presto

Claude Frank plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 36

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsc

CLAUDE FRANK, pianist formerly with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 17 in G major at Sunday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,405 SUN. 1,494,704

JUL 8 1968

First-Weekend Attendance At Tanglewood Tops 20,000

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 7—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this weekend with the largest opening weekend attendance in the last live years. Total attendance was 20,928. Last year's opening weekend attedance was 19,965.

Three Mozart programs were conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony's music director. James Oliver Buswell was soloist in the Violin Concerto No. 1 in B Flat (K. 207) on Friday night's opening program.

Beverly Sills, singing the motet "Exsultate, Jubilate," appeared with the orchestra on Saturday night, and Claude Frank played the piano concerto in G major, (K. 453) on Sunday afternoon.

Frank shows mature mastery

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

NEW YORK CITY-LENOX — Friday evening, the Tanglewood season began with a Mozart program — the first of three during the week-end. At the same time, Daniel Barenboim led a Mozart program at Philharmonic Hall, New York — the first of four concerts with the English Chamber Orchestra at the Lincoln Center Festival.

Friday's concert, at which he started with the A major Symphony, No. 29, ended with the G minor, No. 40, and between played the B flat Concerto, K. 595, leading from the piano, confirmed what I had inferred from recordings — that Barenboim is an outstandingly good conductor.

phony in the earlier version without clarinets, and gave it a really extraordinary performance. To begin with, it was a pleasure to hear someone play the piece who had remembered that Mozart wanted the first movement to be Molto Allegro and not a pathetic Andante.

It was Barenboim's rhythmic sense that enabled him to realize intensity and grace so well: he is wonderfully liberated from the barline — able to work out his interpretive strategies in terms of the largest possible structural units.

The A major Symphony was detached and refined both perhaps, to excess. I couldn't agree with what I heard, but I admired it for its sensitive awareness of harmonic progressions of textures, for its rhythmic vitality. The handling of the repeats was especially interesting: here Barenboim even managed to emancipate himself from the tyranny of double bars, planning and phrasing across those demarcation points to make each repeat an organic, subtly-varied continuation forward.

The least impressive achievement of the concert was Barenboim's piano playing, which kept alternating in a disconcerting way between phrases that were boldly sculptured and those that were bland and without character, and including some that began energetically but then trailed off quickly into flaccidity.

At any rate, Barenboim's playing of K. 595, taken as a whole, was nowhere near as impressive as Claude Frank's of the G major Concerto, K. 453, at Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon. With its powerfully shaped phrases, superb articulation, concentration, rhythmic definition, and with special energy imparted by the exciting life Frank brings to the bass line, the performance was an act of mature mastery.

The orchestral context created by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony was beautifully made on its terms, though I think a bit too pretty and not quite strong enough (definitely with too little atention paid the basses) to be the ideal match for Frank's grandly assertive playing.

The soloist at Saturday's Tanglewood concert was the soprano Beverly Sills, singing two little-known pieces and two famous ones. She began with "Ruhe sanft" from "Zaide," a Singspiel Mozart began and abandoned in 1779.

It is a singularly lovely piece in the simple, homely style Mozart seems to have reserved for his German operas. Sills sang it with beautiful artistry in phrasing, especially in the exquisitely ornamented first reprise, though it was more the artistry of a great instrumentalist than that of word-oriented singer.

Her other solos were bravura pieces, the motet, "Exsultate, jubilate," the concert aria, "Ah se in ciel, benigne stelle," K.538, and "Martern aller Arten" from "Die Entfuehrung." Each gave her an opportunity to sing brilliantly and musically, and each aroused the audience to great enthusiasm.

Putting the last note of "Martern aller Arten" up an octave is a cheap trick, though: the ovation would have been no less long and no less loud had Miss Sills stuck to Mozart's own more logical and more beautiful melodic line.

The singing was well supported by Leinsdorf and the orchestra, and the concertino in the "Entfuehrung" aria, violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and oboist Ralph Gomberg, distinguished itself.

This rather brittle and cold program also included the Symphony No. 28 in C and "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," both too flatly done to be convincing, and the former in addition disfigured by scratchy, generally all-over-the-place playing.

Sunday's concert began with the Linz Symphony, well done except for the loss of rhythmic control in the finale, and it ended with the Prague Symphony.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JUL 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Afternoon of Mozart terrific at Tanglewood

By CORAL CROSMAN
Union-Star Staff

An afternoon of Mozart . . . sunlight washing down over green lawns, boughs swaying rhythmically in the trees . . . Erich Leinsdorf at the helm of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra. This was the scene Sunday at Tanglewood near Lenox, Mass.

On the program was the well known "Prague Symphony, No. 38 in D Major, K. 504," coming climactically last on the program, with the lesser known but delightful "Linz Symphony, No. 36 in C Major, K. 425," serving as an opener. Juxtaposed delicately between them was the moving "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 17 in G Major, K. 453," with the talented Claude Frank at the keyboard.

Triple entente

Leinsdorf seems to fit comfortably with Mozart, as do his musicians, and, it might be added, the large audience in the amphitheater and ensconced on the lawns around it. It suddenly comes to one, with that opening measure perhaps, that Sunday afternoons and Mozart constitute some inviolate formula which if one hasn't at some point hit upon, the people there seem already aware of it.

The conducting style of Leinsdorf, disciplined and metered, coheres well with the temperament of this composer. The "Linz" Symphony, which Mozart supposedly composed in about three days for an "occasion," with its soft "Adagio" opening, its dancelike "Menuetto" and sprightly "Presto," was served well by the musicians.

The soloist in the evocative concerto revealed a concentrated discipline, a sensitive application and interpretation, and a touch exacting and thoughtful, with great awareness of the sound his fingers were supplying. The balance between orchestra and piano was beautifully maintained and there could be little doubt that some satisfying rapport was working between them. The audience appreciated this in long and hearty applause.

While the opening symphony might be called "delightful," at least to this reviewer's taste, the "Prague," it must be said, is genuinely exciting. It again begins with a slower movement, the "Adagio," and proceeds to "Allegro." A thoughtful "Andante" movement intercedes before the dynamic "Presto" climax and conclusion.

List schedule

Tanglewood's schedule this summer includes Friday evening concerts, featuring the Boston Symphony, beginning at 9 p.m., with the Weekend Prelude beginning at 7 p.m. The Saturday concert starts at 8 p.m. with the Sunday concert at 2:30 p.m.

This coming weekend will feature a baroque organ program for the prelude on Friday, followed by David Zinman conducting music by Boccherini, Bach, Handel and Haydn. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, will be featured violinist.

Saturday will include music by Bach and Haydn, and Sunday will feature works by Telemann, Bach and Handel, with Leinsdorf conducting these two concerts. Another delightful feature at Tanglewood are Saturday's open rehearsals at 10:30 a.m.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 31,320

JUL 8 1968

Emily Hears Boston Symphony; Delightful

By EMILY WALKER

PITTSFIELD, Mass. — It would be well worth traveling on your hands and knees to cover the six miles we drove last Sunday afternoon to Lennox to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play at Tanglewood.

Under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra played an all Mozart program. The huge music shed was filled to capacity and overflow crowds sat in the shade of the huge elms and maples on the wide, grassy lawns outside. Many had come early to eat picnic lunches before the concert began.

It was a perfect summer's day. A soft, light breeze blew fitfully. During the quieter passages of the music, one could hear the birds singing. The audience sat in rapt silence.

Pianist Claude Frank brought a standing ovation following his flawless playing of Mozart's Concerto No. 17 in G Major, as did Leinsdorf and the orchestra for both Symphony No. 36 in C Major, which opened the program, and for the closing number, Symphony No. 38 in D Major.

Colorful Affairs

Concerts at Tanglewood, a mecca for music students from all over the world, are colorful affairs. Members of the orchestra are clad in summer white. Among the concert goers were East Indian women in saris, the locals in bright summer dresses and the men, for the most part, in informal slacks and open-necked shirts. No pants on any fatso femmes, only the young girls scattered among the crowd sprawled outside on the grass.

On the way home, we drove around in Lennox, where, before World War 1, many of the very wealthy families from New York, Boston and Philadelphia built huge mansions (which they called "cottages"). Here they whiled away the season attending the races, and giving and going to parties.

The most pretentious of these great houses was Shadowbrook, the 100-room mansion built by the Stokes banking family, which eventually burned down, after the impossibility of getting servants had long since brought about the sale, or abandonment of these summer retreats of the affluent.

Now, the mansion once owned by Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt is occupied by the Foxhollow School for Girls, which also includes the house and grounds which once was the summer home of novelist Edith Wharton.

Town Flourishes

Though millionaires have abandoned Lennox as a summer playground, the town has flourished as a cultural and social retreat, as well as a mecca for winter skiers. The Boston Symphony has played at Tanglewood during the summer for 30 years. The old summer hotels, along with the newer ones, have not only survived but, by modernizing, have flourished. Guests still may be seen lined up on the long verandas in the same rocking chairs from which vacationers watched the passing scene at the turn of the century.

Lennox, as have Stockbridge and many other towns in the Berkshires, has maintained the New England flavor of its past. White church spires, town squares, huge shade trees, white, green shuttered houses set back on wide lawns, grace all of them. All enjoy the dramatic view of the Berkshires, their summer green changing to blues and grays as the sun moves across the sky, then to flaming fire in October and when the leaves finally fall, to still cold white after the first snowfall.

Ballet and Dramas

Jacob's Pillow, in nearby Lee, is now in its 27th year of summer ballet under one director, Ted Shawn. Ballet troops come from all over the world to study and perform here. As this is being written the Danish ballet is performing at Jacob's Pillow, as well as dancers from India.

Summer "straw hat" theaters abound in the area, as they do in nearly all of New England. Casts comprised of local little theater groups put on plays led by Broadway stars.

As it always has, New England draws writers and artists. Last week, local artists put on a show on the grounds of the Berkshire Museum in downtown Pittsfield. For the most part the subjects comprised the woods and lakes that abound here, or village scenes. Believe it or not, there was not a single painting of the daub and smear school. I could have cheered.

I didn't understand what had happened, until an article by Vrest Orton appeared in the Berkshire Eagle the following day. He was writing about the work of John Rogers, a sculptor who lived and worked in Vermont during the last part of the last century. In commenting on the ease with which Rogers communicated through his figures, which have become collectors' items today, he described Rogers' work as "Norman Rockwell in the Round." Orton said, in part, "The day of the selfish, cryptic and sterile dauber and slobber is over. His arrogance that the public did not matter a damn is no longer acceptable. His contempt of people who failed to understand what he was trying to say, has been replaced by the remarkable discovery that such a person really has nothing to say at all and was masking his vacuity with something called 'art'." Ole.

TACOMA NEWS TRIBUNE
TACOMA, WASH.
D. 97,229 SUN. 94,226

JUL 14 1968

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Mozart Rendition At Tanglewood Tender, Delicate

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Claude Frank came forth Sunday afternoon, as expected, with a sweetly flowing, deeply contemplative performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 17 (K. 453) with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Frank's Insight

The concerto is an interesting one in that, even though composed for a highly talented student, it requires an unusual degree of mature expression in the middle movement as well as technical skill in the first and last movements.

Frank's way with Mozart's piano music includes both, and Sunday, as he has in other years during the opening Mozart programs here, he played with tender insight and delicacy.

There are listeners who might quibble with the pace set for the concerto. The first and last movements were of medium speed and the middle, marked "andante," was leisurely indeed. Some might even say very slow.

"Prague" Preferred

But its mood of tranquil thoughtfulness was well served by leisureliness, and it was a success on its own merits.

Before and after the concerto, Leinsdorf led the orchestra on performances of the "Linz" (K. 425) and "Prague" (K. 504) symphonies, which were composed within a couple of years of the concerto.

They appeared to be of notably different character Sunday afternoon, the "Prague" demonstrating much more melodic invention and structural substance than the "Linz." But then, the "Linz" has not been one of my favorites.

Leinsdorf seemed to be conducting Mozart this weekend less briskly than in other seasons during Tanglewood's opening Mozart weekends. Perhaps he is mellowing. Or perhaps it was coincidental.

Anyway, there are many "right" ways to play it, and the emphasis this weekend seems to have been on grace and beauty rather then precision and elegance.

Sunday's attendance was 5967, which, including the Saturday-morning open rehearsal, brought the weekend's total to 20,928.

Morning Session

At the 10.30 a.m. chamber-music session in the theater, the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players chose to play a lean and supple Poulenc quintet, "Sextour for Piano and Woodwinds" (1930-2), and a cheerful Dvorak Quartet for Piano and Strings (Op. 87).

The chamber players (composed of the first-chair players of the Boston Symphone Orchestra plus Richard Goode, pianist) have been playing seldom-heard small-ensemble combinations for four seasons, and this spring toured in the Virgin Islands and Florida.

The Poulenc piece has salty touches of dissonance and entertaining twists of mood and rhythm, and the Dvorak, full of Bohemian folk melodies and dance rhythms, is by turns spirited and tranquil.

Haydn Next Week

Both were beautifully played and were notably appropriate (for those sitting on the grass) to the warming morning sun and pastoral setting.

Next weekend the shed programs will offer music of five baroque composers plus Haydn ("Lord Nelson Mass"). The Sunday morning chamber-music program will present the violine ensemble with Dvorak's Op. 77 quintet.

Music Review

Mozart Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FIRST weekend of the Tanglewood season was devoted completely to the music of Mozart. Yesterday afternoon Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played two of the better known symphonies with the beautiful Piano Concerto No. 17 in G Major (K. 453), with Claude Frank as the soloist.

The "Linz" No. 36, C Major, and the "Prague" No. 38 in D Major, are old favorites everywhere but especially at Tanglewood. Munch played the "Prague" seven times during the summers he was the incumbent director and it evidently is scarcely less in favor with Leinsdorf.

* * *

THE SYMPHONIES yesterday were a bit over-analyzed and an equal amount of spontaneity was sacrificed. The Boston tone and superlative articulation were happily emphasized but the natural flow was tempered by a too exquisite delicacy. Claude Frank fell partially into the pattern established by the conductor for the first movements of his concerto and only in the jolly final allegretto did he take his eyes away from the podium and let the music romp as it deserves and as he so easily can play. His tone and musical inflections were models of keyboard mastery. He might have emerged from the orchestral background more and let the accompaniment fit him rather than the contrary approach. In the finale he took his audience on a flight of air-borne exhilaration which earned him a tremendous ovation.

* * *

MANY COMPOSITIONS used to come from a composer's pen with only an opus number or sometimes not even that. In Mozart's case there came along in mid-19th century an Austrian botanist and minerologist, Ludwig Koechel, who immortalized his name as a musicographer by his Chronological Index of Mozart's works and so we now know them by such designations as K. 425, in the case of the "Linz" symphony, or K. 504, the "Prague." These appellations were mostly applied ex-post facto. I know of no specific designation of the 28th symphony, K. 200 ,in C Major and I hereby designate it as the "Thrush" because of the delightful trills which characterize all the movements but the menuetto.

This appellation might well be fitting and also pleasing to Mozart, could he have been informed, as he was a bird lover. The finale of the G Major piano concerto, which Claude Frank played so beautifully, uses a chirping melody in the final movement which Mozart is supposed to have derived from the song of his pet starling. It was good to hear the C Major symphony Saturday night as it deserves to be better known by a wider circle.

* * *

IT IS doubtful if the Tanglewood season will produce a more exciting and thrilling event than the appearance Saturday night of the soprano Beverly Sills. The audience of more than 6,000 applauded with increasing enthusiasm at the end of the first half of the evening as she finished the "Exultate, Jubilate" motet (K. 165). When she came to her final aria from "Die Entfuhring aus dem Serail" (K.384) the audience fairly exploded with unrestrained effervescence.

Miss Sills made a striking appearance in a peach bouffant costume which matched her hair. She stands a shoulder higher than Leinsdorf and is erect and relaxed, blooming and smiling. Her voice is glorious and she wields it with abandoned sureness. Her runs and trills are flute-clear and trumpet-strong and she never utters a note or phrase but in good taste.

* * *

SHE BEGAN with the aria from Zaide "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" (K.344) which required only unfrilled and undecorated straightforward vocalism. Having convincingly established what degree of this character of singing she could command, she then went on to her feats of pyrotechnics which so delighted her audience. Leinsdorf gave her the most discreet accompaniment when needed and the most dependable support where proper. The orchestra was in a most pliant mood the whole evening.

The "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" was given a finicky reading, one which reflected credit on the orchestra but which showed Leinsdorf trying to display how his string sections could respond to discipline and play like a string quartet. When this piece is played by a quartet it tries to sound like a string orchestra.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Mozart Day at Tanglewood

By R. E. KRIEGER

At the Concert

LENOX, Mass. — Tanglewood has got off to a running start with some 20,000 people here this weekend for the opening of the Boston Symphony Concerts with Erich Leinsdorf conducting an all-Mozart program.

★ ★ ★

THE FINAL concert of the weekend featured pianist Claude Frank in an absolutely stunning performance of Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 17 in G Major, K. 453."

Many people think that Mozart wrote like a mathematician, one of genius, but Frank brings to the fore more than anyone else the emotional complecities of Mozart.

A brilliant pianist, he plays with a marvelous delicacy, technique and style that never fails to bring an audience roaring to its feet with applause.

THREE STARS

PERSONALLY he is one of my favorite pianists if for nothing more than his impeccable control. The Andante, for example in yesterday afternoon's concert was impeccable in its lyricism and development.

In other works on the program, the Boston Symphony sounded marvelous in the opener, the Symphony No. 36 in C Major, K.425 "The Linz", called that because it was written for a concert in that Austrian city.

The other work of the afternoon was the Symphony No. 38 in D Major K.504, "The Orague" also written for a concert in that Bohemian capital.

Both are marked by marvelous melodies, a vivacious spirit and (them at least) freshness of ideas.

★ ★ ★

THEY WERE performed impeccably by the Boston Symphony with Mr. Leinsdorf in fine fettle as he whipped them on.

Since his announcement of retirement from the orchestra there seems to be more of a rapport between the conductor and the orchestra.

This well may be imagination on my part, but regardless I have always thought of Leinsdorf as one of the better conductors in the business. Surely he evidenced great talent in yesterday's concert at Tanglewood.

Claude Frank

Albany Knickerbocker News
... 8, 1968

24.

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Festival is well launched

By RUTH TRIPP

LENOX, Mass. — Music of Mozart was the offering at the opening of the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood last weekend.

The countryside around Lenox was at its best, with the Berkshire foothills green and beautiful, enclosing the music lovers with a serenity that spoke not a word of the labor and hurry which would have preceded the opening concert.

The atmosphere of the place matched the orderliness of the Mozart scores and for the visitors there was nothing but a cheerful welcome to a few hours of tranquility. The tamaracks stood tall and sturdy as if to reassure one that there would always be enough paper pulp to republish numberless editions in the Koechel Verzeichniss and to provide hungry newspapers with a basis for the morning and evening editions. Everything was right at Tanglewood.

Chiefly, the music was right. Erich Leinsdorf has an uncanny way of choosing soloists to assist where required. The first program on Friday evening began with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." The orchestra gave a spirited performance. The musicians were apparently as happy as their audience.

Our first soloist was the young James Oliver Buswell IV, a Harvard junior, just 21, who already has earned important accomplishments. He played the B-flat Concerto K.207 with every note and phrase in proper alignment. Mozart is an admirable test for the musicianship of a young performer. Buswell made a fine impression. The two or three tones which were a shade off-pitch were very reassuring. They proclaimed the credo of Tanglewood, which so creditably has made room for the superior talents of many young people. It would be tragic to be perfect at 21. Many recalls made the performance true to concert form.

After intermission we heard the seldom played "Posthorn" Serenade No. 9, K.320. All seven movements followed in melodious succession and the clarion call of the little posthorn was delivered with precision by Armando Ghitalla.

Saturday evening's concert featured Beverly Sills, soprano. Her voice and her vocal technique left nothing to be desired. Two first performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Miss Sills were "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from Zaide (K.344) and "As se in ciel, benigne stelle" (K.538). An aria from "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" (K.384) was a dramatic portrayal of this facet of the Mozart writing and an admirable testimony to the power of Miss Sills' operatic delivery.

The high point of the vocal portion of the program was the complete performance of the Motet for soprano, "Exsultate, jubilate" (K.165). The true intonation, the flexibility of the voice and the perfect proportions of the accompaniment made this a musical event. The wonder of Mozart's writing was predominent. The fact that he presents the word, "Alleluia" with an accent on every one of the four syllables before the opening four measures have passed, always amazes me. This was a truly great performance.

We also heard the Symphony No. 28 (K.200) and the thoroughly enchanting "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" (K.525).

The Sunday afternoon program featured Claud Frank pianist. His concerto was No. 17 in G major (K.453). The beauty of his interpretation of the Andante with the sensitive orchestral support matched to perfection by Leinsdorf and his musicians, was worth the whole weekend. Clarity of technique, understanding of the style and true musicianship make Claud Frank a perfect choice for a Mozart soloist.

The remaining two works by the orchestra were Symphony No. 36 (K.425), "The Linz" and Symphony No. 3 (K.504), "The Prague." In both performances, the skil and artistry of the player combined to reinforce the standard of excellence which these musicians maintain and the charm with which they share their pleasure in great music. Tanglewood 1968 was well launched.

AT TANGLEWOOD, the serene atmosphere and the music combined for a pleasant summer opening.

Music at Tanglewood

By R. H.

Friday

The Boston Symphony began its 1968 Tanglewood season last weekend with three all-Mozart programs before some of the largest opening audiences in the thirty-one years of the Berkshire Festival. There appeared to be fewer white-haired old ladies, but the discalced young were there — mini-skirted, Nehru-jacketed, and turtle-necked.

Friday night James Oliver Buswell IV, a Harvard undergraduate with a technique as impressive as his name, played the B flat concerto for violin (K 207) without, it would seem, Mr. Leinsdorf's complete co-operation. In an appetizer at seven that evening Mr. Buswell, accompanied by Lillian Kallir, performed the E flat sonata for piano and violin (K 312). It would have made a good main course.

Saturday

Mozart wrote his Symphony No. 28 in C Major (K 200) when he was eighteen. The fact is startling, but the music is dull. At least it was the way Leinsdorf directed it for the opening selection of Saturday night's program. Things picked up, however, when Beverly Sills, a soprano of large proportions and magnificent voice, sang the Exsulte, Jubilate motet (K 165). The audience ate it up. Miss Sills' ornaments were interesting, but at times in her lower registers she tended to cluck. Her "Ah se ciel, benigne stelle" had the audience on their feet cheering bravo with a fine disregard for Miss Sills' gender and that of the adjective they applied to her.

Sunday

Sunday's performance was the best of the three. After a rather uninspired rendition of the "Linz" Claude Frank played the concerto for piano and orchestra No. 17 in G Major (K 453). It was a delight. The andante was particularly beautiful. The "Prague," which concluded the program, was also satisfying. Leinsdorf had unbent.

JAMES OLIVER BUSWELL IV . . . young violinist who made his Tanglewood debut, Friday, July 5.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500

JUL 11 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Traditional Summertime Baroque-shire Festival

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — The second week of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, gracious summer home of the Boston Symphony, by tradition is devoted to works of the baroque.

One immediately thinks of Bach, and indeed the German master was represented on every program, as well as the weekend prelude in which English organist Brian Runnett played excerpts from Part III of the Klavier-Uebung, including the Prelude and Fugue in E-flat ("St. Anne").

But it was not exclusively Bach's weekend. Haydn (not a baroque composer, of course) and Handel were present, and even Telemann and Boccherini appeared on the chamber music programs in the shed.

The Boston Symphony has only a grace-note's acquaintance with George Philipp Telemann, given the nature of symphonic concerts, so it was good to hear the Triple Concerto in A leading off Sunday afternoon's concert. For flute, violin and cello with string orchestra, the concerto forms the centerpiece of Telemann's "Tafelmusik", Part I, the courtly "table music" intended to divert the nobles of his day.

It is an elegant divertissement, and the playing was neat and relaxed by flutist James Pappoutsakis, violinist Alfred Krips, and cellist Martin Hoherman, supported by harpsichordist Robert Levin, who supplied much of the continuo for the weekend.

Hour of Miss Wolff

But the real treat of the sultry afternoon's program, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and attended by 6,159, turned out to be contralto Beverly Wolff's singing of the Bach cantata 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret."

Her warm, sumptuous contralto tones have been a frequent Tanglewood treat. Since our last hearing, Miss Wolff seems to have acquired greater security, more power, and technical proficiency. Her singing of the cantata not only had vocal warmth, with real depth in the lower range, but also a good sense of style and emotional communication. Her florid work, too, went smoothly in the aria, "Gott hat Alles wohl gemacht!" which gained her unscheduled applause.

Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson played the solos on a portative organ, having to scamper in the opening sinfonia because of the rugged tempo Leinsdorf set, resulting in some smudged notes. Bach's scoring for the superb instrumental part, also used in an existing fragment of a harpsichord concerto, is rich with oboes and bassoons.

For the concluding work, Leinsdorf selected the Suite from Handel's "Water Music," but fortunately an authentic version rather than the arrangement by Sir Hamilton Harty which has largely prevailed in modern times.

There are many major differences, one of them being the effective oboe solo Leinsdorf placed after the overture with its dotted rhythms in French style. Another was the leading role assigned to the harpsichord, played by Wilson, linking the movements with proper baroque flourishes and providing continuo support.

Also, the famous air in Leinsdorf's conception, is not a slow, syrupy, and soft bit of sentimentia, but proceeds briskly, with a little snap in the rhythm. It was a welcome change.

Throughout, there was skilled playing and direction, and the regal sounds of trumpets and horns (except for minor problems) brought the royal barge safely home.

Haydn Scene

Music of Haydn dominated Saturday's concert, conducted by Leinsdorf on a warm evening before 6,733 listeners. The small Symphony No. 24 in D began the program, and the Mass in d minor, "The Nelson," concluded after intermission. In between, there was the Cantata No. 51 of Bach, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," for which soprano Saramae Endich was soloist.

The Haydn mass, dating from the summer of 1798, coincided with the defeat of the French fleet by the English Admiral Nelson, thus the name. It was written before the victory, yet its mood neatly fitted the occasion. Rather than being gently Viennese, it is more Prussian in spirit, militant and aggressive.

The Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Choir, directed by Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson, were joined for the performance by Miss Endich, Miss Wolff, tenor Enrico di Giuseppe, bass Paul Plishka, and soprano Donna Precht. The bulk of Haydn's "Nelson" mass is for chorus, with only the soprano having much to do in the solo line, though Plishka demonstrated a gruff, booming bass, and Miss Wolff her contralto art in the few opportunities given them.

Up And Down

Miss Endich, singing behind the orchestra and in front of the chorus as is Leinsdorf's custom in choral works, sounded surprisingly strong and full of voice. Earlier, in the Bach cantata which she sang at stage front, her voice lacked weight and carrying power. She sang the Haydn radiantly, but her Bach was another story.

The Haydn mass offers few contrasts, and the few contrasts, and the few moments of repose in "Et incarnatus" and the "Benedictus," are very welcome. Otherwise, the performance seemed to be a procession of fortes and louder, with waves of hard, driving sound thrown at you. The chorus of about 30 sang enthusiastically, but was overbalanced by the women's voices and words were rarely distinguishable. The reading thus had energy, but little eloquence.

The sunny Symphony in D belongs to another world, pert and brimming with good nature. Leinsdorf led a disciplined and engaging performance in which Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute solo in the adagio shone like shafts of sunlight.

Bach was manhandled in the cantata. Armando Ghitalla played the trumpet obbligato with distinction, but the solo strings were out of tune in the Chorale and Miss Endich lacks the technique to sing this exacting vocal music. Her rhythm was imprecise, some of the inflections were oddly placed, and she often gulped for breath in mid-phrase. She should have stayed with Haydn.

Moving Maestro

David Zinman, the 32-year-old, American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, made an impressive debut with the Boston Symphony Friday night. Dark-haired, bouncy, directing with brisk, cutting gestures, Zinman for the most part made the usually warm-blooded Bostonian sound reasonably close to the leaner, cooler baroque style.

He worked with fewer strings than usual — even the customary "chamber-size" of the Boston Symphony is generously proportioned. He was rewarded with a lighter, sharper tone that was particularly effective in Luigi Boccherini's early Sinfonia in A, Opus 1, No. 3, and in the Handel Concerto grosso in a minor, Opus 6, No. 4.

The Boccherini, given its first performance by the Bostonians, is a charming tidbit containing those dramatic alterations of dynamics and instrumentation characteristic of much of 18th century Italian chamber works. There are several compelling touches — the violins' sul ponticello repeat of the first phrase, the muted song of the andante for violins, supported by pizzicato lower strings.

The sinfonia, as well as the Handel concerto grosso, was led with considerable zip by Zinman. He has a tendency to overconduct and to use extravagant gestures, but imparts crackling rhythms and has a good sense of phrasing.

These qualities paid off handsomely in Josef Haydn's Symphony No. 93, one of the "London" groups, given a remarkably spry reading and earning an ovation from the audience of 4,852. The standout of the evening, the symphony bristled with rhythmic energy, especially in the minuet.

Zinman seemed not as effective as an accompanist in Bach's E major violin concerto, performed by Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein. Silverstein's playing was below par, his sweet tone had trouble carrying over the orchestra at times, and there was some out of tune playing in the first movement, some of which might be attributed to the dampish weather.

Silverstein is a sure and experienced musician and his playing was creditable enough. But it seldom was more than routine and had too little of the aggressive leadership the concerto presumes in the two outer movements.

DAVID ZINMAN . . . trimming and tuning the Boston Symphony

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Second Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

Friday July 12 at 7 pm

BRIAN RUNNETT organ

BACH

Clavier-Übung — Part three

Prelude in E flat (pro organo pleno)

Three settings of the Kyrie
- Kyrie, Gott Vater in Ewigkeit (cantus firmus in soprano)
- Christe, aller Welt Trost (cantus firmus in tenor)
- Kyrie, Gott heiliger Geist (cantus firmus in bass—con organo pleno)

Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr' (trio)

Wir glauben all' an einen Gott (pro organo pleno)

Christ, unser Herr, zum Jordan kamm (cantus firmus in pedal)

Fugue in E flat (pro organo pleno)

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Organ Recital Opens Weekend At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — The second weekend of the Berkshire Festival will be devoted to music of the Baroque and Haydn, including a Saturday evening performance of Haydn's "Lord Nelson" mass under the direction of BSO music director Erich Leinsdorf.

Soloists will be Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di; Guiseppe and Paul Plishka, with the Tanglewood Choir. Also on the Saturday program is the Bach Cantata No. 51 "Jauchzet Gott" sung by Miss Endich.

The Sunday afternoon program, conducted by Leinsdorf, includes Telemann's "Triple Concerto," with members of the orchestra as soloists, Bach's "Cantata No. 35," with Beveiry Wolff as soloist, and the "Water Music Suite" of Handel.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,750

JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Traditional Summertime Baroque-shire Festival

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — The second week of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, gracious summer home of the Boston Symphony, by tradition is devoted to works of the baroque.

One immediately thinks of Bach, and indeed the German master was represented on every program, as well as the weekend prelude in which English organist Brian Runnett played excerpts from Part III of the Klavier-Uebung, including the Prelude and Fugue in E-flat ("St. Anne").

But it was not exclusively Bach's weekend. Haydn (not a baroque composer, of course) and Handel were present, and even Telemann and Boccherini appeared on the chamber music programs in the shed.

The Boston Symphony has only a grace-note's acquaintance with George Philipp Telemann, given the nature of symphonic concerts, so it was good to hear the Triple Concerto in A leading off Sunday afternoon's concert. For flute, violin and cello with string orchestra, the concerto forms the centerpiece of Telemann's "Tafelmusik", Part I, the courtly "table music" intended to divert the nobles of his day.

It is an elegant divertissement, and the playing was neat and relaxed by flutist James Pappoutsakis, violinist Alfred Krips, and cellist Martin Hoherman, supported by harpsichordist Robert Levin, who supplied much of the continuo for the weekend.

Hour of Miss Wolff

But the real treat of the sultry afternoon's program, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and attended by 6,159, turned out to be contralto Beverly Wolff's singing of the Bach cantata 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret."

Her warm, sumptuous contralto tones have been a frequent Tanglewood treat. Since our last hearing, Miss Wolff seems to have acquired greater security, more power, and technical proficiency. Her singing of the cantata not only had vocal warmth, with real depth in the lower range, but also a good sense of style and emotional communication. Her florid work, too, went smoothly in the aria, "Gott hat Alles wohl gemacht!" which gained her unscheduled applause.

Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson played the solos on a portative organ, having to scamper in the opening sinfonia because of the rugged tempo Leinsdorf set, resulting in some smudged notes. Bach's scoring for the superb instrumental part, also used in an existing fragment of a harpsichord concerto, is rich with oboes and bassoons.

For the concluding work, Leinsdorf selected the Suite from Handel's "Water Music," but fortunately an authentic version rather than the arrangement by Sir Hamilton Harty which has largely prevailed in modern times.

There are many major differences, one of them being the effective oboe solo Leinsdorf placed after the overture with its dotted rhythms in French style. Another was the leading role assigned to the harpsichord, played by Wilson, linking the movements with proper baroque flourishes and providing continuo support.

Also, the famous air in Leinsdorf's conception, is not a slow, syrupy, and soft bit of sentimentia, but proceeds briskly, with a little snap in the rhythm. It was a welcome change.

Throughout, there was skilled playing and direction, and the regal sounds of trumpets and horns (except for minor problems) brought the royal barge safely home.

Haydn Scene

Music of Haydn dominated Saturday's concert, conducted by Leinsdorf on a warm evening before 6,733 listeners. The small Symphony No. 24 in D began the program, and the Mass in d minor, "The Nelson," concluded after intermission. In between, there was the Cantata No. 51 of Bach, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," for which soprano Saramae Endich was soloist.

The Haydn mass, dating from the summer of 1798, coincided with the defeat of the French fleet by the English Admiral Nelson, thus the name. It was written before the victory, yet its mood neatly fitted the occasion. Rather than being gently Viennese, it is more Prussian in spirit, militant and aggressive.

The Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Choir, directed by Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson, were joined for the performance by Miss Endich, Miss Wolff, tenor Enrico di Giuseppe, bass Paul Plishka, and soprano Donna Precht. The bulk of Haydn's "Nelson" mass is for chorus, with only the soprano having much to do in the solo line, though Plishka demonstrated a gruff, booming bass, and Miss Wolff her contralto art in the few opportunities given them.

Up And Down

Miss Endich, singing behind the orchestra and in front of the chorus as is Leinsdorf's custom in choral works, sounded surprisingly strong and full of voice. Earlier, in the Bach cantata which she sang at stage front, her voice lacked weight and carrying power. She sang the Haydn radiantly, but her Bach was another story.

The Haydn mass offers few contrasts, and the few contrasts, and the few moments of repose in "Et incarnatus" and the "Benedictus," are very welcome. Otherwise, the performance seemed to be a procession of fortes and louder, with waves of hard, driving sound thrown at you. The chorus of about 30 sang enthusiastically, but was overbalanced by the women's voices and words were rarely distinguishable. The reading thus had energy, but little eloquence.

The sunny Symphony in D belongs to another world, pert and brimming with good nature. Leinsdorf led a disciplined and engaging performance in which Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute solo in the adagio shone like shafts of sunlight.

Bach was manhandled in the cantata. Armando Ghitalla played the trumpet obbligato with distinction, but the solo strings were out of tune in the Chorale and Miss Endich lacks the technique to sing this exacting vocal music. Her rhythm was imprecise, some of the inflections were oddly placed, and she often gulped for breath in mid-phrase. She should have stayed with Haydn.

Moving Maestro

David Zinman, the 32-year-old, American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, made an impressive debut with the Boston Symphony Friday night. Dark-haired, bouncy, directing with brisk, cutting gestures, Zinman for the most part made the usually warm-blooded Bostonian sound reasonably close to the leaner, cooler baroque style.

He worked with fewer strings than usual — even the customary "chamber-size" of the Boston Symphony is generously proportioned. He was rewarded with a lighter, sharper tone that was particularly effective in Luigi Boccherini's early Sinfonia in A, Opus 1, No. 3, and in the Handel Concerto grosso in a minor, Opus 6, No. 4.

The Boccherini, given its first performance by the Bostonians, is a charming tidbit containing those dramatic alterations of dynamics and instrumentation characteristic of much of 18th century Italian chamber works. There are several compelling touches — the violins' sul ponticello repeat of the first phrase, the muted song of the andante for violins, supported by pizzicato lower strings.

The sinfonia, as well as the Handel concerto grosso, was led with considerable zip by Zinman. He has a tendency to over-conduct and to use extravagant gestures, but imparts crackling rhythms and has a good sense of phrasing.

These qualities paid off handsomely in Josef Haydn's Symphony No. 93, one of the "London" groups, given a remarkably spry reading and earning an ovation from the audience of 4,852. The standout of the evening, the symphony bristled with rhythmic energy, especially in the minuet.

Zinman seemed not as effective as an accompanist in Bach's E major violin concerto, performed by Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein. Silverstein's playing was below par, his sweet tone had trouble carrying over the orchestra at times, and there was some out of tune playing in the first movement, some of which might be attributed to the dampish weather.

Silverstein is a sure and experienced musician and his playing was creditable enough. But it seldom was more than routine and had too little of the aggressive leadership the concerto presumes in the two outer movements.

DAVID ZINMAN . . . trimming and tuning the Boston Symphony

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JUL 15 1968

New England Newsclip

Second Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

Friday July 12 at 7 pm

BRIAN RUNNETT organ

BACH

Clavier-Übung — Part three

Prelude in E flat (pro organo pleno)

Three settings of the Kyrie
- Kyrie, Gott Vater in Ewigkeit (cantus firmus in soprano)
- Christe, aller Welt Trost (cantus firmus in tenor)
- Kyrie, Gott heiliger Geist (cantus firmus in bass—con organo pleno)

Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr' (trio)

Wir glauben all' an einen Gott (pro organo pleno)

Christ, unser Herr, zum Jordan kamm (cantus firmus in pedal)

Fugue in E flat (pro organo pleno)

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Organ Recital Opens Weekend At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — The second weekend of the Berkshire Festival will be devoted to music of the Baroque and Haydn, including a Saturday evening performance of Haydn's "Lord Nelson" mass under the direction of BSO music director Erich Leinsdorf.

Soloists will be Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di; Guiseppe and Paul Plishka, with the Tanglewood Choir. Also on the Saturday program is the Bach Cantata No. 51 "Jauchzet Gott" sung by Miss Endich.

The Sunday afternoon program, conducted by Leinsdorf, includes Telemann's "Triple Concerto," with members of the orchestra as soloists, Bach's "Cantata No. 35," with Bevelry Wolff as soloist, and the "Water Music Suite" of Handel.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,750

JUL 13 1968

New England Newsclip

26.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Friday July 12 at 9 pm

DAVID ZINMAN conductor

BOCCHERINI — Sinfonia in A major op. 1 no. 3
Allegro giusto
Andante
Allegro ma non presto

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BACH — Concerto for violin in E major
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro assai
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

intermission

HANDEL — Concerto grosso in A minor op. 6 no. 4
Larghetto affettuoso
Allegro
Largo e piano
Allegro

HAYDN — Symphony no. 93 in D major
Adagio-allegro assai
Largo cantabile
Menuetto: allegretto
Finale: presto ma non troppo

ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 18

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Boston Symphony Breaks Into Baroque at Tanglewood

By JAKE SHERMAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second series of weekend concerts at Tnaglewood this season focused on Bach and Haydn in a general tribute to composers of the classical and baroque periods.

The large turnout Friday night despite bad weather indicated that these musical genres enjoy a much larger popular following than is generally presumed.

The program for the evening featured Boccherini's Sinfonia in A major op. 1 no. 3, Bach's Violin Concerto in E major, Handel's Concerto Grosso in A minor op. 6 no. 4 and Haydn's Symphony No. 93 in D major.

David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, acted as guest conductor.

DAVID ZINMAN

The most stirring of these works is easily the violin concerto which Bach wrote at the age of 35 and which is characterized by a passionate lyricism not easily discerned from his keyborad works.

The orchestra caught both the surging excitement of the allergro movements and the melancholy of the adagio. Joseph Silverstein, in his solo, was more than on a par with the many violinists featured in recorded versions of the work.

The concerto grosso was played with the rococo delicacy that one associates with this largely 18th century form. In its time, the concerto grosso was written primarily for court diversion, and the more facide and clever it was the better. Handel who composed this work to entertain audiences at his operas during intermissions, was probably as able a practitioner of the style as any.

With the Haydn symphony, one is again impressed by the deftness and brilliance of the music rather than its emotional or intellectual substance.

Zinman, who has guest led Amsterdam's Concert among many other orchestras, displayed a fine appreiation for the composers of this period. One got the impression that in places he would have liked a stronger contrast in terms of soft and loud, speed and slowness, but this did not impair anyone's enjoyment of the evening.

Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director, resumed the podium for the Saturday night and Sunday afternoon concerts.

The highlights of Saturday's program were Bach's Cantata No. 51 and Haydn's Mass in D minor. Bach's Cantata No. 35, Handel's Water Music, and Telemann's Triple Concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006

JUL 15 1968

The Boston Globe — Monday, July 15, 1968

But inferior score chosen

Frenzy seems amiss in Baroque dances

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, David Zinman, guest conductor; Joseph Silverstein, violin; playing Boccherini's Sinfonia in A Major, Opus 1, No. 3; Bach's E Major Violin Concerto; Handel's Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, No. 4; and Haydn's Symphony No. 93. Friday night at Tanglewood.

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

LENOX — Though David Zinman is without much of a reputation here, he is at 32, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. On Friday night, he debuted with the Boston Symphony. No stranger to Tanglewood, he once studied at the Berkshire Music Center.

Friday he programmed the same sort of pieces in which his orchestra specializes; music, for the most part, that wants and needs no conductor and demands restraint and taste from the podium.

The Baroque pieces, and I include here Boccherini's Opus 1, No. 3, which is already stretching phrase length and broadening harmonic rhythm towards the Mozartian, were no joy. Zinman is not dance-oriented, and without a feel for baroque dance rhythms, a performance shows no more than conducting technique.

Zinman exerted himself too much, tried to whip the music to a frenzy it had no thought of achieving. The spontaneity and courtly grace of Handel's opening movement, for example, were led right out of it, as was the buoyancy of the finale.

The problem of lightening the B.S.O.'s thick and rather inflexible sound was not faced either. This wasn't the conductor's problem alone, for Joseph Silverstein, violin soloist in Bach's E Major Concerto, kept shading to a minimum, and to complicate matters, often just did not play well enough.

Haydn's 93rd Symphony was the only piece that shouldn't have been led by the concertmaster or the continuo player (Robert Levin's work here was well above average), and it got a good performance.

The slow introduction had character, and Zinman saw the relevance of the exposition repeat — the half tone alteration between the first and second endings and the commentary this makes on the introduction — and played it. The largo would have made more sense if started with a solo quartet and the minuet if taken a bit brisker, but the good impression the finale made, where timing and the sense of humor were keen, showed that this is music about which Zinman has convincing ideas which he can convincingly put across.

This Week At Tanglewood

Friday, July 12: BSO conducted by David Zinman in Boccherini's Symphony in A Op. 1 No. 3, Bach's Violin Concerto in E Major (Joseph Silversetin), Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6 No. 4 and Haydn's Symphony No. 93; 9 p. m., Shed . . Weekend Prelude with Brian Runnett in a baroque organ program, 7 p. m., Shed . . Saturday, July 13: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Bach's Jauchzet Gott, Cantata No. 51 (Saramae Endich, soprano); Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass (Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di Giuseppe, Paul Plishka, Tanglewood Choir); 8 p. m., Shed . . Sunday, July 14: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Telemann's Triple Concerto for Flute, Violin, Cello (James Pappoutsakis, Alfred Krips, Martin Hoherman); Bach's Cantata No. 35 (Beverly Wolff); Handel's Suite from the Water Music; 2:30 p. m. Shed.

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, July 11, 1968

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, July 10, 1968

Chamber Music Weekends

Tanglewood Sounds Delightful

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The Berkshire Festival's second weekend at Tanglewood featured the 50-member chamber orchestra of the Boston Symphony playing music of Boccherini, Bach, Handel and Haydn.

Gazette Review

The season's first guest conductor, David Zinman, a 32-year-old alumnus of Berkshire Music Center, was born in New York but is now the leader of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. The lovely sounds produced under his guidance were best enjoyed if one looked away from the overwrought visual patterns of his direction.

Tanglewood's first "chamber" weekend, July 5 to 7 (all-Mozart), registered the best total attendance in five years, 20,928. This figure for three concerts and an open rehearsal is all the move gratifying because the '66 and '67 initial weekends were by the complete orchstra.

Capable Soloist

Last night's capable soloist was Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, in the Bach "Conerto for Violin in E major." He and Zinman added the relaxed second movement, "Adagio," to the other pleasures of the evening. Demands of the first and third movements were met handsomely, with some sense of pressure from the podium in selecting tempos.

Boccherini's "Sinfonia in A major, Op 1, No. 3 was top-drawer Italian fare of the 18th century, its ornamentation handled with unusual delicacy and charm.

Handel's "Concerto Grosso in A minor, Op. 6, No. 4," achieved delightful variety in coloring and moods.

Robert Levin's harpsichord continuos in the Bach and Handel were much admired. Jules Eskin and Henry Portnoi had continuo roles on the cello and doublebass.

Haydn's "Symphony No. 93 in D major" sang with continuous appeal.

In the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m., Brian Runnett of Norwich Cathedral, England, played Bach on the Aeolian-Skinner two-manual organ. Runnett is head of the Berkshire Boys Choir. The Prelude in E flat, six chorale preludes and the Fugue in E flat, made up a scholarly program, worthily played and will received.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

JUL 13 1968

New England Newsclip

26.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Friday July 12 at 9 pm

DAVID ZINMAN conductor

BOCCHERINI — Sinfonia in A major op. 1 no. 3
Allegro giusto
Andante
Allegro ma non presto
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BACH — Concerto for violin in E major
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro assai
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

intermission

HANDEL — Concerto grosso in A minor op. 6 no. 4
Larghetto affettuoso
Allegro
Largo e piano
Allegro

HAYDN — Symphony no. 93 in D major
Adagio-allegro assai
Largo cantabile
Menuetto: allegretto
Finale: presto ma non troppo

ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 18

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

This Week At Tanglewood

Friday, July 12: BSO conducted by David Zinman in Boccherini's Symphony in A Op. 1 No. 3, Bach's Violin Concerto in E Major (Joseph Silversetin), Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6 No. 4 and Haydn's Symphony No. 93; 9 p. m., Shed . . Weekend Prelude with Brian Runnett in a baroque organ program, 7 p. m., Shed . . Saturday, July 13: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Bach's Jauchzet Gott, Cantata No. 51 (Saramae Endich, soprano): Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass (Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di Giuseppe, Paul Plishka, Tanglewood Choir); 8 p. m., Shed . . Sunday, July 14: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Telemann's Triple Concerto for Flute, Violin, Cello (James Pappoutsakis, Alfred Krips, Martin Hoherman); Bach's Cantata No. 35 (Beverly Wolff); Handel's Suite from the Water Music; 2:30 p. m. Shed.

ATHENS HERALD
Wednesday, July 11, 1968

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, July 10, 1968

Boston Symphony Breaks Into Baroque at Tanglewood

By JAKE SHERMAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second series of weekend concerts at Tnaglewood this season focused on Bach and Haydn in a general tribute to composers of the classical and baroque periods.

The large turnout Friday night despite bad weather indicated that these musical genres enjoy a much larger popular following than is generally presumed.

The program for the evening featured Boccherini's Sinfonia in A major op. 1 no. 3, Bach's Violin Concerto in E major, Handel's Concerto Grosso in A minor op. 6 no. 4 and Haydn's Symphony No. 93 in D major.

David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, acted as guest conductor.

DAVID ZINMAN

The most stirring of these works is easily the violin concerto to which Bach wrote at the age of 35 and which is characterized by a passionate lyricism not easily discerned from his keyborad works.

The orchestra caught both the surging excitement of the allergro movements and the melancholy of the adagio. Joseph Silverstein, in his solo, was more than on a par with the many violinists featured in recorded versions of the work.

The concerto grosso was played with the rococo delicacy that one associates with this largely 18th century form. In its time, the concerto grosso was written primarily for court diversion, and the more facide and clever it was the better. Handel who composed this work to entertain audiences at his operas during intermissions, was probably as able a practitioner of the style as any.

With the Haydn symphony, one is again impressed by the deftness and brilliance of the music rather than its emotional or intellectual substance.

Zinman, who has guest led Amsterdam's Concert among many other orchestras, displayed a fine appreiation for the composers of this period. One got the impression that in places he would have liked a stronger contrast in terms of soft and loud, speed and slowness, but this did not impair anyone's enjoyment of the evening.

Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director, resumed the podium for the Saturday night and Sunday afternoon concerts.

The highlights of Saturday's program were Bach's Cantata No. 51 and Haydn's Mass in D minor. Bach's Cantata No. 35, Handel's Water Music, and Telemann's Triple Concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,013 SUN. 129,006

JUL 15 1968

The Boston Globe — Monday, July 15, 1968

But inferior score chosen

Frenzy seems amiss in Baroque dances

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. David Zinman, guest conductor; Joseph Silverstein, violin; playing Boccherini's Sinfonia in A Major, Opus 1, No. 3; Bach's E Major Violin Concerto; Handel's Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, No. 4; and Haydn's Symphony No. 93. Friday night at Tanglewood.

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

LENOX — Though David Zinman is without much of a reputation here, he is at 32, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. On Friday night, he debuted with the Boston Symphony. No stranger to Tanglewood, he once studied at the Berkshire Music Center.

Friday he programmed the same sort of pieces in which his orchestra specializes; music, for the most part, that wants and needs no conductor and demands restraint and taste from the podium.

The Baroque pieces, and I include here Boccherini's Opus 1, No. 3, which is already stretching phrase length and broadening harmonic rhythm towards the Mozartian, were no joy. Zinman is not dance-oriented, and without a feel for baroque dance rhythms, a performance shows no more than conducting technique.

Zinman exerted himself too much, tried to whip the music to a frenzy it had no thought of achieving. The spontaneity and courtly grace of Handel's opening movement, for example, were led right out of it, as was the buoyancy of the finale.

The problem of lightening the B.S.O.'s thick and rather inflexible sound was not faced either. This wasn't the conductor's problem alone, for Joseph Silverstein, violin soloist in Bach's E Major Concerto, kept shading to a minimum, and to complicate matters, often just did not play well enough.

Haydn's 93rd Symphony was the only piece that shouldn't have been led by the concertmaster or the continuo player (Robert Levin's work here was well above average), and it got a good performance.

The slow introduction had character, and Zinman saw the relevance of the exposition repeat — the half tone alteration between the first and second endings and the commentary this makes on the introduction — and played it. The largo would have made more sense if started with a solo quartet and the minuet if taken a bit brisker, but the good impression the finale made, where timing and the sense of humor were keen, showed that this is music about which Zinman has convincing ideas which he can convincingly put across.

Chamber Music Weekends

Tanglewood Sounds Delightful

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The Berkshire Festival's second weekend at Tanglewood featured the 50-member chamber orchestra of the Boston Symphony playing music of Boccherini, Bach, Handel and Haydn.

Gazette Review

The season's first guest conductor, David Zinman, a 32-year-old alumnus of Berkshire Music Center, was born in New York but is now the leader of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. The lovely sounds produced under his guidance were best enjoyed if one looked away from the overwrought visual patterns of his direction.

Tanglewood's first "chamber" weekend, July 5 to 7 (all-Mozart), registered the best total attendance in five years, 20,928. This figure for three concerts and an open rehearsal is all the move gratifying because the '66 and '67 initial weekends were by the complete orchstra.

Capable Soloist

Last night's capable soloist was Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, in the Bach "Concerto for Violin in E major." He and Zinman added the relaxed second movement, "Adagio," to the other pleasures of the evening. Demands of the first and third movements were met handsomely, with some sense of pressure from the podium in selecting tempos.

Boccherini's "Sinfonia in A major, Op 1, No. 3 was top-drawer Italian fare of the 18th century, its ornamentation handled with unusual delicacy and charm.

Handel's "Concerto Grosso in A minor, Op. 6, No. 4," achieved delightful variety in coloring and moods.

Robert Levin's harpsichord continuos in the Bach and Handel were much admired. Jules Eskin and Henry Portnoi had continuo roles on the cello and doublebass.

Haydn's "Symphony No. 93 in D major" sang with continuous appeal.

In the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m., Brian Runnett of Norwich Cathedral, England, played Bach on the Aeolian-Skinner two-manual organ. Runnett is head of the Berkshire Boys Choir. The Prelude in E flat, six chorale preludes and the Fugue in E flat, made up a scholarly program, worthily played and will received.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

JUL 13 1968

New England Newsclip

Zinman Conducts at Tanglewood

THE SECOND Tanglewood weekend got off to a good start last night when the first of three concerts to be devoted to baroque composers was conducted by David Zinman, a Berkshire Music Center alumnus, now conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, making his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

BOCCHERINI, Bach, Handel and Haydn fit roughly within a fairly discernible cadre, but the term baroque has come to apply more in this day to the requirements expected of the performers than to common characteristics of historical importance. Boccherini is known almost exclusively now as the composer of chamber music — there were 155 string quintets and 102 quartets — and thus a symphony, his Opus 1, No. 3, in A, is A pleasant novelty. It displays the same light and invigorating spirit his better known chamber works convey. And Zinman, to his credit, did not try to inject any more romanticism than the frame would support.

* * *

IN THE BACH E major violin concerto, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, was the soloist and, as expected, presented a reading of remarkably clear lucidity, aided and abetted without surcease by his unique and individual tone. There are few violinists whose vibrato is on tap in every possible situation so uniformly as Silverstein's.

The Handel Concerto Grosso Op. 6, No. 4 and the Haydn Symphony No. 93 completed the program. Handel is the most neglected instrumental composer on most schedules, and it was both a pleasure and a stimulation to hear his music with the special sonorities he was able to develop in such a personal way.

* * *

THE "BELL" symphony of Haydn was another very agreeable novelty. One benefit of bringing in a guest conductor is that he is likely to perform works which are obviously his personal favorites but are not generally performed by the orchestra's permanent conductor. Baroque music does not offer a guest the opportunities to make as vivid an impression as does the music of later centuries but Zinman proved himself capable of subtlety and contrast and the program pleased the audience of 6,000 extremely well.

—J.C.R.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Silverstein and Bach Prove Nice Match at Tanglewood

By RICHARD HAMMERICH

LENOX — Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Bach were nicely matched Friday night in the great shed at Tanglewoood.

David Zinman was guest conductor, and Silverstein was soloist for Bach's Concerto for Violin in E Major, one of two famous for middle movements, adagios, or special beauty.

Silverstein plays his violin with a honeyed tone of near purity, and his technical agility is formidable, although his bland manner hides his virtuosity.

The technical skill stood him in good stead during the busy final movement because of the brisk pace set by Zinman, and the sweetness of tone made the middle movement worthwhile.

Sublime Weekend

It may turn out to be the most sublime of the weekend . . . but Saramae Endich sings here tonight, and she is usually the one to beat.

Zinman, at 32, has made an impressive name for himself as the conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. He was born in New York and studied conducting at the Berkshire Music Center and with Pierre Monteux in Europe.

He lead the Bostonians Friday night with a strong and precise beat colorfully emphasized by dramatic, frequently flamboyant gestures.

Flexible Atmosphere

But he appeared to be in complete control of the orchestra, and sustained an atmosphere of flexibility in spite of the apparent extra attention to precision.

The grandness of the gestures diminished as the evening wore on, and although it is possible that his tendency toward mannerism could become somewhat tiresome to a listener who watched him several times in a season, there was no question Friday but that his neat but always fluid and pliant view of the music was popular with the 4852 attending.

Haydn's Symphony No. 93, which ended the program, was especially flexible, and there were moments during Handel's concerto Opus 6, No. 4, when he spiced the regularity of the baroque rhythms by drawing a contrasting sentimental swoop from the orchestra.

Light, Feathery Movement

The Boccherini Sinfonia opus 1, No. 3, which opened the program was less fluid, in spite of its aura in imitation of Haydn, but it had a middle movement that was as light and feathery as a boa.

At the 7 p. m. prelude Brian Runnett contributed eight pieces from part III of the 'Clavierubung'' to the weekend's presentation of the works of Bach.

Par III is made up of organ music. . .21A chorale preludes preceded by the famous prelude in E flat and followed by the "St. Anne" fugue in E flat.

Digital Stamina

Runnett put together a 40-minute program which started and ended, as part 111 does, with the two E flat pieces and included a half dozen of the middle preludes.

He used only the barest minimum of rubato to lend expression to Bach's metronomic meters and never faltered insustaining the relentless momentum demanded by Bach's intricate counterpoint.

It was a display of digital stamina as well as musicianship, and the audience, as if it were in church, held its applause until the recital was finished.

Boys Choir Director

Runnett is organist and master of choristers at Norwich Cathedral, England, and this summer is serving as director of the Berkshire Boy Choir at the Stockbridge school in Lenox.

Tonight Haydn's Mass in D Minor, "The Nelson" with five vocal soloists and the Tanglewood Choir will be preceded by Haydn's early symphony No. 24 in D major and Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen," with Saramae Endich, soprano, and Armando Ghitalla, trumpeter.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Guest conductor David Zinman.

Zinman Conducts Boston Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — A Berkshire Music Festival audience of 4,852 turned up Friday night at Tanglewood for David Zinman's debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This was the festival's second weekend of music suitable for reduced orchestra. Zinman was the first of eight guest conductors who will appear here this summer. We hope for greater success for the others.

Friday night's concert marked the first performance by the Boston Symphony of Boccherini's Sinfonia in A Major, Opus 1, No. 3.

Historical Interest

It proved to be of greater historical interest than musical enticement.

Zinman is American, 32 years old, and currently conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra.

His musicianship is sound. For the most part, the orchestra sounded well under his direction. He was constantly and elaborately active without bypassing the merest detail, whether the seasoned men of the Boston Symphony needed such supervision or not.

Other Selections

In addition to the Boccherini Sinfonia, the program included Bach's Concerto for Violin in E Major, with concert master Joseph Silverstain as soloist, Handel's Concerto Grosso in A Minor, Opus 6, No. 4, and Haydn's Symphony No. 93 in D Major.

Zinman kept the Boccherini Sinfonia on the go.

The slow movement had charm. Violins carried the naive tunes to balanced backgrounds in low strings and harpsichord played by Robert Levin.

There was somewhat more substance in the finale, adeptly handled by the orchestra. Fortunately, Zinman didn't attempt to conduct the solo trio in violins and viola. These first-desk players didn't need it.

Ensemble Sound

Silverstain was not heard to best advantage. He did make rewarding use of his affluent tone and clear-cut sense of phrase.

Much of his playing was drowned in ensemble sound, a situation that should have been remedied from the podium.

Zinman continued his energetic activity, frequently drawing attention away from the soloist. The impression was that he was trying to dictate the solo part as well.

The slow movement was rather better for Silverstain. When he managed to assert his singing tone, the performance grew appreciably in stature and expressivity. Some passagework in the last movement noticeably strayed from base.

Handel Concerto

Strings were eupronious and precise in the Handel Concerto. The fugue was exact in voice entrances and carried on parallel progress. Zinman improved in this music. The slow movement was tenderly addressed and remained flexible in spite of vigorous podium directives.

The Haydn Symphony received a well-regulated performance. As before, Zinman attended generously to his players' needs, real and superficial.

One couldn't have asked for a more methodical treatment of the work's form, note-playing, handling of details. It was an agitated effort to keep everything moving on schedule, well-invested with 18-century charm.

Tanglewood Continues Survey Of Baroque, Classical Music

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

This weekend, Tanglewood continued its survey of music for baroque and classical orchestras, Spaced over the three-day period were compositions by Bach, Boccherini, Haydel and Telemann. I chose to attend the Friday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, conducted respectively by the visiting David Zinman and the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

The Friday offering began at 7, with the Weekend Prelude, Inaugurated (I think) two years ago, the Weekend Prelude gives an early concertgoer the opportunity to hear solo or chamber music before the feature event gets under way. This weekend Brian Runnett was organ solist in excerpts from Part Three of Bach's "Clavier-Ubung," or keyboard exercises. This is the only part of four devoted to the organ and the public knows only the E-flat Prelude and Fugue ("Saint Anne") that opens and closes Part Three. (Confidentially, I too know only the "St. Anne" business; the 21 chorale-prelude between these two terminals are largely unknown territory to me.)

Runnett selected six of the 21 and seemed to do quite well by the music, capturing Bach' spirit rather completely. I was particularly impressed by the three different settings of the Kyrie, with the Cantus Firmus in soprano, tenor, and bass positions. The "St. Anne" was given a hefty reading, somewhat slower than I've heard, but not less monumental.

At nine Friday night, David Zinman led a superb concert featuring Boccherini's A major Sinfonia, op. 1 no. 3; Bach's E major Violin Concerto; Handel's Concerto Grosso in A minor, op. 6 no. 4; and Hayden's 93rd Symphony.

The Boccherini was a premiere performance by the orchestra and a first hearing for this reviewer. What a delightful piece it is! The bright first movement has a swinging rhythmic snap and offers an unusual use of the violins in that they are given a passage to play "on the bridge."

I was always under the impression that Beethoven was the first to employ this device (in the C-sharp Minor quartet, op. 131; written 1826), but it appears that Boccherini antedated him by more than 60 years. As for the rest of the Bocchreini work, the andante, muted throughout, is characterized by a simple tune and the final movement in a quick 6-8 allegro that brings the work to a happy close.

* * *

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist in Bach's E major Violin Concreto. The performance was splendid, discounting some ill-tuning of the solo instrument at the beginning. Since James Buswell suffered the same fate last weekend, I wonder if the problem doesn't originate when tuning is effected in a room warmer than the outdoor stage . . . because if it is, the cooler outdoor temperature would cause contraction in the violin strings and result in a sharpness of pitch, especially in the tighter A and E strings.

All the same, Silverstein's reading was excellent. He sculpted the outer movements into veritable cathedrals and gave to the adagio a grace and fluency other soloists seem unable to capture.

No less successful was conductor Zinman, who helped Silverstein by providing a masterful accompaniment. Zinman seems especially at home in this style of music, and his intelligent use of the continuo and other characteristic baroque practices makes him the finest baroque conductor I've yet heard. I would really love to hear him conduct some other music and greatly envy Philadelphia audiences who got to hear him for seven weeks last season.

After intermission came the Handel Concerto Grosso. Here, again, Zinman was ideal, giving the work a poised reading notable as much for its technical command as for its stylistic insight.

But the real climax of the evening came with Haydn's Symphony No. 93. Nestled between the "Oxford" and "Surprise" symphonies, it combines classic tastes with sardonic humor and is certainly one of the funniest works the composer ever wrote. The conductor gave what can only be described as a definitive performance.

* * *

Not a single part went unheard, the pacing was excellent throughout and one was always deeply aware of the logic and structure behind every note. Listening to the preparation to that coarse, rude bassoon noise in the Largo was almost as much fun as the vulgar sound itself. And in the Minuet those ridiculous fanfares (announcing nothing at all) were neither blatantly overdone nor cooly understated; everything was thought out carefully beforehand and reflected an artistry of no mean proportion. Even Sir Thomas Beecham, who had a special way with this kind of music, would be hard-pressed to deliver a performance like this. It was tops and capped a most eventful evening.

A different kind of success went to Leinsdorf on Sunday afternoon. Three works were scheduled, a Telemann concerto, a Bach Cantata, and an arrangement by Leinsdorf of Handel's "Water Music."

Things got off to a dull start with the Telemann Triple Concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello. For me, Telemann's music is unimpressive and flavorless and I prefer not to comment upon it at length here. Solo contributions were pretty good: James Pappoutsakis played the flute very well, Alfred Krips did okay for the most part with the violin, and Martin Hohermann was a fine cellist.

* * *

Next came Bach's Cantata No. 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," scored for orchestra, contralto solo, and organ. Beverly Wolff was a paragon of achievement in the vocal part. Her diction was flawless and her voice a delight. She has a bigger sound than most altos, and for a minute there, I thought she could drown the orchestra if she wanted to. She didn't, of course, being more of an artist than a showoff. Charles Wilson had some trouble with the organ part, but it somehow came through intact. Leinsdorf was unusually attentive during the performance.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006
JUL 15 1968

Zinman Conducts at Tanglewood

THE SECOND Tanglewood weekend got off to a good start last night when the first of three concerts to be devoted to baroque composers was conducted by David Zinman, a Berkshire Music Center alumnus, now conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, making his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

BOCCHERINI, Bach, Handel and Haydn fit roughly within a fairly discernible cadre, but the term baroque has come to apply more in this day to the requirements expected of the performers than to common characteristics of historical importance. Boccherini is known almost exclusively now as the composer of chamber music — there were 155 string quintets and 102 quartets — and thus a symphony, his Opus 1, No. 3, in A, is A pleasant novelty. It displays the same light and invigorating spirit his better known chamber works convey. And Zinman, to his credit, did not try to inject any more romanticism than the frame would support.

* * *

IN THE BACH E major violin concerto, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, was the soloist and, as expected, presented a reading of remarkably clear lucidity, aided and abetted without surcease by his unique and individual tone. There are few violinists whose vibrato is on tap in every possible situation so uniformly as Silverstein's.

The Handel Concerto Grosso Op. 6, No. 4 and the Haydn Symphony No. 93 completed the program. Handel is the most neglected instrumental composer on most schedules, and it was both a pleasure and a stimulation to hear his music with the special sonorities he was able to develop in such a personal way.

* * *

THE "BELL" symphony of Haydn was another very agreeable novelty. One benefit of bringing in a guest conductor is that he is likely to perform works which are obviously his personal favorites but are not generally performed by the orchestra's permanent conductor. Baroque music does not offer a guest the opportunities to make as vivid an impression as does the music of later centuries but Zinman proved himself capable of subtlety and contrast and the program pleased the audience of 6,000 extremely well.

—J.C.R.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JUL 13 1968
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 14 1968
New England Newsclip

Silverstein and Bach Prove Nice Match at Tanglewood

By RICHARD HAMMERICH

LENOX — Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Bach were nicely matched Friday night in the great shed at Tanglewoood.

David Zinman was guest conductor, and Silverstein was soloist for Bach's Concerto for Violin in E Major, one of two famous for middle movements, adagios, or special beauty.

Silverstein plays his violin with a honeyed tone of near purity, and his technical agility is formidable, although his bland manner hides his virtuosity.

The technical skill stood him in good stead during the busy final movement because of the brisk pace set by Zinman, and the sweetness of tone made the middle movement worthwhile.

Sublime Weekend

It may turn out to be the most sublime of the weekend . . . but Saramae Endich sings here tonight, and she is usually the one to beat.

Zinman, at 32, has made an impressive name for himself as the conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. He was born in New York and studied conducting at the Berkshire Music Center and with Pierre Monteux in Europe.

He lead the Bostonians Friday night with a strong and precise beat colorfully emphasized by dramatic, frequently flamboyant gestures.

Flexible Atmosphere

But he appeared to be in complete control of the orchestra, and sustained an atmosphere of flexibility in spite of the apparent extra attention to precision.

The grandness of the gestures diminished as the evening wore on, and although it is possible that his tendency toward mannerism could become somewhat tiresome to a listener who watched him several times in a season, there was no question Friday but that his neat but always fluid and pliant view of the music was popular with the 4852 attending.

Haydn's Symphony No. 93, which ended the program, was especially flexible, and there were moments during Handel's concerto Opus 6, No. 4, when he spiced the regularity of the baroque rhythms by drawing a contrasting sentimental swoop from the orchestra.

Light, Feathery Movement

The Boccherini Sinfonia opus 1, No. 3, which opened the program was less fluid, in spite of its aura in imitation of Haydn, but it had a middle movement that was as light and feathery as a boa.

At the 7 p. m. prelude Brian Runnett contributed eight pieces from part III of the "Clavierubung" to the weekend's presentation of the works of Bach.

Par III is made up of organ music. . 21A chorale preludes preceded by the famous prelude in E flat and followed by the "St. Anne" fugue in E flat.

Digital Stamina

Runnett put together a 40-minute program which started and ended, as part III does, with the two E flat pieces and included a half dozen of the middle preludes.

He used only the barest minimum of rubato to lend expression to Bach's metronomic meters and never faltered insustaining the relentless momentum demanded by Bach's intricate counterpoint.

It was a display of digital stamina as well as musicianship, and the audience, as if it were in church, held its applause until the recital was finished.

Boys Choir Director

Runnett is organist and master of choristers at Norwich Cathedral, England, and this summer is serving as director of the Berkshire Boy Choir at the Stockbridge school in Lenox.

Tonight Haydn's Mass in D Minor, "The Nelson" with five vocal soloists and the Tanglewood Choir will be preceded by Haydn's early symphony No. 24 in D major and Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen," with Saramae Endich, soprano, and Armando Ghitalla, trumpeter.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
JUL 13 1968
New England Newsclip

Guest conductor David Zinman.

Zinman Conducts Boston Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — A Berkshire Music Festival audience of 4,852 turned up Friday night at Tanglewood for David Zinman's debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This was the festival's second weekend of music suitable for reduced orchestra. Zinman was the first of eight guest conductors who will appear here this summer. We hope for greater success for the others.

Friday night's concert marked the first performance by the Boston Symphony of Boccherini's Sinfonia in A Major, Opus 1, No. 3.

Historical Interest

It proved to be of greater historical interest than musical enticement.

Zinman is American, 32 years old, and currently conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra.

His musicianship is sound. For the most part, the orchestra sounded well under his direction. He was constantly and elaborately active without bypassing the merest detail, whether the seasoned men of the Boston Symphony needed such supervision or not.

Other Selections

In addition to the Boccherini Sinfonia, the program included Bach's Concerto for Violin in E Major, with concert master Joseph Silverstain as soloist, Handel's Concerto Grosso in A Minor, Opus 6, No. 4, and Haydn's Symphony No. 93 in D Major.

Zinman kept the Boccherini Sinfonia on the go.

The slow movement had charm. Violins carried the naive tunes to balanced backgrounds in low strings and harpsichord played by Robert Levin.

There was somewhat more substance in the finale, adeptly handled by the orchestra. Fortunately, Zinman didn't attempt to conduct the solo trio in violins and viola. These first-desk players didn't need it.

Ensemble Sound

Silverstain was not heard to best advantage. He did make rewarding use of his affluent tone and clear-cut sense of phrase.

Much of his playing was drowned in ensemble sound, a situation that should have been remedied from the podium.

Zinman continued his energetic activity, frequently drawing attention away from the soloist. The impression was that he was trying to dictate the solo part as well.

The slow movement was rather better for Silverstain. When he managed to assert his singing tone, the performance grew appreciably in stature and expressivity. Some passagework in the last movement noticeably strayed from base.

Handel Concerto

Strings were eupronious and precise in the Handel Concerto. The fugue was exact in voice entrances and carried on parallel progress. Zinman improved in this music. The slow movement was tenderly addressed and remained flexible in spite of vigorous podium directives.

The Haydn Symphony received a well-regulated performance. As before, Zinman attended generously to his players' needs, real and superficial.

One couldn't have asked for a more methodical treatment of the work's form, note-playing, handling of details. It was an agitated effort to keep everything moving on schedule, ex- well-invested with 18-century charm.

Tanglewood Continues Survey Of Baroque, Classical Music

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

This weekend, Tanglewood continued its survey of music for baroque and classical orchestras, Spaced over the three-day period were compositions by Bach, Boccherini, Haydel and Telemann. I chose to attend the Friday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, conducted respectively by the visiting David Zinman and the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

The Friday offering began at 7, with the Weekend Prelude, Inaugurated (I think) two years ago, the Weekend Prelude gives an early concertgoer the opportunity to hear solo or chamber music before the feature event gets under way. This weekend Brian Runnett was organ solist in excerpts from Part Three of Bach's "Clavier-Ubung," or keyboard exercises. This is the only part of four devoted to the organ and the public knows only the E-flat Prelude and Fugue ("Saint Anne") that opens and closes Part Three. (Confidentially, I too know only the "St. Anne" business; the 21 chorale-prelude between these two terminals are largely unknown territory to me.)

Runnett selected six of the 21 and seemed to do quite well by the music, capturing Bach' spirit rather completely. I was particularly impressed by the three different settings of the Kyrie, with the Cantus Firmus in soprano, tenor, and bass positions. The "St. Anne" was given a hefty reading, somewhat slower than I've heard, but not less monumental.

At nine Friday night, David Zinman led a superb concert featuring Boccherini's A major Sinfonia, op. 1 no. 3; Bach's E major Violin Concerto; Handel's Concerto Grosso in A minor, op. 6 no. 4; and Hayden's 93rd Symphony.

The Boccherini was a premiere performance by the orchestra and a first hearing for this reviewer. What a delightful piece it is! The bright first movement has a swinging rhythmic snap and offers an unusual use of the violins in that they are given a passage to play "on the bridge."

I was always under the impression that Beethoven was the first to employ this device (in the C-sharp Minor quartet, op. 131; written 1826), but it appears that Boccherini antedated him by more than 60 years. As for the rest of the Bocchreini work, the andante, muted throughout, is characterized by a simple tune and the final movement in a quick 6-8 allegro that brings the work to a happy close.

* * *

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist in Bach's E major Violin Concreto. The performance was splendid, discounting some ill-tuning of the solo instrument at the beginning. Since James Buswell suffered the same fate last weekend, I wonder if the problem doesn't originate when tuning is effected in a room warmer than the outdoor stage . . . because if it is, the cooler outdoor temperature would cause contraction in the violin strings and result in a sharpness of pitch, especially in the tighter A and E strings.

All the same, Silverstein's reading was excellent. He sculpted the outer movements into veritable cathedrals and gave to the adagio a grace and fluency other soloists seem unable to capture.

No less successful was conductor Zinman, who helped Silverstein by providing a masterful accompaniment. Zinman seems especially at home in this style of music, and his intelligent use of the continuo and other characteristic baroque practices makes him the finest baroque conductor I've yet heard. I would really love to hear him conduct some other music and greatly envy Philadelphia audiences who got to hear him for seven weeks last season.

After intermission came the Handel Concerto Grosso. Here, again, Zinman was ideal, giving the work a poised reading notable as much for its technical command as for its stylistic insight.

But the real climax of the evening came with Haydn's Symphony No. 93. Nestled between the "Oxford" and "Surprise" symphonies, it combines classic tastes with sardonic humor and is certainly one of the funniest works the composer ever wrote. The conductor gave what can only be described as a definitive performance.

* * *

Not a single part went unheard, the pacing was excellent throughout and one was always deeply aware of the logic and structure behind every note. Listening to the preparation to that coarse, rude bassoon noise in the Largo was almost as much fun as the vulgar sound itself. And in the Minuet those ridiculous fanfares (announcing nothing at all) were neither blatantly overdone nor cooly understated; everything was thought out carefully beforehand and reflected an artistry of no mean proportion. Even Sir Thomas Beecham, who had a special way with this kind of music, would be hard-pressed to deliver a performance like this. It was tops and capped a most eventful evening.

A different kind of success went to Leinsdorf on Sunday afternoon. Three works were scheduled, a Telemann concerto, a Bach Cantata, and an arrangement by Leinsdorf of Handel's "Water Music."

Things got off to a dull start with the Telemann Triple Concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello. For me, Telemann's music is unimpressive and flavorless and I prefer not to comment upon it at length here. Solo contributions were pretty good: James Pappoutsakis played the flute very well, Alfred Krips did okay for the most part with the violin, and Martin Hohermann was a fine cellist.

* * *

Next came Bach's Cantata No. 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," scored for orchestra, contralto solo, and organ. Beverly Wolff was a paragon of achievement in the vocal part. Her diction was flawless and her voice a delight. She has a bigger sound than most altos, and for a minute there, I thought she could drown the orchestra if she wanted to. She didn't, of course, being more of an artist than a showoff. Charles Wilson had some trouble with the organ part, but it somehow came through intact. Leinsdorf was unusually attentive during the performance,

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 51,006
JUL 15 1968

28.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday July 13 at 8 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 24 in D major
[Allegro]
Adagio
Menuet & trio
Finale: allegro

BACH — Cantata no. 51 'Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen' for soprano and orchestra with trumpet obbligato

Aria: Jauchzet Gott
Recitative: Wir beten zu dem Tempel
Aria: Höchster, mache deine Güte
Choral: Sei Lob und Preis
Aria: Alleluja

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
ARMANDO GHITALLA trumpet
CHARLES WILSON organ continuo
ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo

intermission

HAYDN — Mass in D minor 'The Nelson'

Kyrie: allegro moderato
Gloria: allegro
Qui tollis: adagio
Quoniam: allegro
Credo: allegro con spirito
Et incarnatus: largo
Et resurrexit: vivace
Sanctus: adagio-allegro
Benedictus: allegretto-allegro
Agnus Dei: adagio
Dona nobis pacem: vivace

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
BEVERLY WOLFF contralto
ENRICO DI GIUSEPPE tenor
PAUL PLISHKA bass
DONNA PRECHT soprano

TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
CHARLES WILSON director
JOHN OLIVER assistant director

The program notes and texts for tonight's concert begin on page 23

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

At Tanglewood

Performance of Haydn Blends Beauty, Bustle, Precision

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There were 6377 listeners at Tanglewood Saturday night to hear Erich Leinsdorf lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tanglewood Choir and four soloists in a first-class performance of one of Haydn's masterpieces, the "Mass in Time of Peril."

It is a highly inventive and varied work characterized by much interweaving of melodic strains and harmonic gestures and interplay between chorus and soloists.

There are sections of action when the music is bustling, and sections of drama and sections of simple beauty. The "Qui Tollis," for instance, near the beginning, which presents the soprano and bass soloists with the chorus, was especially beautiful Saturday.

There were 40 in the choir and they sounded like a nimble 100 . . . precise, well-drilled and agile but with plenty of power when needed.

Directly in front of them behind the orchestra were the soloists, Saramae Endich, soprano, Beverly Wolff, contralto, Enrico Digiuseppe, tenor, and Paul Plishka, bass.

The position was appropriate to the degree with which their parts are mingled with the chorus and because of the efficient acoustics of the shed, not too far to be heard brightly.

Most of the solo work fell on the shoulders of Miss Endich, which is all right with me. There were a couple of moments Saturday when she seemed to falter a bit, but her mellow tones and gracious manner were as satisfying as ever, and it is seldom that a concert program schedules so much work for one voice.

Known in City

Beverly Wolff has a contralto that blends well with the warm tones of Miss Endich, and Digiuseppe and Plishka produced their contributions with strength and clarity.

The Mass, most commonly known as "The Nelson," was heard in Springfield in 1960 when the Springfield Symphony Orchestra and Chorus did it. Those who heard it then know what an impressive work it can be.

Before intermission Miss Endich sang the difficult and elaborate cantata written for the 15th Sunday after Trinity, No. 51 . . . "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen."

A Happy Duet

It is a joyful cantata full of florid decoration requiring much skill on the part of the soloist and equal skill on the part of the solo trumpeter, who is required to play a high accompaniment to the voice durinug the opening and closing arias.

The trumpet, played by Armando Ghitalla, and Miss Endich's velvety tones made a happy duet. Between the arias were a recitative and aria accompanied simply by the harpsichord, cello and double bass and a solo chorale accompanied by the instrumental trio plus a couple of violins.

It is like personal chamber music, and Saturday night the little group on the big stage managed to make the music surprisingly intimate considering the vastness of the surroundings.

Pleasant Start

The concert opened with one of Haydn's early little symphonies. No. 24. It was a pleasant, unpretentious beginning. The second movement, especially, was pleasing . . . An innocent flute adagio accompanied by subdued strings.

This afternoon the program calls for a triple concerto for flute, violin and cello by Telemann, Bach's Cantata No. 35 with Beverly Wolff, contralto soloist, and a suite of 10 movements from Handel's "Water Music."

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Haydn's Nelson Mass thrills Tanglewood

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

LENOX—It is always a pleasure to hear one of the vital deeply-felt mass settings of Haydn's last years, particularly in a performance as good as the one Erich Leinsdorf gave the Nelson Mass at Tanglewood Saturday.

The real name of the 1798 Mass in D minor is "Missa in Angustiis," best translated as Mass in Time of Fear. Actually, "angst" comes still closer than "fear," but the flavor is wrong.

The outer sections of the Gloria and Creed and of the Dona nobis pacem are as buoyantly confident as always in Haydn; this is, however, the only minor mode Mass among the late ones, and it is has a unique seriousness of mien.

LATE HAYDN

This mood dominates the Kyrie most of all, but its most astonishing manifestation occurs in the Benedictus, in which the friendly Allegretto that was traditional for this text becomes transmuted into something movingly grave and intense both by the minor key and by the undercurrent of trumpet and drum signals.

Haydn wrote the Nelson Mass three years after his last symphony, and only two complete quartets were to follow. The Mass, then, represents Haydn at an extraordinary point of maturity, invention, and sheer skill.

The magnificent sweep of the Kyrie, the expansively expressive Qui Tollis, the Credo's austere polyphony, the astonishing B minor beginning of Et Resurrexi, the almost unprecedently rich Adagio style of the Agnus Dei, all attest to this.

There is, along with all this, a thrilling flow of activity in the orchestra, especially the violins, for example, the elaborate and impassioned cantilena at Qui sedes ad dexteram, again in the Agnus Dei, or the joyous runs that decorate the doctrinal clauses at the end of the creed.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Haydn: Symphony No. 24 in D; Bach: Cantata: "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," BWV 51, with Saramee Endich, soprano; and Haydn: Nelson Mass, with the Tanglewood Choir and Saramee Endich, soprano, Beverly Wolff, contralto, Enrico Di Giuseppe, tenor, Paul Plishka, bass. Saturday night at Tanglewood.

The one significant cause of complaint about the performance concerns the orchestration. In this respect, too, the Nelson is Haydn's most original mass because it was scored for an ensemble, both austere and sharp-edged, of strings, organ obligato, trumpets and kettledrums.

MISJUDGMENT

The price Haydn paid for his popularity was the circulation of corrupt scores of many of his works. The first publication of the Nelson Mass, though still issued in Haydn's lifetime, was made from bad sources and threw in alterations of its own, substituting woodwind parts for the organ solo, and subjecting the original trumpet parts — which are brilliant and characteristic—to extremely damaging rewriting.

The score on sale at the Tanglewood bookstore was the correct one (published for the first time in 1962!), but Erich Leinsdorf chose the version with the spurious 1803 changes.

I thought it a bad decision, musically and otherwise, and I also deplore the lack of candor about this in Andrew Raeburn's program notes—a case, I suppose, of institutional loyalty winning out over scholarship.

There was one odd misjudgment in Leinsdorf's conducting of the Mass. He seems to dislike the fugues in Viennese classic choral works. He made no cuts, which he has done in the past in Haydn and Schubert, but he expressed his impatience with the In Gloria Dei Patris fugue by speeding it up terrifically.

It got him into difficulties when the references to earlier parts of the Gloria appear since these resist being recapitulated at a tempo other than their original one, and for a while the effect was close to nonsensical.

These reservations aside, the performance went extremely well, with very good playing, superb singing by the Tanglewood Choir, prepared by Charles Wilson with John Oliver. The soprano has the most prominent solo part, and Saramae Endich sang it intelligently and with agreeable sound.

ENERGY AND GRACE

Beverly Wolff's intense, powerful, and varied singing was still more impressive. The men, though competent, were not as pleasing.

Leinsdorf began the concert with Haydn's Symphony No. 24, a humorous little piece from 1764, full of life and ideas, that he had led at a Symphony Hall concert in March. The performance had energy and grace, and the playing itself was very beautiful. The Adagio, which would sound more comfortable just a bit faster, is a flute solo which Mrs. Dwyer played charmingly.

Between the two Haydn works came Bach's great cantata for solo soprano, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," BWV 51. The performance was shapeless note-reading, lacking brilliance and in some details, like the persistent non-ornamentation of cadences in the trumpet part, plain sense.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

'Lord Nelson Mass' Is Highlight at Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

The second weekend of the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood was devoted to music of the baroque period. That this was a popular choice is evidenced by the attendance figures, some twenty thousand for the three concerts.

THE MAJOR work Saturday night was the infrequently heard Mass in D minor by Haydn and now known as "The Nelson" although the composer's original title was "Missa in augustiis" meaning Mass in times of trouble. The news of Lord Nelson's victory over the French navy at Abukir reached Vienna on the same day as the mass's first performance in the Bergkirche in Eisenstadt. The work soon became known as the "Nelson Mass."

This D minor Mass is considered by many authorities to be Haydn's greatest single composition. It is reverant in the proper places but the main impression is one of rejoicing. The length is perfect with not a superfluous measure.

For this presentation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was joined by the Tanglewood choir of approximately fifty voices chosen by audition from all over the country, and a quartet of vocal soloists. The singing of the Tanglewood choir which is trained by Charles Wilson was well nigh perfect. There were wide contrasts in dynamics, the ensemble and diction excellent, and the tone quality was always round and never forced.

At the Concert

The greater part of the solo work was carried by the distaff side, Saramae Endich, soprano, and Beverly Wolff who was programmed as a contralto but who in reality is a mezzo soprano. Miss Endich possesses a well schooled voice of pleasing quality range, and flexibility and has a fine sense of style. Beverly Wolff, who is no stranger to Tanglewood audiences, has a beautiful mezzo voice with a rich creamy quality which she used with the greatest skill and musicianship. The male soloists, Enrico di Guiseppe, tenor, and Paul Plishka bass were more than satisfactory in their solo portions. Erich Leinsdorf conducted with a sensitive awareness of the many beauties and dramatic possibilities in the score.

The Bach cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen" which preceded the mass gave Saramae Endich the opportunity to exhibit her complete mastery of the difficult baroque ornamental style of singing. The florid trumpet obligato was played with fluency and style by Armand Ghitalla.

The purely orchestral portion of the concert was the delightful Symphony in D major, No. 24 which was given a brisk and authoritative reading by Mr. Leinsdorf.

The comparatively unfamiliar work played on Sunday afternoon was the Triple concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello by Georg Philipp Telemann. The soloists, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were James Pappoutsakis, flute Alfred Kripps violin, and Martin Hohermann, cello. This concerto is somewhat similar in style to Handel's Water Music, or the Mozart divertimentos in that it was intended as background or entertainment music. It has four movements, beginning with a slow one and while it doesn't have the rhythmic momentum found in works of Vivaldi or Locatelli, it is richer in texture and more elaborately developed. It was played with great spirit and understanding by all concerned and was well received by the audience.

Beverly Wolff, who sang in the Haydn mass the night before was the soloist in the Bach Cantata No. 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," and confirmed the excellent impression she had made. Her unusual facility in rapid passages enabled her to sing the long florid sections of the cantata with the greatest ease and assurance. The solo organ part played by Charles Wilson provided a finely etched embellishment to Miss Wolff's expressive vocal line. Orchestra and soloists were rewarded with a well deserved ovation at the cantata.

To conclude the program Mr. Leinsdorf selected a suite from "The Water Music" by Handel. This is truly outdoor music at its best and was given the performance it deservse.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,603

JUL 15 1968

Enjoyable Evening At Tanglewood

The program at Tanglewood on Saturday with Erich Leinsdorf conducting opened with Haydn's Symphony No. 24 in D Major. This happy work is particularly noteworthy for its lovely adagio movement with flute.

It was followed by the Bach Cantata No. 51 "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen." Scored for soprano, strings, solo trumpet and continuo, this is vocally one of Bach's most difficult cantatas and musically one of the finest. The Esacting virtuoso part, an excellent example of the art of baroque ornamental singing was sung by soprano Saramae Endich who has appeared often with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Haydn Mass in D Minor featured again soprano Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff contralto, Enrico Di Giuseppe tenor, Paul Plishka bass and the Tanglewood Choir. Although the Mass has no connection with Admiral Nelson, it is an impressive composition, and particular credit should go to Charles Wilson and the Tanglewood Choir for making it a fine performance enthusiastically received by the audience.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

JUL 16 1968 New England Newsclip

28.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday July 13 at 8 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 24 in D major
[Allegro]
Adagio
Menuet & trio
Finale: allegro

BACH — Cantata no. 51 'Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen' for soprano and orchestra with trumpet obbligato
Aria: Jauchzet Gott
Recitative: Wir beten zu dem Tempel
Aria: Höchster, mache deine Güte
Choral: Sei Lob und Preis
Aria: Alleluja

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
ARMANDO GHITALLA trumpet
CHARLES WILSON organ continuo
ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo

intermission

HAYDN — Mass in D minor 'The Nelson'

Kyrie: allegro moderato
Gloria: allegro
Qui tollis: adagio
Quoniam: allegro
Credo: allegro con spirito
Et incarnatus: largo
Et resurrexit: vivace
Sanctus: adagio-allegro
Benedictus: allegretto-allegro
Agnus Dei: adagio
Dona nobis pacem: vivace

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
BEVERLY WOLFF contralto
ENRICO DI GIUSEPPE tenor
PAUL PLISHKA bass
DONNA PRECHT soprano

TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
CHARLES WILSON director
JOHN OLIVER assistant director

The program notes and texts for tonight's concert begin on page 23

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

At Tanglewood

Performance of Haydn Blends Beauty, Bustle, Precision

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There were 6377 listeners at Tanglewood Saturday night to hear Erich Leinsdorf lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tanglewood Choir and four soloists in a first-class performance of one of Haydn's masterpieces, the "Mass in Time of Peril."

It is a highly inventive and varied work characterized by much interweaving of melodic strains and harmonic gestures and interplay between chorus and soloists.

There are sections of action when the music is bustling, and sections of drama and sections of simple beauty. The "Qui Tollis," for instance, near the beginning, which presents the soprano and bass soloists with the chorus, was especially beautiful Saturday.

There were 40 in the choir and they sounded like a nimble 100 . . . precise, well-drilled and agile but with plenty of power when needed.

Directly in front of them behind the orchestra were the soloists, Saramae Endich, soprano, Beverly Wolff, contralto, Enrico Digiuseppe, tenor, and Paul Plishka, bass.

The position was appropriate to the degree with which their parts are mingled with the chorus and because of the efficient acoustics of the shed, not too far to be heard brightly.

Most of the solo work fell on the shoulders of Miss Endich, which is all right with me. There were a couple of moments Saturday when she seemed to falter a bit, but her mellow tones and gracious manner were as satisfying as ever, and it is seldom that a concert program schedules so much work for one voice.

Known in City

Beverly Wolff has a contralto that blends well with the warm tones of Miss Endich, and Digiuseppe and Plishka produced their contributions with strength and clarity.

The Mass, most commonly known as "The Nelson," was heard in Springfield in 1960 when the Springfield Symphony Orchestra and Chorus did it. Those who heard it then know what an impressive work it can be.

Before intermission Miss Endich sang the difficult and elaborate cantata written for the 15th Sunday after Trinity, No. 51 . . . "Jauchzer Gott in Allen Landen."

A Happy Duet

It is a joyful cantata full of florid decoration requiring much skill on the part of the soloist and equal skill on the part of the solo trumpeter, who is required to play a high accompaniment to the voice durinug the opening and closing arias.

The trumpet, played by Armando Ghitalla, and Miss Endich's velvety tones made a happy duet. Between the arias were a recitative and aria accompanied simply by the harpsichord, cello and double bass and a solo chorale accompanied by the instrumental trio plus a couple of violins.

It is like personal chamber music, and Saturday night the little group on the big stage managed to make the music surprisingly intimate considering the vastness of the surroundings.

Pleasant Start

The concert opened with one of Haydn's early little symphonies, No. 24. It was a pleasant, unpretentious beginning. The second movement, especially, was pleasing . . . An innocent flute adagio accompanied by subdued strings.

This afternoon the program calls for a triple concerto for flute, violin and cello by Telemann, Bach's Cantata No. 35 with Beverly Wolff, contralto soloist, and a suite of 10 movements from Handel's "Water Music."

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Haydn's Nelson Mass thrills Tanglewood

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

LENOX—It is always a pleasure to hear one of the vital deeply-felt mass settings of Haydn's last years, particularly in a performance as good as the one Erich Leinsdorf gave the Nelson Mass at Tanglewood Saturday.

The real name of the 1798 Mass in D minor is "Missa in Angustiis," best translated as Mass in Time of Fear. Actually, "angst" comes still closer than "fear," but the flavor is wrong.

The outer sections of the Gloria and Creed and of the Dona nobis pacem are as buoyantly confident as always in Haydn; this is, however, the only minor mode Mass among the late ones, and it is has a unique seriousness of mien.

LATE HAYDN

This mood dominates the Kyrie most of all, but its most astonishing manifestation occurs in the Benedictus, in which the friendly Allegretto that was traditional for this text becomes transmuted into something movingly grave and intense both by the minor key and by the undercurrent of trumpet and drum signals.

Haydn wrote the Nelson Mass three years after his last symphony, and only two complete quartets were to follow. The Mass, then, represents Haydn at an extraordinary point of maturity, invention, and sheer skill.

The magnificent sweep of the Kyrie, the expansively expressive Qui Tollis, the Credo's austere polyphony, the astonishing B minor beginning of Et Resurrexi, the almost unprecedently rich Adagio style of the Agnus Dei, all attest to this.

There is, along with all this, a thrilling flow of activity in the orchestra, especially the violins, for example, the elaborate and impassioned cantilena at Qui sedes ad dexteram, again in the Agnus Dei, or the joyous runs that decorate the doctrinal clauses at the end of the creed.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Haydn: Symphony No. 24 in D; Bach: Cantata: "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," BWV 51, with Saramee Endich, soprano; and Haydn: Nelson Mass, with the Tanglewood Choir and Saramee Endich, soprano, Beverly Wolff, contralto, Enrico Di Giuseppe, tenor, Paul Plishka, bass. Saturday night at Tanglewood.

The one significant cause of complaint about the performance concerns the orchestration. In this respect, too, the Nelson is Haydn's most original mass because it was scored for an ensemble, both austere and sharp-edged, of strings, organ obligato, trumpets and kettledrums.

MISJUDGMENT

The price Haydn paid for his popularity was the circulation of corrupt scores of many of his works. The first publication of the Nelson Mass, though still issued in Haydn's lifetime, was made from bad sources and threw in alterations of its own, substituting woodwind parts for the organ solo, and subjecting the original trumpet parts — which are brilliant and characteristic—to extremely damaging rewriting.

The score on sale at the Tanglewood bookstore was the correct one (published for the first time in 1962!), but Erich Leinsdorf chose the version with the spurious 1803 changes.

I thought it a bad decision, musically and otherwise, and I also deplore the lack of candor about this in Andrew Raeburn's program notes—a case, I suppose, of institutional loyalty winning out over scholarship.

There was one odd misjudgment in Leinsdorf's conducting of the Mass. He seems to dislike the fugues in Viennese classic choral works. He made no cuts, which he has done in the past in Haydn and Schubert, but he expressed his impatience with the In Gloria Dei Patris fugue by speeding it up terrifically.

It got him into difficulties when the references to earlier parts of the Gloria appear since these resist being recapitulated at a tempo other than their original one, and for a while the effect was close to nonsensical.

These reservations aside, the performance went extremely well, with very good playing, superb singing by the Tanglewood Choir, prepared by Charles Wilson with John Oliver. The soprano has the most prominent solo part, and Saramae Endich sang it intelligently and with agreeable sound.

ENERGY AND GRACE

Beverly Wolff's intense, powerful, and varied singing was still more impressive. The men, though competent, were not as pleasing.

Leinsdorf began the concert with Haydn's Symphony No. 24, a humorous little piece from 1764, full of life and ideas, that he had led at a Symphony Hall concert in March. The performance had energy and grace, and the playing itself was very beautiful. The Adagio, which would sound more comfortable just a bit faster, is a flute solo which Mrs. Dwyer played charmingly.

Between the two Haydn works came Bach's great cantata for solo soprano, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," BWV 51. The performance was shapeless note-reading, lacking brilliance and in some details, like the persistent non-ornamentation of cadences in the trumpet part, plain sense.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

'Lord Nelson Mass' Is Highlight at Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

The second weekend of the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood was devoted to music of the baroque period. That this was a popular choice is evidenced by the attendance figures, some twenty thousand for the three concerts.

THE MAJOR work Saturday night was the infrequently heard Mass in D minor by Haydn and now known as "The Nelson" although the composer's original title was "Missa in augustiis" meaning Mass in times of trouble. The news of Lord Nelson's victory over the French navy at Abukir reached Vienna on the same day as the mass's first performance in the Bergkirche in Eisenstadt. The work soon became known as the "Nelson Mass."

This D minor Mass is considered by many authorities to be Haydn's greatest single composition. It is reverant in the proper places but the main impression is one of rejoicing. The length is perfect with not a superfluous measure.

For this presentation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was joined by the Tanglewood choir of approximately fifty voices chosen by audition from all over the country, and a quartet of vocal soloists. The singing of the Tanglewood choir which is trained by Charles Wilson was well nigh perfect. There were wide contrasts in dynamics, the ensemble and diction excellent and the tone quality was always round and never forced.

At the Concert

The greater part of the solo work was carried by the distaff side, Saramae Endich, soprano, and Beverly Wolff who was programmed as a contralto but who in reality is a mezzo soprano. Miss Endich possesses a well schooled voice of pleasing quality range, and flexibility and has a fine sense of style. Beverly Wolff, who is no stranger to Tanglewood audiences, has a beautiful mezzo voice with a rich creamy quality which she used with the greatest skill and musicianship. The male soloists, Enrico di Guiseppe, tenor, and Paul Plishka bass were more than satisfactory in their solo portions. Erich Leinsdorf conducted with a sensitive awareness of the many beauties and dramatic possibilities in the score.

The Bach cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen" which preceded the mass gave Saramae Endich the opportunity to exhibit her complete mastery of the difficult baroque ornamental style of singing. The florid trumpet obligato was played with fluency and style by Armand Ghitalla.

The purely orchestral portion of the concert was the delightful Symphony in D major, No. 24 which was given a brisk and authoritative reading by Mr. Leinsdorf.

The comparatively unfamiliar work played on Sunday afternoon was the Triple concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello by Georg Philipp Telemann. The soloists, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were James Pappoutsakis, flute Alfred Kripps violin, and Martin Hohermann, cello. This concerto is somewhat similar in style to Handel's Water Music, or the Mozart divertimentos in that it was intended as background or entertainment music. It has four movements, beginning with a slow one and while it doesn't have the rhythmic momentum found in works of Vivaldi or Locatelli, it is richer in texture and more elaborately developed. It was played with great spirit and understanding by all concerned and was well received by the audience.

Beverly Wolff, who sang in the Haydn mass the night before was the soloist in the Bach Cantata No. 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," and confirmed the excellent impression she had made. Her unusual facility in rapid passages enabled her to sing the long florid sections of the cantata with the greatest ease and assurance. The solo organ part played by Charles Wilson provided a finely etched embellishment to Miss Wolff's expressive vocal line. Orchestra and soloists were rewarded with a well deserved ovation at the cantata.

To conclude the program Mr. Leinsdorf selected a suite from "The Water Music" by Handel. This is truly outdoor music at its best and was given the performance it deservse.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,603

JUL 15 1968

Enjoyable Evening At Tanglewood

The program at Tanglewood on Saturday with Erich Leinsdorf conducting opened with Haydn's Symphony No. 24 in D Major. This happy work is particularly noteworthy for its lovely adagio movement with flute.

It was followed by the Bach Cantata No. 51 "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen." Scored for soprano, strings, solo trumpet and continuo, this is vocally one of Bach's most difficult cantatas and musically one of the finest. The Esacting virtuoso part, an excellent example of the art of baroque ornamental singing was sung by soprano Saramae Endich who has appeared often with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Haydn Mass in D Minor featured again soprano Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff contralto, Enrico Di Giuseppe tenor, Paul Plishka bass and the Tanglewood Choir. Although the Mass has no connection with Admiral Nelson, it is an impressive composition, and particular credit should go to Charles Wilson and the Tanglewood Choir for making it a fine performance enthusiastically received by the audience.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

JUL 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Fine Haydn Performance at Tanglewood

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Exuberant Tanglewood Concert

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Erich Leinsdorf conducted Haydn's "Lord Nelson" Mass at Tanglewood Saturday night in a performance full of exuberance and vitality.

Considering the confident and optimistic tone of the composer's sacred music, it was an eminently satisfying approach to this revivifying score. All the forces involved seemed to capture the dynamic spirit that characterized Leinsdorf's conducting.

* * *

Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di Giuseppe, and Paul Plishka were the generally excellent soloists. Plishka's rolling bass voice was beautifully projected in the "Qui tollis" and the Misses Endich and Wolff worked together with warmth and feeling in the Agnus Dei.

And Leinsdorf used the Berkshire Choir of some 35 voices (the voice parts were intermixed for a better blend), which gave an admirable account of itself. The sheer thrust of the singing in the "Et resurrexit" and the Benedictus was quite exhilarating. Needless to say, the Boston Symphony offered staunch support (the orchestra was suitably reduced in size).

* * *

Miss Endich demonstrated further versatility in Bach's Cantata No. 51 ("Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen"), which demands the utmost musicianship and vocal flexibility. Outside of a few moments when the orchestra covered her, she gave an assured and expressive performance.

In the taxing trumpet obbligato Armando Ghitalla was a tower of strength and the continuo was ably handled by organist Charles Wilson, harpsichordist Robert Levin, cellist Jules Eskin, and Henry Portnoi on double bass. They all received a prolonged ovation at the end.

* * *

One of Haydn's early symphonies (No. 24) opened the Saturday program at Lenox, Mass. Leinsdorf's crisp tempi in the outer movements and his relaxed handling of the Adagio were admirable.

Some 6700 people gathered in the Music Shed and on the surrounding lawn for this event. Although the orchestra played without coats, the weather was certainly comfortable for the audience.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

By MacLAREN HARRIS

LENOX—The large work of what is usually the baroque weekend at Tanglewood was a vocal-instrumental masterpiece of the classic era, Haydn's "Lord Nelson" Mass. And the remarkable thing about the performance is that it was accomplished with forces fairly approximate to those Haydn envisioned.

The norm, as has been noted occasionally with chagrin, has been to assemble a chorus far in excess of numbers or strength actually required and allow it to dominate every facet of the performance, including efforts by often only passably adequate soloists. But Saturday night Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Tanglewood choir of under 40 singers, a solo quartet blessed with fine voices (in its female complement, anyway) and an orchestra ample in size and wind color, though not of overbearing heaviness.

SOPRANO SARAMAE ENDICH and contralto Beverly Wolff made perhaps the major contributions of excellence to the reading. Miss Endich's voice is light and accurately focused, although her strength is far from awesome it sufficed for quartet context. Indeed, a soprano with greater firepower might have been tempted to make the ensemble top-heavy. As things were, Miss Endich's lyric quality brought beauty to the devotional tenderness of the "Incarnatus" while her arpeggios at the Gloria's conclusion soared as — delicate descant.

Miss Wolff's solo opportunities were far fewer, restricted to brief departures from the ensemble. The extent of her talent, however, was evident in the lightness of her contralto and in the ease of her phrasing. Her duetwork with Miss Endich was thoroughly pleasing.

Enrico Di Giuseppe and Paul Plishka, tenor and bass, where more or less satisfactory for their parts, though not up to foregoing standards, Giuseppe allowed a little uncharacteristic drama to strain his tone and encourage phrase-distortion. Plishka displayed a baritone quality inclined to lose its fullness in the bottom register.

THE CHOIR, strong as a whole, lacked some quality in its individual sections, especially men's voices, which resisted blend; the ployphonic passages emerged with less effect than did straight chordal statements, which gave heightened contrast to the mood of the work.

The Boston Symphony's efforts wher well-coordinated and sensitive to the needs of the vocalists. Certainly there were more instruments present than Haydn would have used, even as indicated in his enlarged score of 1803. Yet one cannot accuse either Leinsdorf or the orchestra of upsetting the balance.

Miss Endich was also soloist in Bach's solo cantata 51, "Jauchzet Gott" on the same program. This work poses severe interpretive trials as well as technical ones—namely holding one's wits sufficiently together in the face of the latter to be able to make dynamic sense of the former.

HER AGILITY in the roulades of the opening arias and concluding alleluja left little to be desired and her tone was a forunate natch for the obbligato trumpet, played by Armando Ghitalla. 8

However, Miss Endich's phrasing was on the flat side dynamically, departing rarely from a forte level. Occasional high notes would bring a tinge of desperation to the soprano quality. There she had pause to consider fine points, as in the aria, "Hoechster, Mache Deine Guete." The results were finely wrought and truly praiseworthy, but again her diction suffered in vowal identity during high passages, though it proved clear in the Haydn Mass. Ghitalla's trumpet work, which encountered one hitch near the beginning was surely articulated and well-disposed in balance for the remainder.

THE ORCHESTRA'S Saturday offering was Haydn's cheerful Symphony in D. No. 24, expressed in full contrasts, although I think Leinsdorf missed an opportunity for a grand "Mannhein roll" crescendo before the recapitulation in the first allegro. Doriot Anthony Dwyer's lyrically-sensitive flute solo dominated the adagio.

Friday night's guest conductor was David Zinman who led the Boston Symphony for the first time in symphonies by Boccherini and Haydn, concerti by Bach and Handel.

As one migh suspect from his position with the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, Zinman's style is one of energy and precision. He encouraged pinpoint accuracy and vigor in tutti passages with sharp, well-defined gestures, yet was no less attentive to lightly melodic strains.

THE ORCHESTRA was magnificently clean and full of agile spirit under his hand during Boccherini's pleasantry, the Sinfonia in A, Op. 1, No. 3 (Zinman called for eerie, on-the-bridge violin tones for certain thematic echoes — something new, not to say curious) and during Haydn's fully-developed (and witty!) Symphony No. 93 in D.

By some contrast, Joseph Silverstein's violin solo in Bach's E Major Concerto was rather softly spoken without sharp edges to the contrapuntal contour. though it is not the usual approach, Silverstein's slightly romantic delivery constituted a relief from the more frequent hard-line concept, and Zinman followed his lead adequately.

Hadel's concerto Grosso in A Minor, Op. 6 No. 4, followed the spirit of Boccherini and Haydn in energy and clear textures. In general, Zinman's interpretations were full of elements of youthful adventure — welcome indeed.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

JUL 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Paul Plishka, bass, will be featured as a soloist in Haydn's "Lord Nelson Mass" which will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood Choir, Saturday.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUL 13 1968 New England Newscli

SARAMAE ENDICH, soprano, will be a soloist with the Boston Symphony in Haydn's "Lord Nelson" Mass tonight at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 77,551

JUL 5 1968

Metropolitan Basso Tanglewood Soloist

Paul Plishka of Paterson to Sing With Boston Symphony on July 13

Paul Plishka of Paterson, Metropolitan Opera basso, will be a featured performer July 13 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

He will be bass soloist in Haydn's "Lord Nelson Mass." Other soloists include Saramae Endich, soprano; Beverly Wolff, mezzo-soprano and Enrico Di Giuseppe, tenor. The Tanglewood Choir also will perform, and Erich Leinsdorf will direct.

Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony, which will be heard in 24 regular programs during the 1968 Berkshire Festival.

Mr. Plishka was a mainstay of the Paterson Lyric Opera Theater and a protege of Armen Boyajian, its director. He joined the Metropolitan in the spring of 1967.

Prior to that he was the eastern regional finalist in the Metropolitan Opera National Council Auditions and a member of the Metropolitan Opera National Touring Company.

Paul Plishka

Winner of the $1.000 first prize in the Baltimore Civic Opera Association auditions, Mr. Plishka began his musical career while a student at Paterson Eastside High School.

Fine Haydn Performance at Tanglewood

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Exuberant Tanglewood Concert

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Erich Leinsdorf conducted Haydn's "Lord Nelson" Mass at Tanglewood Saturday night in a performance full of exuberance and vitality.

Considering the confident and optimistic tone of the composer's sacred music, it was an eminently satisfying approach to this revivifying score. All the forces involved seemed to capture the dynamic spirit that characterized Leinsdorf's conducting.

* * *

Saramae Endich, Beverly Wolff, Enrico Di Giuseppe, and Paul Plishka were the generally excellent soloists. Plishka's rolling bass voice was beautifully projected in the "Qui tollis" and the Misses Endich and Wolff worked together with warmth and feeling in the Agnus Dei.

And Leinsdorf used the Berkshire Choir of some 35 voices (the voice parts were intermixed for a better blend), which gave an admirable account of itself. The sheer thrust of the singing in the "Et resurrexit" and the Benedictus was quite exhilarating. Needless to say, the Boston Symphony offered staunch support (the orchestra was suitably reduced in size).

* * *

Miss Endich demonstrated further versatility in Bach's Cantata No. 51 ("Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen"), which demands the utmost musicianship and vocal flexibility. Outside of a few moments when the orchestra covered her, she gave an assured and expressive performance.

In the taxing trumpet obbligato Armando Ghitalla was a tower of strength and the continuo was ably handled by organist Charles Wilson, harpsichordist Robert Levin, cellist Jules Eskin, and Henry Portnoi on double bass. They all received a prolonged ovation at the end.

* * *

One of Haydn's early symphonies (No. 24) opened the Saturday program at Lenox, Mass. Leinsdorf's crisp tempi in the outer movements and his relaxed handling of the Adagio were admirable.

Some 6700 people gathered in the Music Shed and on the surrounding lawn for this event. Although the orchestra played without coats, the weather was certainly comfortable for the audience.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

By MacLAREN HARRIS

LENOX—The large work of what is usually the baroque weekend at Tanglewood was a vocal-instrumental masterpiece of the classic era, Haydn's "Lord Nelson" Mass. And the remarkable thing about the performance is that it was accomplished with forces fairly approximate to those Haydn envisioned.

The norm, as has been noted occasionally with chagrin, has been to assemble a chorus far in excess of numbers or strength actually required and allow it to dominate every facet of the performance, including efforts by often only passably adequate soloists. But Saturday night Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Tanglewood choir of under 40 singers, a solo quartet blessed with fine voices (in its female complement, anyway) and an orchestra ample in size and wind color, though not of overbearing heaviness.

SOPRANO SARAMAE ENDICH and contralto Beverly Wolff made perhaps the major contributions of excellence to the reading. Miss Endich's voice is light and accurately focused, although her strength is far from awesome it sufficed for quartet context. Indeed, a soprano with greater firepower might have been tempted to make the ensemble top-heavy. As things were, Miss Endich's lyric quality brought beauty to the devotional tenderness of the "Incarnatus" while her arpeggios at the Gloria's conclusion soared as — delicate descant.

Miss Wolff's solo opportunities were far fewer, restricted to brief departures from the ensemble. The extent of her talent, however, was evident in the lightness of her contralto and in the ease of her phrasing. Her duetwork with Miss Endich was thoroughly pleasing.

Enrico Di Giuseppe and Paul Plishka, tenor and bass, where more or less satisfactory for their parts, though not up to foregoing standards, Giuseppe allowed a little uncharacteristic drama to strain his tone and encourage phrase-distortion. Plishka displayed a baritone quality inclined to lose its fullness in the bottom register.

THE CHOIR, strong as a whole, lacked some quality in its individual sections, especially men's voices, which resisted blend; the ployphonic passages emerged with less effect than did straight chordal statements, which gave heightened contrast to the mood of the work.

The Boston Symphony's efforts wher well-coordinated and sensitive to the needs of the vocalists. Certainly there were more instruments present than Haydn would have used, even as indicated in his enlarged score of 1803. Yet one cannot accuse either Leinsdorf or the orchestra of upsetting the balance.

Miss Endich was also soloist in Bach's solo cantata 51, "Jauchzet Gott" on the same program. This work poses severe interpretive trials as well as technical ones—namely holding one's wits sufficiently together in the face of the latter to be able to make dynamic sense of the former.

HER AGILITY in the roulades of the opening arias and concluding alleluja left little to be desired and her tone was a forunate natch for the obbligato trumpet, played by Armando Ghitalla. 8

However, Miss Endich's phrasing was on the flat side dynamically, departing rarely from a forte level. Occasional high notes would bring a tinge of desperation to the soprano quality. There she had pause to consider fine points, as in the aria, "Hoechster, Mache Deine Guete." The results were finely wrought and truly praiseworthy, but again her diction suffered in vowal identity during high passages, though it proved clear in the Haydn Mass. Ghitalla's trumpet work, which encountered one hitch near the beginning was surely articulated and well-disposed in balance for the remainder.

THE ORCHESTRA'S Saturday offering was Haydn's cheerful Symphony in D. No. 24, expressed in full contrasts, although I think Leinsdorf missed an opportunity for a grand "Mannhein roll" crescendo before the recapitulation in the first allegro. Doriot Anthony Dwyer's lyrically-sensitive flute solo dominated the adagio.

Friday night's guest conductor was David Zinman who led the Boston Symphony for the first time in symphonies by Boccherini and Haydn, concerti by Bach and Handel.

As one migh suspect from his position with the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, Zinman's style is one of energy and precision. He encouraged pinpoint accuracy and vigor in tutti passages with sharp, well-defined gestures, yet was no less attentive to lightly melodic strains.

THE ORCHESTRA was magnificently clean and full of agile spirit under his hand during Boccherini's pleasantry, the Sinfonia in A, Op. 1, No. 3 (Zinman called for eerie, on-the-bridge violin tones for certain thematic echoes — something new, not to say curious) and during Haydn's fully-developed (and witty!) Symphony No. 93 in D.

By some contrast, Joseph Silverstein's violin solo in Bach's E Major Concerto was rather softly spoken without sharp edges to the contrapuntal contour, though it is not the usual approach, Silverstein's slightly romantic delivery constituted a relief from the more frequent hard-line concept, and Zinman followed his lead adequately.

Hadel's concerto Grosso in A Minor, Op. 6 No. 4, followed the spirit of Boccherini and Haydn in energy and clear textures. In general, Zinman's interpretations were full of elements of youthful adventure — welcome indeed.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

JUL 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Paul Plishka, bass, will be featured as a soloist in Haydn's "Lord Nelson Mass" which will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood Choir, Saturday.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUL 13 1968 New England Newscli

SARAMAE ENDICH, soprano, will be a soloist with the Boston Symphony in Haydn's "Lord Nelson" Mass tonight at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 77,551

JUL 5 1968

Metropolitan Basso Tanglewood Soloist

Paul Plishka of Paterson to Sing With Boston Symphony on July 13

Paul Plishka of Paterson, Metropolitan Opera basso, will be a featured performer July 13 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

He will be bass soloist in Haydn's "Lord Nelson Mass." Other soloists include Saramae Endich, soprano; Beverly Wolff, mezzo-soprano and Enrico Di Giuseppe, tenor. The Tanglewood Choir also will perform, and Erich Leinsdorf will direct.

Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony, which will be heard in 24 regular programs during the 1968 Berkshire Festival.

Mr. Plishka was a mainstay of the Paterson Lyric Opera Theater and a protege of Armen Boyajian, its director. He joined the Metropolitan in the spring of 1967.

Prior to that he was the eastern regional finalist in the Metropolitan Opera National Council Auditions and a member of the Metropolitan Opera National Touring Company.

Paul Plishka

Winner of the $1.000 first prize in the Baltimore Civic Opera Association auditions, Mr. Plishka began his musical career while a student at Paterson Eastside High School.

30.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday July 14 at 2.30 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

TELEMANN Triple concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello

Largo
Allegro
Gratioso
Allegro

JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS flute
ALFRED KRIPS violin
MARTIN HOHERMAN cello
ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo

BACH Cantata no. 35 'Geist und Seele wird verwirret' for contralto and orchestra with organ obbligato

BEVERLY WOLFF contralto
CHARLES WILSON organ

JULES ESKIN cello continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo

ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo

intermission

HANDEL Suite from 'The Water Music'

Ouverture (Largo-allegro)
Adagio e staccato
(Allegro)-andante-(allegro)
Air
Menuet
Bourrée
Hornpipe
(Allegro)
(Allegro)
Alla hornpipe

CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo

The program notes and texts for this afternoon's concert begin on page 37

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

BEVERLY WOLFF, mezzo-soprano, will be the soloist for J. S. Bach's Cantata 35 at this afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Symphony's 'Water Music' Precise, Practical Version

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its baroque-classical weekend at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with the conductor's, Erich Leinsdorf's, arrangement of Handel's famed "Water Music."

Undemanding, Stylish

It was 36 minutes of diversionary, undemanding but stylish music taken from a work (if confusing historical records can be accepted) which originally (1717) consisted of about 20 movements and took an hour and a half to play.

The hot sun drove most of the lawn dwellers into the shade, but no one was seen to abandon the serenade, which was played with Boston's usual attention to baroque precision and orderliness.

The suit was made up of 10 movements chosen and arranged by Leinsdorf and, very likely in some cases, shortened by the elimination of repeats. It is a leaner, more satisfying and more historically (stylistically) accurate view of the music than the six-movement "Water Music" suite arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty about 1920 with which most listeners are familiar.

Cantata on Program

Harty's suite was played in Springfield in the Municipal Auditorium in 1963 by the Royal Philarmonic under the direction of Sir Malcolm Sargent.

Before intermission Sunday contralto Beverly Wolff was soloist for Bach's Cantata No. 35, a cantata written for the 12th Sunday after Trinity and notable for the unusually decorative obbligato part written for the organ.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor for the orchestra, contributed a valiant performance of a difficult assignment with a small, portative, track-action organ built last year in Boston by Fritz Noak and placed on the front of the stage beside the conductor, Leinsdorf.

Performance Rewarded

Miss Wolff has a voice of ringing authority and a technique to match, although Sunday it took on a touch of harshness in the lower register, and during the early measures of the cantata seemed to be bigger than life . . . as if it were boosted by electronic amplification.

She sang the pleading, supplicating cantata with an impressive depth of emotion and, after the aria, "Gott Hat Alles Wohl Gemacht!", was rewarded, with Wilson for his lively partnership on the organ, by an interruption of applause.

It was probably the most pleasing piece in the seven-part cantata, and easily deserved its special reward.

Concerto Opener

The program opened with Telemann's triple concerto for flute, violin and cello with the solo trio being played by James Pappoutsakis, flute; Alfred Krips, violin, and Martin Hoherman, cello; three worthy gentlemen who may be seen at every performance sitting beside the orchestra's first-chair players in their respective sections.

They are, in a manner of speaking, the first line of reserve soloists, and, if I may venture an analogy, may be compared to that little band of first line benchwarmers with the old Yankees who were of a quality interchangeable with the first team, and who were, with little question, the key to that team's long string of world championships.

They played the little, unpretentious concerto with first-team skill and beauty, and only the smallness of the whole work marred its perfection. It is of the intimate chamber style that is affectionately beautiful but somehow out of proportion in the 6000-seat shed.

The attendance was 6159 which, with Saturday morning's open rehearsal, brought the weekend's total to 20,177.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The 10.30 a. m. chamber-music concert in the Tanglewood theater was presented by the Violone Ensemble, a group of five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra string section which includes in its repertory seldom-heard pieces that call for use of the doublebass.

There were three on the program Sunday: a Rossini sonata (No. 6) for two violins, cello and doublebass; the Second Suite (1954) by Skorzeny for violin, viola and doublebass, and the Dvorak Quintet (Op. 77) for string quartet plus doublebass.

The Rossini was marred by a few slightly squeaky notes that came from the first violin, but it is a sweet and sunny work (at least at the beginning) and has an interesting balance of tones with the deep doublebass and low cello matched against two fiddles.

The Skorzeny piece, in a modern, mildly dissonant manner, uses the widely-spaced trio of violin, viola and doublebass by exploiting the available contrasts of wide intervals of pitch.

There is extensive use of other contrasts also, the music moving from dense chromaticism to thin, lean textures and from short, quixotic harmonic fragments to long, sinuous melodic phrases.

The Dvorak quintet offered the ensemble the greatest opportunity to display the scope of its expressive sensitivity, and it was well served.

There was plenty of the dynamic variance and coordination a listener can expect from a chamber group of high quality.

Perhaps not many are aware of it, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has 11 such chamber groups within it, each of which has its own repertory and concert schedule. Six of them are presenting the eight Sunday-morning chamber music concerts.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,682

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Baroque Weekend at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — A connoisseur program of Baroque music was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, to close the second weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival, yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood.

Yesterday's attendance of 6,1959 brought the weekend total to 20,177, including Saturday morning's open rehearsal.

The first two weekends of concerts were by a reduced orchestra of about 65 players. The rest have been in Boston for the Esplanade concerts with Arthur Fiedler.

Attendance for these opening six concerts and two open rehearsals for modified orchestra comes to 41,105. This is the largest figure in five years which may indicate an increasing interest in 17th and 18th century music.

Entire Symphony

The entire Boston Symphony will be at Tanglewood for the remaining six weeks of the festival, beginning Friday night.

Yesterday's pnogram opened with Telemann's Triple Concerto in A major, with soloists James Pappoutsakis, flute; Alfred Krips, violin; Martin Hoherman, cello; and Robert Levin, harpsichord.

Beverly Wolff was contralto soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 35, "Spirit and Soul are put in Turmoil." Charles Wilson assisted at the organ.

Concluding work was selections from Handel's "Water Music" Suite.

Leinsdorf's methodical, calculating style was compatible with this music.

The straight-ahead melodic lines and unyielding rhythms of the Telemann Concerto were made to follow precise courses. Some romantic influence was felt in the opening largo and grazioso, but it remained mind-stirring rather than emotional music.

Soloists Pappoutsakis, Krips and Hoherman played well individually, but didn't always coordinate as sturdily with the ensemble.

In the Bach Cantata, Wilson frequently selected high-range, reedy stops on the portable organ giving a shrill sound to the texture.

Miss Wolff sang the difficult contralto score with aplomb. Her voice was full-bodied, richly hued, and strong. She projected the two arias and recitatives with penetration and perception.

To these qualities she added coloratura facility to the aria, "God Has Created All Things."

The score itself was of major interest in Handel's "Water Music." It wasn't Sir Hamilton Harty's familiar and prettied-up arrangement, but much closer to the original.

Mishaps beset the performance, particularly in winds. The hot muggy afternoon was most unfavorable to the horns.

Best features were ungarnished harmonies, frequently interspersed solos, and an oboe solo of Leinsdorf's own creation, exceedingly well played by Ralph Gomberg.

30.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday July 14 at 2.30 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

TELEMANN Triple concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello

Largo
Allegro
Gratioso
Allegro

JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS flute
ALFRED KRIPS violin
MARTIN HOHERMAN cello
ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo

BACH Cantata no. 35 'Geist und Seele wird verwirret' for contralto and orchestra with organ obbligato

BEVERLY WOLFF contralto
CHARLES WILSON organ

JULES ESKIN cello continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo

ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo

intermission

HANDEL Suite from 'The Water Music'

Ouverture (Largo-allegro)
Adagio e staccato
(Allegro)-andante-(allegro)
Air
Menuet
Bourrée
Hornpipe
(Allegro)
(Allegro)
Alla hornpipe

CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo

The program notes and texts for this afternoon's concert begin on page 37

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

BEVERLY WOLFF, mezzo-soprano, will be the soloist for J. S. Bach's Cantata 35 at this afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Symphony's 'Water Music' Precise, Practical Version

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its baroque-classical weekend at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with the conductor's, Erich Leinsdorf's, arrangement of Handel's famed "Water Music."

Undemanding, Stylish

It was 36 minutes of diversionary, undemanding but stylish music taken from a work (if confusing historical records can be accepted) which originally (1717) consisted of about 20 movements and took an hour and a half to play.

The hot sun drove most of the lawn dwellers into the shade, but no one was seen to abandon the serenade, which was played with Boston's usual attention to baroque precision and orderliness.

The suit was made up of 10 movements chosen and arranged by Leinsdorf and, very likely in some cases, shortened by the elimination of repeats. It is a leaner, more satisfying and more historically (stylistically) accurate view of the music than the six-movement "Water Music" suite arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty about 1920 with which most listeners are familiar.

Cantata on Program

Harty's suite was played in Springfield in the Municipal Auditorium in 1963 by the Royal Philarmonic under the direction of Sir Malcolm Sargent.

Before intermission Sunday contralto Beverly Wolff was soloist for Bach's Cantata No. 35, a cantata written for the 12th Sunday after Trinity and notable for the unusually decorative obbligato part written for the organ.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor for the orchestra, contributed a valiant performance of a difficult assignment with a small, portative, track-action organ built last year in Boston by Fritz Noak and placed on the front of the stage beside the conductor, Leinsdorf.

Performance Rewarded

Miss Wolff has a voice of ringing authority and a technique to match, although Sunday it took on a touch of harshness in the lower register, and during the early measures of the cantata seemed to be bigger than life . . . as if it were boosted by electronic amplification.

She sang the pleading, supplicating cantata with an impressive depth of emotion and, after the aria, "Gott Hat Alles Wohl Gemacht!", was rewarded, with Wilson for his lively partnership on the organ, by an interruption of applause.

It was probably the most pleasing piece in the seven-part cantata, and easily deserved its special reward.

Concerto Opener

The program opened with Telemann's triple concerto for flute, violin and cello with the solo trio being played by James Pappoutsakis, flute; Alfred Krips, violin, and Martin Hoherman, cello; three worthy gentlemen who may be seen at every performance sitting beside the orchestra's first-chair players in their respective sections.

They are, in a manner of speaking, the first line of reserve soloists, and, if I may venture an analogy, may be compared to that little band of first line benchwarmers with the old Yankees who were of a quality interchangeable with the first team, and who were, with little question, the key to that team's long string of world championships.

They played the little, unpretentious concerto with first-team skill and beauty, and only the smallness of the whole work marred its perfection. It is of the intimate chamber style that is affectionately beautiful but somehow out of proportion in the 6000-seat shed.

The attendance was 6159, which, with Saturday morning's open rehearsal, brought the weekend's total to 20,177.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The 10.30 a. m. chamber-music concert in the Tanglewood theater was presented by the Violone Ensemble, a group of five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra string section which includes in its repertory seldom-heard pieces that call for use of the doublebass.

There were three on the program Sunday: a Rossini sonata (No. 6) for two violins, cello and doublebass; the Second Suite (1954) by Skorzeny for violin, viola and doublebass, and the Dvorak Quintet (Op. 77) for string quartet plus doublebass.

The Rossini was marred by a few slightly squeaky notes that came from the first violin, but it is a sweet and sunny work (at least at the beginning) and has an interesting balance of tones with the deep doublebass and low cello matched against two fiddles.

The Skorzeny piece, in a modern, mildly dissonant manner, uses the widely-spaced trio of violin, viola and doublebass by exploiting the available contrasts of wide intervals of pitch.

There is extensive use of other contrasts also, the music moving from dense chromaticism to thin, lean textures and from short, quixotic harmonic fragments to long, sinuous melodic phrases.

The Dvorak quintet offered the ensemble the greatest opportunity to display the scope of its expressive sensitivity, and it was well served.

There was plenty of the dynamic variance and coordination a listener can expect from a chamber group of high quality.

Perhaps not many are aware of it, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra has 11 such chamber groups within it, each of which has its own repertory and concert schedule. Six of them are presenting the eight Sunday-morning chamber music concerts.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,682

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Baroque Weekend at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — A connoisseur program of Baroque music was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, to close the second weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival, yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood.

Yesterday's attendance of 6,159 brought the weekend total to 20,177, including Saturday morning's open rehearsal.

The first two weekends of concerts were by a reduced orchestra of about 65 players. The rest have been in Boston for the Esplanade concerts with Arthur Fiedler.

Attendance for these opening six concerts and two open rehearsals for modified orchestra comes to 41,105. This is the largest figure in five years which may indicate an increasing interest in 17th and 18th century music.

Entire Symphony

The entire Boston Symphony will be at Tanglewood for the remaining six weeks of the festival, beginning Friday night.

Yesterday's pnogram opened with Telemann's Triple Concerto in A major, with soloists James Pappoutsakis, flute; Alfred Krips, violin; Martin Hoherman, cello; and Robert Levin, harpsichord.

Beverly Wolff was contralto soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 35, "Spirit and Soul are put in Turmoil." Charles Wilson assisted at the organ.

Concluding work was selections from Handel's "Water Music" Suite.

Leinsdorf's methodical, calculating style was compatible with this music.

The straight-ahead melodic lines and unyielding rhythms of the Telemann Concerto were made to follow precise courses. Some romantic influence was felt in the opening largo and grazioso, but it remained mind-stirring rather than emotional music.

Soloists Pappoutsakis, Krips and Hoherman played well individually, but didn't always coordinate as sturdily with the ensemble.

In the Bach Cantata, Wilson frequently selected high-range, reedy stops on the portable organ giving a shrill sound to the texture.

Miss Wolff sang the difficult contralto score with aplomb. Her voice was full-bodied, richly hued, and strong. She projected the two arias and recitatives with penetration and perception.

To these qualities she added coloratura facility to the aria, "God Has Created All Things."

The score itself was of major interest in Handel's "Water Music." It wasn't Sir Hamilton Harty's familiar and prettied-up arrangement, but much closer to the original.

Mishaps beset the performance, particularly in winds. The hot muggy afternoon was most unfavorable to the horns.

Best features were ungarnished harmonies, frequently interspersed solos, and an oboe solo of Leinsdorf's own creation, exceedingly well played by Ralph Gomberg.

Schenectady Gazette
E, MONDAY, JULY 15, 1968

Tanglewood Continues Survey Of Baroque, Classical Music

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

This weekend, Tanglewood continued its survey of music for baroque and classical orchestras. Spaced over the three-day period were compositions by Bach, Boccherini, Haydel and Telemann. I chose to attend the Friday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, conducted respectively by the visiting David Zinman and the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

The Friday offering began at 7, with the Weekend Prelude, Inaugurated (I think) two years ago, the Weekend Prelude gives an early concertgoer the opportunity to hear solo or chamber music before the feature event gets under way. This weekend Brian Runnett was organ solist in excerpts from Part Three of Bach's "Clavier-Ubung," or keyboard exercises. This is the only part of four devoted to the organ and the public knows only the E-flat Prelude and Fugue ("Saint Anne") that opens and closes Part Three. (Confidentially, I too know only the "St. Anne" business; the 21 chorale-prelude between these two terminals are largely unknown territory to me.)

Runnett selected six of the 21 and seemed to do quite well by the music, capturing Bach' spirit rather completely. I was particularly impressed by the three different settings of the Kyrie, with the Cantus Firmus in soprano, tenor, and bass positions. The "St. Anne" was given a hefty reading, somewhat slower than I've heard, but not less monumental.

At nine Friday night, David Zinman led a superb concert featuring Boccherini's A major Sinfonia, op. 1 no. 3; Bach's E major Violin Concerto; Handel's Concerto Grosso in A minor, op. 6 no. 4; and Hayden's 93rd Symphony.

The Boccherini was a premiere performance by the orchestra and a first hearing for this reviewer. What a delightful piece it is! The bright first movement has a swinging rhythmic snap and offers an unusual use of the violins in that they are given a passage to play "on the bridge."

I was always under the impression that Beethoven was the first to employ this device (in the C-sharp Minor quartet, op. 131; written 1826), but it appears that Boccherini antedated him by more than 60 years. As for the rest of the Bocchreini work, the andante, muted throughout, is characterized by a simple tune and the final movement in a quick 6-8 allegro that brings the work to a happy close.

* * *

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist in Bach's E major Violin Concreto. The performance was splendid, discounting some ill-tuning of the solo instrument at the beginning. Since James Buswell suffered the same fate last weekend, I wonder if the problem doesn't originate when tuning is effected in a room warmer than the outdoor stage . . . because if it is, the cooler outdoor temperature would cause contraction in the violin strings and result in a sharpness of pitch, especially in the tighter A and E strings.

All the same, Silverstein's reading was excellent. He sculpted the outer movements into veritable cathedrals and gave to the adagio a grace and fluency other soloists seem unable to capture.

No less successful was conductor Zinman, who helped Silverstein by providing a masterful accompaniment. Zinman seems especially at home in this style of music, and his intelligent use of the continuo and other characteristic baroque practices makes him the finest baroque conductor I've yet heard. I would really love to hear him conduct some other music and greatly envy Philadelphia audiences who got to hear him for seven weeks last season.

After intermission came the Handel Concerto Grosso. Here, again, Zinman was ideal, giving the work a poised reading notable as much for its technical command as for its stylistic insight.

But the real climax of the evening came with Haydn's Symphony No. 93. Nestled between the "Oxford" and "Surprise" symphonies, it combines classic tastes with sardonic humor and is certainly one of the funniest works the composer ever wrote. The conductor gave what can only be described as a definitive performance.

* * *

Not a single part went unheard, the pacing was excellent throughout and one was always deeply aware of the logic and structure behind every note. Listening to the preparation to that coarse, rude bassoon noise in the Largo was almost as much fun as the vulgar sound itself. And in the Minuet those ridiculous fanfares (announcing nothing at all) were neither blatantly overdone nor cooly understated; everything was thought out carefully beforehand and reflected an artistry of no mean proportion. Even Sir Thomas Beecham, who had a special way with this kind of music, would be hard-pressed to deliver a performance like this. It was tops and capped a most eventful evening.

A different kind of success went to Leinsdorf on Sunday afternoon. Three works were scheduled, a Telemann concerto, a Bach Cantata, and an arrangement by Leinsdorf of Handel's "Water Music."

Things got off to a dull start with the Telemann Triple Concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello. For me, Telemann's music is unimpressive and flavorless and I prefer not to comment upon it at length here. Solo contributions were pretty good: James Pappoutsakis played the flute very well, Alfred Krips did okay for the most part with the violin, and Martin Hohermann was a fine cellist.

* * *

Next came Bach's Cantata No. 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," scored for orchestra, contralto solo, and organ. Beverly Wolff was a paragon of achievement in the vocal part. Her diction was flawless and her voice a delight. She has a bigger sound than most altos, and for a minute there, I thought she could drown the orchestra if she wanted to. She didn't, of course, being more of an artist than a showoff. Charles Wilson had some trouble with the organ part, but it somehow came through intact. Leinsdorf was unusually attentive during the performance.

Three Tanglewood Concerts On Radio

Three full length Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be broadcast live by WGBH - FM next week, direct from the orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass.

On Sunday, July 14, at 2:30 pm. Erich Leinsdorf conducts Telemann's Concerto in A Major for flute, violin and cello, Cantata No. 35 by Bach and the suite from Handel's "Water Music".

The following Friday, July 19, at 9 pm. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski is guest conductor in a program that features Le Corsaire overture by Berlioz, Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski and Symphony No. 7 by Dvorak.

On Saturday, July 20, at 8 pm. Erich Leinsdorf directs Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman", Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok, and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist.

JOURNAL & PRESS
SOMERVILLE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,600

JUL 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Draws 20,177 on Weekend; 3,985 Over 1967

Tanglewood drew an audience of 20,177 over the weekend, which was 3,985 more than last year's 16,192, according to the Boston Symphony press office.

The Friday night concert drew 4,852; Saturday morning rehearsal, 2,433, Saturday night, 6,733 and Sunday afternoon, 6,159.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Vocal Works Highlight Tanglewood Weekend

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE LAST two concerts of the second weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was a holiday for vocal enthusiasts. Cantatas of Bach and the Haydn Mass in D Minor, "The Nelson," were buttressed by symphonies and suites of Haydn, Telemann and Handel in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra was led by its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

YESTERDAY AFTERNOON the Cantata No. 35, "Spirit and Soul Are Perplexed," taking its title from the first words of the opening aria, is for contralto with orchestra and organ obbligato. Soloist Beverly Wolff fulfilled the many demands Bach imposes with ease and delightful technical execution. Her first aria was sung with the special compassion which, for me, a genuine contralto can induce.

The second aria, "God has created all things well," is a coloratura example to match the opportunities soprano Saramae Endich conquered so well on the preceding evening in another Bach cantata, "Praise God in all lands," and which, in effect, Beverly Sills had encountered in the Mozart "Exultate" the previous weekend.

* * *

MISS WOLFF benefited by a little better accommodation from the orchestra than Miss Endich had, for she had to contend with musical currents which didn't always flow in the same direction she evidently preferred to go. Miss Wolff's second aria, "Would that I might live with God," was also florid in nature and has its own special intricacies when Bach's orchestra appears to be not totally concerned with the vocalist.

Whitestone

Erich Leinsdorf congratulates Beverly Wolff, contralto, on Sunday afternoon, as Charles Wilson, who played organ obbligato in the Bach 35th Cantata, looks on.

A Telemann concerto, in A Major, for flute, violin and cello was played with James Pappoutsakis, Alfred Krips and Martin Hoherman, respectively, as the principals. This is a work of small dimensions and probably better suited to a smaller hall. Leinsdorf discreetly gave the soloists a most prudent accompaniment and allowed the artists, each a principal of his section, to reveal not so much individual competencies but the strength and solidity of the texture of the whole orchestra. The tonal adjustment, on occasion, between the flute and the violin was conspicuously equated and the cello in different circumstances was tonally remarkably well-poised. The afternoon closed with a 10-movement suite from Handel's "The Water Music."

* * *

SATURDAY EVENING'S opening piece, the Haydn Symphony No. 24 in D Major, includes an adagio which is really a flute solo. Doriot Dwyer distinguished herself with tonal quality and linear inflection. Haydn gets little and inadequate notice on contemporary programs and it was thus a pleasure to hear this unfamiliar symphony and, as the major part of the evening, the same composer's impressive Mass in D Minor "The Nelson."

Basso Paul Plishka

The naming of Haydn's Mass was another example of those ex post facto acquisitions which have become such permanent barnacles on great music. Evidently the first performance took place Sept. 15, 1798, the day on which news of Nelson's victory at sea before Aboukir, on Aug. 1, reached Vienna. Haydn's title had been "Mass in times of trouble" but the synchronization was evidently too pat for those concerned to neglect.

There are two facts, rather irrelevant here, yet deserving to be noted: one, the time it took for news of an event at the Rosetta mouth of the Nile to reach Vienna, and two, the revival of the name of Aboukir, which, to anyone who knows World War I history, will recall the tremendous blow the British suffered when in the early days of that war three of their mightiest battleships, the Hogue, Aboukir and Cressy, were sunk at practically one blow by German submarines.

* * *

IN THE Mass Miss Endich and Miss Wolff were two of the soloists, Enrico Di Giuseppe, was the tenor, Paul Plishka, the bass. The Tanglewood choir of some 40 voices, Charles Wilson, director, was the exceptionally alacritous and sonorous chorus to whom the inspiring Credo and Sanctus fell. The work is replete with stimulating musical glories and Leinsdorf held his forces with a tight rein and a penetrating comprehension.

The trumpet solos of Armando Ghitalla in the Bach cantata "Jauchtet Gott" were outstanding in an evening when all artists reached lofty levels of performance.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Schenectady Gazette
E, MONDAY, JULY 15, 1968

Tanglewood Continues Survey Of Baroque, Classical Music

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

This weekend, Tanglewood continued its survey of music for baroque and classical orchestras. Spaced over the three-day period were compositions by Bach, Boccherini, Haydel and Telemann. I chose to attend the Friday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, conducted respectively by the visiting David Zinman and the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

The Friday offering began at 7, with the Weekend Prelude, Inaugurated (I think) two years ago, the Weekend Prelude gives an early concertgoer the opportunity to hear solo or chamber music before the feature event gets under way. This weekend Brian Runnett was organ solist in excerpts from Part Three of Bach's "Clavier-Ubung," or keyboard exercises. This is the only part of four devoted to the organ and the public knows only the E-flat Prelude and Fugue ("Saint Anne") that opens and closes Part Three. (Confidentially, I too know only the "St. Anne" business; the 21 chorale-prelude between these two terminals are largely unknown territory to me.)

Runnett selected six of the 21 and seemed to do quite well by the music, capturing Bach' spirit rather completely. I was particularly impressed by the three different settings of the Kyrie, with the Cantus Firmus in soprano, tenor, and bass positions. The "St. Anne" was given a hefty reading, somewhat slower than I've heard, but not less monumental.

At nine Friday night, David Zinman led a superb concert featuring Boccherini's A major Sinfonia, op. 1 no. 3; Bach's E major Violin Concerto; Handel's Concerto Grosso in A minor, op. 6 no. 4; and Hayden's 93rd Symphony.

The Boccherini was a premiere performance by the orchestra and a first hearing for this reviewer. What a delightful piece it is! The bright first movement has a swinging rhythmic snap and offers an unusual use of the violins in that they are given a passage to play "on the bridge."

I was always under the impression that Beethoven was the first to employ this device (in the C-sharp Minor quartet, op. 131; written 1826), but it appears that Boccherini antedated him by more than 60 years. As for the rest of the Bocchreini work, the andante, muted throughout, is characterized by a simple tune and the final movement in a quick 6-8 allegro that brings the work to a happy close.

* * *

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist in Bach's E major Violin Concreto. The performance was splendid, discounting some ill-tuning of the solo instrument at the beginning. Since James Buswell suffered the same fate last weekend, I wonder if the problem doesn't originate when tuning is effected in a room warmer than the outdoor stage . . . because if it is, the cooler outdoor temperature would cause contraction in the violin strings and result in a sharpness of pitch, especially in the tighter A and E strings.

All the same, Silverstein's reading was excellent. He sculpted the outer movements into veritable cathedrals and gave to the adagio a grace and fluency other soloists seem unable to capture.

No less successful was conductor Zinman, who helped Silverstein by providing a masterful accompaniment. Zinman seems especially at home in this style of music, and his intelligent use of the continuo and other characteristic baroque practices makes him the finest baroque conductor I've yet heard. I would really love to hear him conduct some other music and greatly envy Philadelphia audiences who got to hear him for seven weeks last season.

After intermission came the Handel Concerto Grosso. Here, again, Zinman was ideal, giving the work a poised reading notable as much for its technical command as for its stylistic insight.

But the real climax of the evening came with Haydn's Symphony No. 93. Nestled between the "Oxford" and "Surprise" symphonies, it combines classic tastes with sardonic humor and is certainly one of the funniest works the composer ever wrote. The conductor gave what can only be described as a definitive performance.

* * *

Not a single part went unheard, the pacing was excellent throughout and one was always deeply aware of the logic and structure behind every note. Listening to the preparation to that coarse, rude bassoon noise in the Largo was almost as much fun as the vulgar sound itself. And in the Minuet those ridiculous fanfares (announcing nothing at all) were neither blatantly overdone nor cooly understated; everything was thought out carefully beforehand and reflected an artistry of no mean proportion. Even Sir Thomas Beecham, who had a special way with this kind of music, would be hard-pressed to deliver a performance like this. It was tops and capped a most eventful evening.

A different kind of success went to Leinsdorf on Sunday afternoon. Three works were scheduled, a Telemann concerto, a Bach Cantata, and an arrangement by Leinsdorf of Handel's "Water Music."

Things got off to a dull start with the Telemann Triple Concerto in A major for flute, violin and cello. For me, Telemann's music is unimpressive and flavorless and I prefer not to comment upon it at length here. Solo contributions were pretty good: James Pappoutsakis played the flute very well, Alfred Krips did okay for the most part with the violin, and Martin Hohermann was a fine cellist.

* * *

Next came Bach's Cantata No. 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," scored for orchestra, contralto solo, and organ. Beverly Wolff was a paragon of achievement in the vocal part. Her diction was flawless and her voice a delight. She has a bigger sound than most altos, and for a minute there, I thought she could drown the orchestra if she wanted to. She didn't, of course, being more of an artist than a showoff. Charles Wilson had some trouble with the organ part, but it somehow came through intact. Leinsdorf was unusually attentive during the performance.

Three Tanglewood Concerts On Radio

Three full length Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be broadcast live by WGBH - FM next week, direct from the orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass.

On Sunday, July 14, at 2:30 pm. Erich Leinsdorf conducts Telemann's Concerto in A Major for flute, violin and cello, Cantata No. 35 by Bach and the suite from Handel's "Water Music".

The following Friday, July 19, at 9 pm. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski is guest conductor in a program that features Le Corsaire overture by Berlioz, Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski and Symphony No. 7 by Dvorak.

On Saturday, July 20, at 8 pm. Erich Leinsdorf directs Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman", Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok, and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist.

JOURNAL & PRESS
SOMERVILLE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,600

JUL 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Vocal Works Highlight Tanglewood Weekend

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE LAST two concerts of the second weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was a holiday for vocal enthusiasts. Cantatas of Bach and the Haydn Mass in D Minor, "The Nelson," were buttressed by symphonies and suites of Haydn, Telemann and Handel in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra was led by its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf.

* * *

YESTERDAY AFTERNOON the Cantata No. 35, "Spirit and Soul Are Perplexed," taking its title from the first words of the opening aria, is for contralto with orchestra and organ obbligato. Soloist Beverly Wolff fulfilled the many demands Bach imposes with ease and delightful technical execution. Her first aria was sung with the special compassion which, for me, a genuine contralto can induce.

The second aria, "God has created all things well," is a coloratura example to match the opportunities soprano Saramae Endich conquered so well on the preceding evening in another Bach cantata, "Praise God in all lands," and which, in effect, Beverly Sills had encountered in the Mozart "Exultate" the previous weekend.

* * *

MISS WOLFF benefited by a little better accommodation from the orchestra than Miss Endich had, for she had to contend with musical currents which didn't always flow in the same direction she evidently preferred to go. Miss Wolff's second aria, "Would that I might live with God," was also florid in nature and has its own special intricacies when Bach's orchestra appears to be not totally concerned with the vocalist.

Whitestone

Erich Leinsdorf congratulates Beverly Wolff, contralto, on Sunday afternoon, as Charles Wilson, who played organ obbligato in the Bach 35th Cantata, looks on.

A Telemann concerto, in A Major, for flute, violin and cello was played with James Pappoutsakis, Alfred Krips and Martin Hoherman, respectively, as the principals. This is a work of small dimensions and probably better suited to a smaller hall. Leinsdorf discreetly gave the soloists a most prudent accompaniment and allowed the artists, each a principal of his section, to reveal not so much individual competencies but the strength and solidity of the texture of the whole orchestra. The tonal adjustment, on occasion, between the flute and the violin was conspicuously equated and the cello in different circumstances was tonally remarkably well-poised. The afternoon closed with a 10-movement suite from Handel's "The Water Music."

* * *

SATURDAY EVENING'S opening piece, the Haydn Symphony No. 24 in D Major, includes an adagio which is really a flute solo. Doriot Dwyer distinguished herself with tonal quality and linear inflection. Haydn gets little and inadequate notice on contemporary programs and it was thus a pleasure to hear this unfamiliar symphony and, as the major part of the evening, the same composer's impressive Mass in D Minor "The Nelson."

Basso Paul Plishka

The naming of Haydn's Mass was another example of those ex post facto acquisitions which have become such permanent barnacles on great music. Evidently the first performance took place Sept. 15, 1798, the day on which news of Nelson's victory at sea before Aboukir, on Aug. 1, reached Vienna. Haydn's title had been "Mass in times of trouble" but the synchronization was evidently too pat for those concerned to neglect.

There are two facts, rather irrelevant here, yet deserving to be noted: one, the time it took for news of an event at the Rosetta mouth of the Nile to reach Vienna, and two, the revival of the name of Aboukir, which, to anyone who knows World War I history, will recall the tremendous blow the British suffered when in the early days of that war three of their mightiest battleships, the Hogue, Aboukir and Cressy, were sunk at practically one blow by German submarines.

* * *

IN THE Mass Miss Endich and Miss Wolff were two of the soloists. Enrico Di Giuseppe, was the tenor, Paul Plishka, the bass. The Tanglewood choir of some 40 voices, Charles Wilson, director, was the exceptionally alacritous and sonorous chorus to whom the inspiring Credo and Sanctus fell. The work is replete with stimulating musical glories and Leinsdorf held his forces with a tight rein and a penetrating comprehension.

The trumpet solos of Armando Ghitalla in the Bach cantata "Jauchtet Gott" were outstanding in an evening when all artists reached lofty levels of performance.

Tanglewood Draws 20,177 on Weekend; 3,985 Over 1967

Tanglewood drew an audience of 20,177 over the weekend, which was 3,985 more than last year's 16,192, according to the Boston Symphony press office.

The Friday night concert drew 4,852; Saturday morning rehearsal, 2,433, Saturday night, 6,733 and Sunday afternoon, 6,159.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 16 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

32.

At Tanglewood

Haydn "Nelson" Festival Highpoint

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

On Friday night, July 12, David Zinman, a New Yorker 32 years of age, who studied conducting at the Music Center and with Monteux and now heads the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, pranced on the podium. Since Bernstein violated the nice reserve of an older generation by dancing directions to the orchestra, the edges of the podium are the only limits to young conductors. But the surprising fact, with a fine musician like Zinman, is that he means it. His rapport with the chamber-size Boston was delicate and complete — as if to say, "I'm not coldly controlling you (like Toscanini or Szell) but acting with you, my abstract dance at the center of your complex of concrete sounds-in-motion." It was obvious that the men felt called on for their finest musicianship and enjoyed it right out into the responding audience.

Boccherini's Sinfonia in A could be early Haydn except for the unassuming lilt of its Italian tunes. (The Austrians did nice imitations of Italian lyricism, even Beethoven, but with some stiffening of the joints.) Deft spicattos, every twitch of accent felt, incisive syncopation, a string trio suddenly lightening the mass (like the concertine in a Baroque concerto). Zinman led the dance like some musical Byron, but without a club foot.

The J. S. Bach "Violin concerto in E" is the very best Bach and was played with scrupulous regard for the affective style of the time. In the Adagio the 'cellos and basses sang their opening motif, dominating the harmony from underneath until the solo violin slipped in above and moved freely against the deep pulse. Joseph Silverstein and the orchestra collaborated sympathetically. I enjoyed the Concertmaster's playing more than I usually do when he is buttering up the Romantics. The conductor, the orchestra, Bach and the occasion seemed to get under his skin.

Handel's "Concerto Grosso in A minor (opus 6 no. 4) is expressive Baroque, appropriately played for all its direct sentiment and drama, written, as it was, as entr'acte music for opera or oratorio. Such music is the more exciting and moving for being super-personal — not I, but humanity, dancing and dying.

Haydn (Symphony 93 in D), like Beethoven, dared to experiment more freely as he aged, shedding the intense but narrow world of the court at Esterhaza and crossing the channel (as Handel had done earlier) to compose larger pieces for a wider public. Mr. Burk's program notes for this symphony follow the party line in speaking of its as prophecy "of the Romantic Age to come." Damn it all, this is the Romantic Age, par excellence. The experiments with form, upsetting symmetry for surprise, mixing comedy and pathos in the shift of a line, discovering the uncommon sense of the subconscious, etc., it's all here in this symphony out of Haydn's late maturity. The wanderings and searchings of development are here before Beethoven made larger capital out of the process. Every intelligent conductor and instrumentalist knows this radical Haydn and Friday's performance set it out for all like a dialogue of differing to feel. The contrasting themes, like a dialogue of differing actors, strong chordal sequences against lightly running counterpoint, startling crescendos and sudden pianissimos, a solo oboe singing out of the mass (largo), a bassoon capping a humorous imitation of instruments with a low fart (all the better this time for being out of tune).

The inflowing ground mist made much tuning necessary all through the concert, but with no spoiling of the music-making mood and the instinctive response of the indoor-outdoor thousands. Some special ways of living became musically manifest that we hadn't known we knew and a kind of communal love.

On Saturday Mr. Leinsdorf began with restraint, but there was plenty of brio in the orchestra. The Esterhaza Court must have puffed with pride at the novelties of their tame composer. Symphony 24 in D, an opening serenade of an Allegro begins with lovely horns (no grand Introduction), continues with a flute solo Adagio warmly and effortlessly blown by Doriot Dwyer complete with a cadenza, as if for the moment we had a concerto. A Menuet, downright rusticity (Haydn never forgot the peasant music of his childhood) — now beyond the castle walls. Indeed, the aristocrats had a taste for the picturesque ways of their opposites, but artful with contrast. A Finale of sheer good spirits.

Bach's Cantata 51 featured a small valved trumpet from the rear, Jules Eskin's fine-toned cello continuo on the right, Silverstein's violin obbligatto (in the developed chorale), Portnoi's bass seconding the 'cello, Saramae Endich's soprano in the middle and Leinsdorf facing these forces, desperately trying to keep order (No rehearsal time?). In the first place it's cheap Bach, florid as all hell, with cascades of reiterative figuration he must have spewed out of the computer part of his mind. And then the famous soprano could not match the tempo, so that her lagging confused the obvious rhythms and even slipped a notch. Silverstein, Eskin and Leinsdorf agreed perfectly, but the conductor kept grabbing at violin and 'cello, who could not have been more on the beat, so they played louder. An organ and harpsichord were lost somewhere in the contest. Meanwhile the soprano seemed to be doing a lackadaisical Bing Crosby and when a high note cropped up, hit it hard regardless of its secondary importance in the phrase. There was bravo applause (for survival?). I hope Miss Endich, out in the wings, could relax in laughter. What a rat race!

The Endich voice is rich with color and with the light and shade of the chiaroscuro painters. She rarely hits a note on the head — always a slight give rather than anticipation of tone to project it on the beat (like the anticipatory movement of a dancer's leg.) Not so good for Bach — at least, for this flashy rabble-rousing, celebration of Praise.

But with Haydn's "Nelson" Mass in D minor all trouble vanished from Tanglewood. (Was it provision that made so much of Haydn's language so assertively glorious?) Miss Endich lined up behind the orchestra with Beverly Wolff, a musically strong contralto, Enrice di Giuseppe, tenor, not often heard separately, but a ringing robusto; Paul Plishka, a bearded bass with an unhairy voice of woody baritone-bass quality and power and Donna Precht, a supporting soprano. With the Tanglewood Choir behind and the BSO before, the valiant line led the singing of this great sublimated Latin drama. There is heart-felt music in Qui Tollis, in Et Incarnatus, in Agnus Dei, but the general mood is Gloria. Even "Give us peace" winds up with vivace celebration.

The Choir, a group of young professionals trained by Charles Wilson, commands a unified ringing tone that backed the soloists with no disparity of quality or appropriate power. There is often a lag of style in sacred music because of the reverence for religious tradition and there is much Baroque solidity in Haydn's mass, plus his own way of 'personalizing' attitudes and feelings. Miss Endich, bless her, moved with expressive grace, topping the fine cast, with only an occasional shadow of delay. Mr. Leinsdorf directed and incited his operatic forces with masterly control. A high point for this Festival.

Coda: I hate controversy but must try to set a new current moving in the critical whirlpool of Boston music. I cannot understand what the music critics of the Boston Globe use for ears — perhaps some lobe of the brain that secretes musicology but has so lost its conduit to sense and sensitivity, that S & S (and indeed, ordinary humanity) have withered away — or perhaps have never developed. That Leinsdorf used an improved (in Haydn's time) score which substituted woodwinds for organ is clearly a sign of good judgment. Michael Steinberg, himself, derogated the organ as a poor excuse for an instrument only weeks ago. Berlioz might use organ as religious symbolism, but not Haydn. Again, the Bach cantata did not suffer one iota from the trumpeter's failure to ornament cadences which would have made a fussy cantata still fussier, but, as I have said, from the soprano's inability to sing up to the set tempo, contradicting the expert musicianship of Silverstein and Eskin and even Leinsdorf's frantic beat.

As for Zinman's conducting, purist Gelles had better close his eyes and take out the wax. The orchestra recognized no "frenzy," but took great pains to phrase in a way I have not heard since Sir Thomas Beecham's day; obviously, being seasoned chamber musicians, agreeing with Zinman's concern. The Globe's bile-masters might well take a correspondence course with Alfred Frankenstein, though perhaps Mr. F will be too occupied with his own search for understanding each new event, as he has for many years in San Francisco. New York and Boston have no critics with ears, but a substitute of adolescent arrogance. Buttressed by a little learning, their response to the factual immediacy of the whole gestalten of human musical speech and occasion seems atrophied at the source. Pax vibiscum.

* * *

Erratum: The gloomy gabled mansion I described last week, giving the impression that it was Hawthorn's, was actually built by the tycoon who developed the estate in the 1860's. Hawthorn's own house, now living only in replica, was a modestly fine sample of an older New England.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 28,000

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Live From Tanglewood

8 A 7/11

Three full length Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be broadcast live by WGBH-FM this week, direct from the Orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass.

On Sunday, July 14 at 2:30 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts Telemann's Concerto in A Major for flute, violin and cello; Cantata No. 35 by Bach and the suite from Handel's "Water Music."

The following Friday, July 19 at 9 p.m. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski is guest conductor in a program that features Le Corsaire overture by Berlioz, Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski and Symphony No. 7 by Dvorak. On Saturday, July 20 at 8 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf directs Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman," Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Van Cliburn as soloist.

20,177 Attend Weekend's Concerts At Tanglewood

A combined audience of 20,177 attended the last weekend's Baroque concerts at Tanglewood. David Zinman conducted Friday evening's concert in music by Boccherini, Sinfonia in A major, op. 1 no. 3 which was a first performance by the Boston Symphony, followed by Bach's Concerto for violin in E major with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. He is the eminent concert master of the Boston Symphony and his rendition was lyrical, sensitive and flawless.

After intermission the orchestra performed Handel's Concerto Gross in A major op. 6 no. 4 and Haydn's Symphony No 93 in D major, featuring Robert Eskin, Harpsichord continuo, Jules Eskin, cello continuo and Henry Portnoi, double bass continuo, all first chair musicians with the Boston Orchestra.

Saturday evening was the highlight of the weekend's programs with the Mass in D Minor "The Nelson" Mass by Haydn, considered one of his single great works. Saramae Endich, soprano; Beverly Wolff contralto; Enrico DeGiuseppe, tenor; Paul Plishka, bass and Donna Precht, soprano, gave singularly excellent and sensitivte readings of the solo parts, accompanied by the Tanglewood Choir. Under the direction of Charles Wilson and John Oliver the choir sang with great professional beauty, its voices strident and dramatic, as the background for the accomplished soloists. The concert was conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

The Nelson Mass was greeted with tremedous enthusiasm by the audience. This is a great work and deserved the thunderous applause. It was an exhilarating performance.

The first half of the program featured Haydn's Symphony No. 24 in D minor and Bach's Cantata No. 51 "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen." Saramae Endich was the soprano soloist accompanied by Armando Chitalla, trumpet soloist. Charles Wilson played the organ continuo, Robert Levin performed the harpsichord continuo Jules Eskin rendered the cello continuo and Henry Portnoi the double bass continuo. The performance was vigorous, yet sensitive and moving.

Sunday afternoon's concert featured music by Telemann, Bach and finished the last half with Suite from "The Water Music" by Handel, always a great favorite. The concert was delightful and in keeping with the limited orchestra, ending the intimate Baroque music for the first two weekends.

Next weekend is the start of the big concerts with full orchestra and will feature guest Conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski on Friday evening performing Berlioz' Le Corsaire Overture, Lutoslowki's Concerto for Orchestra and Dvorak's Sumphony No. 7 in D. minor at 9:00 p.m. The Prelude Concert at 7 on Friday will feature Zara Nelsova and Gran Johannesen.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is taking a departure from its usual past programming by deleting the small chamber concerts on Tuesday evenings, featuring chamber concerts on Sundays at 10:30 a.m. with both faculty and students from the Berkshire Music Center. These chamber concerts will be performed in the theater, and will be free to all "friends" of the Symphony. There will also be Chamber Music Concerts performed by the Berkshire Music Cener students on Tuesday evenings and next Saturday at 2:30 p.m. a vocal concert is scheduled in the theater.

The newest departure in programing is the exciting "Contemporary Trends" performances being sponsored by the Berkshire Festival.

On July 24, Wednesday at 8 p.m. music from India will be heard with Ravi Shankar, sitar and Ali Akbar Khan, sarod with many other musicians from ing.

Wednesday, July 31 will feature Rock music with "The Association." These three concerts are an attempt to appeal to the swining younger generation and recognizing the direction and trend in contemporary music today and how it communicates to young people.

This departure in Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival of Music should prove most exciting and attractive to contemporary tastes. Concerts start at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

Van Cliburn will make his annual trek up to Tanglewood on Saturday evening, in the performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No -, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

SSM

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

JUL 19 1968

New England Newsclip

32.

At Tanglewood

Haydn "Nelson" Festival Highpoint

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

On Friday night, July 12, David Zinman, a New Yorker 32 years of age, who studied conducting at the Music Center and with Monteux and now heads the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, pranced on the podium. Since Bernstein violated the nice reserve of an older generation by dancing directions to the orchestra, the edges of the podium are the only limits to young conductors. But the surprising fact, with a fine musician like Zinman, is that he means it. His rapport with the chamber-size Boston was delicate and complete — as if to say, "I'm not coldly controlling you (like Toscanini or Szell) but acting with you, my abstract dance at the center of your complex of concrete sounds-in-motion." It was obvious that the men felt called on for their finest musicianship and enjoyed it right out into the responding audience.

Boccherini's Sinfonia in A could be early Haydn except for the unassuming lilt of its Italian tunes. (The Austrians did nice imitations of Italian lyricism, even Beethoven, but with some stiffening of the joints.) Deft spicattos, every twitch of accent felt, incisive syncopation, a string trio suddenly lightening the mass (like the concertine in a Baroque concerto). Zinman led the dance like some musical Byron, but without a club foot.

The J. S. Bach "Violin concerto in E" is the very best Bach and was played with scrupulous regard for the affective style of the time. In the Adagio the 'cellos and basses sang their opening motif, dominating the harmony from underneath until the solo violin slipped in above and moved freely against the deep pulse. Joseph Silverstein and the orchestra collaborated sympathetically. I enjoyed the Concertmaster's playing more than I usually do when he is buttering up the Romantics. The conductor, the orchestra, Bach and the occasion seemed to get under his skin.

Handel's "Concerto Grosso in A minor (opus 6 no. 4) is expressive Baroque, appropriately played for all its direct sentiment and drama, written, as it was, as entr'acte music for opera or oratorio. Such music is the more exciting and moving for being super-personal — not I, but humanity, dancing and dying.

Haydn (Symphony 93 in D), like Beethoven, dared to experiment more freely as he aged, shedding the intense but narrow world of the court at Esterhaza and crossing the channel (as Handel had done earlier) to compose larger pieces for a wider public. Mr. Burk's program notes for this symphony follow the party line in speaking of its as prophecy "of the Romantic Age to come." Damn it all, this is the Romantic Age, par excellence. The experiments with form, upsetting symmetry for surprise, mixing comedy and pathos in the shift of a line, discovering the uncommon sense of the subconscious, etc., it's all here in this symphony out of Haydn's late maturity. The wanderings and searchings of development are here before Beethoven made larger capital out of the process. Every intelligent conductor and instrumentalist knows this radical Haydn and Friday's performance set it out for all like a dialogue of differing to feel. The contrasting themes, like a dialogue of differing actors, strong chordal sequences against lightly running counterpoint, startling crescendos and sudden pianissimos, a solo oboe singing out of the mass (largo), a bassoon capping a humorous imitation of instruments with a low fart (all the better this time for being out of tune).

The inflowing ground mist made much tuning necessary all through the concert, but with no spoiling of the music-making mood and the instinctive response of the indoor-outdoor thousands. Some special ways of living became musically manifest that we hadn't known we knew and a kind of communal love.

On Saturday Mr. Leinsdorf began with restraint, but there was plenty of brio in the orchestra. The Esterhaza Court must have puffed with pride at the novelties of their tame composer. Symphony 24 in D, an opening serenade of an Allegro begins with lovely horns (no grand Introduction), continues with a flute solo Adagio warmly and effortlessly blown by Doriot Dwyer complete with a cadenza, as if for the moment we had a concerto. A Menuet, downright rusticity (Haydn never forgot the peasant music of his childhood) — now beyond the castle walls. Indeed, the aristocrats had a taste for the picturesque ways of their opposites, but artful with contrast. A Finale of sheer good spirits.

Bach's Cantata 51 featured a small valved trumpet from the rear, Jules Eskin's fine-toned cello continuo on the right, Silverstein's violin obbligatto (in the developed chorale), Portnoi's bass seconding the 'cello, Saramae Endich's soprano in the middle and Leinsdorf facing these forces, desperately trying to keep order (No rehearsal time?). In the first place it's cheap Bach, florid as all hell, with cascades of reiterative figuration he must have spewed out of the computer part of his mind. And then the famous soprano could not match the tempo, so that her lagging confused the obvious rhythms and even slipped a notch. Silverstein, Eskin and Leinsdorf agreed perfectly, but the conductor kept grabbing at violin and 'cello, who could not have been more on the beat, so they played louder. An organ and harpsichord were lost somewhere in the contest. Meanwhile the soprano seemed to be doing a lackadaisical Bing Crosby and when a high note cropped up, hit it hard regardless of its secondary importance in the phrase. There was bravo applause (for survival?). I hope Miss Endich, out in the wings, could relax in laughter. What a rat race!

The Endich voice is rich with color and with the light and shade of the chiaroscuro painters. She rarely hits a note on the head — always a slight give rather than anticipation of tone to project it on the beat (like the anticipatory movement of a dancer's leg.) Not so good for Bach — at least, for this flashy rabble-rousing, celebration of Praise.

But with Haydn's "Nelson" Mass in D minor all trouble vanished from Tanglewood. (Was it provision that made so much of Haydn's language so assertively glorious?) Miss Endich lined up behind the orchestra with Beverly Wolff, a musically strong contralto, Enrice di Giuseppe, tenor, not often heard separately, but a ringing robusto; Paul Plishka, a bearded bass with an unhairy voice of woody baritone-bass quality and power and Donna Precht, a supporting soprano. With the Tanglewood Choir behind and the BSO before, the valiant line led the singing of this great sublimated Latin drama. There is heart-felt music in Qui Tollis, in Et Incarnatus, in Agnus Dei, but the general mood is Gloria. Even "Give us peace" winds up with vivace celebration.

The Choir, a group of young professionals trained by Charles Wilson, commands a unified ringing tone that backed the soloists with no disparity of quality or appropriate power. There is often a lag of style in sacred music because of the reverence for religious tradition and there is much Baroque solidity in Haydn's mass, plus his own way of 'personalizing' attitudes and feelings. Miss Endich, bless her, moved with expressive grace, topping the fine cast, with only an occasional shadow of delay. Mr. Leinsdorf directed and incited his operatic forces with masterly control. A high point for this Festival.

Coda: I hate controversy but must try to set a new current moving in the critical whirlpool of Boston music. I cannot understand what the music critics of the Boston Globe use for ears — perhaps some lobe of the brain that secretes musicology but has so lost its conduit to sense and sensitivity, that S & S (and indeed, ordinary humanity) have withered away — or perhaps have never developed. That Leinsdorf used an improved (in Haydn's time) score which substituted woodwinds for organ is clearly a sign of good judgment. Michael Steinberg, himself, derogated the organ as a poor excuse for an instrument only weeks ago. Berlioz might use organ as religious symbolism, but not Haydn. Again, the Bach cantata did not suffer one iota from the trumpeter's failure to ornament cadences which would have made a fussy cantata still fussier, but, as I have said, from the soprano's inability to sing up to the set tempo, contradicting the expert musicianship of Silverstein and Eskin and even Leinsdorf's frantic beat.

As for Zinman's conducting, purist Gelles had better close his eyes and take out the wax. The orchestra recognized no "frenzy," but took great pains to phrase in a way I have not heard since Sir Thomas Beecham's day; obviously, being seasoned chamber musicians, agreeing with Zinman's concern. The Globe's bile-masters might well take a correspondence course with Alfred Frankenstein, though perhaps Mr. F will be too occupied with his own search for understanding each new event, as he has for many years in San Francisco. New York and Boston have no critics with ears, but a substitute of adolescent arrogance. Buttressed by a little learning, their response to the factual immediacy of the whole gestalten of human musical speech and occasion seems atrophied at the source. Pax vibiscum.

* * *

Erratum: The gloomy gabled mansion I described last week, giving the impression that it was Hawthorn's, was actually built by the tycoon who developed the estate in the 1860's. Hawthorn's own house, now living only in replica, was a modestly fine sample of an older New England.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 28,000

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Live From Tanglewood

Three full length Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be broadcast live by WGBH-FM this week, direct from the Orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass.

On Sunday, July 14 at 2:30 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts Telemann's Concerto in A Major for flute, violin and cello; Cantata No. 35 by Bach and the suite from Handel's "Water Music."

The following Friday, July 19 at 9 p.m. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski is guest conductor in a program that features Le Corsaire overture by Berlioz, Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski and Symphony No. 7 by Dvorak. On Saturday, July 20 at 8 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf directs Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman," Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Van Cliburn as soloist.

20,177 Attend Weekend's Concerts At Tanglewood

A combined audience of 20,177 attended the last weekend's Baroque concerts at Tanglewood. David Zinman conducted Friday evening's concert in music by Boccherini. Sinfonia in A major, op. 1 no. 3 which was a first performance by the Boston Symphony, followed by Bach's Concerto for violin in E major with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. He is the eminent concert master of the Boston Symphony and his rendition was lyrical, sensitive and flawless.

After intermission the orchestra performed Handel's Concerto Gross in A major op. 6 no. 4 and Haydn's Symphony No 93 in D major, featuring Robert Eskin, Harpsichord continuo, Jules Eskin, cello continuo and Henry Portnoi, double bass continuo, all first chair musicians with the Boston Orchestra.

Saturday evening was the highlight of the weekend's programs with the Mass in D Minor "The Nelson" Mass by Haydn, considered one of his single great works. Saramae Endich, soprano; Beverly Wolff contralto; Enrico DeGiuseppe, tenor; Paul Plishka, bass and Donna Precht, soprano, gave singularly excellent and sensitivte readings of the solo parts, accompanied by the Tanglewood Choir. Under the direction of Charles Wilson and John Oliver the choir sang with great professional beauty, its voices strident and dramatic, as the background for the accomplished soloists. The concert was conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

The Nelson Mass was greeted with tremedous enthusiasm by the audience. This is a great work and deserved the thunderous applause. It was an exhilarating performance.

The first half of the program featured Haydn's Symphony No. 24 in D minor and Bach's Cantata No. 51 "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen." Saramae Endich was the soprano soloist accompanied by Armando Chitalla, trumpet soloist. Charles Wilson played the organ continuo, Robert Levin performed the harpsichord continuo Jules Eskin rendered the cello continuo and Henry Portnoi the double bass continuo. The performance was vigorous, yet sensitive and moving.

Sunday afternoon's concert featured music by Telemann, Bach and finished the last half with Suite from "The Water Music" by Handel, always a great favorite. The concert was delightful and in keeping with the limited orchestra, ending the intimate Baroque music for the first two weekends.

Next weekend is the start of the big concerts with full orchestra and will feature guest Conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski on Friday evening performing Berlioz' Le Corsaire Overture, Lutoslowki's Concerto for Orchestra and Dvorak's Sumphony No. 7 in D. minor at 9:00 p.m. The Prelude Concert at 7 on Friday will feature Zara Nelsova and Gran Johannesen.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is taking a departure from its usual past programming by deleting the small chamber concerts on Tuesday evenings, featuring chamber concerts on Sundays at 10:30 a.m. with both faculty and students from the Berkshire Music Center. These chamber concerts will be performed in the theater, and will be free to all "friends" of the Symphony. There will also be Chamber Music Concerts performed by the Berkshire Music Cener students on Tuesday evenings and next Saturday at 2:30 p.m. a vocal concert is scheduled in the theater.

The newest departure in programing is the exciting "Contemporary Trends" performances being sponsored by the Berkshire Festival.

On July 24, Wednesday at 8 p.m. music from India will be heard with Ravi Shankar, sitar and Ali Akbar Khan, sarod with many other musicians from ing.

Wednesday, July 31 will feature Rock music with "The Association." These three concerts are an attempt to appeal to the swining younger generation and recognizing the direction and trend in contemporary music today and how it communicates to young people.

This departure in Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival of Music should prove most exciting and attractive to contemporary tastes. Concerts start at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

Van Cliburn will make his annual trek up to Tanglewood on Saturday evening, in the performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No -, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

SSM

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

JUL 19 1968

New England Newsclip

Third Week

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

ZARA NELSOVA, cellist, will perform with Grant Johannesen, pianist. Beethoven's Sonata for piano and cello in A major and Brahms' Sonata for piano and cello no. 2 in F major in the Weekend Prelude, Friday, July 19, at Tanglewood. (See "Entertainment" calendar.)

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,150

JUL 1 8 1968 New England Newsclip

VAN CLIBURN, pianist, will be featured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto no. 1, Saturday, July 20 at Tanglewood. (See "Entertainment" calendar.)

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Performance

GRANT JOHANNESEN — ZARA NELSOVA

VAN CLIBURN

047

(Above)

Grant Johannesen, pianist, will perform with Zara Nelsova, cellist, Beethoven's Sonata for piano and cello in A Major and Brahms' Sonata for piano and cello No. 2 in F Major in the Weekend Prelude, Friday.

Johannesen will also play Beethoven's Piano concert No. 5 (the Emperor) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Sunday.

(Left)

Van Cliburn, pianist, will be featured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, Saturday.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE
Friday July 19 at 7 pm

ZARA NELSOVA cello
GRANT JOHANNESEN piano

BEETHOVEN — Sonata for piano and cello in A major op. 69
Allegro ma non tanto
Scherzo
Adagio cantabile

BRAHMS — Sonata for piano and cello no. 2 in F major op. 99
Allegro vivace
Adagio affetuoso
Allegro passionato
Allegro molto

Grant Johannesen plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Coming Events

Highlights of the Season

Week of July 14

TANGLEWOOD—Friday, July 19: Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Stanislaw Skrowaczewski in a program of Berlioz, Lutoslawski and Dvorak, 9 p.m., with cellist Zara Nelsova and pianist Grant Johannesen, playing the prelude concert . . . Saturday, July 20: BSO conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in works by Wagner, Bartok and Tchaikovsky (Piano Concerto No. 1—Van Cliburn).

THEATRE—Berkshire Theatre Festival: A Matter of Position . . . Colonie: Glad Tidings . . . Williamstown: Black Comedy.

DANCE—Jacob's Pillow: Maria Alba & Company of Spanish Dancers, with musicians and singer; popular works and four premieres, seven performances. July 16-20.

POETRY READING — Monday, July 15: Elizabeth Aldrich reading her own poetry at Gallery One, Hillsdale, N.Y., 8 p.m.

Week of July 21

TANGLEWOOD—Sunday, July 21: Boston Symphony conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in all Beethoven program, with Grant Johannesen as piano soloist . . . Friday, July 26: Malcolm Frager, pianist, weekend prelude . . . Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in works by Kraft, Weber, Schumann and Liszt for 9 p.m. concert . . . Saturday, July 27: BSO, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir and soloists conducted by Leinsdorf in Brahms' Reguiem.

THEATRE—Berkshire Theatre Festival: A Cry of Players . . . Colonie: Generation . . . Williamstown: Camino Real . . . Storrowton: Funny Girl.

DANCE—Jacob's Pillow: Pennsylvania Ballet Company, seven performances, July 23-27.

Week of July 28

THEATRE—Berkshire Theatre Festival: A Cry of Players . . . Colonie: Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca Show . . . Storrowton: Funny Girl . . . Williamstown: Joe Egg (if available) or an Edward Albee play.

DANCE—Jacob's Pillow: Norman Walker & Company, featuring Cora Cahan, modern dance; Nala Najan, premieres of Hindu dances. Seven performances, July 30-Aug. 3.

SHAKER FESTIVAL—13th annual Shaker Festival, Shaker Museum, Old Chatham, N.Y. Flea market, Eric Sloane art show.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY CIRC. 111,000

JUL 1 8 1968 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Appearing at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., this weekend are a fine variety of top musicians. World Famous pianist Van Cliburn will perform Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 on Saturday July 20, and on Friday evening Minneapolis Symphony conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski will work with the Boston Symphony. Great Johannesen, pianist, and Zara Nelsova, cellist, will duet during this concert.

Van Cliburn

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski

Zara Nelsova

Third Week

Tanglewood Performance

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

ZARA NELSOVA, cellist, will perform with Grant Johannesen, pianist, Beethoven's Sonata for piano and cello in A major and Brahms' Sonata for piano and cello no. 2 in F major in the Weekend Prelude, Friday, July 19, at Tanglewood. (See "Entertainment" calendar.)

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,150

JUL 1 8 1968 New England Newsclip

VAN CLIBURN, pianist, will be featured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto no. 1, Saturday, July 20 at Tanglewood. (See "Entertainment" calendar.)

GRANT JOHANNESEN ZARA NELSOVA

VAN CLIBURN

(Above)

Grant Johannesen, pianist, will perform with Zara Nelsova, cellist, Beethoven's Sonata for piano and cello in A Major and Brahms' Sonata for piano and cello No. 2 in F Major in the Weekend Prelude, Friday.

Johannesen will also play Beethoven's Piano concert No. 5 (the Emperor) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Sunday.

(Left)

Van Cliburn, pianist, will be featured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, Saturday.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE
Friday July 19 at 7 pm

ZARA NELSOVA cello
GRANT JOHANNESEN piano

BEETHOVEN — Sonata for piano and cello in A major op. 69
- Allegro ma non tanto
- Scherzo
- Adagio cantabile

BRAHMS — Sonata for piano and cello no. 2 in F major op. 99
- Allegro vivace
- Adagio affetuoso
- Allegro passionato
- Allegro molto

Grant Johannesen plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Coming Events

Highlights of the Season

Week of July 14

TANGLEWOOD—Friday, July 19: Boston ~~Symphony Orch~~estra conducted by Stanislaw Skrowaczewski in a program of Berlioz, Lutoslawski and Dvorak, 9 p.m., with cellist Zara Nelsova and pianist Grant Johannesen, playing the prelude concert . . . Saturday, July 20: BSO conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in works by Wagner, Bartok and Tchaikovsky (Piano Concerto No. 1—Van Cliburn).

THEATRE—Berkshire Theatre Festival: A Matter of Position . . . Colonie: Glad Tidings . . . Williamstown: Black Comedy.

DANCE—Jacob's Pillow: Maria Alba & Company of Spanish Dancers, with musicians and singer; popular works and four premieres, seven performances. July 16-20.

POETRY READING — Monday, July 15: Elizabeth Aldrich reading her own poetry at Gallery One, Hillsdale, N.Y., 8 p.m.

Week of July 21

TANGLEWOOD—Sunday, July 21: Boston Symphony conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in all Beethoven program, with Grant Johannesen as piano soloist . . . Friday, July 26: Malcolm Frager, pianist, weekend prelude . . . Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in works by Kraft, Weber, Schumann and Liszt for 9 p.m. concert . . . Saturday, July 27: BSO, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir and soloists conducted by Leinsdorf in Brahms' Reguiem.

THEATRE—Berkshire Theatre Festival: A Cry of Players . . . Colonie: Generation . . . Williamstown: Camino Real . . . Storrowton: Funny Girl.

DANCE—Jacob's Pillow: Pennsylvania Ballet Company, seven performances, July 23-27.

Week of July 28

THEATRE—Berkshire Theatre Festival: A Cry of Players . . . Colonie: Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca Show . . . Storrowton: Funny Girl . . . Williamstown: Joe Egg (if available) or an Edward Albee play.

DANCE—Jacob's Pillow: Norman Walker & Company, featuring Cora Cahan, modern dance; Nala Najan, premieres of Hindu dances. Seven performances, July 30-Aug. 3.

SHAKER FESTIVAL—13th annual Shaker Festival, Shaker Museum, Old Chatham, N.Y. Flea market, Eric Sloane art show.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 6 1968 New England Newsclip

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DAILY CIRC. 111,000

JUL 1 8 1968 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Appearing at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., this weekend are a fine variety of top musicians. World Famous pianist Van Cliburn will perform Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 on Saturday July 20, and on Friday evening Minneapolis Symphony conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski will work with the Boston Symphony. Great Johannesen, pianist, and Zara Nelsova, cellist, will duet during this concert.

Van Cliburn

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski

Zara Nelsova

34.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Friday July 19 at 9 pm

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI conductor

BERLIOZ	Overture 'Le Corsaire'*
LUTOSLAWSKI	Concerto for orchestra Intrada Capriccio notturno e arioso Passacaglia, toccata e corale

intermission

DVOŘÁK	Symphony no. 7 in D minor op. 70 Allegro maestoso Poco adagio Scherzo: vivace-poco meno mosso Finale: allegro

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 21

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Photo by Roy Hemming

Skrowaczewski rehearses Boston Symphony at Tanglewood

World Week 5-2-'68

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI, 42, born in Lwow, Poland; studied there and in Paris; conductor of Warsaw Philharmonic before coming to U. S. in 1958; since 1960 conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, and a frequent guest-conductor of Philadelphia Orchestra (shared its 1967 tour of South America with Eugene Ormandy). A brilliant, incisive, sensitive interpreter of classics and neo-classics, and a standout champion of new music. Best recordings: Prokofieff Romeo & Juliet and Schubert 9th Symphony [both Mercury] and Chopin Piano Concerto No. 1 with Rubinstein [RCA Victor].

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

JUL 16 1968

Boston Symphony on Air From Tanglewood Friday

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert to be heard live from Tanglewood at 9 p.m. Friday, over WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc.

* * *

The concert will begin the third week of the orchestra's performances at the 1968 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. All weekend concerts of the festival are being broadcast live by WAMC, the FM station of Albany Medical College.

The Skrowaczewski program will include Le Corsaire Overture by Berlioz, Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director and regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium on Saturday, July, to conduct a program featuring pianist Van Cliburn in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1. The concert, which begins at 8 p.m., will also include the Flying Dutchman Overture by Wagner and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

* * *

On Sunday, Leinsdorf will lead an all-Beethoven concert beginning at 2:30 p.m. A solo performance of Piano Concerto No. 5 ("Emperor") by Grant Johannesen will be a feature of the Sunday program which also includes Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 and Symphony No. 8.

Community Concert Artists Featured at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Friday night's Tanglewood concert, first of the Berkshire Music Festival's third weekend, was a partial preview of next season's community concerts in Worcester.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Stanislaw Skowaczewski who will bring his Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra to Worcester.

Also on the Worcester series are Zara Nelsova, cellist, and Grant Johannesen. They were the weekend prelude artists.

Mercifully Cool

Friday night's audience numbered a low 3,963. Although it was a mercifully cool night after the heat wave ended, in the late afternoon. Thunderstorms and continuing evening drizzle dampened the prospects of a lawn audience.

Skowaczewski's presence held great promise for those who had seen him conduct. The Boston Symphony's performances of Berlioz' "Corsair" overture and Dvorak's Seventh Symphony in D Minor were powerful attractions.

The program's big surprise was Concerto for Orchestra by the contemporary Polish composer, Witold Lutolawski.

Many still cringe over the memory of his "Venetian Games" that was played at Tanglewood a few summers ago.

Concerto for Orchestra is a block-buster.

Lutolawski took four years to write it, beginning in 1950. It can be interpreted as a valiant Polish cry for liberation.

The opening movement, "Intrada," begins with an ominous soliloquy in low strings with pulsating percussion background. It spreads like a forest fire through the orchestra.

There are gossipy remarks in woodwinds to lighten the tension. Huge blocks of harmony and crashing cymbals support screaming strings, similar to the Shostakovich-Prokofieff metier.

The scherzo is an insect-buzzing dance, at top clip with marvelous sound effects. A passacaglia, toccata and chorale end the work like a powerhouse. Developments are wierd, rebellious, pompous, sullen and violent.

Friday night's performance of the Lutolawski must have allayed any doubt that the Boston Symphony is a virtuoso orchestra.

Skowaczewski conducted the entire program from memory in a clear, concise style without unnecessary trimmings or calisthenics.

His Beloiz overture had poise, sounded well, and was true to form even in some of the composer's shallow trademarks. Strings did dazzling work. Total result was a rare sound that only mutual respect between conductor and orchestra can produce.

Skowaczewski stressed he folkish ,melodic characteristics of the Dvorak symphony. He brought smooth continuity to its ever-changing course. The bombastic and bucolic were in plausible sequence.

Miss Nelsova and Johannesen gave the most successful of the Friday night recitals, thus far.

She plays as one transfixed by he music while her intonation was not always pure in Beethoven's sonata for piano and cello, Opus 69, she produced a small but vibrantly singing tone.

Johannesen also made his instrument sing. He balanced his volume to make true conversation with the lighter textured cello, and played with potless facility.

The Beethoven sonata was a scholarly, sensitive performance by both players.

Brahms' sonata for piano and cello, Opus 99, required and received far more dexterity and tonal expansion.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

JUL 21 1968

New England Newsclip

34.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Friday July 19 at 9 pm

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI conductor

BERLIOZ	Overture 'Le Corsaire'*
LUTOSLAWSKI	Concerto for orchestra Intrada Capriccio notturno e arioso Passacaglia, toccata e corale

intermission

DVOŘÁK	Symphony no. 7 in D minor op. 70 Allegro maestoso Poco adagio Scherzo: vivace-poco meno mosso Finale: allegro

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 21

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Photo by Roy Hemming

Skrowaczewski rehearses Boston Symphony at Tanglewood

World Week 5-2-'68

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI, 42, born in Lwow, Poland; studied there and in Paris; conductor of Warsaw Philharmonic before coming to U. S. in 1958; since 1960 conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, and a frequent guest-conductor of Philadelphia Orchestra (shared its 1967 tour of South America with Eugene Ormandy). A brilliant, incisive, sensitive interpreter of classics and neo-classics, and a standout champion of new music. Best recordings: Prokofieff Romeo & Juliet and Schubert 9th Symphony [both Mercury] and Chopin Piano Concerto No. 1 with Rubinstein [RCA Victor].

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,005

JUL 16 1968

Boston Symphony on Air From Tanglewood Friday

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert to be heard live from Tanglewood at 9 p.m. Friday, over WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc.

* * *

The concert will begin the third week of the orchestra's performances at the 1968 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. All weekend concerts of the festival are being broadcast live by WAMC, the FM station of Albany Medical College.

The Skrowaczewski program will include Le Corsaire Overture by Berlioz, Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director and regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium on Saturday, July, to conduct a program featuring pianist Van Cliburn in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1. The concert, which begins at 8 p.m., will also include the Flying Dutchman Overture by Wagner and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

* * *

On Sunday, Leinsdorf will lead an all-Beethoven concert beginning at 2:30 p.m. A solo performance of Piano Concerto No. 5 ("Emperor") by Grant Johannesen will be a feature of the Sunday program which also includes Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 and Symphony No. 8.

Community Concert Artists Featured at Tanglewood

Music Review

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Friday night's Tanglewood concert, first of the Berkshire Music Festival's third weekend, was a partial preview of next season's community concerts in Worcester.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Stanislaw Skowaczewski who will bring his Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra to Worcester.

Also on the Worcester series are Zara Nelsova, cellist, and Grant Johannesen. They were the weekend prelude artists.

Mercifully Cool

Friday night's audience numbered a low 3,963. Although it was a mercifully cool night after the heat wave ended, in the late afternoon. Thunderstorms and continuing evening drizzle dampened the prospects of a lawn audience.

Skowaczewski's presence held great promise for those who had seen him conduct. The Boston Symphony's performances of Berlioz' "Corsair" overture and Dvorak's Seventh Symphony in D Minor were powerful attractions.

The program's big surprise was Concerto for Orchestra by the contemporary Polish composer, Witold Lutolawski.

Many still cringe over the memory of his "Venetian Games" that was played at Tanglewood a few summers ago.

Concerto for Orchestra is a block-buster.

Lutolawski took four years to write it, beginning in 1950. It can be interpreted as a valiant Polish cry for liberation.

The opening movement, "Intrada," begins with an ominous soliloquy in low strings with pulsating percussion background. It spreads like a forest fire through the orchestra.

There are gossipy remarks in woodwinds to lighten the tension. Huge blocks of harmony and crashing cymbals support screaming strings, similar to the Shostakovich-Prokofieff metier.

The scherzo is an insect-buzzing dance, at top clip with marvelous sound effects. A passacaglia, toccata and chorale end the work like a powerhouse. Developments are wierd, rebellious, pompous, sullen and violent.

Friday night's performance of the Lutolawski must have allayed any doubt that the Boston Symphony is a virtuoso orchestra.

Skowaczewski conducted the entire program from memory in a clear, concise style without unnecessary trimmings or calisthenics.

His Beloiz overture had poise, sounded well, and was true to form even in some of the composer's shallow trademarks. Strings did dazzling work. Total result was a rare sound that only mutual respect between conductor and orchestra can produce.

Skowaczewski stressed he folkish melodic characteristics of the Dvorak symphony. He brought smooth continuity to its ever-changing course. The bombastic and bucolic were in plausible sequence.

Miss Nelsova and Johannesen gave the most successful of the Friday night recitals, thus far.

She plays as one transfixed by he music while her intonation was not always pure in Beethoven's sonata for piano and cello, Opus 69, she produced a small but vibrantly singing tone.

Johannesen also made his instrument sing. He balanced his volume to make true conversation with the lighter textured cello, and played with potless facility.

The Beethoven sonata was a scholarly, sensitive performance by both players.

Brahms' sonata for piano and cello, Opus 99, required and received far more dexterity and tonal expansion.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

JUL 21 1968

New England Newsclip

34

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Friday July 19 at 9 pm

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI conductor

BERLIOZ	Overture 'Le Corsaire'*
LUTOSLAWSKI	Concerto for orchestra Intrada Capriccio notturno e arioso Passacaglia, toccata e corale

intermission

DVOŘÁK	Symphony no. 7 in D minor op. 70 Allegro maestoso Poco adagio Scherzo: vivace-poco meno mosso Finale: allegro

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 21

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Skrowaczewski rehearses Boston Symphony at Tanglewood

World Week 5-2 '68

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI, 42, born in Lwow, Poland; studied there and in Paris; conductor of Warsaw Philharmonic before coming to U. S. in 1958; since 1960 conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, and a frequent guest-conductor of Philadelphia Orchestra (shared its 1967 tour of South America with Eugene Ormandy). A brilliant, incisive, sensitive interpreter of classics and neo-classics, and a standout champion of new music. Best recordings: Prokofieff Romeo & Juliet and Schubert 9th Symphony [both Mercury] and Chopin Piano Concerto No. 1 with Rubinstein [RCA Victor].

Boston Symphony on Air From Tanglewood Friday

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert to be heard live from Tanglewood at 9 p.m. Friday, over WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc.

The concert will begin the third week of the orchestra's performances at the 1968 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. All weekend concerts of the festival are being broadcast live by WAMC, the FM station of Albany Medical College.

The Skrowaczewski program will include Le Corsaire Overture by Berlioz, Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director and regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium on Saturday, July, to conduct a program featuring pianist Van Cliburn in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1. The concert, which begins at 8 p.m., will also include the Flying Dutchman Overture by Wagner and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

On Sunday, Leinsdorf will lead an all-Beethoven concert beginning at 2:30 p.m. A solo performance of Piano Concerto No. 5 ("Emperor") by Grant Johannesen will be a feature of the Sunday program which also includes Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 and Symphony No. 8.

Community Concert Artists Featured at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Friday night's Tanglewood concert, first of the Berkshire Music Festival's third weekend, was a partial preview of next season's community concerts in Worcester.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Stanislaw Skowaczewski who will bring his Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra to Worcester.

Also on the Worcester series are Zara Nelsova, cellist, and Grant Johannesen. They were the weekend prelude artists.

Mercifully Cool

Friday night's audience numbered a low 3,963. Although it was a mercifully cool night after the heat wave ended, in the late afternoon Thunderstorms and continuing evening drizzle dampened the prospects of a lawn audience.

Skowaczewski's presence held great promise for those who had seen him conduct. The Boston Symphony's performances of Berlioz' "Corsair" overture and Dvorak's Seventh Symphony in D Minor were powerful attractions.

The program's big surprise was Concerto for Orchestra by the contemporary Polish composer, Witold Lutolawski.

Many still cringe over the memory of his "Venetian Games" that was played at Tanglewood a few summers ago.

Concerto for Orchestra is a block-buster.

Lutolawski took four years to write it, beginning in 1950. It can be interpreted as a valiant Polish cry for liberation.

The opening movement, "Intrada," begins with an ominous soliloquy in low strings with pulsating percussion background. It spreads like a forest fire through the orchestra.

There are gossipy remarks in woodwinds to lighten the tension. Huge blocks of harmony and crashing cymbals support screaming strings, similar to the Shostakovich-Prokofieff mettier.

The scherzo is an insect-buzzing dance, at top clip with marvelous sound effects. A passacaglia, toccata and chorale end the work like a powerhouse. Developments are wierd, rebellious, pompous, sullen and violent.

Friday night's performance of the Lutolawski must have allayed any doubt that the Boston Symphony is a virtuoso orchestra.

Skowaczewski conducted the entire program from memory in a clear, concise style without unnecessary trimmings or calisthenics.

His Beloiz overture had poise, sounded well, and was true to form even in some of the composer's shallow trademarks. Strings did dazzling work. Total result was a rare sound that only a mutual respect between conductor and orchestra can produce.

Skowaczewski stressed the folkish melodic characteristics of the Dvorak symphony. He brought smooth continuity to its ever-changing course. The bombastic and bucolic were in plausible sequence.

Miss Nelsova and Johannesen gave the most successful of the Friday night recitals, thus far.

She plays as one transfixed by the music while her intonation was not always pure in Beethoven's sonata for piano and cello, Opus 69, she produced a small but vibrantly singing tone.

Johannesen also made his instrument sing. He balanced his volume to make true conversation with the lighter textured cello, and played with potless facility.

The Beethoven sonata was a scholarly, sensitive performance by both players.

Brahms' sonata for piano and cello, Opus 99, required and received far more dexterity and tonal expansion.

35

Tanglewood's Music Triumphs Over Rain

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The music at Tanglewood Friday night was brighter by far than the weather . . . which was dismal. Rain early in the evening was, undoubtedly, the reason why the audience was down to 3963.

Polish Conductor

It was not raining at the start of the prelude at 7, nor was it raining during intermission, but the ground was wet and there was only a handful of lawn-sitters.

Guest conductor was Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, leader of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra since 1960 and earlier conductor of the National Philharmonic of Poland. He has been a guest conductor at Tanglewood in other seasons.

Key work on his program Friday was the "Concerto for Orchestra" written by Poland's leading composer, Witold Lutoslawski, 55, who spent the summer at Tanglewood in 1962 as teacher for the Berkshire Music Center.

"Highly Colorful"

He wrote the concerto about 15 years ago while still strongly influenced by Stravinsky, Bartok and Hindemith before he ventured deeply into the complexities of atonality.

It is a highly colorful work, more like Shostakovich than the aforementioned trio, and virtually without dissonance . . . except toward the end of the third movement when the climactic passages ecome exciting.

There are polyrhythms and rapid changes of tempo, but more characteristic are the sudden changes of direction in timbre, the rushing flurries of sound that become suddenly quiet and langorous and then twittering and then sharply contrasting internally with fluttering strings, for instance, behind a freely floating flute.

Control Is Tight

It is an interesting work and was held tightly under control by the conductor.

The other big work on the schedule was Dvorak's Symphony No. 7, Op. 70 (formerly No. 2) and it, too, was controlled carefully, almost pedantically, although the conductor made full use of the wide dynamics available from the big orchestra, now fully staffed with the close of the Esplande concerts in Boston and the Mozart-Bach concerts here.

The sonority of the full orchestra in the Dvorak was almot palpable Friday night with nine doublebasses lined up across the back row, and Dvorak's sonic depth could hardly have been safer.

Berlioz Opens

The opening piece was Berlioz' "Le Corsaire" overture, another piece which makes full use of the instrumental color available in a large orchestra.

It was lively and capricious, a good piece for an opening or for a pops program.

The prelude concert at 7 presented Zara Nelsova, cellist, and Grant Johannesen, pianist, with cello sonatas by Beethoven and Brahms which required as much musicianship from the pianist as from the cellist.

Husband-Wife Team

The choice was appropriate inasmuch as Johannesen is a solo pianist of international fame. His keyboard style often has been exhibited with more than the usual amount of power, but he seemed subdued Friday, and his expressivity was as nicely varied as the chamber-scale music required.

It was perfectly matched to the soloist, also, which was just as well, not only because the paying customers ought to be pleased, but also because she is his wife.

Her cello was cool in tone and warm in expression and seemed to have faultless intonation in spite of the moisture-laden air. She played it beautifully.

Cliburn Tonight

For the record, the sonatas were Beethoven's A Major, Opus 69, and Brahms' F Major, No. 2, Opus 99.

Johannesen will be back Sunday afternoon to play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra.

Tonight Van Cliburn will be in the giant shed to play one of the works with which he won the Moscow prize 10 year ago, the prize which made him famous . . . Tchaikovsky's No. 1 Piano Concerto.

Also on the program will be the overture to Wagner's Flying Dutchman,'' and Bartok's virtuosic work, "Concerto for Orchestra."

* * *

THE STORM FRIDAY afternoon fortunately had well spent itself by concert time so that the evening concert basked, paradoxically, in cool, refreshing air. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis orchestra, was the guest conductor, for the second successive year, and the construction of his program allowed a totally stimulating evening.

It has been commonly assumed that Berlioz' overture "The Corsair" was based on Byron's poem but the nature of the music by no means suggests distaff involvement. One would have difficulty visualizing "Medora" as the literary embodiment of one of Byron's lemans. Furthermore, the music has no affinity with Byron, the professional melancholic, as much as Berlioz admired his elder contemporary. The French composer was more deeply inspired for this opus by James Fenimore Cooper who, with his family, spent seven years in Europe at the one-third mark of the 19th century. During that time he wrote his "Red Rover," which, with his other works, was the basis of his international reputation.

"THE CORSAIR" was used to extract the zenith of virtuosity from the responsive Boston orchestra. The program then proceeded to a fascinating new (to Tanglewood) concerto for orchestra by the conductor's fellow-countryman, Witold Lutoslawski, bewitching in inventiveness, rhythmic variety and timbre. Skrowaczewski made it a graphic narrative, as it groped experimentally to all ends of the chromatic horizon, even suggesting Stockhausean rumblings and scrapings in the Capriccio. The Passacaglia begins with pachydermatous ploddings in the double basses which persist as a drone as the elaboration engages the other voices and accumulates diversity in the manner of the Ravel "Bolero." Lutoslawski doesn't fear to demand wonderfully effective but treacherous harmonics from the whole violin section.

* * *

THE DVORAK SYMPHONY No. 7, in D Major, Opus 70, closed the evening and the conductor made the most of the luscious adagio and the popular and entrancing scherzo. The whole program was unrelentingly romantic and climax-prone and it was obviously not Skrowaczewski's intention ever to moderate or alleviate the excitement.

Berkshire Eagle
7-22-'68

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
JUL 20 1968
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
JUL 20 1968
New England Newsclip

Full Orchestra Back

Warm And Lustrous Music At Tanglewood On Wet Night

The full orchestra of the Boston Symphony is now performing at The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood after two weeks of Mozart-Bach concerts and it drew nearly 4,000 people to the great Music Shed Friday night despite showers and soaked lawns. The conductor was Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra and formerly conductor of the National Philharmonic of Poland.

This intense young musician provided an evening of warm and lustrous music with a consistently romantic program. It opened with "Le Corsaire" by Berlioz, a vivacious overture that immediately dispelled the mood of a rainy Berkshire evening and launched Mr. Skrowaczewski's dynamic conducting style on a fascinated audience.

It was a gentle introduction to an exciting composition played with high iridescence under the Polish conductor's baton — Concerto for orchestra by the contemporary Polish composer, Witold Lutoslawski. This is a fairly traditional piece for its time (it was written 15 years ago) but its tonal and textural variety testify to an inventive imagination and give it the air of newness. It exploits sensuous instrumental contrasts, with shimmering strings and haunting flutes, brilliant drums. The feeling is mostly lyrical, but there is excitement both in the musical climaxes and in the conductor's obvious rapport with the work.

The Dvorak Symphony No. 7 which followed was grander with its sweeping color. It sustained the romantic mood with its rich orchestral effects and returned the audience to the kind of music that one customarily associates with the Boston Symphony, though the sustained applause that followed it surely went back to the fantastic shimmer of the Lutoslawski concerto.

The Friday night "weekend prelude" was of special quality, for the noted piano soloist Grant Johanneson appeared with his wife, 'cellist Zara Nelsova, playing Beethoven's Sonata for piano and cello in A. major Op. 69 and Brahms' Sonata for piano and cello No. 2 in F major. The remarkable doubleheader was presented with a fluid mastery that was a delight. These early Friday concerts of different small "chamber" combinations are nearly always unusually good and they serve to introduce the symphony addict to other musical treasures.

Tonight Van Cliburn will play his vehicle to fame, Tchaikovsky's Concerto No. 1 with the Boston Symphony with Erich Leinsdorf conducting. The program will also include Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and Bartok's Concerto for orchestra. Sunday afternoon Leinsdorf will conduct an all-Beethoven program, Symphonies No. 2 and No. 8, and "The Emperor" Concerto with Grant Johanneson as soloist. High attendance is certain with two such prominent soloists.

—By A.B.M.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, July 22, 1968

Boston Symphony Performs Berlioz, Lutoslawski, Dvorak at Tanglewood

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Having given six concerts of classical and baroque music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood turned its attention this weekend to larger works by later composers. Friday night the orchestra's full complement was on stage, led by guest conductor Stanislav Skrowaczewski, for three works: Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture, Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D minor.

* * *

The overture was very well done. Skrowaczewski sees the work not only as a study in contrasts, but also as an excursion into the more oblique regions of harmony and orchestration. It is the latter which elevated Skrowaczewski's rendition above the efforts of any conductor I've yet heard. Most conductors achieve Berlioz' daring effects too inconsistently, indicating that the effects are performance "accidents" rather than interpretive perceptions on the part of the conductor. Skrowaczewski was unusually good with this music, and his handling of the bold harmonies through the closing pages made one's hair stand on end.

Next on the program was Witold Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra. The Polish composer finished this score in 1954, and in recent years it has acquired a vogue of sorts among the "in-crowd." Although a recording of the work was issued by Philips last year, it is largely unsuccessful despite the sincere attempt by a native orchestra and conductor. I first became acquainted with the music two years ago during attendance at American Symphony Orchestra rehearsals under Paul Kletzki, whose incisive way with the music has since remained fixed in memory.

* * *

Skowaczewski did an even better job with it, however, revelling in the unusual composite sonorities and gently turning the melodic lines. His solid readings of the first two movements were managed by conveying the rhythmic as well as thematic unity to be found in the music. This rhythmic consideration is very important, for the content of the Concerto is not just melodic. Two significant planes of action must be developed, and it was Skrowaczewski's penetrating realization of both that made the music work so nicely.

He couldn't do the same with the last movement, though, only because the composer left some gaping holes in the structure. Just the same, the conductor did the best he could with the music and almost succeeded in making it sound cohesive. It was a marvelous performance, and judging from the intermission chatter I overheard, it won for the composer many new admirers.

* * *

The final work was Dvorak's seventh symphony. Skrowaczewski proved to be a gifted interpreter here, too. He kept a firm hold on the tempo most of the time, which resulted in some minor revelations during the folksy parts although it had a tendency to compress the lengthy phrase-lines elsewhere. No matter, this was a great performance and brought a magnificent evening of music making to a breathtaking close.

* * *

Erich Leinsdorf was on deck Saturday evening for three pieces, "The Flying Dutchman" overture by Wagner, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, and Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Piano concerto, with Van Cliburn as soloist.

Leinsdorf had a bad time of it in the Wagner. The orchestra was unresponsive and untheatrical. The brasses were saving their lips for the Bartok and deprived the concertgoers of what could have been an exciting reading. Even the ending was a mess, with the orchestra holding onto the final chord that Leinsdorf had long since discontinued.

The Bartok was not much better. The first movement began quite well, and I admired all those lost bassoon parts immensely, but at bar 231 things really fell apart. Only Everett Firth, timpanist, knew where he was, Leinsdorf somehow brought everyone together and the movement continued cautiously.

The cautious attitude took the spontaneity right out of the performance. The only outstanding part through the remainder of the work was the opening of the third movement, which was more mysterious than can be described here.

The allegretto intermezzo was taken as an allegro, destroying its suppleness, and I though I heard the cymbal player come in early although he might have just tripped over his instrument by mistake. The finale was good but uneventful.

When the intermission drew to a close, Van Cliburn was soloist in the Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto. His mercurial approach has not changed much in the last 10 years and continues to win the audience over completely. I can't understand why such a powerful pianist needs so much pedal. though. Really, he could carry a sound all the way to the lake if he wanted to without resorting to artifical means.

Leinsdorf was very good in the accompaniment and the orchestra played loudly enough to be heard, for a change. Perhaps they were embarrassed by the piano volume.

36.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Saturday July 20 at 8 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER — Overture to 'Der fliegende Holländer'*

BARTÓK — Concerto for orchestra*

Andante non troppo — allegro vivace
Giuoco delle coppie: allegro scherzando
Elegy: andante non troppo
Intermezzo interrotto: allegretto
Finale: presto

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 1 in B flat op. 23*

Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso — allegro con spirito
Andantino semplice — allegro vivace assai
Allegro con fuoco

VAN CLIBURN

Van Cliburn plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 24

The first part of this evening's concert is being televised in color by WGBH, Boston. Occasional scenes of the audience may be included.

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Music Review

Van Cliburn Concert Attracts 13,290 to Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A PROGRAM of magnificent Beethoven closed the third weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood. Two of the even-numbered symphonies, Nos. 2 and 8, which classroom clichés like to index as the placid ones (the odd ones are supposed to be grand and dramatic), preceded a performance of the E flat piano concerto, one of Beethoven's three greatest, with Grant Johannesen as the deeply convincing soloist.

This was the first weekend at which the entire personnel of the Boston Symphony participated, as some two-thirds of the orchestra had remained behind on their home grounds for the last two weeks of the Esplanade concerts.

The D Major Symphony, Opus 36, No. 2, stands near the top in the opinion of many Beethovenites. Erich Leinsdorf gave it an authoritative reading. The strings were a little more definite and cleanly articulated than the winds in such details as the double dotted notes but the over-all conception was remarkably unified and forceful.

Whitestone

Van Cliburn and Erich Leinsdorf in Saturday's Tchaikovsky performance.

* * *

THE 8TH SYMPHONY'S four movements are gems. It, as the 2nd, requires a smaller orchestra than in the more popularly famous 5th and 6th. Leinsdorf's terse penetration gave it finesse and distinction. There are several identifiable details of humor which the composer inserted, an attribute not generally associated with Beethoven, although few of the immortals, from Shakespeare down, lacked a sense of playing with words or notes.

The Emperor concerto involves the orchestra more than as a mere accompaniment. By this time in his life, Beethoven wrote the background as a type of symphony. Leinsdorf kept it discreet and vibrant to match the performance of Johannesen, who played with velvet-tipped mallet-fingers. The famous descending chromatic scales in the bass were not as sadistic as have been heard from the same stage but his sense of spacious perspective gave it satisfying symmetry and his tone was always enjoyably zestful. The attendance figure was 10,703.

* * *

ON THE PRECEDING evening, Saturday, a formidable crowd of 13,290 took advantage of the brisk, clear night to come hear Leinsdorf conduct the Wagner "Flying Dutchman" overture, the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra. As a bonus there was the B flat Tchaikovsky piano concerto with Van Cliburn as soloist.

Cliburn stands tall and erect but he is twice his own height in modesty and native, unpretending dignity. He gave a dramatic performance of the concerto with which he won the Moscow competition 10 years ago, forcing a hard tone at times in his effort to emphasize the numerous peaks of a work now almost becoming hackneyed. The ovation tendered the soloist was sensational. Call after recall finally won two little encores for the whistling and cheering audience, a Liszt transcription of a Schumann Lied and a little arabesque from the soloist's pen written when he was fourteen.

* * *

FROM A MUSICAL assay the Bartok was the bright star of Leinsdorf's evening. This, with the Lutoslawski concerto on Friday evening, calls for a huge orchestra, a much more complete brass platoon and a complete percussion battery. It also has an intimate relationship with the Boston orchestra from the day of the commission and first performance. Leinsdorf enhanced the many vivid pictures the score might well conceal and made of it a personal triumph.

* * *

THE STORM FRIDAY afternoon fortunately had well spent itself by concert time so that the evening concert basked, paradoxically, in cool, refreshing air. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis orchestra, was the guest conductor, for the second successive year, and the construction of his program allowed a totally stimulating evening.

It has been commonly assumed that Berlioz' overture "The Corsair" was based on Byron's poem but the nature of the music by no means suggests distaff involvement. One would have difficulty visualizing "Medora" as the literary embodiment of one of Byron's lemans. Furthermore, the music has no affinity with Byron, the professional melancholic, as much as Berlioz admired his elder contemporary. The French composer was more deeply inspired for this opus by James Fenimore Cooper who, with his family, spent seven years in Europe at the one-third mark of the 19th century. During that time he wrote his "Red Rover," which, with his other works, was the basis of his international reputation.

"THE CORSAIR" was used to extract the zenith of virtuosity from the responsive Boston orchestra. The program then proceeded to a fascinating new (to Tanglewood) concerto for orchestra by the conductor's fellow-countryman, Witold Lutoslawski, bewitching in inventiveness, rhythmic variety and timbre. Skrowaczewski made it a graphic narrative, as it groped experimentally to all ends of the chromatic horizon, even suggesting Stockhausean rumblings and scrapings in the Capriccio. The Passacaglia begins with pachydermatous ploddings in the double basses which persist as a drone as the elaboration engages the other voices and accumulates diversity in the manner of the Ravel "Bolero." Lutoslawski doesn't fear to demand wonderfully effective but treacherous harmonics from the whole violin section.

* * *

THE DVORAK SYMPHONY No. 7, in D Major, Opus 70, closed the evening and the conductor made the most of the luscious adagio and the popular and entrancing scherzo. The whole program was unrelentingly romantic and climax-prone and it was obviously not Skrowaczewski's intention ever to moderate or alleviate the excitement.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JUL 22 1968
New England Newsclip

HOUR, NORWALK, CONN.— FRIDAY, JULY 26, 1968

Van Cliburn Thrills Tanglewood Audience

Whatever else may have been said by reviewers who attended the third weekend of this summer's Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., along with the thousand of enthusiastic listeners, nothing can quite account for the standing and repeated ovation, the acclaim and enthusiasm following the evening of Van Cliburn. He rendered the Tchaikovsky Concerto for piano and orchestra; No. 1, in B flat with the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf.

The program for July 20 was as varied as it was compelling to eager listening — opening with a fiery presentation of Wagner's Der fliegende Hollander and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. Bartok, who is not always a favorite among the old school enthusiasts, has something in his concerto of indelible beauty in its middle sections.

The crowded parking lots, the lawn, and the capacity seating in the shed gave evidence that the music lovers had come for a very certain reason, and they did not go away disappointed. Van Cliburn, who for many consecutive seasons has been a top drawing card for the Tanglewood audiences, grows with the years — in musical stature, of course, but in a personal charm and rapport with his music friends that comes alive, more and more at each appearance.

That his Tchaikovsky was at his best, was evidenced by the audience who would not let him go. It would have been interesting to have counted the curtain calls — innumerable and intense. The acclaim was rewarded by the rendering of two encores, a practically unheard gesture following a long and difficult program. It was a memorable, beautiful, occasion. The weatherman stamped it with his approval, following a stormy Friday night when a special feature for that program was an electrifying experience, hearing the Lutoslawski concerto for orchestra, under Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, guest conductor, the Berlioz Overture Le Corsaire, and concluding with Dvorak's Symphony Number 7 in D Minor. It was a lovely program, with an accelerated tempo that gave no pause for anything but ~~anything~~ but greatest enthusiasm.

— R. E. H.

* * *

Erich Leinsdorf was on deck Saturday evening for three pieces, "The Flying Dutchman" overture by Wagner, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, and Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Piano concerto, with Van Cliburn as soloist.

Leinsdorf had a bad time of it in the Wagner. The orchestra was unresponsive and untheatrical. The brasses were saving their lips for the Bartok and deprived the concertgoers of what could have been an exciting reading. Even the ending was a mess, with the orchestra holding onto the final chord that Leinsdorf had long since discontinued.

The Bartok was not much better. The first movement began quite well, and I admired all those lost bassoon parts immensely, but at bar 231 things really fell apart. Only Everett Firth, timpanist, knew where he was, Leinsdorf somehow brought everyone together and the movement continued cautiously.

The cautious attitude took the spontaneity right out of the performance. The only outstanding part through the remainder of the work was the opening of the third movement, which was more mysterious than can be described here.

The allegretto intermezzo was taken as an allegro, destroying its suppleness, and I thought I heard the cymbal player come in early although he might have just tripped over his instrument by mistake. The finale was good but uneventful.

When the intermission drew to a close, Van Cliburn was soloist in the Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto. His mercurial approach has not changed much in the last 10 years and continues to win the audience over completely. I can't understand why such a powerful pianist needs so much pedal, though. Really, he could carry a sound all the way to the lake if he wanted to without resorting to artifical means.

Leinsdorf was very good in the accompaniment and the orchestra played loudly enough to be heard, for a change. Perhaps they were embarrassed by the piano volume.

Schenectady Gazette 7-22-'68

36.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Saturday July 20 at 8 pm

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER — Overture to 'Der fliegende Holländer'*

BARTÓK — Concerto for orchestra*

Andante non troppo — allegro vivace
Giuoco delle coppie: allegro scherzando
Elegy: andante non troppo
Intermezzo interrotto: allegretto
Finale: presto

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 1 in B flat op. 23*

Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso — allegro con spirito
Andantino semplice — allegro vivace assai
Allegro con fuoco

VAN CLIBURN

Van Cliburn plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 24

The first part of this evening's concert is being televised in color by WGBH, Boston. Occasional scenes of the audience may be included.

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Music Theatre Movies TV Art

Music Review

Van Cliburn Concert Attracts 13,290 to Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A PROGRAM of magnificent Beethoven closed the third weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood. Two of the even-numbered symphonies, Nos. 2 and 8, which classroom clichés like to index as the placid ones (the odd ones are supposed to be grand and dramatic), preceded a performance of the E flat piano concerto, one of Beethoven's three greatest, with Grant Johannesen as the deeply convincing soloist.

This was the first weekend at which the entire personnel of the Boston Symphony participated, as some two-thirds of the orchestra had remained behind on their home grounds for the last two weeks of the Esplanade concerts.

The D Major Symphony, Opus 36, No. 2, stands near the top in the opinion of many Beethovenites. Erich Leinsdorf gave it an authoritative reading. The strings were a little more definite and cleanly articulated than the winds in such details as the double dotted notes but the over-all conception was remarkably unified and forceful.

Whitestone

Van Cliburn and Erich Leinsdorf in Saturday's Tchaikovsky performance.

* * *

THE 8TH SYMPHONY'S four movements are gems. It, as the 2nd, requires a smaller orchestra than in the more popularly famous 5th and 6th. Leinsdorf's terse penetration gave it finesse and distinction. There are several identifiable details of humor which the composer inserted, an attribute not generally associated with Beethoven, although few of the immortals, from Shakespeare down, lacked a sense of playing with words or notes.

The Emperor concerto involves the orchestra more than as a mere accompaniment. By this time in his life, Beethoven wrote the background as a type of symphony. Leinsdorf kept it discreet and vibrant to match the performance of Johannesen, who played with velvet-tipped mallet-fingers. The famous descending chromatic scales in the bass were not as sadistic as have been heard from the same stage but his sense of spacious perspective gave it satisfying symmetry and his tone was always enjoyably zestful. The attendance figure was 10,703.

* * *

ON THE PRECEDING evening, Saturday, a formidable crowd of 13,290 took advantage of the brisk, clear night to come hear Leinsdorf conduct the Wagner "Flying Dutchman" overture, the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra. As a bonus there was the B flat Tchaikovsky piano concerto with Van Cliburn as soloist.

Cliburn stands tall and erect but he is twice his own height in modesty and native, unpretending dignity. He gave a dramatic performance of the concerto with which he won the Moscow competition 10 years ago, forcing a hard tone at times in his effort to emphasize the numerous peaks of a work now almost becoming hackneyed. The ovation tendered the soloist was sensational. Call after recall finally won two little encores for the whistling and cheering audience, a Liszt transcription of a Schumann Lied and a little arabesque from the soloist's pen written when he was fourteen.

* * *

FROM A MUSICAL assay the Bartok was the bright star of Leinsdorf's evening. This, with the Lutoslawski concerto on Friday evening, calls for a huge orchestra, a much more complete brass platoon and a complete percussion battery. It also has an intimate relationship with the Boston orchestra from the day of the commission and first performance. Leinsdorf enhanced the many vivid pictures the score might well conceal and made of it a personal triumph.

* * *

THE STORM FRIDAY afternoon fortunately had well spent itself by concert time so that the evening concert basked, paradoxically, in cool, refreshing air. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis orchestra, was the guest conductor, for the second successive year, and the construction of his program allowed a totally stimulating evening.

It has been commonly assumed that Berlioz' overture "The Corsair" was based on Byron's poem but the nature of the music by no means suggests distaff involvement. One would have difficulty visualizing "Medora" as the literary embodiment of one of Byron's lemans. Furthermore, the music has no affinity with Byron, the professional melancholic, as much as Berlioz admired his elder contemporary. The French composer was more deeply inspired for this opus by James Fenimore Cooper who, with his family, spent seven years in Europe at the one-third mark of the 19th century. During that time he wrote his "Red Rover," which, with his other works, was the basis of his international reputation.

"THE CORSAIR" was used to extract the zenith of virtuosity from the responsive Boston orchestra. The program then proceeded to a fascinating new (to Tanglewood) concerto for orchestra by the conductor's fellow-countryman, Witold Lutoslawski, bewitching in inventiveness, rhythmic variety and timbre. Skrowaczewski made it a graphic narrative, as it groped experimentally to all ends of the chromatic horizon, even suggesting Stockhausean rumblings and scrapings in the Capriccio. The Passacaglia begins with pachydermatous ploddings in the double basses which persist as a drone as the elaboration engages the other voices and accumulates diversity in the manner of the Ravel "Bolero." Lutoslawski doesn't fear to demand wonderfully effective but treacherous harmonics from the whole violin section.

* * *

THE DVORAK SYMPHONY No. 7, in D Major, Opus 70, closed the evening and the conductor made the most of the luscious adagio and the popular and entrancing scherzo. The whole program was unrelentingly romantic and climax-prone and it was obviously not Skrowaczewski's intention ever to moderate or alleviate the excitement.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 22 1968

New England Newsclip

HOUR, NORWALK, CONN.— FRIDAY, JULY 26, 1968

Van Cliburn Thrills Tanglewood Audience

Whatever else may have been said by reviewers who attended the third weekend of this summer's Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., along with the thousand of enthusiastic listeners, nothing can quite account for the standing and repeated ovation, the acclaim and enthusiasm following the evening of Van Cliburn. He rendered the Tchaikovsky Concerto for piano and orchestra; No. 1, in B flat with the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf.

The program for July 20 was as varied as it was compelling to eager listening — opening with a fiery presentation of Wagner's Der fliegende Hollander and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. Bartok, who is not always a favorite among the old school enthusiasts, has something in his concerto of indelible beauty in its middle sections.

The crowded parking lots, the lawn, and the capacity seating in the shed gave evidence that the music lovers had come for a very certain reason, and they did not go away disappointed. Van Cliburn, who for many consecutive seasons has been a top drawing card for the Tanglewood audiences, grows with the years — in musical stature, of course, but in a personal charm and rapport with his music friends that comes alive, more and more at each appearance.

That his Tchaikovsky was at his best, was evidenced by the audience who would not let him go. It would have been interesting to have counted the curtain calls — innumerable and intense. The acclaim was rewarded by the rendering of two encores, a practically unheard gesture following a long and difficult program. It was a memorable, beautiful, occasion. The weatherman stamped it with his approval, following a stormy Friday night when a special feature for that program was an electrifying experience, hearing the Lutoslawski concerto for orchestra, under Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, guest conductor, the Berlioz Overture Le Corsaire, and concluding with Dvorak's Symphony Number 7 in D Minor. It was a lovely program, with an accelerated tempo that gave no pause for anything but ~~anything~~ ~~but~~ greatest enthusiasm.

—R. E. H.

* * *

Erich Leinsdorf was on deck Saturday evening for three pieces, "The Flying Dutchman" overture by Wagner, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, and Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Piano concerto, with Van Cliburn as soloist.

Leinsdorf had a bad time of it in the Wagner. The orchestra was unresponsive and untheatrical. The brasses were saving their lips for the Bartok and deprived the concertgoers of what could have been an exciting reading. Even the ending was a mess, with the orchestra holding onto the final chord that Leinsdorf had long since discontinued.

The Bartok was not much better. The first movement began quite well, and I admired all those lost bassoon parts immensely, but at bar 231 things really fell apart. Only Everett Firth, timpanist, knew where he was, Leinsdorf somehow brought everyone together and the movement continued cautiously.

The cautious attitude took the spontaneity right out of the performance. The only outstanding part through the remainder of the work was the opening of the third movement, which was more mysterious than can be described here.

The allegretto intermezzo was taken as an allegro, destroying its suppleness, and I thought I heard the cymbal player come in early although he might have just tripped over his instrument by mistake. The finale was good but uneventful.

When the intermission drew to a close, Van Cliburn was soloist in the Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto. His mercurial approach has not changed much in the last 10 years and continues to win the audience over completely. I can't understand why such a powerful pianist needs so much pedal, though. Really, he could carry a sound all the way to the lake if he wanted to without resorting to artifical means.

Leinsdorf was very good in the accompaniment and the orchestra played loudly enough to be heard, for a change. Perhaps they were embarrassed by the piano volume.

Schenectady Gazette 7-22-'68

VAN CLIBURN

Cliburn Still Catering To Mass Audience

By JAKE SHERMAN

Some critic once observed that after a concert by pianist Rudolf Serkin audiences always said "What beautiful music," while after a concert by Jose Iturbi, another pianist, their invariable reaction was "What a great performance!"

The remark was made to distinguish between two very different kinds of musicians—those who subordinate their technique to the composition at hand and those who allow their technique to completely overshadow it.

Van Cliburn, who appears Saturday night at Tangleood with the Boston Symphony, belongs to the "great performers" category. He is a pianist of truly staggering technical gifts, but one who, for the time being at least, has given no indication that he can put the music ahead of him self.

Cliburn could probably win more respect for himself in the music world were he to become more adventurous in the selection of works he played. But his choice of Tchaikowsky's First Piano Concerto, the piece with which he snowed Russian audiences ten years ago and which has won him the most popularity, proves that he is still very much caught up in the mass audience syndrome.

Without Much Thought

One can scarcely fault his playing of the work. The virtuoso pyrotechnics Tachaikowsky wrote into it—crashing chords and racing octave runs—seem almost tailor-made for Cliburn's naturally flashy style. And, in spite of all the criticism to the contrary, he does play with feeling if without much thought.

One wishes one could say as much for the Boston Symphony. With each Tanglewood concert, it seems to grow more mechanical. Like so many disgruntled union men, the musicians appear to be willing to put out exactly what's required of them and not one jot more.

Their lack of ardor was evident in the Tchaikowsky work in which the contrast between Cliburn's vigorous attack and the technically perfect, but otherwise lacklustre support of the orchestra couldn't have been more noticeable. Only in the concerto's familiar last movement was some sense of community gained between piano and orchestra.

The absence of enthusiasm could conceivably be forgiven on such a tired warhorse as the piano concerto but not on such a musically more interesting piece as Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. Once again, all is technically precise, but the wit of the second movement, the blood-racing excitment of the first, these are missing. Even Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture sounded slightly anemic.

Could Do Better

Whether the Boston Symphony, under the expert but hardly spirited baton of Erich Leinsdorf, is reacting to what it considers an insufficiently challenging repertoire or whether it is put off by the cultural borscht circuit atmosphere of Tanglewood remains debatable. What is not to be disputed is that this world-renowned orchestra is capable of something better.

As to Cliburn, he will grow only when he learns to put his prodigious talents in the service of larger musical ends. This will mean, for one thing, attempting music—and there is a considerable amount of 19th century music in this category—that calls for intelligent subtlety and insight.

And it may also mean temporarily putting off those audiences which now accord him standing ovations, and, at the conclusion of his concert, rush to the front of the auditorium to touch his large, incredibly dextrous hands.

On Sunday afternoon, the orchestra, again under Mr. Leinsdorf, offered an all-Beethoven progam that featured the Second and Eighth Symphonies as well as the famed "Emperor" Piano Concerto. Grant Johannesen was the soloist on the latter work.

Satnislaw Skrowaczewski led the orchestra Friday night in Berlioz' "Le Corsaire" Overture. Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra and Dvorshak's Symphony No. 7 in D minor.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,013 SUN. 129,006

JUL 22 1968

Cliburn Brings House Down With Concerto

Last weekend at Tanglewood started on Friday evening with a brilliant concert despite the weather that accounted for the small audience of 3,963. Guest Conductor was Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, musical director of the Minneapolis Symphony and a familiar guest on Tanglewood's podium.

The highlight of the evening was the "Concerto for Orchestra," written by Poland's leading composer, Witold Lutoslowski, who was a member of the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center in 1962. This orchestral work was composed 15 years ago when the composer was influenced b yStavinsky. It was a highly colorful and interesting work conducted with deep feeling. The Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 (formerly the 2nd), performed by the full Boston Symphony, now in residence at Tanglewood, after the Esplanade Series in Boston.

Saturday evening brought to Tanglewood the great musical hero in American music circles. It was "Cliburn" night at the festival, and it drew an audience of 13,298, somewhat smaller than in previous years. It is 10 years since Van Cliburn returned from Moscow in 1958 bringing with him the first prize of the Tschaikowsky piano competition when the country accorded him a hero's welcome, and he has attracted so many people everywhere.

He performed the prize-winning Tschaikowsky Piano Concerto. His performance of this work was one of great contrasts, and while his technique is startling, he slurred and blurred many of the poetic, sensuous passages and pounded heavily in the strong phrasings and harmonics. Chilburn pleased the large audience who responded with tumultuous applause and would not leave the shed until he returned again and again.

Finally, Cliburn succumbed to the enthusiasm of his listeners with a surprise encore, unprecedented at Tanglewood by playing Schuman's Lied transposed for the piano by Liszt — "Vidmung." It thrilled everyone with its beauty and haunting melody, a magnificent rendition.

Again the audience responded with loud bravos and still would not disperse, and Van Cliburn sat down and played a lovely piece that was unfamiliar to everyone, it seems, but may have been an original composition by the pianist. The second encore was well received and the audience was happy to leave, having heard Van Cliburn at his very best.

The first half of the program was conducted brilliantly by Erich Leinsdorf, starting with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture and Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," a most interesting, at times witty and thrilling, orchestration.

Tonight Tanglewood continues the new Contemporary Trends concerts with Music from India, featuring Ravi Shankar, playing the sitar, Ali Akbar performing the sarod and many other musicians from north and south India.

Next Friday evening the full Boston Symphony orchestra will perform Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, Weber's Konzertstuck with George Bolet, pianist, Rimsky-Korsakov: Antar and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy with Bolet. Saturday evening will present Brahms "Requiem" with soloists Boatwright, Milnes, Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir. Leinsdorf will conduct both Friday's and Saturday's concerts. Sunday's concert will feature guest conductor Alfred Krips with Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Stravinski's "Firebird Suite."

SSM

BERKSHIRE EAGLE 7/26/68

A Concordance Of Tanglewoods

When the Saratoga Performing Arts Center opened its gates two years ago, there was worried speculation hereabouts as to the effect on the Berkshire Festival box office. Pessimists predicted there would not be enough music lovers to go around.

They were wrong, of course. The near-record 13,290 who enjoyed the Van Cliburn concert at Tanglewood Saturday attested to that. The Berkshire and Saratoga festivals are thriving as symbiotically as anyone could expect of two major summer music attractions within an hour's drive of each other.

Nor are these festivals the only ones of their genre, though surely they are two of the best. A recent New York Times summary listed no less than 113 — count 'em, 113 — musical events in the Northeast and Midwest this summer, including the Marlboro (Vermont) Music Festival with the Serkins; the Caramoor festival in Katonah, New York; the Yale Concerts in Norwich, Connecticut; the Lincoln Center Festival '68; the Ravinia Festival with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; the New York Philharmonic's Promenades '68; the Provincetown Music Festival; and many, many others. Even Daytona Beach has latched onto the London Symphony Orchestra for a midsummer "international music festival." Then there is the celebrated Blossom Music Center festival, put on by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra under the direction of George Szell in a $7 million, 800-acre site 30 miles south of Cleveland.

Of all the up-and-coming musical enterprises, this one is most akin to Tanglewood. The Blossom Music Center, named after a prominent Cleveland family, has a huge pavilion in a natural amphitheater with space for 4,632 inside and more than 15,000 outside. It will encompass a summer music school much like the pioneering Berkshire Music Center in Lenox.

But no one at Tanglewood seems to be fretting unduly about the competition today. These summer festivals make economic sense for big orchestras seeking full-time employment for their members. And they meet a demand for fine, live music which evidently keeps growing year after year.

Tanglewood Draws In Spite of Rain

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — In spite of Friday's rain, Tanglewood attendance for the third week was excellent. Wednesday's "Contemporary Trends" jazz-folk concert drew 6,405. Grant Johannesen, pianist, who will be heard next season in Worcester Community Concerts, attracted 10,703 yesterday.

Gazette Review

Saturday, Van Cliburn brought in 13,298 customers, a thousand more than last year and almost as good as the phenomenal 14,275 of 1966. He will be heard in the Rachmaninoff Third at the 109th Worcester Festival on Tuesday, Oct. 22.

The first hour of Saturday's concert was broadcast in color over channel 2. Erich Leinsdorf, leading the full orchestra for the first time in this series, kept his forces under splendid control, producing tonal colors which had sheen and warmth.

Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" ranged from dark foreboding to redeeming love and even a touch of rough sailors' humor.

Bartok Concerto

Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," written at the behest of the Koussevitzky Foundation and premiered in Boston in 1944, featured virtuoso work by the entire wind section. Its early seriousness broke into humor in the fourth movement, as a gay, operetta song was quoted literally. The bumbling activity of the fleet finale was something to hear.

Cliburn and Leinsdorf worked together beautifully. The Tchaikovsky Paino Concrto No. 1 in B flat, with which Cliburn won in Moscow ten years ago, was given body and meaning to offset its alternate tendencies toward bombast and sentiment. Humor again crept into the program, in the simple gaiety of the second movement.

Cliburn, a shade more stocky now, seems to have matured steadily. After many recalls to the stage, he yielded to the audience's pleas and played two solo encores, the Schumann-Liszt "Widmung" and his own "Nostalgia," written at the age of 14.

Van Cliburn at Tanglewood

38.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Sunday July 21 at 2:30 pm
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 36
- Adagio molto — allegro con brio
- Larghetto
- Scherzo: allegro
- Allegro molto

Symphony no. 8 in F major op. 93
- Allegro vivace e con brio
- Allegretto scherzando
- Tempo di menuetto
- Allegro vivace

intermission

Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 5 in E flat op. 73 'The Emperor'*
- Allegro
- Adagio un poco mosso
- Rondo: allegro ma non tanto

GRANT JOHANNESEN

Grant Johannesen plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 37

This afternoon's concert is being televised in color by WGBH, Boston. Occasional scenes of the audience may be included.

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

All-Beethoven at Lenox

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX — Sunday's program at Tanglewood was an afternoon of pure aural delight. The all Beethoven program which included the second and eight symphonies and the fifth piano concerto found conductor, soloist and orchestra in splendid form.

★ ★ ★

THE SECOND symphony which opened the program is smoother and more discursive than the first. There is more color in the orchestration, and the music is clear and luminous from beginning to end. The themes of the Larghetto in particular are most expressive and Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave them a most sympathetic exposition. The Scherzo was notable for the fine work of the string and woodwind sections and the finale had the necessary verve and brightness to bring the symphony to a brilliant close.

While the thematic material used is different, the Symphony No. 8 is similar to the second in that it is in a major key and the prevailing mood of the music is joyous.

These two Beethoven symphonies which were perfect summer fare were received most enthusiastically by the capacity audience.

★ ★ ★

THE CONCERTO for piano and orchestra in E Flat Major and best known as "The Emperor" has long been one of the most popular of concertos. It is a work of great power and breadth and provides a perfect vehicle for a master pianist. Grant Johannesen was a most impressive soloist in this imposing work.

The opening Allegro had a majesty of style with exceptional vitality in the rhythmic figures, and throughout the concerto his technique was fluent and accurate.

We have never heard the lyric sections played with more beauty of tone, particularly the Adagio. All in all, this was a most brilliant performance and earned Mr. Johannesen many recalls. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave magnificent support to the soloist.

GRANT JOHANNESEN

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,603

JUL 22 1968

Inspiration Lacking In Symphony Program

By BERNARD LOTH

TANGLEWOOD — The Boston Symphony with its music director, Erich Leinsdorf on the podium and Grant Johannesen, pianist, presented an all Beethoven program Sunday. The easy two-hour drive to Lenox, Mass. taking Rt. 84, the Taconic, 20 cents of the Thruway and a few miles on Routes 102 and 183 in Massachusetts were a pleasant prelude to a fine concert.

The orchestra played Symphonies No. 2 and No. 8 and the soloist joined in the Fifth Piano Concerto "The Emperor."

Mr. Leinsdorf was firmly in command of the orchestra and led it through the familiar and beautiful Beethoven compositions to the enthusiastic satisfaction of the huge audience.

Conducting entirely without a score and before a battery of television cameras for a Boston channel, nothing was wrong except one floodlight aimed at the conductor for the benefit of the camera behind the orchestra which also poured a great deal of candlepower into the eyes of the audience to the noticeable discomfort of a number of people including your reviewer.

However there is a difference between a good workmanlike, polished performance and an inspiring one. There was roundness of tone throughout. There were moments of beauty, but there was a lack of clean delineation of beat and some attacks — not that there was anything wrong, just that there was the lack of inspiration.

Mr. Johannesen also did nothing wrong except a number of clinkers, but he also failed to give more than a good workmanlike professional performance. Of course inspiring performances cannot be produced every day, but one can hope, especially when the music is so well known.

The Shed at Tanglewood lacks the architectural refinement of the amphitheater at Saratoga. It lacks a balcony; it has plain, hard metal chairs and a dirt floor, but the roof is wood and the sides are wood, less imaginative than Saratoga, in every detail except the sound.

There is a richer, mellower, rounder tone in the Shed. The comparison is offered because both music centers have world-famous orchestras and conductors, Saratoga featuring the Philadelphia Orchestra in August after the July season of the New York City Ballet, and both are about two hours away.

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony At Berkshire Festival To Be On TV Sunday

Channel 2 will climax its live coverage from the 1968 Berkshire Festival with a full-length concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, live and in color, next Sunday, July 21 at 2:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH radio in stereo, direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the all-Beethoven concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature the gifted American pianist Grant Johannesen.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct two Beethoven Symphonys — Nos. 2 and 8, and Grant Johannesen will perform one of the most popular of all Beethoven Piano Concertos, "The Emperor".

The last of four live color telecasts from Tanglewood, this concert was produced for television by WGBH Special Projects Director Greg Harney and directed by William Cosel.

Other Berkshire Festival programs seen earlier included a jazz concert by singer-guitarist Judy Collins, the Don Ellis Orchestra and the Modern Jazz Quartet.

Today's program is by the Berkshire Music Center Orcheatra, and the first half of the Boston Symphony's Saturday night concert will be July 20, when Erich Leinsdorf conducts the overture to Wagner's opera "The Flying Dutchman" and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUL 20 1968

New England Newsclip

GRANT JOHANNESEN, American pianist, will perform Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto in E flat with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Channel 2 To Air Berkshire Music

Channel 2 will climax its live coverage from the 1968 Berkshire Festival with a full-length concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, live and in color, Sunday, July 21 at 2:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH radio in stereo, direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the all-Beethoven concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature the gifted American pianist Grant Johannesen.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct two Beethoven Symphonys—Nos. 2 and 8, and Grant Johannesen will perform one of the most popular of all Beethoven Piano Concertos, "The Emperor".

The last of four live color telecasts from Tanglewood, this concert was produced for television by WGBH Special Projects Director Greg Harney and directed by William Cosel.

ITEM (e)
CLINTON, MASS.
CIRC. 3,550

JUL 13 1968

New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concert on Channel 2 Sunday

Channel 2 will climax its live coverage from the 1968 Berkshire Festival with a full-length concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, live and in color, Sunday, July 21, 2:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH radio in stereo, direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the all-Beethoven concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature pianist Grant Johannesen.

Program includes Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 2 and 8, and "The Emperor" piano concerto.

38.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

Sunday July 21 at 2:30 pm
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 36

Adagio molto — allegro con brio
Larghetto
Scherzo: allegro
Allegro molto

Symphony no. 8 in F major op. 93

Allegro vivace e con brio
Allegretto scherzando
Tempo di menuetto
Allegro vivace

intermission

Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 5 in E flat op. 73
'The Emperor'*

Allegro
Adagio un poco mosso
Rondo: allegro ma non tanto

GRANT JOHANNESEN

Grant Johannesen plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 37

This afternoon's concert is being televised in color by WGBH, Boston. Occasional scenes of the audience may be included.

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*.

All-Beethoven at Lenox

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX — Sunday's program at Tanglewood was an afternoon of pure aural delight. The all Beethoven program which included the second and eight symphonies and the fifth piano concerto found conductor, soloist and orchestra in splendid form.

★ ★ ★

THE SECOND symphony which opened the program is smoother and more discursive than the first. There is more color in the orchestration; and the music is clear and luminous from beginning to end. The themes of the Larghetto in particular are most expressive and Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave them a most sympathetic exposition. The Scherzo was notable for the fine work of the string and woodwind sections and the finale had the necessary verve and brightness to bring the symphony to a brilliant close.

While the thematic material used is different, the Symphony No. 8 is similar to the second in that it is in a major key and the prevailing mood of the music is joyous.

These two Beethoven symphonies which were perfect summer fare were received most enthusiastically by the capacity audience.

★ ★ ★

THE CONCERTO for piano and orchestra in E Flat Major and best known as "The Emperor" has long been one of the most popular of concertos. It is a work of great power and breadth and provides a perfect vehicle for a master pianist. Grant Johannesen was a most impressive soloist in this imposing work.

The opening Allegro had a majesty of style with exceptional vitality in the rhythmic figures, and throughout the concerto his technique was fluent and accurate.

We have never heard the lyric sections played with more beauty of tone, particularly the Adagio. All in all, this was a most brilliant performance and earned Mr. Johannesen many recalls. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave magnificent support to the soloist.

GRANT JOHANNESEN

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 54,603

JUL 22 1968

Inspiration Lacking In Symphony Program

By BERNARD LOTH

TANGLEWOOD — The Boston Symphony with its music director, Erich Leinsdorf on the podium and Grant Johannesen, pianist, presented an all Beethoven program Sunday. The easy two-hour drive to Lenox, Mass. taking Rt. 84, the Taconic, 20 cents of the Thruway and a few miles on Routes 102 and 183 in Massachusetts were a pleasant prelude to a fine concert.

The orchestra played Symphonies No. 2 and No. 8 and the soloist joined in the Fifth Piano Concerto "The Emperor."

Mr. Leinsdorf was firmly in command of the orchestra and led it through the familiar and beautiful Beethoven compositions to the enthusiastic satisfaction of the huge audience.

Conducting entirely without a score and before a battery of television cameras for a Boston channel, nothing was wrong except one floodlight aimed at the conductor for the benefit of the camera behind the orchestra which also poured a great deal of candlepower into the eyes of the audience to the noticeable discomfort of a number of people including your reviewer.

However there is a difference between a good workmanlike, polished performance and an inspiring one. There was roundness of tone throughout. There were moments of beauty, but there was a lack of clean delineation of beat and some attacks — not that there was anything wrong, just that there was the lack of inspiration.

Mr. Johannesen also did nothing wrong except a number of clinkers, but he also failed to give more than a good workmanlike professional performance. Of course inspiring performances cannot be produced every day, but one can hope, especially when the music is so well known.

The Shed at Tanglewood lacks the architectural refinement of the amphitheater at Saratoga. It lacks a balcony; it has plain, hard metal chairs and a dirt floor, but the roof is wood and the sides are wood, less imaginative than Saratoga, in every detail except the sound.

There is a richer, mellower, rounder tone in the Shed. The comparison is offered because both music centers have world-famous orchestras and conductors, Saratoga featuring the Philadelphia Orchestra in August after the July season of the New York City Ballet, and both are about two hours away.

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony At Berkshire Festival To Be On TV Sunday

Channel 2 will climax its live coverage from the 1968 Berkshire Festival with a full-length concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, live and in color, next Sunday, July 21 at 2:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH radio in stereo, direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the all-Beethoven concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature the gifted American pianist Grant Johannesen.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct two Beethoven Symphonys — Nos. 2 and 8, and Grant Johannesen will perform one of the most popular of all Beethoven Piano Concertos, "The Emperor".

The last of four live color telecasts from Tanglewood, this concert was produced for television by WGBH Special Projects Director Greg Harney and directed by William Cosel.

Other Berkshire Festival programs seen earlier included a jazz concert by singer-guitarist Judy Collins, the Don Ellis Orchestra and the Modern Jazz Quartet.

Today's program is by the Berkshire Music Center Orcheatra, and the first half of the Boston Symphony's Saturday night concert will be July 20, when Erich Leinsdorf conducts the overture to Wagner's opera "The Flying Dutchman" and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUL 20 1968

New England Newsclip

GRANT JOHANNESEN, American pianist, will perform Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto in E flat with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Channel 2 To Air Berkshire Music

PAGE ONE

Channel 2 will climax its live coverage from the 1968 Berkshire Festical with a full-length concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, live and in color, Sunday, July 21 at 2:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH radio in stereo, direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the all-Beethoven concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature the gifted American pianist Grant Johannesen.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct two Beethoven Symphonys—Nos. 2 and 8, and Grant Johannesen will perform one of the most popular of all Beethoven Piano Concertos, "The Emperor".

The last of four live color telecasts from Tanglewood, this concert was produced for television by WGBH Special Projects Director Greg Harney and directed by William Cosel.

ITEM (e)
CLINTON, MASS.
CIRC. 3,550

JUL 13 1968

New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concert on Channel 2 Sunday

Channel 2 will climax its live coverage from the 1968 Berkshire Festival with a full-length concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, live and in color, Sunday, July 21, 2:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH radio in stereo, direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the all-Beethoven concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature pianist Grant Johannesen.

Program includes Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 2 and 8, and "The Emperor" piano concerto.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 22 1968

New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Beethoven Proves Right Prescription For Music Lovers

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There were 10,703 listeners at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to receive a nice, big dose of Beethoven. It was good medicine, and they loved it.

Johannesen Soloist

First there was Symphony No. 2 and then Symphony No. 8 . . . more than an hour of straight, standard, inevitably popular symphonic fare.

Then, after intermission, there was Grant Johannesen as soloist for the "Emperor" concerto (No. 5, Op. 73). Erich Leinsdorf conducted all of it under bright lights for television.

There were two aspects (at least) of the music worthy of more than passing mention; one was Leinsdorf's mellowing approach to Beethoven, and the other was the odd contrast between the sunny, joyous atmosphere that pervades these three works and the personal anguish the composer was enduring at the time of their composition.

Sun and Fun

The second symphony was written in 1802 when Beethoven was in the depths of despair because he had learned that his increasing deafness was incurable; the concerto was written in 1809 under the hateful military occupation of Vienna by the French following a Napoleonic bombardment; the eighth symphony was written in 1812 when Beethoven was touring Europe's spas seeking a cure for a digestive disorder and fighting with his brother who was about to make a bad marriage.

There doesn't seem to be the slightest hint in this music of the psychological pressures on the composer.

It is all sun and fun and Leinsdorf spread it graciously. There was no electric tension a la Toscanini. It was spacious, genial, generous and infinitely relaxing.

Not Fireworks, Music

Someone looking for jumping action in the music would have been disappointed. All the corners were rounded, the edges smoothed and the transitions eased.

Johannesen, one of the nation's more reliable and satisfying pianists, fell right in with the mood. He played with substance, accuracy and grace. There were no fireworks. There was music.

Attendance for the week, including the 6504 at Wednesday's Contemporary Trend concert and the 3511 at Saturday morning's open rehearsal, was 37,880.

Next weekend the guests will be Jorge Bolet, pianist (Friday); Helen Boatwright, soprano; Sherrill Milnes, baritone (with choir and chorus Saturday); Joseph Krips, conductor (Sunday); special event will be Brahm's "Requiem" Saturday.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The 10,30 a. m. chamber music concert in the Tanglewood theater was thoroughly delightful, not only because of the perfection of the performance, but also because of the choice of program.

The New England Wind Quintet, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played four pieces that began with a light and airy classical quintet written by Giovanni Cambini about 1809 in the Haydn-Mozart style and became very gradually more and more spicy without ever losing the smiling good humor of the first piece.

The second was Suite, Opus 57, by Lefebvre, an unhurried, gently romantic piece, neither sweet nor dry, that seemed like a stroll through the park on a pleasant day.

Cheerful Collection

The third was Milhaud's "La Cheminee du Roi Rene" (1942), a cheerful collection of seven short sections that were slightly off center in harmony, a bit off beat in the rhythm and mildly unpredictable in melody.

It was piquant and capricious, the most entertaining piece on the program.

The last was "Concerto for Wind Quintet" by William Bergsma, 47. Its salty modernism seemed to be in direct progression from Milhaud's piece. It held the same flavor a bit more strongly without becoming acid or acrid.

Easy, Flawless

Throughout the program the quintet played with unpretentious precision. It seemed flawless while retaining an air of easy freedom, neither shy nor assertive.

The members of the quintet are Lois Schaefer, flute; Laurence Thorstenberg, oboe; Peter Hadcock, clarinet; Matthew Ruggiero, bassoon; Thomas Newell, horn.

Next Sunday the morning chamber-music program will present the Music Guild String Quartet, also made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Haydn's "Rider" quartet, Opus 74, No. ; Bartok's Quartet No. 3 and Ravel's F major quartet.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

WGBH Broadcasts From Tanglewood

A complete performance of Brahms' "German Requiem" highlights the live Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts from Tanglewood on WGBH-FM on Saturday, July 27 at 9 p.m. The Requiem is performed by the Berkshire Festival, Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir, and soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

Earlier in the week conductor Leinsdorf is joined by two top flight pianists, as Grant Johannessen performs Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "The Emperor" on Sunday, July 21 at 2:30 p.m., and on Friday, July 26 at 9 p.m. Jorge Bolet plays Weber's Konzertstuck and the Hungarian Fantasy by Liszt. The Sunday concert will also be televised live by Channel 2.

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A PROGRAM of magnificent Beethoven closed the third weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood. Two of the even-numbered symphonies, Nos. 2 and 8, which classroom clichés like to index as the placid ones (the odd ones are supposed to be grand and dramatic), preceded a performance of the E flat piano concerto, one of Beethoven's three greatest, with Grant Johannesen as the deeply convincing soloist.

This was the first weekend at which the entire personnel of the Boston Symphony participated, as some two-thirds of the orchestra had remained behind on their home grounds for the last two weeks of the Esplanade concerts.

The D Major Symphony, Opus 36, No. 2, stands near the top in the opinion of many Beethovenites. Erich Leinsdorf gave it an authoritative reading. The strings were a little more definite and cleanly articulated than the winds in such details as the double dotted notes but the over-all conception was remarkably unified and forceful.

* * *

THE 8TH SYMPHONY'S four movements are gems. It, as the 2nd, requires a smaller orchestra than in the more popularly famous 5th and 6th. Leinsdorf's terse penetration gave it finesse and distinction. There are several identifiable details of humor which the composer inserted, an attribute not generally associated with Beethoven, although few of the immortals, from Shakespeare down, lacked a sense of playing with words or notes.

The Emperor concerto involves the orchestra more than as a mere accompaniment. By this time in his life, Beethoven wrote the background as a type of symphony. Leinsdorf kept it discreet and vibrant to match the performance of Johannesen, who played with velvet-tipped mallet-fingers. The famous descending chromatic scales in the bass were not as sadistic as have been heard from the same stage but his sense of spacious perspective gave it satisfying symmetry and his tone was always enjoyably zestful. The attendance figure was 10,703.

* * *

Berkshire Eagle
7-22-'68

37,800 Attended Concerts At Tanglewood Last Week

The attendance count for five concerts at Tanglewood last week was 37,880, of which 13,298 was accounted for by Van Cliburn's appearance on Saturday night. The star pianist did not quite break the Tanglewood attendance record, but he drew thundering applause for playing Tchaikowsky's No. 1 concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The result was two encores, "Vidnrung," Schumann-Liszt, and "Nostalgia" by Cliburn himself.

Eric Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony, conducted both the Saturday night and Sunday afternoon concerts. The Saturday evening program opened with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner, and the brilliantly colorful Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok.

On Sunday afternoon, an all-Beethoven program pleased an audience of more than 10,000, filling the Music Shed and spreading over the sunlit lawns. Symphony No. 2 and Symphony No. 8 were played, one right after the other. Then the Emperor Concerto was presented with Grant Johannesen as piano soloist.

The jazz-folk concert given on Wednesday night drew a crowd of 6504, which indicates that the experiment in presenting current popular music is working well. This week the series will offer Ravi Shenkar, famous Indian sitar player.

Programs for the coming weekend will include a Friday night concert with works by Kraft, Weber, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Liszt, with piano soloist Jorge Bolet, will be conducted by Leinsdorf. On Saturday night Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra, the Berkshire Chorus, and the Tanglewood Choir in Brahms' Requiem, and Sunday afternoon, Joseph Krips will be guest conductor for a program including Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, "Don Juan" by Strauss, and Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 22 1968

New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 22 1968

New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Beethoven Proves Right Prescription For Music Lovers

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There were 10,703 listeners at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to receive a nice, big dose of Beethoven. It was good medicine, and they loved it.

Johannesen Soloist

First there was Symphony No. 2 and then Symphony No. 8 . . . more than an hour of straight, standard, inevitably popular symphonic fare.

Then, after intermission, there was Grant Johannesen as soloist for the "Emperor" concerto (No. 5, Op. 73). Erich Leinsdorf conducted all of it under bright lights for television.

There were two aspects (at least) of the music worthy of more than passing mention; one was Leinsdorf's mellowing approach to Beethoven, and the other was the odd contrast between the sunny, joyous atmosphere that pervades these three works and the personal anguish the composer was enduring at the time of their composition.

Sun and Fun

The second symphony was written in 1802 when Beethoven was in the depths of despair because he had learned that his increasing deafness was incurable; the concerto was written in 1809 under the hateful military occupation of Vienna by the French following a Napoleonic bombardment; the eighth symphony was written in 1812 when Beethoven was touring Europe's spas seeking a cure for a digestive disorder and fighting with his brother who was about to make a bad marriage.

There doesn't seem to be the slightest hint in this music of the psychological pressures on the composer.

It is all sun and fun and Leinsdorf spread it graciously. There was no electric tension a la Toscannini. It was spacious, genial, generous and infinitely relaxing.

Not Fireworks, Music

Someone looking for jumping action in the music would have been disappointed. All the corners were rounded, the edges smoothed and the transitions eased.

Johannesen, one of the nation's more reliable and satisfying pianists, fell right in with the mood. He played with substance, accuracy and grace. There were no fireworks. There was music.

Attendance for the week, including the 6504 at Wednesday's Contemporary Trend concert and the 3511 at Saturday morning's open rehearsal, was 37,880.

Next weekend the guests will be Jorge Bolet, pianist (Friday); Helen Boatwright, soprano; Sherrill Milnes, baritone (with choir and chorus Saturday); Joseph Krips, conductor (Sunday); special event will be Brahm's "Requiem" Saturday.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The 10,30 a. m. chamber music concert in the Tanglewood theater was thoroughly delightful, not only because of the perfection of the performance, but also because of the choice of program.

The New England Wind Quintet, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played four pieces that began with a light and airy classical quintet written by Giovanni Cambini about 1809 in the Haydn-Mozart style and became very gradually more and more spicy without ever losing the smiling good humor of the first piece.

The second was Suite, Opus 57, by Lefebvre, an unhurried, gently romantic piece, neither sweet nor dry, that seemed like a stroll through the park on a pleasant day.

Cheerful Collection

The third was Milhaud's "La Cheminee du Roi Rene" (1942), a cheerful collection of seven short sections that were slightly off center in harmony, a bit off beat in the rhythm and mildly unpredictable in melody.

It was piquant and capricious, the most entertaining piece on the program.

The last was "Concerto for Wind Quintet" by William Bergsma, 47. Its salty modernism seemed to be in direct progression from Milhaud's piece. It held the same flavor a bit more strongly without becoming acid or acrid.

Easy, Flawless

Throughout the program the quintet played with unpretentious precision. It seemed flawless while retaining an air of easy freedom, neither shy nor assertive.

The members of the quintet are Lois Schaefer, flute; Laurence Thorstenberg, oboe; Peter Hadcock, clarinet; Matthew Ruggiero, bassoon; Thomas Newell, horn.

Next Sunday the morning chamber-music program will present the Music Guild String Quartet, also made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Haydn's "Rider" quartet, Opus 74, No. ; Bartok's Quartet No. 3 and Ravel's F major quartet.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

WGBH Broadcasts From Tanglewood

A complete performance of Brahms' "German Requiem" highlights the live Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts from Tanglewood on WGBH-FM on Saturday, July 27 at 9 p.m. The Requiem is performed by the Berkshire Festival, Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir, and soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

Earlier in the week conductor Leinsdorf is joined by two top flight pianists, as Grant Johannessen performs Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "The Emperor" on Sunday, July 21 at 2:30 p.m., and on Friday, July 26 at 9 p.m. Jorge Bolet plays Weber's Konzertstuck and the Hungarian Fantasy by Liszt. The Sunday concert will also be televised live by Channel 2.

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A PROGRAM of magnificent Beethoven closed the third weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood. Two of the even-numbered symphonies, Nos. 2 and 8, which classroom clichés like to index as the placid ones (the odd ones are supposed to be grand and dramatic), preceded a performance of the E flat piano concerto, one of Beethoven's three greatest, with Grant Johannesen as the deeply convincing soloist.

This was the first weekend at which the entire personnel of the Boston Symphony participated, as some two-thirds of the orchestra had remained behind on their home grounds for the last two weeks of the Esplanade concerts.

The D Major Symphony, Opus 36, No. 2, stands near the top in the opinion of many Beethovenites. Erich Leinsdorf gave it an authoritative reading. The strings were a little more definite and cleanly articulated than the winds in such details as the double dotted notes but the over-all conception was remarkably unified and forceful.

* * *

THE 8TH SYMPHONY'S four movements are gems. It, as the 2nd, requires a smaller orchestra than in the more popularly famous 5th and 6th. Leinsdorf's terse penetration gave it finesse and distinction. There are several identifiable details of humor which the composer inserted, an attribute not generally associated with Beethoven, although few of the immortals, from Shakespeare down, lacked a sense of playing with words or notes.

The Emperor concerto involves the orchestra more than as a mere accompaniment. By this time in his life, Beethoven wrote the background as a type of symphony. Leinsdorf kept it discreet and vibrant to match the performance of Johannesen, who played with velvet-tipped mallet-fingers. The famous descending chromatic scales in the bass were not as sadistic as have been heard from the same stage but his sense of spacious perspective gave it satisfying symmetry and his tone was always enjoyably zestful. The attendance figure was 10,703.

* * *

Berkshire Eagle
7-22-'68

37,800 Attended Concerts At Tanglewood Last Week

The attendance count for five concerts at Tanglewood last week was 37,880, of which 13,298 was accounted for by Van Cliburn's appearance on Saturday night. The star pianist did not quite break the Tanglewood attendance record, but he drew thundering applause for playing Tchaikowsky's No. 1 concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The result was two encores, "Vidnrung," Schumann-Liszt, and "Nostalgia" by Cliburn himself.

Eric Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony, conducted both the Saturday night and Sunday afternoon concerts. The Saturday evening program opened with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner, and the brilliantly colorful Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok.

On Sunday afternoon, an all-Beethoven program pleased an audience of more than 10,000, filling the Music Shed and spreading over the sunlit lawns. Symphony No. 2 and Symphony No. 8 were played, one right after the other. Then the Emperor Concerto was presented with Grant Johannesen as piano soloist.

The jazz-folk concert given on Wednesday night drew a crowd of 6504, which indicates that the experiment in presenting current popular music is working well. This week the series will offer Ravi Shenkar, famous Indian sitar player.

Programs for the coming weekend will include a Friday night concert with works by Kraft, Weber, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Liszt, with piano soloist Jorge Bolet, will be conducted by Leinsdorf. On Saturday night Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra, the Berkshire Chorus, and the Tanglewood Choir in Brahms' Requiem, and Sunday afternoon, Joseph Krips will be guest conductor for a program including Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, "Don Juan" by Strauss, and Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 22 1968

New England Newsclip

Fourth Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday July 26 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

MALCOLM FRAGER piano

BRAHMS — Sonata for piano in C major op. 1
Allegro
Andante: (nach einem altdeutschen Minnelied)
Scherzo: allegro molto e con fuoco
Finale: allegro con fuoco

LISZT — Hungarian rhapsody no. 8 in F sharp minor

Malcolm Frager plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MALCOLM FRAGER, who has appeared many times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past here at the Berkshire Festival, in Boston and New York, was soloist with the St Louis Symphony at the age of ten. He moved four years later to New York to study with Carl Friedberg, who had been a pupil of Clara Schumann and Johannes Brahms. He started winning significant prizes in 1952, which included the Michaels Memorial Music and the Leventritt Awards. In 1960 he won the first prize at the Queen Elisabeth International Competition in Brussels. Meanwhile he had graduated magna cum laude from Columbia University, and he now speaks seven languages, including Russian. He has given concerts extensively in Europe and South America, and has just returned from his first tour of the Far East.

Will Perform at Tanglewood

SHERRILL MILNES

Sherrill Milnes, baritone, will be heard as soloist in a performance of the German Requiem of Brahms with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tanglewood Choir, and the Berkshire Chorus, Saturday.

HELEN BOATWRIGHT

Helen Boatwright will be featured soloist in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus that will include Bach's Cantata no. 202 (The Wedding Cantata) and Brahms' Requiem op. 49, Saturday.

JORGE BOLET

Jorge Bolet, pianist, will be featured as a soloist in performances of Weber's Konzerstuck and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday.

During the summer the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival will present musical offerings of the broadest scope. With the resident Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Music Center, and visiting attractions the Tanglewood summer will concern itself with concerts from recitals and chamber music to symphonic programs that have made this summer Festival the model to which all others in this country look for leadership.

During the Tanglewood season the Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard in 24 regular Festival programs over the eight-week period which began July 5.

Among programs to be heard this year are:

Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will present much of Brahms' choral music including Ein Deutsches Requiem, Gesang der Parzen, and Schicksalslied.

* * *

By special invitation pianist Gina Bachauer will appear at each concert on Aug. 9, 10, 11 playing Brahms and Rachmaninoff concerti.

* * *

Act I from Wagner's Die Walkure will be heard on Aug. 24. This will be preceded on the same day by the Finale of Das Rheingold, not previously done in concert.

* * *

On Aug. 3 Malcolm Frager will play a version of the Schumann Piano Concerto which he recently discovered.

* * *

Eight guest conductors will share the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts with Mr. Leinsdorf.

* * *

Arthur Fiedler appears on Aug. 14 conducting the Boston Pops at Tanglewood benefit program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 21 1968 — New England Newsclip

4th Berkshire Festival Weekend

The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival is a performance on Saturday evening, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the Orchestras music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. The Tanglewood Choir consists of the Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University. The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the Orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson. Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current Festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan", and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

The Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Saturday morning, July 27, in the Shed at 10:30 a.m. The Sunday Morning Chamber Music Concert will be presented by the Music Guild String Quartet, playing works of Haydn, Bartok, and Ravel.

Berkshire Music Center events include second "Trends" Concert. Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan to teach.

The Berkshire Music Center will present the second of its three Contemporary Trends Concerts on tomorrow evening at 8 in the Music Shed. The program is called "Music from India", and features Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan, and their troupe of Indian musicians.

Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan and the other eleven members of their troupe will be in residence for several days before and after the concert in order to teach and work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center and the related Boston University and New England Conservatory programs.

Also on the Berkshire Music Center schedule are Chamber Music concerts tonight and Thursday and a Faculty recital on the afternoon of July 27. Roman Totenberg, violinist, will be heard with Artur Balsam, pianist, at 2:30 in the Theatre - Concert Hall.

The Festival of Contemporary American Music, co - sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, begins on Sunday, August 4 and continues through Saturday, August 10. Highlights of the week will be the premieres of four new works commissioned for the Festival from composers Mark De Voto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall.

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 15,900

JUL 23 1968 — New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18.650

JUL 30 1968 — New England Newsclip

Boatwright, Milnes, Bolet, Krips, Frager

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival is a performance on Saturday evening, July 27, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. The Tanglewood Choir consists of the Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the Orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson. Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, and Schumann's Sumphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current Festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan", and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

Offer Brahms

Tanglewood, Lenox — The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival is a performance on Saturday evening, July 27, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, Baritone.

The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. The Tanglewood Choir consists of the Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University. The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson.

Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current Festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan", and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

CHRONICLE SUN
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
CIRC. 12,850

JUL 25 1968 — New England Newsclip

CATSKILL MAIL
Friday, July 26, 1968

4th Berkshire Festival Weekend Features Brahms Requiem

NE

The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival is a performance on Saturday evening, July 27, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, Baritone. The 78 voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. Also, on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Contata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend PRELUDE Concert, performing the Brahms C Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Krats' Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra and Schumann's Symbony No. 2.

Fourth Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday July 26 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

MALCOLM FRAGER piano

BRAHMS — Sonata for piano in C major op. 1
Allegro
Andante: (nach einem altdeutschen Minnelied)
Scherzo: allegro molto e con fuoco
Finale: allegro con fuoco

LISZT — Hungarian rhapsody no. 8 in F sharp minor

Malcolm Frager plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MALCOLM FRAGER, who has appeared many times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past here at the Berkshire Festival, in Boston and New York, was soloist with the St Louis Symphony at the age of ten. He moved four years later to New York to study with Carl Friedberg, who had been a pupil of Clara Schumann and Johannes Brahms. He started winning significant prizes in 1952, which included the Michaels Memorial Music and the Leventritt Awards. In 1960 he won the first prize at the Queen Elisabeth International Competition in Brussels. Meanwhile he had graduated magna cum laude from Columbia University, and he now speaks seven languages, including Russian. He has given concerts extensively in Europe and South America, and has just returned from his first tour of the Far East.

Will Perform at Tanglewood

SHERRILL MILNES

Sherrill Milnes, baritone, will be heard as soloist in a performance of the German Requiem of Brahms with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tanglewood Choir, and the Berkshire Chorus, Saturday.

HELEN BOATWRIGHT

Helen Boatwright will be featured soloist in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus that will include Bach's Cantata no. 202 (The Wedding Cantata) and Brahms' Requiem op. 49, Saturday.

JORGE BOLET

Jorge Bolet, pianist, will be featured as a soloist in performances of Weber's Konzerstuck and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday.

During the summer the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival will present musical offerings of the broadest scope. With the resident Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Music Center, and visiting attractions the Tanglewood summer will concern itself with concerts from recitals and chamber music to symphonic programs that have made this summer Festival the model to which all others in this country look for leadership.

During the Tanglewood season the Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard in 24 regular Festival programs over the eight-week period which began July 5.

Among programs to be heard this year are:

Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will present much of Brahms' choral music including Ein Deutsches Requiem, Gesang der Parzen, and Schicksalslied.

* * *

By special invitation pianist Gina Bachauer will appear at each concert on Aug. 9, 10, 11 playing Brahms and Rachmaninoff concerti.

* * *

Act 1 from Wagner's Die Walkure will be heard on Aug. 24. This will be preceded on the same day by the Finale of Das Rheingold, not previously done in concert.

* * *

On Aug. 3 Malcolm Frager will play a version of the Schumann Piano Concerto which he recently discovered.

* * *

Eight guest conductors will share the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts with Mr. Leinsdorf.

* * *

Arthur Fiedler appears on Aug. 14 conducting the Boston Pops at Tanglewood benefit program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 21 1968 New England Newsclip

4th Berkshire Festival Weekend

The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival is a performance on Saturday evening, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the Orchestras music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. The Tanglewood Choir consists of the Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University. The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the Orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson. Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current Festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan", and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

The Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Saturday morning, July 27, in the Shed at 10:30 a.m. The Sunday Morning Chamber Music Concert will be presented by the Music Guild String Quartet, playing works of Haydn, Bartok, and Ravel.

Berkshire Music Center events include second "Trends" Concert. Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan to teach.

The Berkshire Music Center will present the second of its three Contemporary Trends Concerts on tomorrow evening at 8 in the Music Shed. The program is called "Music from India", and features Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan, and their troupe of Indian musicians.

Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan and the other eleven members of their troupe will be in residence for several days before and after the concert in order to teach and work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center and the related Boston University and New England Conservatory programs.

Also on the Berkshire Music Center schedule are Chamber Music concerts tonight and Thursday and a Faculty recital on the afternoon of July 27. Roman Totenberg, violinist, will be heard with Artur Balsam, pianist, at 2:30 in the Theatre - Concert Hall.

The Festival of Contemporary American Music, co - sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, begins on Sunday, August 4 and continues through Saturday, August 10. Highlights of the week will be the premieres of four new works commissioned for the Festival from composers Mark De Voto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall.

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 15,900

JUL 23 1968 New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18.650

JUL 30 1968 New England Newsclip

Boatwright, Milnes, Bolet, Krips, Frager

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival is a performance on Saturday evening, July 27, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. The Tanglewood Choir consists of the Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the Orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson. Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, and Schumann's Sumphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current Festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan", and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

Offer Brahms

Tanglewood, Lenox — The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival is a performance on Saturday evening, July 27, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, Baritone.

The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. The Tanglewood Choir consists of the Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University. The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson.

Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current Festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan", and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

JUL 25 1968 New England Newsclip

CATSKILL MAIL
Friday, July 26, 1968

4th Berkshire Festival Weekend Features Brahms Requiem

NE

The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival is a performance on Saturday evening, July 27, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, Baritone. The 78 voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. Also, on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Contata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend PRELUDE Concert, performing the Brahms C Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Krats' Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

Pianists, Percussionists Shine at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Pianists and percussionists played the principal roles at the opening of the Berkshire Music Festival's fourth weekend Friday night at Tanglewood. The audience numbered 4,447.

Jorge Bolet was piano soloist for the orchestral concert by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Earlier in the evening, the weekend prelude was a piano recital by Malcolm Frager.

William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra received its first festival performance. Five percussionists occupied front positions on state with a full barrage of instruments including membranic drums, song bells, graduated metals and antique cymbals.

Frager Standout

Players of this extensive hardware were Everett Firth, Arthur Press, Frank Epstein, Charles Smith and Thomas Gauger.

Most impeccable performances of both programs were Frager's absorbing interpretation of Brahms' Piano Sonata in C Major, Opus 1, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C Major, Opus 61, by the orchestra.

Frager started the little-heard Brahms sonata in the grand manner. As it progressed, he gavefull import to the composer's quiet sentiments.

The playing was technically arresting, but within tasteful restraint. In fact, the performance partly eclipsed the glaring fact that this early work has stretches of sonorous but barren territory.

Bolet Great, But 'Off'

Frager gave a straightforward account of Liszt's Eighth Hungarian Rhapsody, minimizing its "schmaltz" and pouring virtousity all over its bravura climax.

His encores were Brahms' "Sarabande" and Waltz in A Flat.

Many well-publicized pianists would give their eyeteeth to play as well as Bolet on an "off night."

He was not at his best in either Weber's Konzertstuck, Opus 79, or Liszt's side-show piece, "Fantasia on Hungarian Folktunes," which is a veneered rehas of his fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody.

At that, both received dazzling performances, however marred by wrong notes.

Technical Discrepancies

Bolet approached the Weber concert piece with decorum, making light of its romantic sweepings. He didn't gild the lily but treated the florid and sentimental passages for what they are.

He uncovered all the razzle-dazzel to be found in the Liszt, and was spectacular. Some was elegiac. Here and there were technical discrepancies.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra handed him superlative backgrounds in both works.

It is difficult to take the Kraft percussion concerto very seriously. But neither can it be dismissed as a "fun piece."

Its distended moods are mostly created with striking sound effects, plus being a good show to see. Melodies wander, but not far from home base. Nothing too shocking happens in the first movement, a loose collection of ideas vaguely related to a focal point.

Two High Points

The two high points were some extremely clever counter-point in woodwinds and brilliant writing for five kettledrums at the start of the finale.

Kraft achieved his effects through contrived tonal chaos and seeming disorganization. But behind it all was excellent orchestral craft.

Incidentally, Kraft is 45 years old and a one time student at the Berkshire Music Center.

Leinsdorf's treatment of the Schumann symphony was methodical, competent and routined.

He moved the scherzo at a tempo that would have defeated a lesser orchestra. There was no penalty in articulation from the strings although wind instruments left a few ragged edges.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 28 1968
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concerts Occasion For Virtuoso Playing Of Various Kinds

Two fine pianists performed at Tanglewood Friday night as part of the Berkshire Festival. In the main concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eric Leinsdorf conducting, the Cuban artist Jorge Bolet appeared, and at the "weekend prelude" which preceded the Friday concerts, young Malcolm Frager gave a recital. The concerts were blessed with perfect weather.

It was an occasion for virtuoso playing of various kinds. The orchestra concert opened with William Kraft's fanciful Concerto for percussion and orchestra, a showpiece designed to display up front, both literally and musically, such instruments as drums, glockenspiel, wood blocks, cymbals and triangles. The work does not lean on dissonance or jagged patterns and is pleasantly stirring to hear. The five percussionists, of course, had their great moment in the spotlight.

Jorge Bolet played two very demanding pieces with the orchestra: Weber's Konzertstuck in F minor and Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian folktunes. He is a brilliant technician able to master the work of these great pianists. The Konzertstuck was particularly lovely, heard less often and perhaps more appealing for that reason, but nontheless played with a mellow touch. The program also included Schumann's Symphony No. 2, a grand score which the orchestra handled with easy familiarity.

Those who arrived early enough for the seven o'clock prelude were rewarded with a jewel-like performance by Frager of the Brahms Sonata in C major and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F sharp minor, plus two Brahms encores including the Waltz in A Flat. This artist appears frequently at Tanglewood and it is worth making a point to go hear him, for he plays with unusual grace.

Tonight Leinsdorf will conduct a program including Bach's Wedding Cantata with Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Brahms' German Requiem, with Miss Boatwright, Sherrill Milnes, baritone, and the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. On Sunday afternoon Joseph Krips will be guest conductor. The program will offer Beethoven's Sixth (Pastoral) Symphony, Don Juan by Richard Strauss, and the Firebird Suite by Stravinsky.

Tanglewood will venture into pop music on Wednesday night when The Association will give a rock concert. —By A.B.M.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
JUL 27 1968
New England Newsclip

Romantic Weekend Variety

The Evening Gazette

Pianists Star at Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The fourth weekend at Tanglewood has great variety. Last night's moderate audience will probably be much larger tonight. The chorus and soloists will perform Brahms Requiem at 8 p.m. and tomorrow at 2:30 p.m., when Josef Krips (of San Francisco, formerly of Buffalo) will be guest conductor.

Gazette Review

Pianist Malcolm Frager, heard last night in the Weekend Prelude, played at Worcester Music Festival in 1966 and is a Tanglewood favorite. He offered early Brahms, the Sonata in C major, and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F sharp minor, a series of vividly contrasting episodes. An enthusiastic audience was given two Brahms encores.

Frager will also be heard in next Saturday's concert.

Last night's main concert brought forward Jorge Bolet, a pianist heard in Worcester's Becker series of '51 and '54, and the Worcester Festivals of '55 and '58.

Although somewhat dated, the Weber "Konzertstuck in F minor" emphasized that this composer was a great pianist. Bolet gave the elaborate, agreeable piano part a masterful, but less than immaculate, reading with some rather capricious moments.

Erich Leinsdorf insisted that Bolet take his curtain-calls alone.

More satisfactory collaboration came in the Liszt "Fantasia on Hungarian Folktunes," where piano solos often alternated with orchestral interludes. Bolet's work was brilliant, and his impressive sounds in the "tuttis" were matched by the B.S.O. trumpets and percussion. Conductor and soloist shared bows.

Bolet will be heard again in Friday's Prelude and next Sunday's concert.

Leinsdorf game the utmost care to the Kraft "Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra," featuring five soloists from the orchestra. This work, in three fairly long movements, more often soft and tuneful than thunderous, used a great variety of drums, some tuned, and everything from musical noise makers to bells.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2 in C major was a triumph for the orchestra, and especially for Leinsdorf, who knows how to make this composer's fairly laborious orchestrations much more facile.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350
JUL 27 1968
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday July 26 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

KRAFT — Concerto for percussion and orchestra†
Recitativo quasi senza misura
Allegro con brio
Cadenza e variazioni

EVERETT FIRTH, ARTHUR PRESS, FRANK EPSTEIN, CHARLES SMITH, THOMAS GAUGER

WEBER — Konzertstück in F minor op. 79†
Larghetto affettuoso — allegro passionato — tempo di marcia — presto giocoso
JORGE BOLET

intermission

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 2 in C major op. 61
Sostenuto assai — allegro ma non troppo
Scherzo: allegro vivace — trio I — trio II
Adagio espressivo
Allegro molto vivace

LISZT — Fantasia on Hungarian folktunes op. 123†
Andante mesto — allegro eroico — molto adagio — moderato — allegretto alla zingarese — vivace assai
JORGE BOLET

† First performance at the Festival concerts

Jorge Bolet plays the Baldwin piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 23

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Berkshire Festival Changes Old Format

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood has a new program. After 30 years or so, the cover is in color, the whole format has changed. Even the printing. It is very pretty and very easy to read. The Festival also has this year a series of Wednesday evening concerts ranging from Ravi Skankar and his sitar to Rock with The Association". It is also conducting some sort of survy on the grounds, all of which portends changes. Nothin is static of absolute, not even Tanglewood.

This past weekend was, however, what we have come to expect from the Festival; very good music.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted Friday evening, opening with a new, interesting Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra by Kraft. All the drums, chimes, and things were down stage front, the five percussionists moved wildly among their some 37 instruments. It was fun, rather like watching a strange new dance. The Concerto itself should be heard rather than watched, it becomes a bit distracting, but it was interesting.

Carl Von Weber's Konzertstuck in F Minor op. 79 followed with Jorge Bolet as solo pianist. The percussion was all moved back and we were pleased to see that the musician in charge of the bit kettle drums could proceed with his endless tuning undisturbed. Mr. Bolet is a marvelous pianist. He plays with great authority and skill. The orchestra with Mr. Bolet sounded just about perfect.

Schumann's delightful Symphony No. 2 was next. No one can deny that Leinsdorf knew what to do with Schumann. He also knew what to do with Liszt. Mr. Bolet played the Fantasia On Hungarian Folktunes op. 123 and it was brilliant. Mr. Leinsdorf had a great time, from leaning on the piano to conducting hands-over-eyes. Mr. Bolet had an equally great time, the combination produced a great rendition of Liszt.

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 15,900
JUL 30 1968
New England Newsclip

Pianists, Percussionists Shine at Tanglewood

Music Review

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Pianists and percussionists played the principal roles at the opening of the Berkshire Music Festival's fourth weekend Friday night at Tanglewood. The audience numbered 4,447.

Jorge Bolet was piano soloist for the orchestral concert by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Earlier in the evening, the weekend prelude was a piano recital by Malcolm Frager.

William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra received its first festival performance. Five percussionists occupied front positions on state with a full barrage of instruments including membranic drums, song bells, graduated metals and antique cymbals.

Frager Standout

Players of this extensive hardware were Everett Firth, Arthur Press, Frank Epstein, Charles Smith and Thomas Gauger.

Most impeccable performances of both programs were Frager's absorbing interpretation of Brahms' Piano Sonata in C Major, Opus 1, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C Major, Opus 61, by the orchestra.

Frager started the little-heard Brahms sonata in the grand manner. As it progressed, he gavefull import to the composer's quiet sentiments.

The playing was technically arresting, but within tasteful restraint. In fact, the performance partly eclipsed the glaring fact that this early work has stretches of sonorous but barren territory.

Bolet Great, But 'Off'

Frager gave a straightforward account of Liszt's Eighth Hungarian Rhapsody, minimizing its "schmaltz" and pouring virtousity all over its bravura climax.

His encores were Brahms' "Sarabande" and Waltz in A Flat.

Many well-publicized pianists would give their eyeteeth to play as well as Bolet on an "off night."

He was not at his best in either Weber's Konzertstuck, Opus 79, or Liszt's side-show piece, "Fantasia on Hungarian Folktunes," which is a veneered rehas of his fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody.

At that, both received dazzling performances, however marred by wrong notes.

Technical Discrepancies

Bolet approached the Weber concert piece with decorum, making light of its romantic sweepings. He didn't gild the lily but treated the florid and sentimental passages for what they are.

He uncovered all the razzle-dazzel to be found in the Liszt, and was spectacular. Some was elegiac. Here and there were technical discrepancies.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra handed him superlative backgrounds in both works.

It is difficult to take the Kraft percussion concerto very seriously. But neither can it be dismissed as a "fun piece."

Its distended moods are mostly created with striking sound effects, plus being a good show to see. Melodies wander, but not far from home base. Nothing too shocking happens in the first movement, a loose collection of ideas vaguely related to a focal point.

Two High Points

The two high points were some extremely clever counter-point in woodwinds and brilliant writing for five kettledrums at the start of the finale.

Kraft achieved his effects through contrived tonal chaos and seeming disorganization. But behind it all was excellent orchestral craft.

Incidentally, Kraft is 45 years old and a one time student at the Berkshire Music Center.

Leinsdorf's treatment of the Schumann symphony was methodical, competent and routined.

He moved the scherzo at a tempo that would have defeated a lesser orchestra. There was no penalty in articulation from the strings although wind instruments left a few ragged edges.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 28 1968
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concerts Occasion For Virtuoso Playing Of Various Kinds

Two fine pianists performed at Tanglewood Friday night as part of the Berkshire Festival. In the main concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eric Leinsdorf conducting, the Cuban artist Jorge Bolet appeared, and at the "weekend prelude" which preceded the Friday concerts, young Malcolm Frager gave a recital. The concerts were blessed with perfect weather.

It was an occasion for virtuoso playing of various kinds. The orchestra concert opened with William Kraft's fanciful Concerto for percussion and orchestra, a showpiece designed to display up front, both literally and musically, such instruments as drums, glockenspiel, wood blocks, cymbals and triangles. The work does not lean on dissonance or jagged patterns and is pleasantly stirring to hear. The five percussionists, of course, had their great moment in the spotlight.

Jorge Bolet played two very demanding pieces with the orchestra: Weber's Konzertstuck in F minor and Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian folktunes. He is a brilliant technician able to master the work of these great pianists. The Konzertstuck was particularly lovely, heard less often and perhaps more appealing for that reason, but nontheless played with a mellow touch. The program also included Schumann's Symphony No. 2, a grand score which the orchestra handled with easy familiarity.

Those who arrived early enough for the seven o'clock prelude were rewarded with a jewel-like performance by Frager of the Brahms Sonata in C major and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F sharp minor, plus two Brahms encores including the Waltz in A Flat. This artist appears frequently at Tanglewood and it is worth making a point to go hear him, for he plays with unusual grace.

Tonight Leinsdorf will conduct a program including Bach's Wedding Cantata with Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Brahms' German Requiem, with Miss Boatwright, Sherrill Milnes, baritone, and the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. On Sunday afternoon Joseph Krips will be guest conductor. The program will offer Beethoven's Sixth (Pastoral) Symphony, Don Juan by Richard Strauss, and the Firebird Suite by Stravinsky.

Tanglewood will venture into pop music on Wednesday night when The Association will give a rock concert. —By A.B.M.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
JUL 27 1968
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday July 26 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

KRAFT — Concerto for percussion and orchestra†
Recitativo quasi senza misura
Allegro con brio
Cadenza e variazioni

EVERETT FIRTH, CHARLES SMITH, ARTHUR PRESS, THOMAS GAUGER, FRANK EPSTEIN

WEBER — Konzertstück in F minor op. 79†
Larghetto affettuoso — allegro passionato — tempo di marcia — presto giocoso
JORGE BOLET

intermission

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 2 in C major op. 61
Sostenuto assai — allegro ma non troppo
Scherzo: allegro vivace — trio I — trio II
Adagio espressivo
Allegro molto vivace

LISZT — Fantasia on Hungarian folktunes op. 123†
Andante mesto — allegro eroico — molto adagio — moderato — allegretto alla zingarese — vivace assai
JORGE BOLET

† First performance at the Festival concerts

Jorge Bolet plays the Baldwin piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 23

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Romantic Weekend Variety

The Evening Gazette

Pianists Star at Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The fourth weekend at Tanglewood has great variety. Last night's moderate audience will probably be much larger tonight. The chorus and soloists will perform Brahms Requiem at 8 p.m. and tomorrow at 2:30 p.m., when Josef Krips (of San Francisco, formerly of Buffalo) will be guest conductor.

Gazette Review

Pianist Malcolm Frager, heard last night in the Weekend Prelude, played at Worcester Music Festival in 1966 and is a Tanglewood favorite. He offered early Brahms, the Sonata in C major, and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F sharp minor, a series of vividly contrasting episodes. An enthusiastic audience was given two Brahms encores.

Frager will also be heard in next Saturday's concert.

Last night's main concert brought forward Jorge Bolet, a pianist heard in Worcester's Becker series of '51 and '54, and the Worcester Festivals of '55 and '58.

Although somewhat dated, the Weber "Konzertstuck in F minor" emphasized that this composer was a great pianist. Bolet gave the elaborate, agreeable piano part a masterful, but less than immaculate, reading with some rather capricious moments.

Erich Leinsdorf insisted that Bolet take his curtain-calls alone.

More satisfactory collaboration came in the Liszt "Fantasia on Hungarian Folktunes," where piano solos often alternated with orchestral interludes. Bolet's work was brilliant, and his impressive sounds in the "tuttis" were matched by the B.S.O. trumpets and percussion. Conductor and soloist shared bows.

Bolet will be heard again in Friday's Prelude and next Sunday's concert.

Leinsdorf game the utmost care to the Kraft "Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra," featuring five soloists from the orchestra. This work, in three fairly long movements, more often soft and tuneful than thunderous, used a great variety of drums, some tuned, and everything from musical noise makers to bells.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2 in C major was a triumph for the orchestra, and especially for Leinsdorf, who knows how to make this composer's fairly laborious orchestrations much more facile.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350
JUL 27 1968
New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Changes Old Format

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood has a new program. After 30 years or so, the cover is in color, the whole format has changed. Even the printing. It is very pretty and very easy to read. The Festival also has this year a series of Wednesday evening concerts ranging from Ravi Skankar and his sitar to Rock with The Association". It is also conducting some sort of survy on the grounds, all of which portends changes. Nothin is static of absolute, not even Tanglewood.

This past weekend was, however, what we have come to expect from the Festival; very good music.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted Friday evening, opening with a new, interesting Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra by Kraft. All the drums, chimes, and things were down stage front, the five percussionists moved wildly among their some 37 instruments. It was fun, rather like watching a strange new dance. The Concerto itself should be heard rather than watched, it becomes a bit distracting, but it was interesting.

Carl Von Weber's Konzertstuck in F Minor op. 79 followed with Jorge Bolet as solo pianist. The percussion was all moved back and we were pleased to see that the musician in charge of the bit kettle drums could proceed with his endless tuning undisturbed. Mr. Bolet is a marvelous pianist. He plays with great authority and skill. The orchestra with Mr. Bolet sounded just about perfect.

Schumann's delightful Symphony No. 2 was next. No one can deny that Leinsdorf knew what to do with Schumann. He also knew what to do with Liszt. Mr. Bolet played the Fantasia On Hungarian Folktunes op. 123 and it was brilliant. Mr. Leinsdorf had a great time, from leaning on the piano to conducting hands-over-eyes. Mr. Bolet had an equally great time, the combination produced a great rendition of Liszt.

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 15,900
JUL 30 1968
New England Newsclip

42.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 57,006

JUL 29 1968

Tanglewood Fare: New and Familiar

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Friday evening at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of new and familiar music. Featured were William Kraft's Percussion Concerto, Schumann's Symphony No. 2, Weber's Konzertstueck, op. 79, and Franz Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy, op. 123. Soloist in the last two works was George Bolet.

* * *

The concert got under way with Kraft's brilliant Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, a three-movement work conceived along classical lines although based on modern 12-tone subjects. Performing the solo function were the orchestra's five percussionists.

The program notes don't mention it, but this score was originally conceived as a percussion concerto for a single performer. I heard it this way under conductor Henry Lewis a couple years ago in New York, but the recent expansion to five percussionists and considerably more solo hardware is a great improvement. It now sounds more imaginative and doesn't leave the "solo" concept quite so weightless and uncompetitive.

The performance was simply masterful. The soloists really dug into the score with sincere conviction and obvious involvement. Leinsdorf, too, was on his toes and led the orchestra in a dazzling accompaniment. The raving applause (premature and otherwise) that followed the work indicate that the Concerto should be played again, soon, by other major orchestras.

* * *

Next was Weber's Konzertstueck, op. 79, with George Bolet as soloist. This delightful piece is not performed often these days, perhaps because of the frankly tear-jerking, heart-on-sleeve story that goes along with it. The pianist must be an incurable romantic to play it; in fact, he sounded like one as the performance unfolded. Barring several wrong notes here and there, Bolet's playing was really nice. It's good to hear someone play smoothly these days. There was intelligent use of the pedal and a "rounded" sound that were just what this little piece requires. Leinsdorf was generally good throughout, but there could've been more horns in the opening of the march section.

After intermission Schumann's 2nd Symphony was given the poorest reading in my memory. Right from the start you could hear that Leinsdorf would somehow manage to butcher the score by pushing it too hard. The slow introduction was a trifle rushed, but it was the inflexibility of the tempo that followed which hurt the movement the most. Toward the end of the movement several loose ends must be tied up (and it can be done; Schumann as structuralist was neither incompetent nor a beginner), but Leinsdorf had the tempo by the throat and wouldn't give the various thematic subjects their proper breathing room.

* * *

The scherzo was even more stunted. Here the orchestral textures were icy clear and denied the movement of any warmth, Leinsdorf will simply have to learn how to use the cellos and horns more effectively if he expects to get anything out of music like this.

The slow movement was neither adagio nor expressivo. It was a hasty race just to get things over with and accomplished nothing except frustrate the music's poetic content. This is not an uncommon thing with Leinsdorf, for he often tends to strait jacket a score at times by employing speed for its own sake. Worst of all, the two string climaxes were totally ruined, probably because the conductor began waving his arms about so wildly that he couldn't indicate the proper emotional build-up to the players.

The finale was a little better but still left much to be desired. It wasn't until the closing pages that the music began to sound right. The ending was very exciting, actually, but Leinsdorf's preceding sins were unforgivable.

Last on the program was Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy, that bombastic synthesis for piano and orchestra. Bolet was soloist again, and he was great for the part. Virtuosity prevailed everywhere, even in the orchestra. Judging from the intensity of Leinsdorf's accompaniment, he should conduct Liszt more often.

* * *

Sunday afternoon Josef Krips was on the podium for three works, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Richard Strauss' Don Juan, and the Firebird Suite by Stravinsky. The concert opened with Beethoven, and those of us who expected a plodding, indifferent interpretation were in for a pleasant surprise. Krips made the music sing with a grace and charm that today's high-pressure conductors cannot seem to give the work. The first and second movements were ravishingly performed, evidence of Krips' new-found conviviality with the music. The third movement suffered from some ensemble difficulty when at bar 95 the bassoon forgot to come in and this so confused the horn that his whole F major sequence after bar 132 was early. It was certainly unusual to hear flute and horn in canon rather than in unison. Oh well, the rest of the work went better and earned Krips a fond applause at the conclusion.

No less successful was his Don Juan, which followed intermission and proved to be as virile and exciting as we'd expect from a younger man. The percussion was unusually spotlighted, all to the better of the music. Too often the percussion gets buried in all the dense brass, but Krips kept everything under superb control. Why can't Leinsdorf get his brass to play like that?

The concert closed with Stravinsky's popular suite from the Firebird, and again Krips was excellent. The demonic power of the infernal brass was remarkable for its clarity and impact, but the subtler sections of the score did not go unheeded. Altogether a splendid afternoon, certainly one of the most musical.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., SATURDAY, JULY 27, 1968.

At Tanglewood

High Piano Artistry Offered In Program of Liszt Works

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Jorge Bolet hasn't lost any of his expertise with the flamboyant style of Liszt. He played that worthy's "Fantasia on Hungarian Folktunes," Op. 123, and Weber's "Konzerstuck" in F Minor, Opus 79, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf Friday night at Tanglewood.

Nimble Despite Bulk

He is a bulking man seemingly too big for the keyboard, but his fingers are nimble enough for the ornate lightning of Liszt.

He has the good judgment, lso, to play this theatrical music fairly straight, letting it display its own extremes of sentiment, melodrama and fire without adding gilt to its gold.

The result is, and was Friday, pianism of high entertainment.

Strong Follower

It was a good thing, also, that Schumann's second symphony, which followed intermission, is a work of great substance or it would have suffered from the nearness of the glitter of the rest of the program.

Fortunately, Leinsdorf kept it going briskly, and its traditional Germanic virtues displayed with warmth and a refreshing lack of metronomic stiffness.

The program opened with a Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra that probably won a few fans for contemporary music. It was written by William Kraft in 1964 and is considerably more musical than one might expect from a piece that uses about 40 percussion instruments as its major attraction.

Rhythm Melodies

The percussion was spread out across the front of the stage, and five acrobats leaped from one set of tuned drums or bells or chimes or vibraphones or cymbals or wood blocks to another to beat out fragmented melodies . . . yes, melodies . . . in eccentric rhyhms.

The passages were overlapped and mingled and mirrored among the percussive sections as well as orchestral sections with immense complexity and fascination.

It is active, youthful music, rebellious without chaos, and had a surprising emotional content Friday, as well as highly colorful textures and timbres.

Frager in Prelude

At the prelude concert at 7, Malcolm Frager, who will be here next weekend to play Schumann's piano concerto, played three Brahms pieces (two as encores) and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8.

Frager is a young pianist with a shy manner and a high sensitivity for pianistic sublety. He has been heard here several times, especially with Mozart's piano concertos, which he has played with elegance.

Friday, along with the gentle expressiveness I have learned to expect from him, there appeared a bit of pounding.

Serious Piece

Pounding is expected here and there in Lizst, but it didn't seem necessary in the Brahms Sonata, Opus 1, C Major, although that giant work is 30 minutes of most unrelenting strength and rugged brawn.

It is a very serious piece with just a little dreamy, lyrical relief near the end of the first movement.

The other Brahms pieces, the encores, were a sarabande and the A Flat Waltz.

The Lizst rhapsody has the expected thunderous noise, but also, it has some extremely fast feathery runs played with beautiful agility by Frager.

Too bad those pounding thumps stick in the memory.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

JUL 30 1968

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood and Marlboro

Festival highlights

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Lenox, Mass.

The novelty piece at Tanglewood this weekend was William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra. This is a relatively new work; Zubin Mehta conducted its first performance in Los Angeles last year, and Erich Leinsdorf introduced it to the Berkshire Music Festival Friday night.

Mr. Kraft is principal percussionist for the Los Angeles Philharmonic and one of the finest timpanists in that part of the world. His concerto betrays the hand and mind of a skilled performer; one can hardly imagine its being written by anyone with less than Mr. Kraft's accomplishment, for it is as idiomatic as the piano music of Liszt, and perhaps as difficult.

Five players — on this occasion they were Everett Firth, Arthur Press, Frank Epstein, Charles Smith, and Thomas Guager — work at a battery of some 35 instruments, including all manner of drums and bells, chimes, glockenspiel, vibraphone, xylophone, triangles, and six antique cymbals. Piano and celeste enter the fray from time to time as percussion instruments, although they are not designated as belonging to the solo group, and the man who played both of them Friday didn't get his name in the program.

The rest of the orchestra is also treated in concerto fashion for a large portion of the work, with instruments, or sections of them, frequently chattering at each other across the band shell. The orchestration is sparse; tuttis are rare, and except for the opening of the second movement, the percussion is always in the forefront.

Variation by timbre

The musical substance, taken in the abstract, is also rather lean. Variations by timbre is the most notable compositional technique. The last movement is a variation form, and although the other two are not, they also rely for their effect on an ever-changing configuration of tone colors.

Mr. Kraft's concerto has its pretty moments, but makes no pretense of heavy musical thought. As with most genuinely virtuosic music, the pleasure it produces is derived chiefly from the application of monumental executant force to an unusual instrumental challenge. And watching it performed is as much fun as listening to it.

The same could be said for most of the remainder of Friday night's concert. Jorge Bolet's delivery of the Konzertstück in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, by Weber (also, oddly enough, a Tanglewood première), and of the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy, revealed more showmanship than technical or stylistic accuracy. But his performances were fun, and the audience received them well.

Between Weber and Liszt Mr. Leinsdorf sandwiched a rather listless reading of Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major.

Bach at Marlboro

Marlboro, Vt.

Saturday night was the annual Bach cantata night at Marlboro. Blanche Honegger-Moyse led her well-trained Brattleboro Music Center Chorus through three works of the Leipzig period: No. 104, "Du Hirte Israel, höre"; No. 105, "Herr, gehe nicht ins Gericht"; and No. 11, "Lobet Gott in seinen Reichen."

The performances featured a variety of soloists, most of them of high quality. Thomas Paul and Leslie Guinn made bass and baritone arias exceptionally pleasurable; Betty Allen brought a rich, if not invariably accurate, contralto sound to solo numbers from the second and third works.

The soprano Benita Valente had only one aria to sing — "Wie zittern und wanken" from Cantata No. 105. But she did that so exceedingly well that it was one of the high points of the evening.

Kirchner concerto

Mrs. Honegger-Moyse has made a specialty of the Bach cantatas. Her performances are a model of taste and musicianship — never spectacular, but devastatingly effective, and invariably a service to the cause.

The Sunday afternoon concert included Leon Kirchner's Concerto for Violin, Cello, Ten Winds, and Percussion (1960), with Pina Carmirelli and Robert Sylvester, soloists, and the composer conducting. The work strikes this listener as substantial and stimulating, and put together with a high order of workmanship. The extreme condensation of its musical materials makes it difficult to absorb on one hearing; but its exuberant spirit encourages one to come back for a second round.

The rest of the program consisted chiefly of Alexander Schneider playing second fiddle in the best of Marlboro tradition. Mr. Schneider played second to Yoko Matsuda in a sweet performance of the Ravel Quartet, and to Yosef Yankelev in Schubert's Quartet in A minor, Op. 29.

The program opened with Monteverdi's "Scherzi Musicali" (1607), featuring sopranos Bethany Beardslee and Kate Hurney, and baritone Leslie Guinn. This was followed by a lively interpretaton of the Stravinsky Septet (1953), in which Mr. Schneider played first—and only fiddle. C.S.

43.

The Boston Globe — Monday, July 29, 1968 13

Brahms Requiem -- astonishing in its force

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—The Brahms Requiem, which Erich Leinsdorf conducted at Tanglewood on Saturday, astounds me at each hearing or reading with its power as a statement of and about religious belief and with the unity of Brahm's vision of it as a musical romposition, the forle of its imagery, and the originality and beauty of its sonorities.

It had been something like 14 years sinlt I had heard a uonhert performanhe of the Requiem, and the one at Tanglewood was of a kind to make the enrounter not only an occasion for astonishment—it is not that one forgets the force of the work, but that one cannot ever experience it as fully as in performance — but one that deeply moved me. I don't believe I was alone in this response: what happened afterwards was by no means the loudest and hottest ovation heard at Tanglewood, bht the applause went on for a long time, solidly, and with an unusual warmth and gratitude.

The performance was superbly paced, rather quickly though its excellence was, of course, not in the speed but in the mutual relevence of the tepi. The emergence of the B flat fugue, "Die Eriosseten des Herrn," was an example of an especially masterful centrol of pace.

Leinsdorf was unusually concerned to bring out the coherence of the Requiem as a whole, to convey a sense of the progression from "Blessed are they that mourn" to "Blessed are the dead" as one immense ideational and musical impluse.

External signals alert one to this continuity—the brief pauses between movements, including even the bold, dramatic stroke of going without break from the soprano solo with its gospel of consolation to the mystery of "For here we have no continuing city."

That this aspect of the work was conveyed so successfully again depended on pacing, the aptness of each choice in the largest possible context as well as locally, and on the powers of concentration that enabled Leinsdorf to articulate the formal design so surely.

It is easy in so rhetorical a work to overplay one's hand, to make too much of individual climaxes at the expense of the whole, but Leinsdorf produced a performance with no self-indulgence, his discipline being externalized by a necessary and scrupulous observance of Brahms's keen sense of distinction between forte and fortissimo.

THE German Requiem is a work to which Leinsdorf responds with special urgency. The subject, the German words, the presence-voices, the fact that the musical language is ne in which he tends to feel comfortable; all, I imagine, contribute in various ways. At any rate, Leinsdorf's conducting Saturday was itense, involved, energetic, to a degree that occurs seldom with him.

The phrasing was always sustained, and there were moments of burning intensity, the long statement of the chorus sopranos at the beginning of the last movement being one I remember particularly vividly. The one fault in Leinsdorf's conducting was in its being excessively intense at times, with a tendency to push and to stir up activity when it did not seem justified or needed, for example in the lovely episode about the early and the latter rain.

The actual execution of all this varied in quality The choral singing was first-rate, excepting only an occasional diphthongal vowel and an ell too richly rolled.

Charles Wilson, assisted this Summer by John Oliver, did an impressive job of preparing the singers.

There was some marvelous orchestral playing (violas, cellos, basses in the first movement, timpani in the second, for example), and some that was out of tune and in other ways unbeatable (almost everything from horns and trombones), and there was often the sense of a performance that had not been rehearsed quite enough.

Helen Boatwright sang the soprano solo more beautifully than I have ever heard it, with clear and lovely tone, fine intonation, a touching sense of the words, delicate rhythmic fantasy, and an artistry in long-spanned phrasing that produced, within this quiet dynamic frame, spine-chilling tensions.

Sherrill Milnes uses his splendid baritone with taste, but there is no touch of the psalmist, the apostle, the prophet, about him at all: for all its respectable qualities, his singing really missed the point.

The performance altogether was an incompletely achieved thing, but the best of it was unusually beautiful, and the strength of the conception meant more than the blemishes.

The Bach with which the concert began, the best-known of his scular wedding cantatas, also provided an opportunity for some exquisite singing by Mrs. Boatwright, though she was not quite at ease technically here, but in most respects the performance seemed to me an impossible one, too slow, too beaty, too stiff in the foundation, too perfumed on the surface.

The ARTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf conducting Bach: Wedding Cantata for soprano, "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten," BWV 202, and Brahms: A German Requiem, with Helen Boatwright, soprano, Sherrill Milnes, baritone, the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. Charles Wilson, director, and John Oliver, assistant director. Saturday evening at Tanglewood.

JOSEF KRIPS HELEN BOATWRIGHT JORGE BOLET SHERRILL MILNES

Tanglewood to Feature Brahms Requiem

The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox is a performance tomorrow evening, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. The Tanglewood Choir consists of the Fellows if the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University. The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson. Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C. Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan", and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

The open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Saturday morning in the Shed at 10.30. The Sunday Morning Chamber Music Concert will be presented by the Music Guild String Quartet, playing works of Haydn, Bartok, and Ravel.

The Festival of Contemporary American Music, co-sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, begins Sunday, Aug. 4 and continues through Saturday, Aug. 10. Highlights of the week will be the premieres of four new works commissioned for the Festival from composers Mark De Voto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
JUL 26 1968
New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
JUL 18 1968
New England Newsclip

BRAHMS REQUIEM

A complete performance of Brahms' "German Requiem" highlights the live Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts from Tanglewood on WGBH-FM Saturday, July 27, 9 p.m., performed by the Berkshire Festival Chorus, Tanglewood Choir, and soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday July 27 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)
Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

HELEN BOATWRIGHT soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin RALPH GOMBERG oboe
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo JULES ESKIN cello continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45
Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

HELEN BOATWRIGHT soprano SHERRILL MILNES baritone
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR and BERKSHIRE CHORUS
CHARLES WILSON director JOHN OLIVER assistant director

The program notes and texts for tonight's concert begin on page 27

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
JUL 29 1968
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus Join In Singing Brahms' "Requiem"

The Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus joined with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night to present the German Requiem by Brahms as part of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. The performance was led by Erich Leinsdorf, director of the orchestra, before an audience of nearly 8,000. This more than fills the Music Shed but it is not a large Saturday night crowd for Tanglewood.

The great oratorio was preceded by Bach's "Wedding" Cantata. Helen Boatwriglht, soprano, was soloist for this and, with baritone Sherrill Milnes, for the Requiem.

On Sunday afternoon the weather turned pleasant in time for the Music Shed concert at which Joseph Krips was guest conductor. Beethoven's Sixth Symphony opened the concert which also included Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and the exciting "Firebird" of Stravinsky. The audience was tallied at 6,562.

Students at the Berkshire Music Center are assisting in conducting a survey of Tanglewood audiences, to get a profile of the Festival's clientele. Concertgoers are picked at random to answer factual questions about how far they have come and how often they visit Tanglewood. They are also interested to know how much of the Boston Symphony's Boston audience follows it into the Berkshires in the summer.

There will be two guest conductors next weekend, Sixteen Erhling on Friday and William Eteinberg on Sunday. On Saturday night Leinsdorf will conduct and Malcolm Frager will be soloist in his own version of the Schumann piano concerto. This will be the fifth week of the eight-week Festival A.B.M.

43.

Brahms Requiem -- astonishing in its force

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX—The Brahms Requiem, which Erich Leinsdorf conducted at Tanglewood on Saturday, astounds me at each hearing or reading with its power as a statement of and about religious belief and with the unity of Brahm's vision of it as a musical romposition, the forle of its imagery, and the originality and beauty of its sonorities.

It had been something like 14 years sinlt I had heard a uonhert performanhe of the Requiem, and the one at Tanglewood was of a kind to make the enrounter not only an occasion for astonishment—it is not that one forgets the force of the work, but that one cannot ever experience it as fully as in performance — but one that deeply moved me. I don't believe I was alone in this response: what happened afterwards was by no means the loudest and hottest ovation heard at Tanglewood, bht the applause went on for a long time, solidly, and with an unusual warmth and gratitude.

The performance was superbly paced, rather quickly though its excellence was, of course, not in the speed but in the mutual relevence of the tepi. The emergence of the B flat fugue, "Die Eriosseten des Herrn," was an example of an especially masterful centrol of pace.

Leinsdorf was unusually concerned to bring out the coherence of the Requiem as a whole, to convey a sense of the progression from "Blessed are they that mourn" to "Blessed are the dead" as one immense ideational and musical impluse.

External signals alert one to this continuity—the brief pauses between movements, including even the bold, dramatic stroke of going without break from the soprano solo with its gospel of consolation to the mystery of "For here we have no continuing city."

That this aspect of the work was conveyed so successfully again depended on pacing, the aptness of each choice in the largest possible context as well as locally, and on the powers of concentration that enabled Leinsdorf to articulate the formal design so surely.

It is easy in so rhetorical a work to overplay one's hand, to make too much of individual climaxes at the expense of the whole, but Leinsdorf produced a performance with no self-indulgence, his discipline being externalized by a necessary and scrupulous observance of Brahms's keen sense of distinction between forte and fortissimo.

THE German Requiem is a work to which Leinsdorf responds with special urgency. The subject, the German words, the presence-voices, the fact that the musical language is ne in which he tends to feel comfortable; all, I imagine, contribute in various ways. At any rate, Leinsdorf's conducting Saturday was itense, involved, energetic, to a degree that occurs seldom with him.

The phrasing was always sustained, and there were moments of burning intensity, the long statement of the chorus sopranos at the beginning of the last movement being one I remember particularly vividly. The one fault in Leinsdorf's conducting was in its being excessively intense at times, with a tendency to push and to stir up activity when it did not seem justified or needed, for example in the lovely episode about the early and the latter rain.

The actual execution of all this varied in quality The choral singing was first-rate, excepting only an occasional diphthongal vowel and an ell too richly rolled.

Charles Wilson, assisted this Summer by John Oliver, did an impressive job of preparing the singers.

There was some marvelous orchestral playing (violas, cellos, basses in the first movement, timpani in the second, for example), and some that was out of tune and in other ways unbeatable (almost everything from horns and trombones), and there was often the sense of a performance that had not been rehearsed quite enough.

Helen Boatwright sang the soprano solo more beautifully than I have ever heard it, with clear and lovely tone, fine intonation, a touching sense of the words, delicate rhythmic fantasy, and an artistry in long-spanned phrasing that produced, within this quiet dynamic frame, spine-chilling tensions.

Sherrill Milnes uses his splendid baritone with taste, but there is no touch of the psalmist, the apostle, the prophet, about him at all: for all its respectable qualities, his singing really missed the point.

The performance altogether was an incompletely achieved thing, but the best of it was unusually beautiful, and the strength of the conception meant more than the blemishes.

The Bach with which the concert began, the best-known of his scular wedding cantatas, also provided an opportunity for some exquisite singing by Mrs. Boatwright, though she was not quite at ease technically here, but in most respects the performance seemed to me an impossible one, too slow, too beaty, too stiff in the foundation, too perfumed on the surface.

The ARTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf conducting Bach: Wedding Cantata for soprano, "Weichet nur, betruebte Schatten," BWV 202, and Brahms: A German Requiem, with Helen Boatwright, soprano, Sherrill Milnes, baritone, the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus, Charles Wilson, director, and John Oliver, assistant director. Saturday evening at Tanglewood.

JOSEF KRIPS

HELEN BOATWRIGHT

JORGE BOLET

SHERRILL MILNES

Tanglewood to Feature Brahms Requiem

The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox is a performance tomorrow evening, of the Brahms Requiem conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus. The Tanglewood Choir consists of the Fellows if the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University. The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson. Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C. Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Liszt. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan", and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

The open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Saturday morning in the Shed at 10.30. The Sunday Morning Chamber Music Concert will be presented by the Music Guild String Quartet, playing works of Haydn, Bartok, and Ravel.

The Festival of Contemporary American Music, co-sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, begins Sunday, Aug. 4 and continues through Saturday, Aug. 10. Highlights of the week will be the premieres of four new works commissioned for the Festival from composers Mark De Voto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

JUL 26 1968 New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JUL 18 1968 New England Newsclip

BRAHMS REQUIEM

A complete performance of Brahms' "German Requiem" highlights the live Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts from Tanglewood on WGBH-FM Saturday, July 27, 9 p.m., performed by the Berkshire Festival Chorus, Tanglewood Choir, and soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday July 27 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)
Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

HELEN BOATWRIGHT soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin RALPH GOMBERG oboe
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo JULES ESKIN cello continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45
Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

HELEN BOATWRIGHT soprano SHERRILL MILNES baritone
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR and BERKSHIRE CHORUS
CHARLES WILSON director JOHN OLIVER assistant director

The program notes and texts for tonight's concert begin on page 27

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus Join In Singing Brahms' "Requiem"

The Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus joined with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night to present the German Requiem by Brahms as part of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. The performance was led by Erich Leinsdorf, director of the orchestra, before an audience of nearly 8,000. This more than fills the Music Shed but it is not a large Saturday night crowd for Tanglewood.

The great oratorio was preceded by Bach's "Wedding" Cantata. Helen Boatwrighlt, soprano, was soloist for this and, with baritone Sherrill Milnes, for the Requiem.

On Sunday afternoon the weather turned pleasant in time for the Music Shed concert at which Joseph Krips was guest conductor. Beethoven's Sixth Symphony opened the concert which also included Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and the exciting "Firebird" of Stravinsky. The audience was tallied at 6,562.

Students at the Berkshire Music Center are assisting in conducting a survey of Tanglewood audiences, to get a profile of the Festival's clientele. Concertgoers are picked at random to answer factual questions about how far they have come and how often they visit Tanglewood. They are also interested to know how much of the Boston Symphony's Boston audience follows it into the Berkshires in the summer.

There will be two guest conductors next weekend, Sixteen Erhling on Friday and William Eteinberg on Sunday. On Saturday night Leinsdorf will conduct and Malcolm Frager will be soloist in his own version of the Schumann piano concerto. This will be the fifth week of the eight-week Festival A.B.M.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, July 29, 1968

Bach and Brahms Works Feature Soloists, Choruses

Voice Dominant Instrument in Evening at Tanglewood

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

The voice was by far the dominant instrument in Saturday night's concert at Tanglewood which made ample use of the talents of Helen Boatwright, Sherill Milnes and the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and voices in a warm and spirited performance opening with Bach's Wedding Cantata No. 22 ("Weichet nur betrubte Schatten") sung by soprano Helen Boatwright supported by a small group of instrumentalists.

The Cantata, opening "Vanish gloomy shadows," is a celebration of spring and the light hearted romance of the season. Miss Boatwright was marvellous with a full but caressing voice and a glowing face that bespoke her own feeling of the performance.

Burden on Soloist

The Cantata is relatively brief but nevertheless places a heavy burden on the soloist who is backed primarily by the continuo of the harpsichord, cello and the double bass.

Violinist Joseph Silverstein and oboeist Ralph Gomberg as solo instrumentalists provided the subtle shadings of tome with an expert touch.

It was on the whole a performance of musical subtlety and understatement. Solo voice and chamber orchestra were inversely employed to fill orchestral proportions.

In contrast, choir upon choir and full complement of orchestral accompaniment was used to achieve the heavier and never subtle "German" Requiem of Brahms which followed, completing the program.

As the first work depended on Miss Boatwright, the Requiem was built on the persistent full-voiced use of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

The Requiem is thoroughly German and-or Lutheran, far removed from the sentiments and text of the Latin mass common to other familiar requiems. In its way, it is also celebrational.

SHERRILL MILNES

HELEN BOATWRIGHT

Orchestra and choruses performed beautifully, straining to the utmost under the unusually spirited direction of Leinsdorf. This is a work of massive power, not one for individual virtuosity.

The role of the soloists, Miss Boat weight and barit one Sherrill Milnes, is extremely restricted and in the case of Milnes not even particularly advantageous. The fault lay with the part not the performance, Milnes making the best of an unsatisfactory role.

While the Requiem performance possessed all of the heavy and glorious power of the attention-getting climax it lacked enough reserve for texture that would have sustained interest better. It was almost too much of a good thing.

The ending of the second section, "For all flesh is as grass," would have made a perfect conclusion for the works. But instead the performance piled climax on climax until the actual ending came as a disappointing anticlimax.

The weekend at the Berkshire Music festival opened with pianist Malcom Frager giving the Weekend Prelude on Friday night followed by Leinsdorf conducting the orchestra and pianist Jorge Bolet playing a program that included Weber's Knzertstuck in F Minor and Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian folktunes.

Joseph Kripps was scheduled to conduct the BSO on Sunday afternoon in a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 and Stravinsky's Firebird Suite.

The highlight of next week's concerts in Lenox, Mass., will be the only appearance of William Steinberg with the orchestra between the announcement of his appointment as music director and the time when he succeeds Leinsdorf at the conclusion of next summer. Steinberg will conduct on Sunday afternoon.

HELEN BOATWRIGHT, soprano, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus that will include Bach's Cantata no. 202 (The Wedding Cantata) and Brahms' Requiem op. 45, Saturday, July 27 at Tanglewood. (See "Entertainment" calendar.)

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 28 1968

New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Symphony, Singers Deliver Solemn Message of Brahms

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Brahms' "German Requiem" is a slow starter, and Erich Leinsdorf was in no hurry to get it going Saturday night at Tanglewood. With him and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were Helen Boatwright, soprano, Sherrill Milnes, Baritone, and the 100 voices of the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshir Chorus.

Toward the end of the second chorus there is a little action, and after the baritone has contributed his share to the third section the chorus breaks forth with fugal passages that are dramatically impressive.

But action is not the message this music has to deliver. Solemn thoughtfulness is the message, and faith and a generous and comforting view of the world.

Both Milnes, a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Miss Boatwright delivered this message with clarity even though their words were lost.

Calm Pacing

The chorus and orchestra delivered it even more eloquently with calm and deliberate pacing and tasteful dynamics.

Brahms worked on his great oratorio over a period of nine years; even so it was a relatively early work, completed eight years before his first symphony. And it made the young, beardless Brahms famous — especially among the many singing societies in Germany.

There are seven movements, the early sections being expressions of mourning, the center (fourth) an expression of consolation ("How Lovely is Thy Dwelling Place") and the later movements expressions of reconciliation to the idea of death.

It is a big piece of music—vast in scope and philosophy—and it kept its 7925 listeners in their seats Saturday for about 70 minutes.

But its opening mournfulness leads surely to strong and climactic final passages of optimism.

Before intermission Miss Boatwright was soloist with 21 members of the orchestra for a really elegant performance of Bach's "Wedding" Cantata No. 202.

The little group on sage consisted of 18 strings, a harpsichord, oboe, bassoon and Miss Boatwright, who was obliged to sing four arias, four recitatives and the final gavotte.

Three of the arias are of special interest, the first because the oboe (Ralph Gomberg) accompanies the soprano on an almost equal basis, the third because a solo violin (Joseph Silberstein) sings along with her, and the fourth because she and the oboe and bassoon (Sherman Walt) form a playful trio.

The cantata is one of Bach's most popular. The opening words are "Vanish, gloomy shadows," and that is what it did for its lucky listeners Saturday.

Boston Symphony to Play 'Requiem' at Tanglewood

The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., is a performance this evening of the Brahms "Requiem" conducted by the orcestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

Soloists will be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

The 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Shorus.

The Tanglewood Choir consists of the fellows of the Berkshire Music Center and participants in the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Boston University. The Berkshire Chorus is made up of residents of the Tanglewood area who work under the direction of the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson.

Also on tonight's program will be the "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Leinsdorf, with Miss Boatwright as soloist.

* * *

Tomorrow's concert will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current festival, Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan," and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

The open rehearsal of the orchestra will be held at 10:30 a.m. today in the Shed.

The Sunday morning chamber music concert will be presented by the Music Guild String Quartet, playing works of Haydn, Bartok and Ravel.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Saturday, July 27, 1968

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 29, 1968

A Night to Remember at Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

At the Concert

Saturday night a crowd of over 8,000 went to Tanglewood to hear a program of baroque and romantic music consisting of the Bach "Wedding Cantata" No. 202 for soprano and the Brahms "A German Requiem" for orchestra, chorus and soprano and baritone soloists.

In the requiem the test is of a very special import. It is not setting of a traditional liturgical sequence, but a most sensitive gleaning of the Christian scriptures based on the composers own thorough knowledge of the German Bible.

"A German Requiem" has the ordered proportions and singleness of mood and color of a great work of art. The music is colored by Brahm' concern for the surviving living rather than the itercessary prayers for the departed dead.

The performance of this work by the combined Berkshire and Tanglewood choruses, soloists and Boston Symphony Orchestra under the inspire leadership of Erich Leinsdorf left nothing to be desired.

Full credit must be given to Charles Wilson and John Oliver for the splendid work of the chorus. The blend was exceptional and the overall sound had a freshness and youthful quality of unusual beauty. There was never a strident moment.

The baritone, Sherril Milnes has a rich resonant voice which he used with intelligence and style.

Helen Boatright's fluent pure voice and splendid musicianship were heard to great advantage in both Bach and Brahms.

The Bach "Wedding Cantata" which began the concert gave an opportunity for the vaunted first chair men of the orchestra to exhibit exceptional abilities. Joseph Silverstein, violin and Ralph Gomber, oboe, deserve special mention for their outstanding playing.

At the close of the concert, the audience gave the performers 10-minute standing ovation. This was truly a concert to be remembered as it was one of the rare occasions when conductor, orchestra, soloists and chorus all seemed equally inspired.

HELEN BOATWRIGHT

Massive Music At Tanglewood Presents Interesting Contrast

A two-part program at Tanglewood Saturday evening held interesting contrast for its audience. The second half presented Brahms' "German Requiem" with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony together with soloists Helen Boatwright, soprano, Sherrill Milnes, baritone and a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and the combined voices of the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus. The latter made its first appearance of the season and is composed of people in the area. This massive and impressive piece of music was composed over a period of nine years and reflects the devotion to the mastering of a difficult form by its composer. Although long and at times ponderous, this work is huge in scope both musically and philosophically, and it is to be noted that the measured mourning of the early sections gives way to optimism and acceptance of death without fear in the final passages, ending on a note of great strength and faith. The chorus skillfully handled the fugal passages with dramatic effect.

Bach's "Wedding Cantata" No. 202 opens with the words "Vanish gloomy shadows" which proved indeed to be the case, as the audience was treated in the first half of the program to a fine and polished performance by Miss Boatwright, 18 strings, a harpsichord, oboe and bassoon. The carefully controlled interplay of voice and instruments made this popular cantata both a memorable and delightful experience for its listeners.—A.C.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

JUL 30 1968 New England Newsclip

SOPRANO Helen Boatwright is featured soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Saturday.

Leinsdorf, Krips Conduct at Lenox

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Two strikingly different personalities were on podium Saturday night and yesterday afternoon for the closing concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival's fourth weekend at Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, its regular conductor, and Joseph Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

Yesterday's audience of 6,562 made a total of 21,424 for weekend concerts beginning Friday night.

Saturday night, Leinsdorf conducted the orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, and vocal soloists in a program that might be thought of lesser cross-section attraction. It brought the largest audience of the weekend, 7,925.

It was Bach's "Wedding" Cantata, No. 202 for soprano and small orchestra, and Brahms' "German Requiem." Helen Boatwright was soprano soloist in both works.

Tried and True

The mixed chorus of 78 voices and baritone Sherrill Milnes of the Met participated in the Brahms.

Krips conducted a tried and true, safe and sound program. It was also unusually exciting — Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral," Strauss' "Don Juan," and the 1919 version of Stravinsky's ballet suite, "Firebird."

In Leinsdorf one witnessed a conductor of generalized, standard gesture. His Bach was "according to the book," but he was also instrumental in filling the Brahms Requiem with tonal opulence and inspiration.

The Bach Cantata was disappointing. Miss Boatwright's voice was poorly suited to the score. It was frail, pleasing at times, but effortful and not entirely reliable in pitch. She improved in the Brahms.

Chorus, Milnes and the orchestra shared credit for a profound delivery of the Requiem. They produced a rich composition of sound, intimately associated with the spiritual nuances of the text.

Milnes sang "Lord, make me to know" with a powerful and disciplined baritone. The absence of vocal stress was most impressive.

Commands Respect

Krips commands respect from the moment he steps on stage. You can feel such reaction from the orchestra. The audience confirmed it with long, insistent applause.

His face exuded the joy that permeates most of Beethoven's "Pastoral." Everything was exactly in place. The man has a few characteristic gestures. He beckons for loud instead of resorting to sweeping commands. His balances are obtained by quieting an entire section with a flip of the hand.

Krips' cues anticipate action. They don't pursue it in that split second that's too late for effectiveness.

Only Sour Note

Everything in the Beethoven sounded in bold relief. The only sour note was audience restlessness after the second movement. Krips was visibly upset. He could also have been annoyed at the clinkers in horns, although those men more than compensated in the Straus and Stravinsky.

The conductor brought magnificence to "Don Juan" as well as narrative substance. He placed unusual stress on the brass and didn't allow the work to lag even through the long oboe episode.

Stravinsky's "Firebird" was loaded with highlights. To name but two, the luscius sounds in the Princess round, and tingling excitement of Kastchei's dance.

It was the kind of music that brings you to the edge of your seat and keeps you there.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

JUL 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Syracusan sings at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. — The major work of the fourth weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968 Berkshire festival is a performance on Saturday evening of the Brahms' "Requiem" conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

Soloists will be Syracusan Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone, with the 78-voice chorus will be the combined Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire chorus.

Also on the Saturday evening program will be the "Wedding Cantata" (No. 202) of Bach, conducted by Leinsdorf, with Mrs. Boatwright as soloist.

The weekend programs will begin at 7 p.m. Friday in the Tanglewood Music Shed when pianist Malcolm Frager plays the Weekend Prelude Concert, performing the Brahms C. Major Sonata and the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8 in F Sharp minor. That evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Leinsdorf features Jorge Bolet as piano soloist in two works, the Konzertstueck of Weber and the Hungarian Fantasy of Lisz. Leinsdorf will also conduct William Kraft's Concerto for Precussion and Orchestra, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

The Sunday concert at 2:30 p.m. will be conducted by the third guest conductor of the current Festival, Josef Krips, condoctur of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Krips will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan," and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

The Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Saturday in the shed at 10:30 a.m. The Sunday Morning Chamber Music Concert will be presented by the Music Guild String Quartet, playing works of Haydn, Bartok, and Ravel.

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Wednesday, July 24, 1968

MUSIC

MASSACHUSETTS

LENOX (Berkshire Festival) — Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in all three concerts at Tanglewood this week. Today's all-Beethovan program at 2:30 p.m. will include Symphony No. 2, Symphony No. 8 and Piano Concerto No. 5, Emperor. At 9 p.m. on Friday, the Orchestra will play Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, Weber's Konzertstuck, Schulmann's Symphony No. 2 and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy. On Saturday at 8 p.m. the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir will join in the performance of Brahm's Requiem.

DANCE

MASSACHUSETTS

LEE (Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival) — The Pennsylvania Ballet Company, July 23-27.

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

JUL 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Albany Knickerbocker News
Sat. [illegible] 1968

Music

TANGLEWOOD. —The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will present a program at 8 p.m. today consisting of Brahms "Requiem." Helen Boatwright and Sherrill Milnes will sing with the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir. At 2:30 p.m. tomorrow Josef Krips will conduct a program of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 6." Strauss "Don Juan;" and Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite." Concerts will start again on Aug. 2 with a Weekend Prelude, followed by the Boston Symphony playing Berlioz, Ravel and Tchaikovsky.

Boston Symphony At Tanglewood

The Brahms Requiem will be conducted by the Boston Symphony's music director, Erich Leinsdorf tonight at 8 p.m.

Soloists wil be Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

The 78-voice chorus will be comprised of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

Also on the evening program is "Wedding" Cantata (No. 202) of Bach.

The 2:30 Sunday concert will be conducted by Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

His program: Beethoven's "PASTORAL" Symphony Struss's "Don Juan, and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

JUL 27 1968 New England Newsclip

46.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday July 28 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

JOSEPH KRIPS conductor

BEETHOVEN	Symphony no. 6 in F major op. 68 'The Pastoral'
	Awakening of happy feelings on reaching the countryside: allegro ma non troppo
	At the brook's edge: andante molto mosso
	Festive gathering of the country people: allegro
	Thunderstorm: allegro
	Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm: allegretto
intermission
STRAUSS	Don Juan op. 20
STRAVINSKY	Suite from the ballet 'The Firebird' (1919)*
	Introduction — the Firebird and its dance — variation of the Firebird
	The round of the Princess
	Infernal dance of Kashchei
	Lullaby
	Finale

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 42

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

/ Music Review

Varied Musical Fare at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE PAST WEEKEND at Tanglewood, the fourth and the halfway mark of the season, presented three programs of stimulating interest consisting mainly of well-worn but welcome ever-young favorites.

Yesterday afternoon, guest conductor Joseph Krips, a man of long international experience and respected authority, made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three masterpieces: The Beethoven Sixth Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan" and a suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird."

The composer of this latter work has had second thoughts and has rearranged, editing and excising, certain details from the original composition. The performance which Krips used yesterday was not the one Stravinsky was heard in two years ago when he conducted the Eastman School Orchestra at Rochester, but the 1919 version of the ballet which was commissioned by the nearest-to-fabulous entrepreneur, Diaghilev, who has ever dominated any era.

* * *

STRAUSS DETOURED Byron's "Don Juan" just as Berlioz, as ardent a fan of the histrionic Englishman as he was, had done with his "Corsair" overture on last week's program. Berlioz went to our own Cooper; Strauss to his fellow-countryman, Nicholas Lenau, the Viennese poet who, tiring of Vienna's effete aristocracy, sailed to Baltimore in 1832 and staked out a homestead claim in Ohio.

When Koussevitzky first brought the Boston orchestra to the Berkshires, he sensed how fitting the bucolic nature of the countryside seemed to be for Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." He played it the first year the Berkshire Festival moved to the Tanglewood grounds, in 1937, but under a tent. He played it again the following year, the first under the newly erected Shed. It became all but the official theme song of the Festival.

Krips, too, recognizing its aptness asked rhetorically, "Where else but here?"

* * *

IT MAY BE only of minor academic interest, but Henry Hadley, the first conductor of the Festival, used the "Don Juan" on his program for the first year, 1934, of the burgeoning outdoor venture. To complete the report on research, Koussevitzky used "Firebird Suite" on his 1937 program, also with the "Pastoral."

Whitestone

Joseph Krips in Tanglewood debut.

Krips received an ovation for his work in the second half of his program. The audience seemed to warm to the excitement he generated in the latter two of his choices. His "Pastoral" was played with obvious affection, but the lack of any contrast between the first two movements made it a bit languorous.

But if his "Infernal Dance" was deliriously seducing and his "Don Juan" emotionally moving, his "Pastoral" was inclined to be comfortably languid. Krips is a tall, straight man and his baton technic is professionally correct. The delineation of the various Beethoven movements which the Bostonians gave him was exemplary.

The largest crowd of the weekend came to the Saturday night program. It proved to be Erich Leinsdorf's night. His command and direction of the magnificent Brahms Requiem will undoubtedly be one of the most memorable performances of the season.

* * *

THE ASTONISHMENTS of this work never dull. It becomes redundant to point out the strokes of genius in the score, but it was nothing less than that to always notice the entrance and later the underlying accompaniment of the opening chorus in the wonderfully grateful timbre realized by omitting violins for its entire duration.

The Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus, Charles Wilson, director, and John Oliver, assistant, sang with instant power and responsiveness and produced overwhelming impact in many instances. The soloists were Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. Each one has but a single opportunity, but they did them with outstanding effectiveness. Leinsdorf was overgenerous in sharing the acclaim the audience of nearly 8,000, would not cease to tender him, but he should have shouldered more of the praise personally, for the success of the evening was mainly his.

* * *

THE EVENING Saturday started with a concerto for percussion and orchestra of William Kraft, who is tympanist of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. This was indeed a novelty for the Tanglewood stage. This type of music is heard more often in the smaller concert hall on the same grounds in a framework where experimental music is played for a more sophisticated audience.

Five percussionists from the Boston orchestra battery took their place as soloists at the front of the stage but unexpectedly, did not release the full power of their potential impact until well along in the three-movement concerto. There were suggestions and reminiscences of Varese in some spots but it had continuity and originality as well.

Surprisingly, there were solos for several of the numerous instruments spread out before them and occasionally one player scampered from one drum to another or to a vibraphone. About 24 different instruments were utilized and the sound effects were fun and intriguing. Except for a slash-bang tympani solo, most of the playing was delicately restrained.

Kraft writes an episode for strings at the beginning of his "Cadenza e Variozioni" which sounds like a 12-note envasion. It was attention-demanding and may not have sounded any better if it had been played accurately.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT Leinsdorf used the Schumann Second Symphony, C Major, Opus 61, as his pivotal exhibit and gave it a deeply convincing performance. He eased into the introduction with judicious acceleration. In the scherzo, he let the Boston strings have a scintillating holiday. The agogic stresses gave it special shape and rationality and the adagio was sung without giving the impression that Schumann's rhythmic accompanying configurations were gasping for breath, an impression that can easily be conveyed in this movement.

Jorge Bolet is always a welcome piano soloist at Tanglewood. He invariably turns in a brilliant performance but also invariably (or is it assigned?) a flamboyant vehicle. He executed his Friday night tasks in his own unsurpassable fashion—the Weber Konzertstueck in F Minor, Opus 79, and the Liszt Fantasia on Hungarian folk tunes, Opus 123. But one wonders if he hasn't been type cast. Bolet proved in the lyric passages of the Weber work that he can "sing" on his piano as well as explode fireworks. It was of interest to hear how Liszt had obviously gone to the same source for his supplies as had Bartok, in his concerto for orchestra on last week's program.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 29 1968

New England Newsclip

46.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday July 28 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

JOSEPH KRIPS conductor

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 6 in F major op. 68 'The Pastoral'

Awakening of happy feelings on reaching the countryside: allegro ma non troppo
At the brook's edge: andante molto mosso
Festive gathering of the country people: allegro
Thunderstorm: allegro
Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm: allegretto

intermission

STRAUSS — Don Juan op. 20

STRAVINSKY — Suite from the ballet 'The Firebird' (1919)*

Introduction — the Firebird and its dance — variation of the Firebird
The round of the Princess
Infernal dance of Kashchei
Lullaby
Finale

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 42

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

/ Music Review

Varied Musical Fare at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE PAST WEEKEND at Tanglewood, the fourth and the halfway mark of the season, presented three programs of stimulating interest consisting mainly of well-worn but welcome ever-young favorites.

Yesterday afternoon, guest conductor Joseph Krips, a man of long international experience and respected authority, made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three masterpieces: The Beethoven Sixth Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan" and a suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird."

The composer of this latter work has had second thoughts and has rearranged, editing and excising, certain details from the original composition. The performance which Krips used yesterday was not the one Stravinsky was heard in two years ago when he conducted the Eastman School Orchestra at Rochester, but the 1919 version of the ballet which was commissioned by the nearest-to-fabulous entrepreneur, Diaghilev, who has ever dominated any era.

* * *

STRAUSS DETOURED Byron's "Don Juan" just as Berlioz, as ardent a fan of the histrionic Englishman as he was, had done with his "Corsair" overture on last week's program. Berlioz went to our own Cooper; Strauss to his fellow-countryman, Nicholas Lenau, the Viennese poet who, tiring of Vienna's effete aristocracy, sailed to Baltimore in 1832 and staked out a homestead claim in Ohio.

When Koussevitzky first brought the Boston orchestra to the Berkshires, he sensed how fitting the bucolic nature of the countryside seemed to be for Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." He played it the first year the Berkshire Festival moved to the Tanglewood grounds, in 1937, but under a tent. He played it again the following year, the first under the newly erected Shed. It became all but the official theme song of the Festival.

Krips, too, recognizing its aptness asked rhetorically, "Where else but here?"

* * *

IT MAY BE only of minor academic interest, but Henry Hadley, the first conductor of the Festival, used the "Don Juan" on his program for the first year, 1934, of the burgeoning outdoor venture. To complete the report on research, Koussevitzky used "Firebird Suite" on his 1937 program, also with the "Pastoral."

Whitestone

Joseph Krips in Tanglewood debut.

Krips received an ovation for his work in the second half of his program. The audience seemed to warm to the excitement he generated in the latter two of his choices. His "Pastoral" was played with obvious affection, but the lack of any contrast between the first two movements made it a bit languorous.

But if his "Infernal Dance" was deliriously seducing and his "Don Juan" emotionally moving, his "Pastoral" was inclined to be comfortably languid. Krips is a tall, straight man and his baton technic is professionally correct. The delineation of the various Beethoven movements which the Bostonians gave him was exemplary.

The largest crowd of the weekend came to the Saturday night program. It proved to be Erich Leinsdorf's night. His command and direction of the magnificent Brahms Requiem will undoubtedly be one of the most memorable performances of the season.

* * *

THE ASTONISHMENTS of this work never dull. It becomes redundant to point out the strokes of genius in the score, but it was nothing less than that to always notice the entrance and later the underlying accompaniment of the opening chorus in the wonderfully grateful timbre realized by omitting violins for its entire duration.

The Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus, Charles Wilson, director, and John Oliver, assistant, sang with instant power and responsiveness and produced overwhelming impact in many instances. The soloists were Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. Each one has but a single opportunity, but they did them with outstanding effectiveness. Leinsdorf was overgenerous, in sharing the acclaim the audience of nearly 8,000, would not cease to tender him, but he should have shouldered more of the praise personally, for the success of the evening was mainly his.

* * *

THE EVENING Saturday started with a concerto for percussion and orchestra of William Kraft, who is tympanist of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. This was indeed a novelty for the Tanglewood stage. This type of music is heard more often in the smaller concert hall on the same grounds in a framework where experimental music is played for a more sophisticated audience.

Five percussionists from the Boston orchestra battery took their place as soloists at the front of the stage but unexpectedly, did not release the full power of their potential impact until well along in the three-movement concerto. There were suggestions and reminiscences of Varese in some spots but it had continuity and originality as well.

Surprisingly, there were solos for several of the numerous instruments spread out before them and occasionally one player scampered from one drum to another or to a vibraphone. About 24 different instruments were utilized and the sound effects were fun and intriguing. Except for a slash-bang tympani solo, most of the playing was delicately restrained.

Kraft writes an episode for strings at the beginning of his "Cadenza e Variozioni" which sounds like a 12-note envasion. It was attention-demanding and may not have sounded any better if it had been played accurately.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT Leinsdorf used the Schumann Second Symphony, C Major, Opus 61, as his pivotal exhibit and gave it a deeply convincing performance. He eased into the introduction with judicious acceleration. In the scherzo, he let the Boston strings have a scintillating holiday. The agogic stresses gave it special shape and rationality and the adagio was sung without giving the impression that Schumann's rhythmic accompanying configurations were gasping for breath, an impression that can easily be conveyed in this movement.

Jorge Bolet is always a welcome piano soloist at Tanglewood. He invariably turns in a brilliant performance but also invariably (or is it assigned?) a flamboyant vehicle. He executed his Friday night tasks in his own unsurpassable fashion—the Weber Konzertstueck in F Minor, Opus 79, and the Liszt Fantasia on Hungarian folk tunes, Opus 123. But one wonders if he hasn't been type cast. Bolet proved in the lyric passages of the Weber work that he can "sing" on his piano as well as explode fireworks. It was of interest to hear how Liszt had obviously gone to the same source for his supplies as had Bartok, in his concerto for orchestra on last week's program.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 29 1968 New England Newsclip

47

Krips' Metronomic Beat Inhibits Performance at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —Josef Krips, the rotund Viennese conductor from San Francisco, was treated politely by his hosts, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sunday afternoon.

Joyful "Don Juan"

They painted Strauss' "Don Juan" with all the joyfully garish colors the young Strauss asked for and they managed to insert some robust, gusty sounds into the "Infernal Dance" during the course of Stravinsky's suite from his ballet, "The Firebird."

But they couldn't get past Krips' professorial, metronomic beat to bring Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, "The Pastoral," to life.

Of course, a Beethoven symphony core is a masterpiece at the start, and Boston's orchestra consists of masterful musicians; so a bad performance of "The Pastoral" would have been impossible.

Early Tension Missed

But this symphony, for all its facade of rustic idyl, is best when its early sections convey an underground of electric tension which increases in anticipation of the "Thunderstorm" at the climactic point and is released in the final "Shepherd's Song" in the finale.

That "Shepherd's Song" is one of the great melodies of the symphonic library, and Sunday its beauty was sadly diminished because the uninspired early sections had not provided the proper preparation.

The orchestral virtuosity with Strauss and Stravinsky which followed erased the memory of the dissapointment with "The Pastoral," however, and the audience gave Krips warm applause.

Ehrling to Conduct

Attendance was 6562, which, with Wednesday's 4653 at the Ravi Shankar concert, brought the week's attendance to 26,077.

Next weekend the programs in the shed will present Sixten Ehrling as guest conductor Friday and William Steinberg as guest conductor Sunday.

Guest soloists will be pianists Jorge Bolet at the Friday prelude concert and with the Paganini Variations Sunday afternoon and Malcolm Frager Saturday night with his revised score of the Schumann piano concerto.

Morning Chamber Music

The spirit of the 10.30 a. m. chamber-music concert in the Tanglewood theater was dampened by a grey overcast that produced three short showers which developed into a steady, warm drizzle by the end of the concert. (The afternoon was warm and sunny.)

But the grey atmosphere was oppropriate to most of the music. The Music Guild String Quartet played Bartok's Quartet No. 3 and Ravel's Quartet in F.

The players, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Max Winder, first violin; Gerald Gelbloom, second violin; Bernard Kadinoff, viola; Stephen Gerber, cello.

Benevolence Evident

Neither the weather nor the players seemed to be entirely in sympathy with the Haydn "Rider" quartet (Op. 74. No. 3), which opened the program, although no serious quibble is raised with the technical quality of the performance.

Aside from the tidy coordination displayed by the four players reflecting the talent for ensemble unanimity that infuses even the back-bench players of Boston's orchestra, the most evident characteristic of the quartet Sunday morning was benevolence.

It failed to show the aggression bordering on arrogance so often displayed by string quartets when essaying the dense textures, strong dynamics and variable rhythms of Ravel's only quartet and any of Bartok's quartets . . . in this case, the third.

Boston Sinfonietta

The result was supple music with a wry flavor —tasteful and satisfying.

Next Sunday morning the Boston Sinfonietta is scheduled to play music by Mozart, Bach and Dvorak.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
JUL 29 1968
New England Newsclip

Sunday's concert was conducted by Joseph Krips of the San Francisco Symphony. It might well have been sub-titled "Lush music for a warm Sunday Afternoon." There is nothing sterile or academic about Mr. Krips. He seems to have a fine feeling for romance and smaltz and the music Sunday had no competition whatsoever from the cicadas or swaving trees outside. Beethoven's 6th in F. Major, "The Pastoral" opened, and surely, there is no more perfect work to be played at Tanglewood. And it was played perfectly. We dreamed on to Strauss' Don Juan op. 20 and became aware that besides romance. Mr. Krips has a great sense of the dramatic. He seems particularly interested in intonation and sound quality. We get a real feeling of theatre from what he does with the orchestra. The afternoon concluded with Stravinsky's Firebird Ballet music and here Krips really shone. It had verve and vitality and drama. It was as exciting as it was romantic and everyone sort of smiled out of the shed. It is nice to know that there are conductors like Joseph Krips around. They endow music with another dimension; it is somewhere close to love.

— Esther Watstein

Bristol Conn. Press 7/30/68

THE NEW YORK TIMES, MONDAY, JULY 29, 1968

Music: Tanglewood Has Variety

Krips Mingles Familiar and Uncommon Fare

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 28—If nothing else, the Tanglewood programs of the Berkshire Music Festival had variety over the weekend. This afternoon's program, conducted by Joseph Krips, was strictly bread-and-butter, with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite. But last night saw Bach's "Wedding Cantata" and the Brahms "German Requiem," two works that are not exactly unknown but do not turn up very often. And on Friday, what with Malcolm Frager playing Brahms's C major Sonata at the Weekend Prelude, and Jorge Bolet at the evening concert playing Weber's "Concertstück" and Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy," both with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, nobody could complain of hackneyed programs.

•

There even was a complete novelty to most listeners. William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra opened the Friday evening concert.

Mr. Kraft, a 45-year-old Chicago-born composer, now a teacher at the University of Southern California, composed this concerto last year. It is a three-movement work, a little over 15 minutes long, and does what its title implies—gives the percussion players a chance to indulge in some fancy handwork and footwork, and make a hell of a racket. The musical idiom is relatively conservative, and there even was a tonal feeling. And, of course, juggling five percussionists inevitably provides variety of sound, from pianissimo cymbal brushing to the full battery.

There were perky moments, and exciting moments. But once pure sound and pure technique were absorbed by the listener, the actual musical content sounded very thin. Whatever temporary interest the music has is in the chance it gives for hitherto anonymous musicians, normally far back in the orchestra, to come up front and display themselves. The gallant five on this occasion, all Boston Symphony players, were Everett Firth, Arthur Press, Frank Epstein, Charles Smith and Thomas Gauger.

•

The Weber "Concertstück" is a marvelous piece, and should be permanently in the repertory. Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy," on the other hand, is fun and games, and does not aim higher than entertainment. But entertainment it is, especially as played so heroically by Mr. Bolet, all 20 fingers flailing away, not a digit out of place, in complete command of style and sonority.

Curiously, Mr. Bolet sounded less comfortable in the Weber. Possibly it was not rehearsed enough. But he was hitting in the cracks, something rare for this infallible pianist, and he even committed a few rhythmic sins. One had almost forgotten how prophetic this piece is, how it inspired the romantics, how its bravura still shines through, how advanced it was for its day.

Percussionists Heard in Rare Solo Roles

In the Schumann Second, Mr. Leinsdorf gave an up-and-down metrical performance, propulsive but inflexible, strong but without much charm. But the following night, in the "German Requiem," he was conducting music that clearly meant a great deal to him, and there was a kind of personal involvement missing from the Schumann, or from Bach's "Wedding Cantata," for that matter.

The powerful and often brooding Brahms score emerged with consecutive flow, with contour and rhythmic precision, and with a kind of massiveness that never degenerated into lumpy heaviness. Two fine soloists participated. Helen Boatwright sang the soprano solo with a pure, lovely floating sound, and Sherrill Milnes was the admirable baritone —a singer with an opulent voice and, in addition, brains. The Tanglewood Choir had been rehearsed through and through, and the young singers gave as good an account of the choral parts as one is going to hear any time, any place.

Tanglewood and Marlboro

Festival highlights

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

The novelty piece at Tanglewood this weekend was William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra. This is a relatively new work; Zubin Mehta conducted its first performance in Los Angeles last year, and Erich Leinsdorf introduced it to the Berkshire Music Festival Friday night.

Mr. Kraft is principal percussionist for the Los Angeles Philharmonic and one of the finest timpanists in that part of the world. His concerto betrays the hand and mind of a skilled performer; one can hardly imagine its being written by anyone with less than Mr. Kraft's accomplishment, for it is as idiomatic as the piano music of Liszt, and perhaps as difficult.

Five players — on this occasion they were Everett Firth, Arthur Press, Frank Epstein, Charles Smith, and Thomas Guager — work at a battery of some 35 instruments, including all manner of drums and bells, chimes, glockenspiel, vibraphone, xylophone, triangles, and six antique cymbals. Piano and celeste enter the fray from time to time as percussion instruments, although they are not designated as belonging to the solo group, and the man who played both of them Friday didn't get his name in the program.

The rest of the orchestra is also treated in concerto fashion for a large portion of the work, with instruments, or sections of them, frequently chattering at each other across the band shell. The orchestration is sparse; tuttis are rare, and except for the opening of the second movement, the percussion is always in the forefront.

Variation by timbre

The musical substance, taken in the abstract, is also rather lean. Variations by timbre is the most notable compositional technique. The last movement is a variation form, and although the other two are not, they also rely for their effect on an ever-changing configuration of tone colors.

Mr. Kraft's concerto has its pretty moments, but makes no pretense of heavy musical thought. As with most genuinely virtuosic music, the pleasure it produces is derived chiefly from the application of monumental executant force to an unusual instrumental challenge. And watching it performed is as much fun as listening to it.

The same could be said for most of the remainder of Friday night's concert. Jorge Bolet's delivery of the Konzertstück in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, by Weber (also, oddly enough, a Tanglewood première), and of the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy, revealed more showmanship than technical or stylistic accuracy. But his performances were fun, and the audience received them well.

Between Weber and Liszt Mr. Leinsdorf sandwiched a rather listless reading of Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major.

Bach at Marlboro

Marlboro, Vt.

Saturday night was the annual Bach cantata night at Marlboro. Blanche Honegger-Moyse led her well-trained Brattleboro Music Center Chorus through three works of the Leipzig period: No. 104, "Du Hirte Israel, höre"; No. 105, "Herr, gehe nicht ins Gericht"; and No. 11, "Lobet Gott in seinen Reichen."

The performances featured a variety of soloists, most of them of high quality. Thomas Paul and Leslie Guinn made bass and baritone arias exceptionally pleasurable; Betty Allen brought a rich, if not invariably accurate, contralto sound to solo numbers from the second and third works.

The soprano Benita Valente had only one aria to sing — "Wie zittern und wanken" from Cantata No. 105. But she did that so exceedingly well that it was one of the high points of the evening.

Kirchner concerto

Mrs. Honegger-Moyse has made a specialty of the Bach cantatas. Her performances are a model of taste and musicianship — never spectacular, but devastatingly effective, and invariably a service to the cause.

The Sunday afternoon concert included Leon Kirchner's Concerto for Violin, Cello, Ten Winds, and Percussion (1960), with Pina Carmirelli and Robert Sylvester, soloists, and the composer conducting. The work strikes this listener as substantial and stimulating, and put together with a high order of workmanship. The extreme condensation of its musical materials makes it difficult to absorb on one hearing; but its exuberant spirit encourages one to come back for a second round.

The rest of the program consisted chiefly of Alexander Schneider playing second fiddle in the best of Marlboro tradition. Mr. Schneider played second to Yoko Matsuda in a sweet performance of the Ravel Quartet, and to Yosef Yankelev in Schubert's Quartet in A minor, Op. 29.

The program opened with Monteverdi's "Scherzi Musicali" (1607), featuring sopranos Bethany Beardslee and Kate Hurney, and baritone Leslie Guinn. This was followed by a lively interpretaton of the Stravinsky Septet (1953), in which Mr. Schneider played first—and only fiddle. C. S.

48.

Tanglewood Concerts Draw 18,934

Last weekend at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Berkshire Music Festival, the half-way mark of the season was reached.

A total of 18,934 attended the three concerts, plus an audience of 4,653 who turned out for the Wednesday Contemporary Trends musical program with Ravi Shankar and a group of North and South India Musicians.

Malcolm Frager played the Brahms' C major Sonata at the weekend Prelude Friday evening with his usual competence and musicianship, followed by the regular concert with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony, which opened with a rather interesting novelty, making its debut at Tanglewood, William Kraft's "Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra".

Composed last year, Kraft is tympanist of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and teaches at the University of Southern California. His work gives the symphony's percussionists an opportunity to let go with solos sounds that blast away. The five soloists from the percussion section featured up front were Everett Firth, Arthur Press, Frank Epstein, Charles Smith and Thomas Gauger.

The famed pianist George Bolet performed the Weber "Concertstuck" most colorfully, with considerable fire and passion. The second half of the program featured Schumann's Symphony No. 2, given a pedestrian performance by orchestra and conductor. Friday evening's program finished with the delightful and ever-popular Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian folk tunes op. 123, brilliantly played by George Bolet, who has the flair and technique that does Liszt justice.

Saturday evening's program began with Bach's "Wedding Cantata" featuring Helen Boatwright as soprano soloist, accompanied by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston, Charles Wilson playing the Harpsichord Continuo, Henry Portnoi, Double Bass Continuo, Ralph Gomberg, Oboe and Jules Eskin, Cello Continuo. This was a thoroughly delightful and charming performance, with Miss Boatwright's flowing and beautiful voice thrilling the audience.

However, the most thrilling and exciting performance was the presentation of the monumental "Brahms German Requiem", which completed the last half of Saturday night's performance. It was quite evident that Leinsdorf was personally and deeply involved with this performance. It was brilliantly the Tanglewood Choir and Berkperformed by the orchestra and shire Festival Chorus sang this work with the greatest of purity, joy and musicanship. Credit should be given to Charles Wilson, director of these choral groups and his assistant, John Oliver. The two soloists, Helen Boatwright and Sherrill Milnes, Baritone, performed their small, yet perfectly beautiful solos with infallible artistry. This work of powerful beauty and massiveness never proved dull or overbearing.

Joseph Krips made his Tanglewood debut as guest conductor on Sunday afternoon with a beautiful rendition of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6. always enjoyed by audiences in this idyllic bucolic and magnificent setting of Tanglewood. The last half of the program featured Strauss' Don Juan, op. 20 and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite from the Ballet.

Next weekend's programs will bring Sixten Ehrling of the Detroit Symphony as Guest Conductor, Friday evening, featuring Berlioz, "Benvenuto Cellini, Overture, Ravel's Pavane for a dead Infanta, Ravel's Rapsodie Spaknole and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5. Saturday evening's concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf playing Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor", Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 (Scottish), Strauss' Suite from Der Rosenkavalier, and the return to the regular concert stage of Malcolm Frager, eminent pianist, who will be the soloist in Schumann's Piano Concerto. Sunday afternoon, Aug. 4, will bring guest conductor William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, for a concert of works by Wagner, Rachmaninoff and Mahler. George Bolet, Piano Soloist will be heard in Rachmaninoff's Paganini Variations. Tonight, "the Association" will perform in the last of the contemporary trends concerts.

S.S.M.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood in Review

FRIDAY, JULY 26
By D. D.

This evening's concert by the Boston Symphony featured a host of soloists, seven, to be exact, in a program featuring three concertos and one symphony. Robert Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, with its numerous hints of Copland and Bernstein, was, if not much else, a brilliant display piece for the percussion section of the orchestra. If one has a taste for dazzling virtuosity in this department, Kraft's work generated a lot of excitement and seemed to please the audience.

Jorge Bolet, brilliant Cuban pianist, turned finely wrought versions of Weber's Konzertstuck in F Minor and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy. These works, requiring enormous technical command as well as sheer muscular force, were worthy vehicles for this gifted artist. In absolute control at all times, his ability to preserve complete clarity and purity of line especially in the heavily charged passages would place Bolet in the top rank of interpreters of Liszt. Schumann's Second Symphony with its rich thematic material and varied moods was read with integrity and taste if not with any excess of lyric abandon.

SATURDAY, JULY 27
By A. C. S.

When a conductor has so many compositions to present in the course of a symphony season, it is presumptuous to expect him to have a deep personal attachment for each one. Those who were at Tanglewood Saturday night were privileged to hear at least two works about which Erich Leinsdorf does feel deeply. The first was Bach's Wedding Cantata No. 202 with Helen Boatwright as soprano soloist. It was a joyful performance of a work heard rarely in concert or otherwise.

The major offering was the Requiem of Johannes Brahms. The orchestra has rarely sounded better and the rich sonorities of the score were eloquently projected. Sherrill Milnes' rich baritone was perfect for the work. (Although a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, this was his first appearance at Tanglewood.) Miss Boatwright was ideal for the soprano solo. Her sensitive approach and the fine texture of her voice added immeasurably to the presentation.

Brahms makes extraordinary demands on the chorus in this very personal oratorio. The range is wide, the tessitura is often high, and the dynamic range is enormous. The combined voices of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir were superbly equal to the demands. In all, this was one of the finest performances one could hope to hear.

SUNDAY, JULY 28
By D. D.

Making his first appearance this season at Tanglewood was the noted conductor Joseph Krips. For his program he chose three works from the standard repertory: Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, Richard Strauss' Don Juan, and Stravinsky's Firebird Suite. Mr. Krips' excellence as an interpreter of Beethoven was quite obvious. A taut style along with a highly disciplined approach in the Germanic tradition, drew every ounce of musical content from the score, the various scenes flowing one into the other to form an unbroken image of nature.

The same touch was evident in the Strauss work. An impressive orchestral showpiece to begin with, and utilizing the full resources of the modern orchestra, the Don Juan requires a seasoned conductor and musicians to make its effect, and this was admirably achieved. In spite of some faulty intonation The Firebird came over with the same verve. Heavily accentuated dynamic contrasts kept the audience awake and listening. A note of praise is due to the first oboist Ralph Gomberg for some exquisite playing in all three works.

REPUBLICAN (m)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 26,100

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

Attendance Hits 23,587 At Concerts

Last weekend at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Berkshire Music Festival, the half-way mark of the season was reached.

A total of 18,934 attended the three concerts, plus an audience of 4,653 which turned out for the Wednesday Contemporary Trends musical program with Ravi Shankar and a group of North and South India Musicians.

Malcolm Frager played the Brahms' C major Sonata at the weekend Prelude Friday evening with his usual competence and musicianship, followed by the regular concert with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony, which opened with a rather interesting novelty, making its debut at Tanglewood, William Kraft's "Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra".

Composed last year, Kraft is with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and teaches at the University of Southern California. His work gives the symphony's percussionists an opportunity to let go with solos sounds that blast away. The five soloists from the percussion section featured up front were Everett Firth, Arthur Press, Frank Epstein, Charles Smith and Thomas Gauger.

The famed pianist George Bolet performed the Weber "Concertstuck" most colorfully, with considerable fire and passion. The second half of the program featured Schumann's Symphony No. 2, given a pedestrian performance by orchestra and conductor. Friday evening's program finished with the delightful and ever-popular Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian folk tunes op. 123, brilliantly played by George Bolet, who has the flair and technique that does Liszt justice.

Saturday evening's program began with Bach's "Wedding Cantata" featuring Helen Boatwright as soprano soloist, accompanied by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston, Charles Wilson playing the Harpsichord Continuo, Henry Portnoi, Double Bass Continuo, Ralph Gomberg, Oboe and Jules Eskin, Cello Continuo. This was a thoroughly delightful and charming performance, with Miss Boatwright's flowing and beautiful voice thrilling the audience.

However, the most thrilling and exciting performance was the presentation of the monumental "Brahms German Requiem", which completed the last half of Saturday night's performance. It was quite evident that Leinsdorf was personally and deeply involved with this performance. It was brilliantly performed by the orchestra and the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Festival Chorus sang this work with the greatest of purity, joy and musicanship. Credit should be given to Charles Wilson, director of these choral groups and his assistant, John Oliver. The two soloists, Helen Boatwright and Sherrill Milnes, Baritone, performed their small, yet perfectly beautiful solos with infallible artistry. This work of powerful beauty and massiveness never proved dull or overbearing.

Joseph Krips made his Tanglewood debut as guest conductor on Sunday afternoon with a beautiful rendition of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6. always enjoyed by audiences in this idyllic bucolic and magnificent setting of Tanglewood. The last half of the program featured Strauss' Don Juan, op. 20 and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite from the Ballet.

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

Fifth Week

Chopin Ballades Highlight at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Some of the most stimulating music of this Berkshire Festival was heard at the opening concert of the fifth weekend Friday night at Tanglewood.

Although this summer's audiences have been partial to programs with soloists, 5,043 persons came to hear Sixten Ehrling conduct the Boston Symphony.

Ehrling is well known to Worcester where he conducts his Detroit Symphony Orchestra annually at the festival.

The early evening weekend prelude program was the four Chopin ballades superbly played by Jorge Bolet.

It was crystal clear Friday night that the Boston Symphony players like and respect Ehrling. This could be detected easily in their personal attitude and playing.

The program itself was pretty standard, with two rather frail inclusions. Substantial works were Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnol and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, Opus 64.

Pallid by comparison were Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Opus 23, and Ravel's "Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte."

Ehrling is an imaginative, reliable conductor. He knows what he wants and approaches his scores with decision. When he conducts an orchestra of Boston Symphony caliber, the results can be spectacular.

They certainly were in the Tchaikovsky symphony and Ravel rapsodie.

Its frowning moods do not bar the Tchaikovsky Fifth from being used as an abject emotion rouser along with fireworks display.

The Tchaikovsky was outstanding because Ehrling removed all traces of exaggeration.

Opening theme was sad but didn't weep. String passages had sweep. Brass was aggressive but didn't blare. Percussion was not pounded.

The major horn solo of the second movement was invisively and accurately played by James Stagliano and duplicated beautifully by the cello section. Ehrling drew vivid contrasts between the passionate laments of the second movement and flighty mood of the ensuing waltz. The finale had breadth and total magnificence.

Ravel's rapsodie was presented as a tapestry of exquisite sound. Ehrling gave as much attention to its delicate porcelain as to geyser-like passages and lush materials.

The Malaguena and Habanera were thoroughly steeped in the Spanish idiom. The concluding feria took the orchestra into an area of virtuosity. It was excellent podium-orchestra communication and the men played for all they were worth.

Berlioz' "Cellini" was competent performance of a jaded piece — pompous, noisy and shallow beyond its superficial sound.

Ravel's "Pavane" was properly amorous. Its only justification on this program was that it gave horns, woodwinds, strings and harp opportunities to play sentimental and euphonious solos.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

AUG 4 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 2 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

JORGE BOLET piano

CHOPIN

Ballade in G minor op. 23

Ballade in F major op. 38

Ballade in A flat major op. 47

Ballade in F minor op. 52

Jorge Bolet plays the Baldwin piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JORGE BOLET was born in Havana, Cuba, and was five when he began to study the piano. At nine he gave his first public recital and a year later appeared as soloist with the Havana Sinfonica. He won a scholarship to the Curtis Institute, and after graduation went to Europe for further study. He served in both the Cuban and US armies during the second world war, then returned to the concert stage. Jorge Bolet has played with the major orchestras in the United States, and has appeared in recital and with orchestras on all five continents of the world. He appears again with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next weekend, and is soloist at the prelude next Friday August 2. During the coming season he will perform with the Orchestra in Boston and New York.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Weekend Program

MALCOLM FRAGER

SIXTEN EHRLING

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Sixten Ehrling, music director and conductor of the Detroit Symphony, will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox Friday evening in a concert including works by Berlioz, Ravel and Tschaikovsky.

Saturday evening, Malcolm Frager, pianist, will be featured as the soloist in a performance of the Schumann Piano Concerto (Frager version) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of conductor Erich Leinsdorf.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor Sunday afternoon for a concert of works by Wagner, Rachmaninoff and Mahler. This will be Mr. Steinberg's only appearance with the Boston Symphony before he becomes its new music director in the fall of 1969.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18.650

AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival In Fifth Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The fifth weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival opens tonight at 7 o'clock when pianist Jorge Bolet plays the four Chopin Ballads as the Weekend Prelude. At 9 p.m. the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Sixten Ehrling, conductor of the Detroit Symphony, in a program consisting of Berlioz' Overture to Benvenuto Cellini, Ravel's Pavane for a Dead Infanta and Rapsodie Espagnole, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday evening's program, Erich Leinsdorf, the Orchestra's Music Director, conducts an unusually interesting performance of Robert Schumann's piano concerto with Malcolm Frager as soloist. This performance offers a rare opportunity to hear the concerto's first movement as Schumann first composed it in 1841 for his wife, Clara. It was then called the Phantasie for Piano and Orchestra.

When Schumann added the second and third movements, he made certain changes in the Phantasie, in which changed form we know it now as the concerto's first movement. Malcolm Frager had the opportunity to obtain a copy of the original work. At the time of his appearance at the Berkshire Festival in 1967, he read through it with Mr. Leinsdorf and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf decided then to program it for Tanglewood 1968.

Also on the Saturday evening program is the "Scottish" Symphony, No. 3, of Mendelssohn. The concert opens with the overture to Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and closes with a suite from Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier."

On Sunday, August 4, the Orchestra will be conducted by its future Music Director, William Steinberg. This will be Mr. Steinberg's only appearance with the Orchestra before assuming the Music Directorship in the fall of 1969. His program will include Wagner's Overture to "Die Meisters-Paganini Variations, with pianist Jorge Bolet as soloist, and Mahler's First Symphony.

Boston Symphony Slated For Airing at Tanglewood

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1968 Berkshire Music Festival will be broadcast live from Tanglewood again this weekend by WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc.

* * *

On Friday, beginning at 9 p.m., guest conductor Sixten Ehrling will lead the orchestra in performances of the Benvenuto Cellini Overture by Berlioz, Pavane for a Dead Infanta and Rapsodie Espagnole by Ravel, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director and regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium for Saturday's concert, which begins at 8 p.m. Pianist Malcolm Frager will be featured in a performance of his own version of the Schumann Piano Concerto. The program will also include The Merry Wives of Windsor by Nicolai, the Mendelssohn Symphony No. 3 (or "Scottish" symphony), and the Suite from Der Rosenkavailier by Strauss.

* * *

William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra on Sunday, Aug. 4. This program, which begins at 2:30 p.m., will feature a performance of Rachmaninoff's Paganini Variations by pianist Jorge Bolet. Mahler's Symphony No. 1 will also be heard.

* * *

WAMC, the FM station of Albany Medical College, is broadcasting live from Tanglewood every performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this year's Berkshire Music Festival.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

AUG 1 1968

Fifth Week

Chopin Ballades Highlight at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Some of the most stimulating music of this Berkshire Festival was heard at the opening concert of the fifth weekend Friday night at Tanglewood.

Although this summer's audiences have been partial to programs with soloists, 5,043 persons came to hear Sixten Ehrling conduct the Boston Symphony.

Ehrling is well known to Worcester where he conducts his Detroit Symphony Orchestra annually at the festival.

The early evening weekend prelude program was the four Chopin ballades superbly played by Jorge Bolet.

It was crystal clear Friday night that the Boston Symphony players like and respect Ehrling. This could be detected easily in their personal attitude and playing.

The program itself was pretty standard, with two rather frail inclusions. Substantial works were Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnol and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, Opus 64.

Pallid by comparison were Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Opus 23, and Ravel's "Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte."

Ehrling is an imaginative, reliable conductor. He knows what he wants and approaches his scores with decision. When he conducts an orchestra of Boston Symphony caliber, the results can be spectacular.

They certainly were in the Tchaikovsky symphony and Ravel rapsodie.

Its frowning moods do not bar the Tchaikovsky Fifth from being used as an abject emotion rouser along with fireworks display.

The Tchaikovsky was outstanding because Ehrling removed all traces of exaggeration.

Opening theme was sad but didn't weep. String passages had sweep. Brass was aggressive but didn't blare. Percussion was not pounded.

The major horn solo of the second movement was invisively and accurately played by James Stagliano and duplicated beautifully by the cello section. Ehrling drew vivid contrasts between the passionate laments of the second movement and flighty mood of the ensuing waltz. The finale had breadth and total magnificence.

Ravel's rapsodie was presented as a tapestry of exquisite sound. Ehrling gave as much attention to its delicate porcelain as to geyser-like passages and lush materials.

The Malaguena and Habanera were thoroughly steeped in the Spanish idiom. The concluding feria took the orchestra into an area of virtuosity. It was excellent podium-orchestra communication and the men played for all they were worth.

Berlioz' "Cellini" was competent performance of a jaded piece — pompous, noisy and shallow beyond its superficial sound.

Ravel's "Pavane" was properly amorous. Its only justification on this program was that it gave horns, woodwinds, strings and harp opportunities to play sentimental and euphonious solos.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

AUG 4 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 2 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

JORGE BOLET piano

CHOPIN

Ballade in G minor op. 23

Ballade in F major op. 38

Ballade in A flat major op. 47

Ballade in F minor op. 52

Jorge Bolet plays the Baldwin piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JORGE BOLET was born in Havana, Cuba, and was five when he began to study the piano. At nine he gave his first public recital and a year later appeared as soloist with the Havana Sinfonica. He won a scholarship to the Curtis Institute, and after graduation went to Europe for further study. He served in both the Cuban and US armies during the second world war, then returned to the concert stage. Jorge Bolet has played with the major orchestras in the United States, and has appeared in recital and with orchestras on all five continents of the world. He appears again with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next weekend, and is soloist at the prelude next Friday August 2. During the coming season he will perform with the Orchestra in Boston and New York.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Weekend Program

MALCOLM FRAGER

SIXTEN EHRLING

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Sixten Ehrling, music director and conductor of the Detroit Symphony, will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox Friday evening in a concert including works by Berlioz, Ravel and Tschaikovsky.

Saturday evening, Malcolm Frager, pianist, will be featured as the soloist in a performance of the Schumann Piano Concerto (Frager version) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of conductor Erich Leinsdorf.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor Sunday afternoon for a concert of works by Wagner, Rachmaninoff and Mahler. This will be Mr. Steinberg's only appearance with the Boston Symphony before he becomes its new music director in the fall of 1969.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival In Fifth Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The fifth weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival opens tonight at 7 o'clock when pianist Jorge Bolet plays the four Chopin Ballads as the Weekend Prelude. At 9 p.m. the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Sixten Ehrling, conductor of the Detroit Symphony, in a program consisting of Berlioz' Overture to Benvenuto Cellini, Ravel's Pavane for a Dead Infanta and Rapsodie Espagnole, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday evening's program, Erich Leinsdorf, the Orchestra's Music Director, conducts an unusually interesting performance of Robert Schumann's piano concerto with Malcolm Frager as soloist. This performance offers a rare opportunity to hear the concerto's first movement as Schumann first composed it in 1841 for his wife, Clara. It was then called the Phantasie for Piano and Orchestra.

When Schumann added the second and third movements, he made certain changes in the Phantasie, in which changed form we know it now as the concerto's first movement. Malcolm Frager had the opportunity to obtain a copy of the original work. At the time of his appearance at the Berkshire Festival in 1967, he read through it with Mr. Leinsdorf and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf decided then to program it for Tanglewood 1968.

Also on the Saturday evening program is the "Scottish" Symphony, No. 3, of Mendelssohn. The concert opens with the overture to Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and closes with a suite from Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier."

On Sunday, August 4, the Orchestra will be conducted by its future Music Director, William Steinberg. This will be Mr. Steinberg's only appearance with the Orchestra before assuming the Music Directorship in the fall of 1969. His program will include Wagner's Overture to "Die Meisters-Paganini Variations, with pianist Jorge Bolet as soloist, and Mahler's First Symphony.

Boston Symphony Slated For Airing at Tanglewood

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1968 Berkshire Music Festival will be broadcast live from Tanglewood again this weekend by WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc.

* * *

On Friday, beginning at 9 p.m., guest conductor Sixten Ehrling will lead the orchestra in performances of the Benvenuto Cellini Overture by Berlioz, Pavane for a Dead Infanta and Rapsodie Espagnole by Ravel, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director and regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium for Saturday's concert, which begins at 8 p.m. Pianist Malcolm Frager will be featured in a performance of his own version of the Schumann Piano Concerto. The program will also include The Merry Wives of Windsor by Nicolai, the Mendelssohn Symphony No. 3 (or "Scottish" symphony), and the Suite from Der Rosenkavailier by Strauss.

* * *

William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra on Sunday, Aug. 4. This program, which begins at 2:30 p.m., will feature a performance of Rachmaninoff's Paganini Variations by pianist Jorge Bolet. Mahler's Symphony No. 1 will also be heard.

* * *

WAMC, the FM station of Albany Medical College, is broadcasting live from Tanglewood every performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this year's Berkshire Music Festival.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

AUG 1 1968

50.

Will Make Appearances at Tanglewood

JOSEF KRIPS

Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert that will include works by Beethoven, Strauss and Stravinsky, today.

SIXTEN EHRLING

Sixten Ehrling, music director and conductor of the Detroit Symphony, will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert including works by Berlioz, Ravel, and Tschaikovsky, next Friday.

MALCOLM FRAGER

Malcolm Frager, pianist, will be featured as the soloist in a performance of the Schumann Piano concerto (Frager version) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, Saturday evening.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert of works by Wagner, Rachmaninoff and Mahler, next Sunday afternoon.

The Association will give a concert of Rock music in the third event in the Contemporary Trends Series, Wednesday evening.

Saturday, Aug. 17

Ancerl to Conduct Berkshire Concert

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the orchestra under the direction of Karel Ancerl on Saturday, Aug. 17, when Mr. Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by the ailing Charles Munch, at Tanglewood.

PROGRAM

GLUCK Overture to IPHIGENIA IN AULIS
SHOSTAKOVICH Symphony no. 1
DVORAK Symphony no. 8 in G (old no. 4)

The 60 year old Mr. Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra, and his appearances throughout the

KAREL ANCERL

the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munich, former music director of the B.S.O. was to have conducted Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

Illness Cancels Engagement

"We are delighted to welcome Karel Ancerl to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Tanglewood," said Music Director Erich Leinsdorf in a statement issued when he announced Mr. Ancerl's program, "though we regret that it should be occasioned by the illness of Charles Munch, who holds a very special place in our hearts and to whom we send our warmest good wishes. We are very grateful to Mr. Ancerl for kindly revising his plans and coming early to this country for his first conducting appearances of the season."

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUL 28 1968 New England Newsclip

WILLIAM STEINBERG . . . Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra who will be guest conductor at Tanglewood Sunday, Aug. 4.

The Weekend at Tanglewood

Two guest conductors and two soloists will be featured at Tanglewood this weekend. The Friday evening concert (which starts at 9) will be precluded by pianist Jorge Bolet who begins her solo performance at 7. The concert itself will be conducted by Sixten Ehrling, Music Director and Conductor of the Detroit Symphony. The program will include the Benvenuto Cellini Overture by Berlioz; Pavane for a dead Infanta and Rapsodie Espagnole, Ravel; Symphony No. 5, Tchaikovsky.

Saturday evening at 8 Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Boston Symphony in The Merry Wives of Windsor by Nicolai; Mendelssohn's Scottish Symphony; and the Frager version of Schumann's Piano Concerto featuring soloist Malcolm Frager. The program will conclude with a suite from Der Rosenkavalier by Strauss.

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra will be guest conductor Sunday, Aug. 4 at 2:30. The program will include only two works: Paganini Variations by Rachmaninoff featuring Jorge Bolet, and Mahler's First Symphony.

In an advance announcement, Director Leinsdorf states that due to ill health Charles Munch will be unable to conduct his scheduled concert on Aug. 17. In his place will be Karel Ancerl, conductor of Czech Philharmonic.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

This Week At Tanglewood

Wednesday, July 31: Contemporary trends, rock, the Association, 8 p. m., Shed.

Friday, August 2: BSO conducted by Sixten Ehrling, in Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini, Overture, Ravel's Pavane for a dead Infanta and Rapsodie Espagnole and Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 5, 9 p. m., Shed . . Week end Prelude, 7 p. m., Jorge Bolet . .

Saturday, August 3: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Nicolai's The Merry Wives of Windsor, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, "Scottish," Schumann's Piano Concerto (Frager version) (Malcolm Frager) and Strauss' Suite from Der Rosenkavalier, 8 p. m., Shed . .

Sunday, August 4: BSO conducted by William Steinberg in Wagner's Meistersinger Overture, Rachmaninoff's Paganini Variations (Bolet) and Mahler's Symphony No. 1, 2:30 p. m., Shed.

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, July 31, 1968

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, August 1, 1968

RAVENA NEWS HERALD
Friday, August 2, 1968

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Guest Conductors at Tanglewood This Weekend

LENOX — The fifth weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival opens this evening at 7 when pianist Jorge Bolet plays the four Chopin Ballades as the weekend prelude.

Ehrling To Conduct

At 9 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Sixten Ehrling, conductor of the Detroit Symphony, in a program consisting of Berlioz' Overture to Benvenuto Cellini, Ravel's Pavane for a dead Infanta and Rapsodie Espagnole, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday evening's program, Erich Leinsdorf, the Orchestra's music director, conducts a performance of Robert Schumann's piano concerto with Malcolm Frager as soloist. Also on the Saturday program is the "Scottish" Symphony, No. 3, of Mendelssohn. The concert opens with the overture to Nicolai's The Merry Wives of Windsor and closes with a suite from Strauss's Der Rosenkavalien.

On Sunday, the orchestra will be conducted by its future music director, William Steinberg. His program will include Wagner's Overture to Die Meistersinger, Rachmaninoff's Paganini Variations, with pianist Jorge Bolet as soloist, and Mahler's First Symphony.

The 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the fifth year by the Berkshire Music Center with the Fromm Music Foundation, begins Sunday and runs through August 11. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music and opera will be presented.

Leinsdorf, will conduct a performance of Schoenberg's Die Gluecklicke Hand on August 7 at 8 p. m. preceding the premiere of a new opera by Stanley Silverman (music) and Richard Foreman (words). The opera will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Three other works are also to be premiered. On Monday, Richard Trythall's Continuums will be heard in a program to be conducted by Gunther Schuller. On Tuesday, Mark DeVoto's The Distinguished Thing will be heard in a program which also will include William T. McKinley's Premises and Espositions.

Ehrling Masterful At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Sixten Ehrling was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Friday night, and I must confess he mixed me up.

Easy Prediction

On earlier hearings when he has appeared in the Connecticut Valley with his Detroit Symphony Orchestra and at Tanglewood, he has seemed to perform according to easy prediction, that is, with Germanic regularity and sonority in keeping with his Swedish origin.

Friday night he led off his program with the overture to Berlioz' opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," a colorful piece which he conducted with an expected, no-nonsense, businesslike precision.

Then he softened and relaxed for two works by Ravel, "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and "Rapsodie Espagnole." They came forth with exquisite nicety, every detail exposed.

He set a surprisingly slow pace for them especially the rhapsody and nursed them along as if he were savoring every little, shimmering delicacy in them.

Ehrling is a short and sturdy man with a burly atmosphere. There are times when it seems as if he is a stalwart, Nordic baker standing there with feet apart purposefully kneading dough at dawn.

But that is not how his music sounded.

Graceful, Fluid

After intermission he led the orchestra through Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5., almost as well known as Beethoven's of the same number, and it was graceful . . . fluid, pliant, lyric and, well, graceful.

I can't remember when I have felt fully justified before in saying that I heard a Tchaikovsky symphony played with grace. To be sure, that master melodist wrote his songs with infinite grace, but they are usually played another way.

So here I am a bit mixed up . . . Ehrling looked like a journeyman and conducted Berlioz with Nordic precision, Ravel with French delicacy and Tchaikovsky with Russian warmth.

At the 7 p. m. prelude program, the pianist Jorge Bolet, one of Cuba's more illustrious exports, played four of Chopin's ballades and an etude (Opus 25, No. 1) for an encore.

Bolet is a pianist known for his digital dexterity and his warm feeling for the high-temperature romantic literature for the piano.

He is a first-class purveyor of the music of Liszt and the other rosy romantics and will be playing one of the classics in that classification Sunday afternoon, Rachmaninov's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" with the orchestra.

His Chopin Friday evening, however, offered a split appeal. The high-pressure, theatrical sections calling for muted lightning were greatly impressive. The lyrical passages were pleasant but not unusual.

Bolet's Chopin had plenty of heat, not much light, and luminous elegance is one of the attributes one looks for in Chopin.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
JUL 31 1968 New England Newsclip

SIXTEN EHRLING, conductor of Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor of Boston Symphony in concert of works by Berlioz, Ravel, Tschaikovsky on Friday at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 2 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

SIXTEN EHRLING conductor

BERLIOZ	Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini' op. 23*
RAVEL	Pavane pour une infante défunte*
RAVEL	Rapsodie espagnole Prélude à la nuit Malagueña Habanera Feria

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY	Symphony no. 5 in E minor op. 64* Andante - allegro con anima Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza Valse: allegro moderato Finale: andante maestoso - allegro vivace

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 19

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Fifth Tanglewood Weekend

Ehrling Pleases Audience

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Tanglewood's fifth weekend began with the only appearance of Detroit's Sixten Ehrling, a conductor of great interest to Worcester. The audience, while not extremely large, was very enthusiastic.

Ehrling directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the familiar work he and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will feature at the opening concert of Worcester's 109th Festival, Monday, Oct. 21: Tchaikovsky's Fifth.

Gazette Review

The Weekend Prelude presented Jorge Bolet playing the four Ballades of Chopin. Tonight, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Malcolm Frager will be the piano soloist. Tomorrow afternoon, William Steinberg, who is to take over the baton at Boston in the fall of 1969, will conduct a program with Bolet as soloist, culminating in the Mahler First Symphony.

Last night, conducting entirely from memory, Ehrling revealed the qualities heard in Worcester: capable control, lucid interpretations and energy which overflowed the man to the inner workings of his orchestral choirs.

Ehrling's "first" at Tanglewood was Aug. 12, 1966 and his Symphony Hall B.S.O. debut was March 8, 1968. Last night's shouts of "bravo" indicated a much more responsive audience than that at Boston.

In Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Ehrling brought out the lower voices of the orchestra and built to climaxes after starting very softly.

Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," in the first three sections, emphasized delicacy and fragile charm, leaving "The Fair" to burst forth in full-voiced rhythmic splendors.

Ehrling has been conducting at the eight-week Meadow Brook Festival in Michigan. The "super" acoustics of this smaller layout may have influenced his choice of dynamics at Tanglewood.

The warmth of Tchaikovsky last night found a cameo mate in Ravel's tender "Pavane for a Dead Princess."

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350
AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

The Berkshire Eagle, Monday, Aug. 5, 1968—

Friday night Ehrling's major opus was the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony, in E Minor, Opus 64. His reading did not neglect any of the multiple opportunities for tonal richness and dramatic fervor that the score reflects in conspicuously competent hands but his Ravel was doubly welcome on his program, for the music itself and for the convincing penetration the performance evinced.

The "Pavane for a dead Infanta" was written when Ravel was not yet 25, thereby just squeezing in before the turn of the century. But it is actually centuries away from the Schumann and Mendelssohn and even from the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" with which Ehrling opened his program. It is a pity that the illness of a guest conductor is going to deprive Tanglewood of hearing one of the massive Berlioz works this festival, for these nibbles provoke a strong appetency for his more formidable writings.

* * *

THE RAVEL "Rapsodie Espagnole" was one of a series of compositions to appear in the quarter-century before World War I which provoked the opinion that the best Spanish music of the period was written by foreigners. The fascinating themes are the factors which first strike the ear but a little closer attention reveals the mastery of orchestral timbre Ravel possessed. As Mahler pre-empted (one can hardly plagiarize from himself) his own songs, so Ravel adapted melodies and music he had written for other applications and used them here again in his Rapsodie. The subtle rhythms of his Malaguena and Habanera and the over-all nature of the delicacy with which Ravel constructed everything he touched made these the highlights of a perspective of the weekend's programs.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 2 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

SIXTEN EHRLING conductor

BERLIOZ	Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini' op. 23*
RAVEL	Pavane pour une infante défunte*
RAVEL	Rapsodie espagnole Prélude à la nuit Malagueña Habanera Feria

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY	Symphony no. 5 in E minor op. 64* Andante - allegro con anima Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza Valse: allegro moderato Finale: andante maestoso - allegro vivace

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 19

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
JUL 31 1968 New England Newsclip

SIXTEN EHRLING, conductor of Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor of Boston Symphony in concert of works by Berlioz, Ravel, Tschaikovsky on Friday at Tanglewood.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,404
AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Ehrling Masterful At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Sixten Ehrling was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Friday night, and I must confess he mixed me up.

Easy Prediction

On earlier hearings when he has appeared in the Connecticut Valley with his Detroit Symphony Orchestra and at Tanglewood, he has seemed to perform according to easy prediction, that is, with Germanic regularity and sonority in keeping with his Swedish origin.

Friday night he led off his program with the overture to Berlioz' opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," a colorful piece which he conducted with an expected, no-nonsense, businesslike precision.

Then he softened and relaxed for two works by Ravel, "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and "Rapsodie Espagnole." They came forth with exquisite nicety, every detail exposed.

He set a surprisingly slow pace for them especially the rhapsody and nursed them along as if he were savoring every little, shimmering delicacy in them.

Ehrling is a short and sturdy man with a burly atmosphere. There are times when it seems as if he is a stalwart, Nordic baker standing there with feet apart purposefully kneading dough at dawn.

But that is not how his music sounded.

Graceful, Fluid

After intermission he led the orchestra through Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5., almost as well known as Beethoven's of the same number, and it was graceful . . . fluid, pliant, lyric and, well, graceful.

I can't remember when I have felt fully justified before in saying that I heard a Tchaikovsky symphony played with grace. To be sure, that master melodist wrote his songs with infinite grace, but they are usually played another way.

So here I am a bit mixed up . . . Ehrling looked like a journeyman and conducted Berlioz with Nordic precision, Ravel with French delicacy and Tchaikovsky with Russian warmth.

At the 7 p. m. prelude program, the pianist Jorge Bolet, one of Cuba's more illustrious exports, played four of Chopin's ballades and an etude (Opus 25, No. 1) for an encore.

Bolet is a pianist known for his digital dexterity and his warm feeling for the high - temperature romantic literature for the piano.

He is a first - class purveyor of the music of Liszt and the other rosy romantics and will be playing one of the classics in that classification Sunday afternoon, Rachmaninov's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" with the orchestra.

His Chopin Friday evening, however, offered a split appeal. The high - pressure, theatrical sections calling for muted lightning were greatly impressive. The lyrical passages were pleasant but not unusual.

Bolet's Chopin had plenty of heat, not much light, and luminous elegance is one of the attributes one looks for in Chopin.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 51,320
AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Fifth Tanglewood Weekend

Ehrling Pleases Audience

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Tanglewood's fifth weekend began with the only appearance of Detroit's Sixten Ehrling, a conductor of great interest to Worcester. The audience, while not extremely large, was very enthusiastic.

Ehrling directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the familiar work he and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will feature at the opening concert of Worcester's 109th Festival, Monday, Oct. 21: Tchaikovsky's Fifth.

Gazette Review

The Weekend Prelude presented Jorge Bolet playing the four Ballades of Chopin. Tonight, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Malcolm Frager will be the piano soloist. Tomorrow afternoon, William Steinberg, who is to take over the baton at Boston in the fall of 1969, will conduct a program with Bolet as soloist, culminating in the Mahler First Symphony.

Last night, conducting entirely from memory, Ehrling revealed the qualities heard in Worcester: capable control, lucid interpretations and energy which overflowed the man to the inner workings of his orchestral choirs.

Ehrling's "first" at Tanglewood was Aug. 12, 1966 and his Symphony Hall B.S.O. debut was March 8, 1968. Last night's shouts of "bravo" indicated a much more responsive audience than that at Boston.

In Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Ehrling brought out the lower voices of the orchestra and built to climaxes after starting very softly.

Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," in the first three sections, emphasized delicacy and fragile charm, leaving "The Fair" to burst forth in full-voiced rhythmic splendors.

Ehrling has been conducting at the eight-week Meadow Brook Festival in Michigan. The "super" acoustics of this smaller layout may have influenced his choice of dynamics at Tanglewood.

The warmth of Tchaikovsky last night found a cameo mate in Ravel's tender "Pavane for a Dead Princess."

The Berkshire Eagle, Monday, Aug. 5, 1968

Friday night Ehrling's major opus was the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony, in E Minor, Opus 64. His reading did not neglect any of the multiple opportunities for tonal richness and dramatic fervor that the score reflects in conspicuously competent hands but his Ravel was doubly welcome on his program, for the music itself and for the convincing penetration the performance evinced.

The "Pavane for a dead Infanta" was written when Ravel was not yet 25, thereby just squeezing in before the turn of the century. But it is actually centuries away from the Schumann and Mendelssohn and even from the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" with which Ehrling opened his program. It is a pity that the illness of a guest conductor is going to deprive Tanglewood of hearing one of the massive Berlioz works this festival, for these nibbles provoke a strong appetency for his more formidable writings.

* * *

THE RAVEL "Rapsodie Espagnole" was one of a series of compositions to appear in the quarter-century before World War I which provoked the opinion that the best Spanish music of the period was written by foreigners. The fascinating themes are the factors which first strike the ear but a little closer attention reveals the mastery of orchestral timbre Ravel possessed. As Mahler pre-empted (one can hardly plagiarize from himself) his own songs, so Ravel adapted melodies and music he had written for other applications and used them here again in his Rapsodie. The subtle rhythms of his Malaguena and Habanera and the over-all nature of the delicacy with which Ravel constructed everything he touched made these the highlights of a perspective of the weekend's programs.

52.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday August 3 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

NICOLAI	Overture to 'The Merry Wives of Windsor'
MENDELSSOHN	Symphony no. 3 in A minor op. 56 'The Scottish'*
	Andante con moto - allegro un poco agitato
	Vivace non troppo
	Adagio
	Allegro vivacissimo - allegro maestoso assai

intermission

SCHUMANN	Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor op. 54 (original version)†
	Allegro affettuoso
	Intermezzo: andantino grazioso
	Allegro vivace
	MALCOLM FRAGER
STRAUSS	Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier'†

†First performance at the Festival concerts in this version.

Malcolm Frager plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 23

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Schumann 'premiere' by Frager, BSO first-rate

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The ARTS

LENOX — Last Summer, the pianist Malcolm Frager participated in an informal reading with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra of the first movement of the Schumann Concerto in its original version, which he had recently discovered in Germany. Last Saturday, a few hundred yards across the Tanglewood lawn and before an audience about 50 times the size of last year's, Frager was soloist with the Boston Symphony in the Schumann, playing the whole work, of course, but using the first version of the opening movement, giving its real American premiere. Erich Leinsdorf was the conductor on both occasions.

To recapitulate the background quickly, what is now the first movement existed to begin with as an independend Concert Fantasy, and the finale — using the terminology of Clara Schumann, who always thought of the Intermezzo and final Allegro together as "the finale" — was added four years later. At some point between the first performance of the one-movement Fantasy and the publication of the whole Concerto, Schumann made changes in the first movement, producing the work familiar today.

Three changes are obvious. The work originally started without the bang from the orchestra on the first downbeat, but instead put a dramatic punctuation between the piano's first and second pairs of chords. Second, the last 12 measures of the cadenza as they stand now are the result of rewriting: the original led via more propulsive figuration to a startingly unexpected orchestral entry on a diminished chord. Third, in the coda, the piano originally had a two-measure outburst on its own, theatrically delaying for a moment the final settling onto the tonic in bar 504.

The other changes affect scoring and figuration rather than structure and rhetoric. One attractive detail does stand out, though: the downward arpeggios that tailed each phrase of the C major clarinet melody that is first heard at measure 67, though Gino Cioffi's staccato clatter through them was remarkably ugly.

With Schumann, for reasons about which one can only speculate, the rule seems to be that his revisions make things less interesting than they were before because he tends to put safe moves in place of the audacious, original strokes he first thought of. Of course, the first movement of the Concerto is beautiful in the form in which we have always heard it, but almost without exception I regret the changes, now that I know what was there first.

Saturday's performance, however, made me see why some of the changes might have seemed desirable to Schumann or to his wife, who was the first soloist. That beginning, for instance, is hard to carry off. It seems that the only way the conductor can safely bring the orchestra in on its tricky entrance right after the piano's first da-DUM, is to give the downbeat Schumann so carefully left out. But that spoils it both for the pianist (he can't make his dramatic gesture at his own pleasure) and for the audience (we get a clear signal instead of the surprise of the solo entrance from nowhere). Also, the orchestral chord after the cadenza is hard to bring in. It sounded tentative rather than dramatic on Saturday, and Schumann, who was an exceedingly unconfident conductor, will have had much more trouble with it than Leinsdorf, and may, as well, have been disappointed by the lack of punch in the sonority itself.

These are technical problems that can be solved, though I expect Mr. Frager, and any other pianist who takes up this version, will often run into the typical conductor's prejudice against exhaustive rehearsal of a concerto, especially one "we all know" like the Schumann. I hope, at any rate, they will be solved. There is no reason why the 1841 version should replace the 1845 one altogether, nor is there any chance it will, but it has a boldness about it, a sense of adventure, that makes it an important and exciting find. It should stay in circulation.

Frager's warm, vocal, unpercussive playing became better and better, more free and with more expression of delicate fantasy, as it went on. It was marvelously nonmechanical, and throughout there was an exquisite rightness of taste in the way he moved about Schumann's affettuoso style. His tempi were close to the indicated ones, faster than usual in the first two movements, but broader in the third. I have never heard the finale done with such grace, and it really cannot be done properly at the conventional quick pace. Apart from the couple of reservations above, Leinsdorf and the orchestra provided first-rate collaboration, and even had there not been the special matters of interest, this performance would have been something singularly memorably and beautiful.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf conducting Nicolai: Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scottish;" Schumann: Piano Concerto (first American performance of the original version of the first movement), with Malcolm Frager, soloist; Strauss-Wilson: Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." Saturday evening at Tanglewood.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 6 1968

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

AUG 6 1968

A Schumann original

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood tonight in a unique version of Schumann's piano concerto with Malcolm Frager, soloist. Mr. Frager obtained an original copy of the first movement which Schumann had written for his wife which was called Phantasie for Piano and Orchestra. Later, when Schumann added the second and third movements, he made several changes in the first movement. Mr. Frager's performance will include the original first movement.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

AUG 3 1968

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUL 31

Music sleuth Frager sheds new light on Schumann

MICHAEL STEINBERG

The ARTS

LENOX — The Boston Symphoney concert at Tanglewood this Saturday evening, Aug. 3, will include the Schumann Piano Concerto in what the program calls "the Frager version," a description deplored by the Frager in question, Malcolm, the pianist, who will be the soloist. "It sounds as though I have added something," he says. He has not. On the contrary: he has done something that sheds fascinating new light on Schumann's intentions concerning this particularly well-loved work of his.

It began a couple of years ago with Frager worrying, as many pianists have, about the metronome marks in the Piano Concerto. The 84 for the main tempo of the first movement seems fast, and so does the 72 for the A flat major episode; on the other hand, 72 in the finale is slow. Then again, because of the evidently intended tempo connections (via the 72) Frager felt that thhe problem could not be ignored, though that is what most pianists have in fact done. He thought access to the manuscript might help, and on his next European tour he went to look at it. In private German ownership, the manuscript is partly in Schumann's hand, partly in that of his wife, Clara, who was the first pianist to play the work, and partly in that of a third, unidentified person.

The controversial metronome marks were there all right, but what excited Frager was the realization that he was looking at a version of the first movement that was startlingly different from the one he had always played. Concertgoers and record collectors know from their reading of program notes that in 1841 Schumann wrote a one-movement piano and orchestra "Konzert-Fantasie" for Clara and that in 1845 he added an intermezzo and finale, turning the Fantasia into a full-length Concerto. Attentive note-readers might remember, too, that after the second performance of the three-movement concerto, Schumann made what are usually referred to as "a few alterations" in the first movement. No one, however, seems to have had any idea that these alterations, incorporated in the first published edition, amount to something as interesting as they in fact do.

Apropos not having any idea, Frager said that he had asked the owner of the manuscript if anyone else had taken an interest in it. The owner said no and added that Wolfgang Boetticher, a German musicologist who is the author of a voluminous critical-biographical study of Schumann, had been to see some of the other Schumann manuscripts in his collection, but that he could not be interested in the concerto at all. And not surprisingly, Boetticher has nothing to say about the Piano Concerto in its original form.

Now, there are composers whose final thoughts on any given work are the most characteristic and therefore preferable, Mahler, for instance. That is most often, though not always, true of Verdi. With Mozart, first versions are apt to be the finer ones, with the Prague score of "Don Giovanni," regardless of the individual beauties of the later "Dalla sua pace" and "Mi tradi," providing the outstanding example.

Schumann is a composer whose first thoughts are generally his best, a rule well known to pianists in its application to big solo works like the Symphonic Etudes and the "Davidsbuendlertaenze." Was Schumann pushed about by an adoring yet domineering wife whose tastes were more conventional than his? Was it the shock of his experiences as a bad conductor? Was it an early sign of his mental illness that undermined his confidence in his own judgment? Whatever the reason, we find again and again that Schumann, as he revised, eliminated bold, original first inspirations and substituted safe, "normal," over-insured solutions. With the solo works, both versions have always been available; for the Concerto we have had only the revised score.

Frager first tried a few details of the original score in a performance in Brussels with Andre Cluytens. The Belgian conductor was delighted, said "this is beautiful . . . I always want to play it this way," but he died of cancer shortly afterwards and the concert with Frager was in fact his last. One conductor in America whom Frager tried to interest in his discovery responded with an abusive sermon on the necessity of always respecting the composer's final thoughts and with a contemptuous volley in the direction of manuscript grubbers. Then someone suggested that Erich Leinsdorf might be sympathetic. Leinsdorf was, inviting Frager to try the score out at a runthrough with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and the result of that reading in August 1967, Frager was engaged to play it this week-end's Boston Symphony concert. Since then, Frager has played it in Krakow (where the conductor was delighted), and in Budapest and in The Hague (where the conductors, according to Frager, "couldn't have been less interested," and where one of them scratched his head and brilliantly remarked something like, "well, gee, I don't know, I've never heard it this way . . ."). There was also an eminent German conductor in Paris who refused point-black to as much as open the score. So far, no American performances are definitely scheduled after that at Tanglewood, though there are strong prospects for one other. The Leinsdorfs, the men with a little curiosity, are rare.

Since his last performance, Frager has been able to deal with the one problem that still hung on. At the end of the cadenza, Schumann had made such an extensive change that he had to paste a new sheet over the original one. It was good glue, and there was no budging the paper. The owner was reluctant to have the MS x-rayed, but he had no objection when Frager went to work with a strong light-bulb. He managed not to scorch the precious document, and by a tremendous effort of concentration directed at not seeing the notes on the upper sheet and focusing on those on the lower one, he was able to decipher the original, something he hardly dared hope for when we spoke about this a year ago.

I am not going to give away what happens at that spot: the effect is dramatic and audacious. So, for example is the original opening, which lacks the metrical stabilizer of the orchestral downbeat, but in which the piano leaps into its cascade of chords, as it were, from nowhere, the orchestra providing a dramatic comment only on the third beat. One of the most striking variants occurs in the C major clarinet solo (m.67), where the decorative arpeggios originally occurred not only in the piano, but in the clarinet as well. So it goes through many differences in figuration, articulation, and scoring: no radical changes, but almost always the first score gives more exciting life to the idea.

Frager prefers the first version. On my sketchy acquaintance with it, I do too. He emphasizes, though, that regardless of this or that listener's preference, the bringing to light of something so revealing about Schumann, his music, his personality, his way of working, is in itself exciting, important, and its own justification.

August 3: MALCOLM FRAGER, pianist, will be featured as the soloist in a performance of the Schumann Piano concerto (Frager version) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,150

AUG 1 1968

52.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday August 3 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

NICOLAI	Overture to 'The Merry Wives of Windsor'
MENDELSSOHN	Symphony no. 3 in A minor op. 56 'The Scottish'*
	Andante con moto - allegro un poco agitato
	Vivace non troppo
	Adagio
	Allegro vivacissimo - allegro maestoso assai

intermission

SCHUMANN	Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor op. 54 (original version)†
	Allegro affettuoso
	Intermezzo: andantino grazioso
	Allegro vivace
	MALCOLM FRAGER
STRAUSS	Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier'†

†First performance at the Festival concerts in this version.

Malcolm Frager plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 23

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Schumann 'premiere' by Frager, BSO first-rate

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The ARTS

LENOX — Last Summer, the pianist Malcolm Frager participated in an informal reading with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra of the first movement of the Schumann Concerto in its original version, which he had recently discovered in Germany. Last Saturday, a few hundred yards across the Tanglewood lawn and before an audience about 50 times the size of last year's, Frager was soloist with the Boston Symphony in the Schumann, playing the whole work, of course, but using the first version of the opening movement, giving its real American premiere. Erich Leinsdorf was the conductor on both occasions.

To recapitulate the background quickly, what is now the first movement existed to begin with as an independend Concert Fantasy, and the finale — using the terminology of Clara Schumann, who always thought of the Intermezzo and final Allegro together as "the finale" — was added four years later. At some point between the first performance of the one-movement Fantasy and the publication of the whole Concerto, Schumann made changes in the first movement, producing the work familiar today.

Three changes are obvious. The work originally started without the bang from the orchestra on the first downbeat, but instead put a dramatic punctuation between the piano's first and second pairs of chords. Second, the last 12 measures of the cadenza as they stand now are the result of rewriting: the original led via more propulsive figuration to a startingly unexpected orchestral entry on a diminished chord. Third, in the coda, the piano originally had a two-measure outburst on its own, theatrically delaying for a moment the final settling onto the tonic in bar 504.

The other changes affect scoring and figuration rather than structure and rhetoric. One attractive detail does stand out, though: the downward arpeggios that tailed each phrase of the C major clarinet melody that is first heard at measure 67, though Gino Cioffi's staccato clatter through them was remarkably ugly.

With Schumann, for reasons about which one can only speculate, the rule seems to be that his revisions make things less interesting than they were before because he tends to put safe moves in place of the audacious, original strokes he first thought of. Of course, the first movement of the Concerto is beautiful in the form in which we have always heard it, but almost without exception I regret the changes, now that I know what was there first.

Saturday's performance, however, made me see why some of the changes might have seemed desirable to Schumann or to his wife, who was the first soloist. That beginning, for instance, is hard to carry off. It seems that the only way the conductor can safely bring the orchestra in on its tricky entrance right after the piano's first da-DUM, is to give the downbeat Schumann so carefully left out. But that spoils it both for the pianist (he can't make his dramatic gesture at his own pleasure) and for the audience (we get a clear signal instead of the surprise of the solo entrance from nowhere). Also, the orchestral chord after the cadenza is hard to bring in. It sounded tentative rather than dramatic on Saturday, and Schumann, who was an exceedingly unconfident conductor, will have had much more trouble with it than Leinsdorf, and may, as well, have been disappointed by the lack of punch in the sonority itself.

These are technical problems that can be solved, though I expect Mr. Frager, and any other pianist who takes up this version, will often run into the typical conductor's prejudice against exhaustive rehearsal of a concerto, especially one "we all know" like the Schumann. I hope, at any rate, they will be solved. There is no reason why the 1841 version should replace the 1845 one altogether, nor is there any chance it will, but it has a boldness about it, a sense of adventure, that makes it an important and exciting find. It should stay in circulation.

Frager's warm, vocal, unpercussive playing became better and better, more free and with more expression of delicate fantasy, as it went on. It was marvelously nonmechanical, and throughout there was an exquisite rightness of taste in the way he moved about Schumann's affettuoso style. His tempi were close to the indicated ones, faster than usual in the first two movements, but broader in the third. I have never heard the finale done with such grace, and it really cannot be done properly at the conventional quick pace. Apart from the couple of reservations above, Leinsdorf and the orchestra provided first-rate collaboration, and even had there not been the special matters of interest, this performance would have been something singularly memorably and beautiful.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Nicolai: Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3 in A minor, "Scottish;" Schumann: Piano Concerto (first American performance of the original version of the first movement), with Malcolm Frager, soloist; Strauss-Wilson: Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." Saturday evening at Tanglewood.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 6 1968

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

AUG 6 1968

A Schumann original

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the ~~Boston~~ Symp~~hony Or~~chestra at Tanglewood tonight in a unique version of Schumann's piano concerto with Malcolm Frager, soloist. Mr. Frager obtained an original copy of the first movement which Schumann had written for his wife which was called Phantasie for Piano and Orchestra. Later, when Schumann added the second and third movements, he made several changes in the first movement. Mr. Frager's performance will include the original first movement.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

AUG 3 1968

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUL 31

Music sleuth Frager sheds new light on Schumann

MICHAEL STEINBERG

The ARTS

LENOX — The Boston Symphoney concert at Tanglewood this Saturday evening, Aug. 3, will include the Schumann Piano Concerto in what the program calls "the Frager version," a description deplored by the Frager in question, Malcolm, the pianist, who will be the soloist. "It sounds as though I have added something," he says. He has not. On the contrary: he has done something that sheds fascinating new light on Schumann's intentions concerning this particularly well-loved work of his.

It began a couple of years ago with Frager worrying, as many pianists have, about the metronome marks in the Piano Concerto. The 84 for the main tempo of the first movement seems fast, and so does the 72 for the A flat major episode; on the other hand, 72 in the finale is slow. Then again, because of the evidently intended tempo connections (via the 72) Frager felt that thhe problem could not be ignored, though that is what most pianists have in fact done. He thought access to the manuscript might help, and on his next European tour he went to look at it. In private German ownership, the manuscript is partly in Schumann's hand, partly in that of his wife, Clara, who was the first pianist to play the work, and partly in that of a third, unidentified person.

The controversial metronome marks were there all right, but what excited Frager was the realization that he was looking at a version of the first movement that was startlingly different from the one he had always played. Concertgoers and record collectors know from their reading of program notes that in 1841 Schumann wrote a one-movement piano and orchestra "Konzert-Fantasie" for Clara and that in 1845 he added an intermezzo and finale, turning the Fantasia into a full-length Concerto. Attentive note-readers might remember, too, that after the second performance of the three-movement concerto, Schumann made what are usually referred to as "a few alterations" in the first movement. No one, however, seems to have had any idea that these alterations, incorporated in the first published edition, amount to something as interesting as they in fact do.

Apropos not having any idea, Frager said that he had asked the owner of the manuscript if anyone else had taken an interest in it. The owner said no and added that Wolfgang Boetticher, a German musicologist who is the author of a voluminous critical-biographical study of Schumann, had been to see some of the other Schumann manuscripts in his collection, but that he could not be interested in the concerto at all. And not surprisingly, Boetticher has nothing to say about the Piano Concerto in its original form.

Now, there are composers whose final thoughts on any given work are the most characteristic and therefore preferable, Mahler, for instance. That is most often, though not always, true of Verdi. With Mozart, first versions are apt to be the finer ones, with the Prague score of "Don Giovanni," regardless of the individual beauties of the later "Dalla sua pace" and "Mi tradi," providing the outstanding example.

Schumann is a composer whose first thoughts are generally his best, a rule well known to pianists in its application to big solo works like the Symphonic Etudes and the "Davidsbuendlertaenze." Was Schumann pushed about by an adoring yet domineering wife whose tastes were more conventional than his? Was it the shock of his experiences as a bad conductor? Was it an early sign of his mental illness that undermined his confidence in his own judgment? Whatever the reason, we find again and again that Schumann, as he revised, eliminated bold, original first inspirations and substituted safe, "normal," over-insured solutions. With the solo works, both versions have always been available; for the Concerto we have had only the revised score.

Frager first tried a few details of the original score in a performance in Brussels with Andre Cluytens. The Belgian conductor was delighted, said "this is beautiful . . . I always want to play it this way," but he died of cancer shortly afterwards and the concert with Frager was in fact his last. One conductor in America whom Frager tried to interest in his discovery responded with an abusive sermon on the necessity of always respecting the composer's final thoughts and with a contemptuous volley in the direction of manuscript grubbers. Then someone suggested that Erich Leinsdorf might be sympathetic. Leinsdorf was, inviting Frager to try the score out at a runthrough with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and the result of that reading in August 1967, Frager was engaged to play it this week-end's Boston Symphony concert. Since then, Frager has played it in Krakow (where the conductor was delighted), and in Budapest and in The Hague (where the conductors, according to Frager, "couldn't have been less interested," and where one of them scratched his head and brilliantly remarked something like, "well, gee, I don't know, I've never heard it this way . . ."). There was also an eminent German conductor in Paris who refused point-black to as much as open the score. So far, no American performances are definitely scheduled after that at Tanglewood, though there are strong prospects for one other. The Leinsdorfs, the men with a little curiosity, are rare.

Since his last performance, Frager has been able to deal with the one problem that still hung on. At the end of the cadenza, Schumann had made such an extensive change that he had to paste a new sheet over the original one. It was good glue, and there was no budging the paper. The owner was reluctant to have the MS x-rayed, but he had no objection when Frager went to work with a strong light-bulb. He managed not to scorch the precious document, and by a tremendous effort of concentration directed at not seeing the notes on the upper sheet and focusing on those on the lower one, he was able to decipher the original, something he hardly dared hope for when we spoke about this a year ago.

I am not going to give away what happens at that spot: the effect is dramatic and audacious. So, for example is the original opening, which lacks the metrical stabilizer of the orchestral downbeat, but in which the piano leaps into its cascade of chords, as it were, from nowhere, the orchestra providing a dramatic comment only on the third beat. One of the most striking variants occurs in the C major clarinet solo (m.67), where the decorative arpeggios originally occurred not only in the piano, but in the clarinet as well. So it goes through many differences in figuration, articulation, and scoring: no radical changes, but almost always the first score gives more exciting life to the idea.

Frager prefers the first version. On my sketchy acquaintance with it, I do too. He emphasizes, though, that regardless of this or that listener's preference, the bringing to light of something so revealing about Schumann, his music, his personality, his way of working, is in itself exciting, important, and its own justification.

August 3: MALCOLM FRAGER, pianist, will be featured as the soloist in a performance of the Schumann Piano concerto (Frager version) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,150

AUG 1 1968

Malcolm Frager Draws 9,000 to Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

MALCOLM FRAGER

The featured work on Saturday night's program at Tanglewood was the original version of Robert Schumann's Concerto in A Minor, Opus 54 for piano and orchestra which had Malcolm Frager as the soloist.

The changes are all in the first movement and concern details in the piano figuration and orchestration. The most obvious difference is that the orchestral chord which usually begins the concerto is missing and there is a different transition from the end of cadenza to the coda.

In no way is the essential charm and appeal of the romantic concerto lessened.

Malcolm Frager who is one of our better young pianists showed a melodic sense and beauty of tone unusual in this day of percussive playing. The piano has never sounded better as it had the full rich ound that we expect in Carnegie Hall, but very seldom hear in the vast Tanglewood music shed.

Mr. Frager and Mr. Leinsdorf combined to make this a most sensitive and moving performance, with the various duets between the piano and woodwinds having the intimacy and ensemble of chamber music. This was especially true in the delicate Intermezzo.

The remainder of the program was well suited to the pleasant summer evening.

Scotland's picturesque highlands and rugged coast inspired Mendelssohn in the writing of his orchestral works, the "Fingal's Cave" overture and the Symphony No. 3 in A Minor "The Scottish" which was played last night.

The suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" by Strauss, the program's finale, was arranged by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra. The melodious and colorful score was stunningly played by Erich Leinsdorf and his players who obviously have a special sympathy for this bittersweet Strauss music.

That this type of program is popular is attested by the over 9,000 music lovers in attendance.

Friday evening Charles Wilson will conduct an all-Russian program with Gina Bachauer as soloist in the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 3 for piano and orchestra.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

AUG 4 1968

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 5, 1968

New Version of Concerto Debuts at Tanglewood

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Paradoxical as it may seem, the real novelty of the program at Tanglewood Saturday night was the Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor.

In his travels in Europe Malcolm Frager recently discovered the manuscript of the original version of the first movement of the Schumann Concerto, which differs in several respects from the later version. The composer at first conceived of the work at a one-movement fantasy and only later added the familiar second and third movements.

* * *

Frager believes the original version was superior to the revised one. Unlike Mahler and Beethoven (whose painstaking revisions produced masterpieces), Schumann, like Mozart, was often most inspired when he first put pen to musical paper.

Although there are some very apparent changes (the piano, rather than the orchestra, makes the initial entry and there is a change immediately after the cadenza of the first movement), the familiar melodic pattern is there.

* * *

Saturday night the versatile Mr. Frager was the soloist with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf and he played with the skill and assurance that he has displayed in the past. His concept of the work is dramatic, rather than poetic, but it worked very well with such accomplished participants.

For the remainder of his Saturday program Leinsdorf chose works that are tried and true — Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" Overture, Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony (No. 3), and the Suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," which (believe it or not) was having its Festival premiere.

* * *

The Mendelssohn had an extroverted and sunny interpretation that suited its lyric content very well. If the final Allegro Maestoso is one of the most banal movements from the romantic period, Leinsdorf had the good sense not to dwell too heavily on its mediocrities. The Nicolai overture was tossed off with imperturbable virtuosity.

For this reviewer the Strauss suite was a nostalgic reminder that I first encountered Leinsdorf as the conductor of the Metropolitan's production of the Strauss opera with Lotte Lehmann in the early Forties. He still knows how to underline the echt-Wien quality of this treasurable score.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

AUG 5 1968

At Tanglewood

Frager's Keyboard Style Fits Original Schumann Concerto

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —There were 9110 listeners at Tanglewood Saturday night to hear Malcolm Frager and the Boston Symphony Orchestra present the original version of Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra undert he direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Orchestra Reduced

The orchestra was reduced to about two-thirds for balance, inasmuch as the piece is not a giant and because the second and third movements, which are the same as those of the well-known and much recorded version, require the pianist to cover the keyboard like a tireless gazelle with endlessly linked, decorative, lightfingered runs.

The major difference between the original and well-known versions are at the very beginning and near the end of the first movements. Frager believes Schumann made the changes at the request of his pianist wife —to build up the piano part a little.

It is a beautiful piece (both versions) full of romantic warmth and joy as well as sentiment, and Frager's understanding of the lighter side of the 19th century musical literature was well illustrated.

His pianistic temperament is well suited to the piece, as it is also to the late 18th century classic of Mozart.

The program ended as it began, with light - hearted summery music eminently suitable to the Boston Pops — Nicholai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" to begin and a suite of nine excerpts from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" arranged by the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, to end.

There wasn't a heavy note to be heard.

Mendelssohn Work

Before intermission Leinsdorf led the orchestra through a carefully structured but smoothly fluid performance of Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, Opus 56, "The Scottish."

It is an unspectacular work, but it is full of comfort and it was fashioned with special attention to detail, not only by the composer, but also by the orchestra Saturday.

Mendelssohn acquired a few ideas for the music when he was a 20-year-old tourist in Scotland, but he worked on them and developed and polished them for 11 years before he let the symphony be published.

The first movement Saturday was serious, the second joyful, the third serene and the fourth purposeful and crisp. There were no oddities or eccentricities. It was good stuff.

This afternoon Leinsdorf's replacement (in 1969) will lead the orchestra in a program of music by Wagner (Prelude), Rachmaninov ("Paganini Variations" with Jorge Bolet) and Mahler (Symphony No. 1).

Tanglewood Program Suits Light Summer Mood

LENNOX — On Saturday, the Tanglewood program opened and closed in a light vein suited to a summer mood, beginning with a sprightly rendition of Nicholai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and closing with a suite of excerpts from "Der Rosenkavalier" by Richard Strauss.

The major portion of the first half of the program was devoted to Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, "The Scottish," based on ideas acquired during Mendelssohn's trip through Scotland in his youth and composed over a period of eleven years. Although a somewhat unremarkable work, its performance by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf was well executed and solid.

The highlight of the performance was, of course, Malcolm Frager's playing of Schumann's "Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor" in its original version. The differences in the version played on Saturday night occur in the first movement at the beginning and near the end. Frager feels that the changes were made later perhaps at the request of Schumann's wife, who often performed this concerto, to help enhance the piano part. It is the lack of pretentiousness of this work which charms the listener with a lyric flow of melody and warm sentiment. The light and sure touch of Malcolm Frager is well suited to this particular concerto and shows his fine understanding of the quality of the music.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

AUG 6 1968

BROOKLYN CANARSIE DIGEST
Saturday, August 3, 1968

FLATBUSH LIFE
Saturday, August 3, 1968

MALCOLM FRAGER, pianist, will be featured as the soloist in a performance of the Schumann Piano Concerto (Frager version) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, Sat. evening, Aug. 3, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

BROOKLYN BAY NEWS
Saturday, August 3, 1968

BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, August 3, 1968

Tanglewood

A musical occasion . . .

By Clifford Barnes

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

The composer's original version or the final printed one? For two consecutive years Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have posed this question for audiences at Tanglewood. Last year, the earlier version of Beethoven's "Fidelio" served as a starring vehicle for the debut of Hanne-Lore Kuhse.

Saturday night in the Music Shed, pianist Malcolm Frager played the result of some refined detective work on Robert Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.

Mr. Frager is apparently the first musician to compare the original manuscript of the "Phantasie" of 1841 with the published edition of the first movement. The most important changes are the opening chords, and a transition from the cadenza to the coda. This is of historical and compositional interest, as well as worth being heard once. After this version has served the pianist for a season or two, there seems no reason why it should continue.

Once the novelty of the first movement was over, Mr. Frager settled down to the unchanged concluding movements. The pianist ties phrases up in neat, precise rhythmic units. This is fine for brilliant passages, but not for lyrical ones. The Intermezzo was too matter-of-fact, just skimming what this brief contrasting section is all about. The outer movements were in polished bravura style.

Leinsdorf chose Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" for the concert opener. It was good to hear a fully professional orchestra play it — and with enthusiasm. The conductor had nothing new to say with Mendelssohn's Third Symphony (not that that is necessary), but it was familiar territory traversed engagingly. The audience was reminded that Mendelssohn had, and still has something worth saying in the symphonic repertoire.

Charles Wilson's arrangement of a Suite from Richard Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier" adds some excerpts from the opera that are not in the more familiar concert version. In many places, Leinsdorf just settled back and let the musicians play, as only a well-disciplined group can do. In others, he kept the reins as tight as necessary. Strauss's glorious orchestration showed the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be the great ensemble that it is.

. . . and a family outing

By Roderick Nordell

Lenox, Mass.

The frail, indomitable sound of a baby's crying wafted from the lawn into the Music Shed during Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. Inside, and inaudibly, a woman was crying, because, she explained, this had been a favorite piece when she was a girl and now she was hearing it done superbly with her young son beside her.

Tanglewood, on a Sunday afternoon, is not just music, it is people.

Last Sunday, the conductor was William Steinberg, making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the announcement that he would become its music director at the beginning of the 1969-70 season. If the kinetic response he drew from the Tanglewood audience is an indication, he will be made thoroughly welcome at that time.

Like much of the Tanglewood season, the program was conservative—Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Mahler's Symphony No. 1 in D major, along with the Rachmaninoff. But, with Jorge Bolet at the piano in the latter work, and Steinberg conveying a splendid ease and control over the orchestra, the audience fairly exploded into applause before the last notes of each work died away. They brought the conductor and soloist back time and again.

For the people there on a warm and sunny August day, it all added to the Tanglewood experience—music made accessible in an inviting setting. One saw the family with the daughter home from college, the grown children taking their parents for an outing, the young marrieds, the middle-aged and elderly couples, the retinues of all ages with giant hampers, folding chairs, and even a table or two. After the concert, courting couples lingered under the trees.

We took our own two sons of 9 and 11 for the first time this year. We reminisced about how long the drive from Boston used to take—in Tanglewood's youth and our own —and how fast it is now on the Massachusetts Turnpike, two hours or a little more.

The boys suffered our nostalgia. Part of the concert they obviously suffered, too—the storms and mutterings of the Mahler go on a bit even for older ears enjoying the fluidity with which the orchestra under Steinberg passed the themes from section to section, ready with the necessary power when he stamped his foot—which was about the most extravagant gesture this impeccably disciplined conductor indulged himself in.

But the delight of the children, in a parent's eyes, outweighed any signs of the old ennui. Not just the box lunches, not just the trips back to the cafeteria for extra refreshments, not just the scenery being shot by a third-grader's camera—their pleasure obviously went beyond these things to moments of a rapport of their own with the music.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

AUG 6 1968

54.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 4 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

WAGNER	Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg'
RACHMANINOV	Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini op. 43 JORGE BOLET

intermission

MAHLER	Symphony no. 1 in D major (1888)* Langsam: schleppend, wie ein Naturlaut Kräftig bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell Feierlich und gemessen, ohne zu schleppen Stürmisch bewegt

Jorge Bolet plays the Baldwin piano

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 37

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006
AUG 5 1968

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006
AUG 3 1968

BSO Under a New Baton

Steinberg Cheered in Debut

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

Conductor William Steinberg was accorded a rousing welcome by both audience and orchestra in his preview appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

An attendance of almost 7,500 turned out to hear Steinberg in his only performance with the BSO before he assumes the post of music director of the orchestra next summer. Erich Leinsdorf's retirement is effective August 25, 1969.

Cheers and wild applause followed by an ebullient performpearance on stage. Overly enthusiastic "Bravos" punctuated all applause for the afternoon.

The program itself was rousing in its own manner.

Wagner's Prelude To "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" which opened the program is in itself a celebration of the arts and the orchestra gave some of its spirited best in its performance marked Steinberg's aploose but authoritative direction.

Going beyond its sometimetendency to become a bit stolid, the orchestra sprang forthwith full bright sound. In the Prelude as in the Rachmoniov Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini that followed, the single problem appeared to be with the brass.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Each work possessed a bit of madness for brass and percussion which crashed forth punctuating the full range of mood expressed in each, with an occasional surprising raggedness of brass.

Pianist Jorge Bolet was soloist in the Paganini Variations, translating what was originally a violin virtuosity to pianistic virtuosity of a high order. A jazzy "Qies Irae," familiar melodic strains and finally the so-called "Diabolic" pizzicato, infitately identifiable as Paganini, combined to test all modes of musical expression for both piano and orchestra.

The string sections particularly responded to a vigorous workout through the Variations.

Bolet was superb, asserting and restraining his solo role, finally crashing through the medley of themes that is designed to stir the audience to high response.

The balance of the program consisted of Gustave Mahler's Symphony No. 1, a musically expressive work which was originally a tone poem in five movements. As a symphony in four movements, it represents a variety of musical ideas pulled an integrated whole. The orchestra continued to reach beyond itself for a particularly enjoyable performance combining thought and technique.

Sunday's concert concluded a series of weekend performances which opened with a Prelude concert of Chopin music performed by Bolet on Friday night. Sisten Ehrling of the Detroit Symphony conducted the Boston Symphony in Friday night's main concert, which included Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

Leinsdorf himself conducted the Saturday night concert with pianist Malcolm Frager performing Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in A Minor.

A total of 38,000 turned out at Tanglewood in the past week, which included an appearance by the top vocal group The Association, with attracted 13,000 on Wednesday night.

Steinberg in Evening of Comfortable Beethoven at Spa

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

William Steinberg conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra in a program of comfortably familiar Beethoven at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center Friday night, the first of his two appearances in the area this weekend.

Friday's concert could almost be considered a warm-up for Steinberg's appearance Sunday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Sunday's performance will be of particular interest because it is his only scheduled appearance with the Boston Symphony prior to his assuming the reins of the orchestra on Erich Leinsdorf's retirement a year from now.

Steinberg is also conductor of the Pittsburg Symphony, a title he can hold for his lifetime.

The Saratoga concert Friday might combine the "Philadelphia Sound" with the equally famous "Beethoven Sound" for a full-blown performance of beautiful Beethoven. It is hard to imagine a program that would better suit the popular image of the typical "Beethoven Sound" unless the "Emperor" Concerto were substituted for the Piano Concerto No. 3 which was played by Rudolf Firkusny.

Symphonies No. 5 and 8 rounded out the program.

Beethoven's Fifth is undoubtedly one of the most popular and familiar pieces of music performed on the concert stage. But unlike many of what might be termed "good time classics," the Beethoven selections for Friday's concert also fall well within the realm of superb symphonic music.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

From beginning to end, it was a confident and heart-felt performance whether it was the strength of the Fifth Symphony or the restrained hesitancy of the second movement of the Piano Concerto. Steinberg conducts with a sure hand that demands attention and respect from the players. A carelessly tossed baton combines with a scowl, a grin and a stamp of a foot to get his message across clearly.

Firkusny is one of the older generation of concert artists, somewhat of a strange sight among the many young soloists prominent on the summer festival circuit.

The pianist played quickly and precisely in a display of technical excellence. Music and quickness militated against a similar display of interpretation without hinting at its being mechanical.

Altogether, it was a program that gave straight good music but offered no surprises. It delivered nothing but good music.

The popularity of the program was reflected in the size of the audience which equalled that of Thursday's opening performance by the Philadelphia under Eugene Ormandy.

Tonight, Eugene Ormandy returns to the podium to lead the Philadelphia in an all-Russian program featuring music of Kabalevsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Stravinsky and Borodin.

Sunday afternoon, Arthur Fiedler and Richard Rogers will share conducting duties at SPAC in a Rogers and Hammerstein program with soloists Lee Venora, Shirley Verrett, Harry Danner and Theodor Uppman, and the Parnassus Club chorus of the Capitol Hill Choral Society of Albany.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006
AUG 3 1968

Steinberg at Tanglewood

William Steinberg, who will become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1970 will conduct a full-length concert at the Berkshire Festival Sunday at 2:30 p.m. on WGBH-FM.

Broadcast in stereo direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the program includes the overture to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, Rachmaninoff's "Paganini Variations" with pianist Georges Bolet as soloist, and Symphony No. 1 by Gustav Mahler.

A second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be broadcast in stereo Friday, August 9 at 9 p.m. when Charles Wilson conducts Glinka's "Ruslan and Ludmila", "Sheherazade" by Rimsky - Konsakov and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 with Gina Bachauer as soloist.

Miss Bachauer will be on stage Saturday, Aug. 10, as well, when Erich Leinsdorf directs the orchestra in three excerpts from L'Arleesienne" by Bizet, "Also sprach Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 featuring Miss Bauchauer.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18.650
AUG 3 1968
New England Newsclip

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3.150
AUG 1 1968
New England Newsclip

August 4: WILLIAM STEINBERG, Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood for a concert of works by Wagner, Rachmaninoff, and Mahler. This will be Mr. Steinberg's only appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra before he becomes its new music director in the fall of 1969.

54.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 4 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

WAGNER	Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg'
RACHMANINOV	Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini op. 43 JORGE BOLET

intermission

MAHLER	Symphony no. 1 in D major (1888)* Langsam: schleppend, wie ein Naturlaut Kräftig bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell Feierlich und gemessen, ohne zu schleppen Stürmisch bewegt

Jorge Bolet plays the Baldwin piano

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 37

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006

AUG 5 1968

BSO Under a New Baton

Steinberg Cheered in Debut

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

Conductor William Steinberg was accorded a rousing welcome by both audience and orchestra in his preview appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

An attendance of almost 7,500 turned out to hear Steinberg in his only performance with the BSO before he assumes the post of music director of the orchestra next summer. Erich Leinsdorf's retirement is effective August 25, 1969.

Cheers and wild applause followed by an ebullient performpearance on stage. Overly enthusiastic "Bravos" punctuated all applause for the afternoon.

The program itself was rousing in its own manner.

Wagner's Prelude To "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" which opened the program is in itself a celebration of the arts and the orchestra gave some of its spirited best in its performance marked Steinberg's aploose but authoritative direction.

Going beyond its sometime-tendency to become a bit stolid, the orchestra sprang forthwith full bright sound. In the Prelude as in the Rachmoniov Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini that followed, the single problem appeared to be with the brass.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Each work possessed a bit of madness for brass and percussion which crashed forth punctuating the full range of mood expressed in each, with an occasional surprising raggedness of brass.

Pianist Jorge Bolet was soloist in the Paganini Variations, translating what was originally a violin virtuosity to pianistic virtuosity of a high order. A jazzy "Qies Irae," familiar melodic strains and finally the so-called "Diabolic" pizzicato, infitately identifiable as Paganini, combined to test all modes of musical expression for both piano and orchestra.

The string sections particularly responded to a vigorous workout through the Variations.

Bolet was superb, asserting and restraining his solo role, finally crashing through the medley of themes that is designed to stir the audience to high response.

The balance of the program consisted of Gustave Mahler's Symphony No. 1, a musically expressive work which was originally a tone poem in five movements. As a symphony in four movements, it represents a variety of musical ideas pulled an integrated whole. The orchestra continued to reach beyond itself for a particularly enjoyable performance combining thought and technique.

Sunday's concert concluded a series of weekend performances which opened with a Prelude concert of Chopin music performed by Bolet on Friday night. Sisten Ehrling of the Detroit Symphony conducted the Boston Symphony in Friday night's main concert, which included Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

Leinsdorf himself conducted the Saturday night concert with pianist Malcolm Frager performing Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in A Minor.

A total of 38,000 turned out at Tanglewood in the past week, which included an appearance by the top vocal group The Association, with attracted 13,000 on Wednesday night.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006

AUG 3 1968

Steinberg in Evening of Comfortable Beethoven at Spa

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

William Steinberg conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra in a program of comfortably familiar Beethoven at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center Friday night, the first of his two appearances in the area this weekend.

Friday's concert could almost be considered a warm-up for Steinberg's appearance Sunday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Sunday's performance will be of particular interest because it is his only scheduled appearance with the Boston Symphony prior to his assuming the reins of the orchestra on Erich Leinsdorf's retirement a year from now.

Steinberg is also conductor of the Pittsburg Symphony, a title he can hold for his lifetime.

The Saratoga concert Friday might combine the "Philadelphia Sound" with the equally famous "Beethoven Sound" for a full-blown performance of beautiful Beethoven. It is hard to imagine a program that would better suit the popular image of the typical "Beethoven Sound" unless the "Emperor" Concerto were substituted for the Piano Concerto No. 3 which was played by Rudolf Firkusny.

Symphonies No. 5 and 8 rounded out the program.

Beethoven's Fifth is undoubtedly one of the most popular and familiar pieces of music performed on the concert stage. But unlike many of what might be termed "good time classics," the Beethoven selections for Friday's concert also fall well within the realm of superb symphonic music.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

From beginning to end, it was a confident and heart-felt performance whether it was the strength of the Fifth Symphony or the restrained hesitancy of the second movement of the Piano Concerto. Steinberg conducts with a sure hand that demands attention and respect from the players. A carelessly tossed baton combines with a scowl, a grin and a stamp of a foot to get his message across clearly.

Firkusny is one of the older generation of concert artists, somewhat of a strange sight among the many young soloists prominent on the summer festival circuit.

The pianist played quickly and precisely in a display of technical excellence. Music and quickness militated against a similar display of interpretation without hinting at its being mechanical.

Altogether, it was a program that gave straight good music but offered no surprises. It delivered nothing but good music.

The popularity of the program was reflected in the size of the audience which equalled that of Thursday's opening performance by the Philadelphia under Eugene Ormandy.

Tonight, Eugene Ormandy returns to the podium to lead the Philadelphia in an all-Russian program featuring music of Kabalevsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Stravinsky and Borodin.

Sunday afternoon, Arthur Fiedler and Richard Rogers will share conducting duties at SPAC in a Rogers and Hammerstein program with soloists Lee Venora, Shirley Verrett, Harry Danner and Theodor Uppman, and the Parnassus Club chorus of the Capitol Hill Choral Society of Albany.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18.650

AUG 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Steinberg at Tanglewood

William Steinberg, who will become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1970 will conduct a full-length concert at the Berkshire Festival Sunday at 2:30 p.m. on WGBH-FM.

Broadcast in stereo direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the program includes the overture to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, Rachmaninoff's "Paganini Variations" with pianist Georges Bolet as soloist, and Symphony No. 1 by Gustav Mahler.

A second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be broadcast in stereo Friday, August 9 at 9 p.m. when Charles Wilson conducts Glinka's "Ruslan and Ludmila", "Sheherazade" by Rimsky - Konsakov and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 with Gina Bachauer as soloist.

Miss Bachauer will be on stage Saturday, Aug. 10, as well, when Erich Leinsdorf directs the orchestra in three excerpts from L'Arleesienne" by Bizet, "Also sprach Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 featuring Miss Bauchauer.

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,150

AUG 1968
New England Newsclip

August 4: WILLIAM STEINBERG, Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood for a concert of works by Wagner, Rachmaninoff, and Mahler. This will be Mr. Steinberg's only appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra before he becomes its new music director in the fall of 1969.

55

At Tanglewood

Steinberg Chooses Program to Match Regal Podium Style

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —William Steinberg is a regal sort of conductor. He stands tall and bows from the waist with his back straight, and he keeps his neck sort of stiff and commands the orchestra to do his bidding rather as if he had a divine right to do so.

Next Director

He was at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to lead the resident Boston Symphony Orchestra through Mahler's stentorian Symphony No. 1, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Rachmaninov's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini," Opus 43.

Steinberg has been appointed to take over the orchestra in October next year as its regular music director and conductor. He will split his time between Boston and Pittsburgh, where he is music director and conductor of that orchestra.

The program he chose to present Sunday was an almost perfect match, atmospherically, for his podium manner and for the setting, also. All three of the pieces are characterized by an expansive spaciousness reflected by Steinberg's benevolent imperialism and Tanglewood's bucolic opulence.

Careful Pace

Most impressive, of course, was the Mahler symphony. It is about an hour of gradual accumulation of sonic splendor, and Steinberg did not hurry it. He set a carefully measured pace so that its massive, all-inclusiveness could make its full effect.

Even the vaguely satirical funeral march, apparently founded on a slight variation of "frere Jacques," sounded royal under Steinberg's firm guidance.

We knew we had been somewhere when that giant work finally reached its destination. And there was no doubt who had been driving.

Bolet on Keyboard

It had been preceded by Rachmaninov's "Paganini Variations" with Jorge Bolet at the solo keyboard, a colorful piece composed especially to dazzle the audience.

Bolet's nimble fingers are nearly always ready for this sort of entertainment music, and so is his musical temperament, so it was a successful performance, full of neon lights and sequins and lyricism and sentiment and flashes of firecrackers as well as frowning Russian melancholy.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

Sunday morning George Zazofsky appeared at the 10.30 chamber music program in the Tanglewood theater with the Boston Sinfonietta, a string group made up of 12 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra plus a harpsichord player.

Hand Injured

Zazofsky has been missing all summer from his usual seat in the orchestra because of a serious cut on the third finger of his left (fingerboard) hand acquired while gardening.

But he is a concertmaster and driving force of the Sinfonietta and, well, the show must go on.

Sunday morning he played the solo part for Bach's A Minor Violin Concerto as well as issued the key signals for Mozart's K. 136 Divertimento and Benjamin Britten's "Variations on a theme of Frank Bridge."

Signals Start

The Sinfonietta plays without a conductor, but Zazofsky is obviously in charge. Like the first violinist in a string quartet, he signals from his chair to time the starts at crucial moments.

Otherwise the group played Sunday like an untended, well-oiled machine, smoothly and smartly.

More important, it played with taste and elegance, with musical expressiveness befitting a first-class chamber group.

Small Falters in Bach

The bandage on Zazofsky's finger kept reminding me of the painful hurdles he was leaping, but there was no evidence of strain (except, perhaps, to someone who is thoroughly aware of how he plays with 10 good fingers) until the third movement of the Bach concerto.

There was a small flurry of finger-falters at one point; it failed to erase the memory of the beauty of the sweet, singing tone with which he played the floating middle movement of Bach piece.

The Mozart which had started the program was exquisite and the Britten which ended it was notable, not only for its moments of beauty, but also for the technical unanimity of its 12 conductorless players while negotiating constantly-changing variations of dynamics and speeds.

Weekend's Best

Once again the Sunday morning program had produced some of the best sounds of the festival weekend.

The audience for the afternoon program was 7467, which, with the Saturday morning open rearsal, brought the week's total to 38,121.

* * *

Contemporary Festival

The opening concert of the series of seven in the Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, began about 9 Sunday night for about 300 patient listeners on the damp grass.

It was a concert of electronic music dispensed from four giant speakers (two stereo pairs) on the roof of the back of the shed directed toward the lawn. The activating tape player was backstage out of sight.

There were five works on the program, three of them consisting entirely of sounds generated by electronic devices, one involving pre-recorded cello plus electronic sounds, and another beginning with unaccompanied violin and evolving into 19 variations of electronic sound composed by a computer.

Like most electronic music produced during recent years, it appeared to be the result of surrealistic techniques producing sounds in an infinite range of speeds, durations, volumes, pitches, sequences and combinations.

There were, as expected, a bewildering array of ticks, tocks, moans, crashes, (wind in the trees), pings, roars, shudders, (a truck on Hawthrone St. behind the high hedge), booms, whistles and wheezes.

It was interesting, of course, but as inhuman as a witch's wish.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 5 1968 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

AUG 4 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

MASSACHUSETTS

LENOX (Berkshire Festival)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Wagner's Die Meistersinger—Overture, Rachmaninoff's Paganini Variations and Mahler's Symphony No. 1 this afternoon at 2:30 p.m. Friday at 9 p.m. the Boston Symphony's concert will include Glika's Rusian and Ludmila, Rimsky-Korsakov's Sheherazade and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Saturday evening's concert at 8 p.m. Excerpts from L'Arlesienne by Bizet, Also Sprach Zarathustra by Strauss and Piano Concerto No. 2 by Rachmaninoff will be given by the orchestra.

Steinberg Leads Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood was led Sunday afternoon by its future music director, William Steinberg. Three works comprised the program, Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" overture, Rachmaninoff's Paganini Rhapsody, and Mahler's First Symphony.

"Die Meistersinger" was superb. Rarely has the orchestra responded to a conductor so completely, giving him contoured arches of sound, fluent passagework, precise attacks, and impeccable balances. It truly sounded like an orchestra of soloists. The real impetus behind this marvelous music-making was, of course, William Steinberg.

Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" followed, with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist. Most admirable was the linearity Steinberg and Bolet brought to the piece. Played thusly, the music was certainly no less persuasive and had every bit as much emotion. In a day when "big-sound sumptuousness" and overresonance are literally extruded like cheap plastic by our major orchestras, it was certainly pleasant to hear an engaging, facile performance of the work.

Bolet didn't overplay the solo role grossly; rather he worked with conductor and orchestra to make the score sound like an integrated unit. Steinberg's accompaniment reaffirmed this organic consciousness, stressing piano-orchestral continuity and inter-dependence. At times the orchestra sounded a bit rough, but in general things went smoothly and left a favorable impression.

Mahler's First Symphony, following intermission, fared less well. I've never understood Steinberg's austere approach to Mahler, for despite the contemplative or intellectual mortar that binds Mahler's works, you should never walk away feeling like you've just been to a great lecture session. Mahler should provoke a catharsis, the more emotional, the better. You "take all the fun" out of his music by playing anagrams with the various motifs and minimizing the more obvious sentimentality and violence that betrays an overly-romantic heart.

Musically, the orchestra sounded like it was in rehearsal. Off-stage trumpets never got softer in the distance, on-stage trumpets came in 20 measures early, the triangle missed an important downbeat, etc. Worst of all, in the loudest parts the orchestra was always held back. For example, the timpani could always have used more volume, and tubist Chester Schmitz (who deserves a "most valuable player of the year" award) was heard in only two "Pesante" sections of the finale.

The center of the third movement and the concluding pages of the finale were the best moments of the symphony. Too bad. It was the first time I've ever been bored during a Mahler symphony. I hope those of you hearing the music for the first time at least try to investigate this composer's music from some other source.

The World Of Music

Tanglewood Marks 30th Anniversary

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

It was a soggy, muggy, hot, and airless afternoon that made even standing still a chore, and yet it did not prevent 7,467 people from paying $2.50 up to $7.50 for a seat in the 6,000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood in Massachusetts last Sunday to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg.

Sunday also marked the 30th anniversary of the opening of this pie-wedge shaped music shed, which was dedicated in 1938 by the late Serge Koussevitzky, through whose effort it was built. During the previous summer, I was told, the orchestra had played in an enormous tent, but a sudden and violent thunderstorm demonstrated quite vividly that a permanent structure was needed. The original plans for the shed were sketched by the late Eliel Saarinen and were modified by Joseph Frantz, who supervised the 1½-acre shed's construction, begun on New Year's Eve in 1937 and completed in June, 1938.

* * *

Koussevitzky, as Irving Kolodin tells it, strolled onto the stage, picked up two blocks of wood, clacked them together and proclaimed: "Perfect!" So much for the acoustics: perfect — despite the fact that the shed shows its age or perhaps vintage. The extreme sides are not ideal for watching, if you must, but the sound comes by undisturbed. In fact, the design of the shed is such that every point on the outer edge is equidistant from the stage, thus assisting the sounds of the music as it spreads out from the point of the wedge under the open sides of the structure unto the lawn.

A coat of paint might have been a birthday present to the venerable structure with its bat-like acousticons on the ceiling, but then who cares about such details, when the Bostonians play and play at their best?

The orchestra played as if it wanted to show that even without white jackets, the shirtsleeved members of this orchestra are musical aristocrats, as RCA Victor claims them to be. It was coincidental, no doubt, that this concert also marked Steinberg's only appearance before he assumes the music directorship of the orchestra in the fall of 1969. Obviously, there is a very great love-affair between the orchestra and their future boss and from the shouts of "bravo" and the standing ovations, it is obvious there is another such love-affair brewing between Steinberg and the audience.

Not that the Bostonians and Steinberg did not deserve this accolade, for together they made some magnificent music and one can look forward to some exciting things in Boston in the seasons to come. It is always exciting when orchestral players bother or are moved to applaud their conductor, and that is exactly what the Bostonians did for Mr. Steinberg.

The program was perhaps ordinary enough, and yet it wasn't ordinary at all, proving once again that it is in the conception and interpretation of the conductor and the response by the orchestra that music breathes — lives or dies. Steinberg plays his Wagner "echt deutsch," as it indeed it should be played. Every idea, every instrumental contribution of the overture to Die Meistersinger therefore came through — clean and clear, and the tempi were just right, heavily accented but not dragging, impressively pompous without falling apart.

How Steinberg can build climaxes is always a bit of a miracle; starting very slowly and quietly, he mounts them carefully until he has reached full dynamic strength and the tempo sounds explosively new and fresh. And such climaxes are irresistible, as was proven in the Mahler's First Symphony in D Major.

* * *

This work is never an easy thing to do, for just to play the notes is not enough. It takes a plan, an idea, and a frame by the conductor, and I think Steinberg hit on excellent balances: elegiac and lyrical in turn, he could play it on the rough side, too, as in the stompy Laendler (country dance) of the second movement scherzo, and really hit the sense of fulfillment one moment and of frustration the next in the chromatic wail of the stormy last movement.

And in the famous funeral march of the third movement Steinberg saw the humor in it but like all real humor, it has a tug or two of tragedy. I think Steinberg's was one of the finest realizations of that movement I have ever heard, despite the fact that no doubt due to the weather the principal bass player had a bit of pitch trouble with the sounding the initial solo of the Frere Jacques theme.

Just before intermission, Steinberg almost disappeared in the shadow of great, big Jorge Bolet who was to be the soloist in a cataclysmic version of Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody On a Theme by Paganini, Opus 43. Bolet is not only a big man, he is also a big pianist and he plays with a great line and a large technique. And yet there were some exquisitely sensitive moments.

As we re-entered the afternoon of hot sun, the applause still continued and Steinberg made his seventh return to stage center to share with the orchestra the enthusiasm of the crowd loathe to go away.

* * *

At the press office I learned that to date 78,935 people had listened at Tanglewood this summer, a figure which surpasses by 16,758 the audiences of last year.

People brought their ice-chests and bought box lunches at the Tanglewood cafeteria and enjoyed the shade under the trees.

Only in one matter did the Tanglewood audience deviate from the policy stated that "Tanglewood is a concert hall, albeit an outdoor one, and the management expects and kindly requests that all Tanglewood patrons attend performances in appropriate concert dress."

Ascribe it to the weather or to prevailing styles, never has human imagination abbreviated and colorized female attire to such an extent. So if you did not want to enjoy the music inside the shed, you could always wander about and pop your eyes at the human display. I suppose it adds to the 'flavor' of a summer afternoon's outdoor concert. Wagner surely would have approved, although I have my doubts about Mahler!

DINNER ON THE GROUND AND MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD
William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 175,118
SUN. - CIRC. 185,817

Schenectady Gazette

57.

Whitestone

WILLIAM STEINBERG, present director of the Pittsburgh Symphony and the recently announced successor to Erich Leinsdorf as head of the Boston Symphony, conducts the latter orchestra at his Tanglewood concert Sunday afternoon. His performance yesterday and at the Saturday open rehearsal were his only appearances here this summer. Concerts this weekend at Tanglewood drew 25,042 listeners.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

AUG 5 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Ehrling, Steinberg and Leinsdorf at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, shared the podium for the three concerts of the fifth week of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood this past weekend with two guests. Yesterday afternoon William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony and director-designate of the Boston orchestra starting in the fall of 1969, took the baton and Friday night Sixten Ehrling, director of the Detroit Symphony, was in charge.

One of the advantages of this procedure is to dilute the onerous duties of the orchestra's director and another is to expose audiences to a wider range of the repertory. No matter how catholic a conductor's interests and preferences may be, in the long run, it will be channeled within discernible limits. Koussevitzky brought much French and Russian music to Tanglewood programs; Munch lavished French choices, and currently Leinsdorf does much Germanic music. This is all to the good but the injection of a soupcon of French seasoning, namely some Ravel, which Ehrling threw into the potpourri, added a welcome and zestful spice to an otherwise predictable menu.

* * *

YESTERDAY Steinberg gave the major part of his afternoon to the Mahler First Symphony, a near-hour-long work in which ideas are so plentiful that, ad valorem, a portion of them seems to have been squandered. But on the other hand, Steinberg kept the contrasts between the opposing alternates so clearly in character and well-defined that the music moved on consistently without any diminution of magnetism.

* * *

JORGE BOLET paid a welcome return visit in the spectacular Rachmaninoff "Rhapsody on the 24th Caprice for violin solo of Paganini," Opus 43. Again Bolet was cast in the role he fulfills so splendidly, that of a flamboyant virtuoso. One remembers and thinks of him at Tanglewood only as that type of pianist. He always reveals that he is equally capable in the more amiable, even if short, passages of the choices in which he appears but he becomes typed at the keyboard as a personage, much as Boris Karloff was in the movies.

A straightforward reading of the Wagner Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" opened Steinberg's program.

* * *

LEINSDORF'S program Saturday night was a doubly frosted cake of one layer too many. Malcolm Frager in Schumann's piano concerto turned in a deeply stirring performance but, coming after the Mendelssohn "Scottish" Symphony, the A Minor, Opus 56, it was like two planked steaks in succession. And to encase them in Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and Strauss's suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" was enough to make one raise his eyebrows in mild surprise.

Frager played a version of the Schumann which adhered to the composer's earliest sketches of his concerto, because of the soloist's fortuitous finding of the manuscript in a private collection. The changes are not momentous and are of interest mainly to scholars. His performance, however, combined a lissome and reposeful poetry with an incandescent rhythmic urgency. There is no passage in the piano concerto literature which is more felicitous than the cello section solo which is the second theme in the middle movement of the concerto.

* * *

THE STRAUSS SUITE is a captivating series of the opera's most familiar melodies. Leinsdorf played it with nostalgic infatuation which he readily conveyed to the audience of more than 9,000.

Friday night Ehrling's major opus was the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony, in E Minor, Opus 64. His reading did not neglect any of the multiple opportunities for tonal richness and dramatic fervor that the score reflects in conspicuously competent hands but his Ravel was doubly welcome on his program, for the music itself and for the convincing penetration the performance evinced.

The "Pavane for a dead Infanta" was written when Ravel was not yet 25, thereby just squeezing in before the turn of the century. But it is actually centuries away from the Schumann and Mendelssohn and even from the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" with which Ehrling opened his program. It is a pity that the illness of a guest conductor is going to deprive Tanglewood of hearing one of the massive Berlioz works this festival, for these nibbles provoke a strong appetency for his more formidable writings.

* * *

THE RAVEL "Rapsodie Espagnole" was one of a series of compositions to appear in the quarter-century before World War I which provoked the opinion that the best Spanish music of the period was written by foreigners. The fascinating themes are the factors which first strike the ear but a little closer attention reveals the mastery of orchestral timbre Ravel possessed. As Mahler pre-empted (one can hardly plagiarize from himself) his own songs, so Ravel adapted melodies and music he had written for other applications and used them here again in his Rapsodie. The subtle rhythms of his Malaguena and Habanera and the over-all nature of the delicacy with which Ravel constructed everything he touched made these the highlights of a perspective of the weekend's programs.

Study in Comparisons at Lenox

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — An audience of 7,467 persons came to Tanglewood yesterday afternoon to find out what's in store for the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the Berkshire Music Festival of 1969.

Judging by the volume of applause before, during and after yesterday's program, it's a safe assumption that they intend to prolong the welcome when William Steinberg succeeds Erich Leinsdorf as the Boston Symphony's new conductor.

Total attendance for the weekend was 25,042.

It was more a study in comparisons than contrasts at the last two concerts of the festival's fifth weekend, Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

Heavily Romantic

Leinsdorf conducted Saturday night with Malcolm Frager as piano soloist in the original version of the Schumann Concerto.

Pianist Jorge Bolet was Steinberg's soloist yesterday afternoon. He played Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini.

Both programs were heavily romantic. The only possible exception was a suite from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," which could have been written by a sophisticated Johann Strauss.

Tone Was Pure

Both programs were stylistically so similar that comparisons were inevitable. This applied equally to the soloists.

Frager approached the Schumann Concerto as a reserved romantic. Differences from the popular version are clinical rather than musical.

It was technically competent, extremely musical playing. Frager made every phrase hinge on melody. His tone was pure, well-rounded and singing.

Much the same can be said of Bolet's performance in the Rachmaninoff Variations, except that he indulged in such license that at one point Steinberg showed his irritation.

Some of the slower variations dawdled and dragged. But Bolet's capacity for tempestuous speed and bursting sonorities was natural fodder for brilliant sections.

Leinsdorf's conducting of Flotow's featherweight "Merry Wives of Windsor" Overture encouraged momentum, tonal beauty approaching splendor, and dramatic strength.

Best Disposed

While the orchestra performed its part admirably, Leinsdorf was best disposed toward the second and final movements of Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" sparkled in what was identified as an "arrangement" by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. It sounded more like a mere selection of material from the opera.

Yesterday, Steinberg applied his impressive gifts of scrutiny and detail to the Prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger," and Mahler's Symphony No. 1 in D major.

Steinberg has no stereotyped movements for anything. The orchestra was his willing instrument and attentive to his every move.

Blaze of Glory

No resource of regalia and brilliant sound was left untapped in the Wagner. It had a sweeping start, progressed through reserved terrain, and ended in a blaze of glory.

The orchestra ran into a few problems of intonation in the Mahler Symphony.

Steinberg sustained interest in the lengthy and occasionally long-winded work.

Some might even feel that it took such beautifully sculptured balances and philosophy to spare the Mahler from being a colossal bore.

Yesterday it was downright thrilling.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

AUG 5 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE MUSICIANS PLAY TO CAPACITY

The Berkshire Music Festival, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. came forth with another group of victories for the past weekends programs — boasting capacity crowds, virtuoso instrumentalists, programs that initiate innovations in performance and choice of compositions.

Beginning as is the custom of the past two years with a Friday evening prelude, with Jorge Bolet playing a group of Chopin Ballades, the major program, conducted by Sixten Ehrling as guest, presented a stirring rendition of Berlioz Overture to Benvenuto Cellini, Ravel's Pavane pour une infante defunte, and Rapsodie espagnole before intermission. A never to be forgotten Trhaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was the entire second half.

Ehrling has an approach in directing that electrifies both musicians and audience, and some new sounds from the familiar seemed audibly in evidence in the beloved Tchaikovsky; it was worth the entire season's output to hear. Saturday, Erich Leinsdorf again resumed the podium, opening the program with a stirring Overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor of Nicolai, and a compellingly eager-to-listen-to-every nuance and tone in the Scottish, third symphony of Mendelssohn.

The intermission was followed by the guest soloist of the evening, Malcolm Frager — whose appearances at Tanglewood now seem to be a must on every season's billing. The original version of Schumann's concerto for piano and orchestra in A., seldom heard, is now in a private collection in Europe Mr. Frager is the only pianist who has seen it since the turn of the century. The changes are all in the opening movement. It is as one critic has said, fa more dramatic and audacious The orchestral chord which begins the familiar version is replaced by a sudden striking of the piano keys. The revised version was pasted over the first but Mr. Frager managed to decipher what was underneath. He believes the changes were made to please his wife, Clara Wieck and that it is characteristic of Schumann in its original form. It was interesting to note that one of the earliest performances had been conducted by Mendelssohn, whose own symphony appeared on the same program last Saturday. Frager has an inimitable style and genius of his own, and he was given an ovation of applause that seemed would never cease.

Another First

A brilliantly performed and stirring Strauss composition, Suite from Der Rosenkavalier, too, was the first performance at the Festival in that version, sent the audience away singing with joy.

William Steinberg, who is to be the orchestra's leadership choice in the 1969-1970 season conducted the Sunday afternoon program in Wagner's Preluded to Die Meistersinger, and Mahler's first symphony.

Guest pianist, in his third appearance of this season, who is a repeater by acclamation, rendered the Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini by Rachmaninov. Truly it was another in memorable weekend packages defying comparison.

—R.E.H.

HOUR (e)
NORWALK, CONN.
CIRC. 21,500

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Summer home Aug 8

Tanglewood in Review

FRIDAY, AUGUST 2
By AA. C. S.

Sixten Ehrling, director of the Detroit Symphony, chose a program of old favorites for his appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. Berlioz' Overture to Benvenuto Cellini made a brilliant opener. This was followed by two works of Ravel: Pavane pour une infante defunte and the Rapsodie espagnole. The second half of the evening was devoted to Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

If the management believed the program would draw a large crowd they were mistaken. It was an enthusiastic audience, however. A friend noted that one reason for such a collection of oft played works was to demonstrate how well they could be played. Ehrling certainly pulled out all stops. His direction is unmannered and authoritative; and if he sometimes seemed to be testing the virtuosity of the orchestra in his choice of tempos, he was always in complete control. The Tchaikovsky gave him the obvious opportunity to display his talents and received a tumultuous ovation.

The Cuban pianist Jorge Bolet, was soloist for the weekend prelude. He played four Chopin Ballades with fervor.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 3
By R. H.

Last Saturday's Tanglewood performance was the most satisfying of the several this writer has heard thus far this season. The highlight was a superb performance of Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A minor (opus 56), The Scottish. It is beautifully Celtic, and the Boston Symphony understood that. One might have thought that MacLeinsdorf was conducting MacMendelssohn.

Malcolm Frager played the Schumann piano concerto in A minor. To be sure, the opinion of a group of young hairy necklaced (sic) males types seated nearby that the whole business was "schmaltz" had some merit; but it was good honest schmaltz, and there could be worse things. Too many listeners like to intellectualize all music, willy-nilly. because they think it is intellectual to do so.

Otto Nicolai's Overture to his Merry Wives opened the program. It is, I suppose, what those self-appointed Madison Avenue grammarians call "fun" music. The concluding number was Strauss's Suite from Der Rosenkavalier. I feel about Strauss the way some English milord or other felt about looking at a waterfall. "Pretty soon," he said, "you want to leave." That's what I did; I felt, thereby avoiding the departing traffic of the very large audience as well as Strauss.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 4
By A. C. S.

William Steinberg made his first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood since the announcement of his appointment as Music Director of the orchestra as of the start of the 1969 season. Perhaps it was only in the mind of the listener, but it seemed as if this factor played a part in the excellence of the concert. The orchestra appeared to try that much harder to do well, and the results were noticeable.

Steinberg chose a varied program of late romantic-type works beginning with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Jorge Bolet was piano soloist in the Rachmaninov Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini. His rendition was brilliantly virile, and the collaboration between soloists and conductor provided an exhilarating performance.

The meatiest part of the program was saved for the end: Mahler's Symphony No. 1. This ode to Nature with its bird-like motifs and country dances obviously appeals to Steinberg. His rather elemental style of conducting, strong and earthy, matched the quality of the music. Here, as was evident in his reading of the Wagner, Steinberg caught the architectural sweep of the score. For all its length, one was never bored.

Pianist Rich, conductor Morgenstern at Bennett College concert.

THE LIVELY ARTS

Festival Scene '68

By ROY HEMMING

IT used to be only the rich and chic who attended summer music festivals. But not anymore. The increasing mobility of the average American (thanks mainly to the automobile and the superhighway, and to some extent the economy-fare jet airplane) has turned most summer music festivals into genuine mass-culture affairs—with moderate prices, no shortage of tickets, and a generally informal atmosphere.

Most important of all, however, has been their generally high artistic level. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, for example, plays for Illinois' Ravinia Festival, and the Detroit Symphony for the Meadowbrook Festival in Michigan. And for the third successive season, the London Symphony Orchestra even crossed the Atlantic for the Daytona Beach Festival in Florida. Many of the orchestras' musicians also double as instructors at summer music schools affiliated with the festivals.

And the record-breaking 1968 attendance at most of the festivals proved how really popular the concerts themselves are. At Tanglewood, Mass., for example, pianist Van Cliburn and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to nearly 15,000 people at one concert—more than five times the standing-room-only capacity of the major concert halls of Boston or New York.

But the record of records was maintained again this summer at the free outdoor concerts given by the New York Philharmonic in New York City's principal parks—with more than 70,000 attending several of the Central Park concerts.

There was a major new festival this summer: the Cleveland Orchestra's new Blossom Center Festival in Ohio. This reporter regretted being unable to accept an invitation to attend the festival's gala opening in July, but others were glowing in their praise of the design of the new Blossom Center, its acoustics, and the quality of its first season's programs as led by George Szell and others.

Among other festivals this reporter did get to, here is a rundown of some of their highlights:

▶ Tanglewood, Mass.: Considerable excitement greeted the first Boston Symphony concert William Steinberg has led since being named the new music director of the orchestra (to begin in 1969). Audience enthusiasm for the colorful Pittsburgh maestro boded well for future festivals at Tanglewood. Also most enthusiastic was the reception given Minneapolis conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski the night he led the BSO in a brilliantly played program of Berlioz, Dvorak, and Lutoslawski. Among soloists, pianist Malcolm Frager—first in a solo recital and then performing the recently discovered original version of Schumann's Piano Concerto—proved that he was no longer one of America's most promising young pianists but already one of its handful of great ones.

▶ Saratoga, N. Y.: July featured the incomparable New York City Ballet—dancing fantastically in the most far-ranging repertory of any ballet company in the world (from baroque divertimentos to the jazzy Slaughter on 10th Avenue). August spotlighted the Philadelphia Orchestra, proving week after week why anyone with a good set of ears considers it the world's greatest orchestra. Conductor Eugene Ormandy shone particularly in an all-Rachmaninoff program.

▶ Greensboro, N. C.: The Eastern Music Festival at Guilford College made impressive strides toward establishing itself as one of the South's major festivals. In one of several programs I heard, conductor Sheldon Morgenstern and pianist Warren Rich (in a program of Ives, Dohnanyi, and Stravinsky) gave clear evidence of the exciting and off-beat music-making taking place in some of the U. S.'s less-publicized locales. Morgenstern and Rich also scored a first—giving the first integrated symphonic concert ever held on the campus of primarily Negro Bennett College.

▶ Lincoln Center, N. Y.: Far and away the most exciting and enterprising festival of all 1968 could be reached by New York City subways rather than by superhighways. Lincoln Center hosted the Rome Opera for several weeks, spotlighting productions of Rossini's Otello and Verdi's early I Due Foscari, not seen in America for generations. From Britain came the splendid English Chamber Orchestra, for a series of programs with the brillant, young conductor-pianist Daniel Barenboim and his equally brilliant and young wife, cellist Jacqueline du Pré. The American Ballet Theatre offered a representative sampling of its still-unique mixture of theatre and dance. But most interesting of all was a series of exceptional concerts by the New York Philharmonic (under Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland), the Boston Symphony (under Erich Leinsdorf), the Pittsburgh Symphony (under André Previn and Jorge Mester), and a chamber orchestra (under Richard Dufallo)—all featuring works commissioned over the past 30 years by the Koussevitzky Foundation from such composers as Bernstein, Copland, Bartok, Ginastera, Henze, Stravinsky, etc. The series provided an amazing eye-opener into the heritage of remarkable contemporary works that have been quietly accumulating right under our noses—and which may well turn out to be some of the mainstays of musical fesitivals come the year 2001, and beyond. □

U.S AFFAIRS IN PERSPECTIVE
Senior Scholastic
September 13, 1968

Summer home Aug 8

Tanglewood in Review

FRIDAY, AUGUST 2
By AA. C. S.

Sixten Ehrling, director of the Detroit Symphony, chose a program of old favorites for his appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. Berlioz' Overture to Benvenuto Cellini made a brilliant opener. This was followed by two works of Ravel: Pavane pour une infante defunte and the Rapsodie espagnole. The second half of the evening was devoted to Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

If the management believed the program would draw a large crowd they were mistaken. It was an enthusiastic audience, however. A friend noted that one reason for such a collection of oft played works was to demonstrate how well they could be played. Ehrling certainly pulled out all stops. His direction is unmannered and authoritative; and if he sometimes seemed to be testing the virtuosity of the orchestra in his choice of tempos, he was always in complete control. The Tchaikovsky gave him the obvious opportunity to display his talents and received a tumultuous ovation.

The Cuban pianist Jorge Bolet, was soloist for the weekend prelude. He played four Chopin Ballades with fervor.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 3
By R. H.

Last Saturday's Tanglewood performance was the most satisfying of the several this writer has heard thus far this season. The highlight was a superb performance of Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A minor (opus 56), The Scottish. It is beautifully Celtic, and the Boston Symphony understood that. One might have thought that MacLeinsdorf was conducting MacMendelssohn.

Malcolm Frager played the Schumann piano concerto in A minor. To be sure, the opinion of a group of young hairy necklaced (sic) males types seated nearby that the whole business was "schmaltz" had some merit; but it was good honest schmaltz, and there could be worse things. Too many listeners like to intellectualize all music, willy-nilly. because they think it is intellectual to do so.

Otto Nicolai's Overture to his Merry Wives opened the program. It is, I suppose, what those self-appointed Madison Avenue grammarians call "fun" music. The concluding number was Strauss's Suite from Der Rosenkavalier. I feel about Strauss the way some English milord or other felt about looking at a waterfall. "Pretty soon," he said, "you want to leave." That's what I did; I felt, thereby avoiding the departing traffic of the very large audience as well as Strauss.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 4
By A. C. S.

William Steinberg made his first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood since the announcement of his appointment as Music Director of the orchestra as of the start of the 1969 season. Perhaps it was only in the mind of the listener, but it seemed as if this factor played a part in the excellence of the concert. The orchestra appeared to try that much harder to do well, and the results were noticeable.

Steinberg chose a varied program of late romantic-type works beginning with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Jorge Bolet was piano soloist in the Rachmaninov Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini. His rendition was brilliantly virile, and the collaboration between soloists and conductor provided an exhilarating performance.

The meatiest part of the program was saved for the end: Mahler's Symphony No. 1. This ode to Nature with its bird-like motifs and country dances obviously appeals to Steinberg. His rather elemental style of conducting, strong and earthy, matched the quality of the music. Here, as was evident in his reading of the Wagner, Steinberg caught the architectural sweep of the score. For all its length, one was never bored.

Pianist Rich, conductor Morgenstern at Bennett College concert.

THE LIVELY ARTS

Festival Scene '68

By ROY HEMMING

IT used to be only the rich and chic who attended summer music festivals. But not anymore. The increasing mobility of the average American (thanks mainly to the automobile and the superhighway, and to some extent the economy-fare jet airplane) has turned most summer music festivals into genuine mass-culture affairs—with moderate prices, no shortage of tickets, and a generally informal atmosphere.

Most important of all, however, has been their generally high artistic level. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, for example, plays for Illinois' Ravinia Festival, and the Detroit Symphony for the Meadowbrook Festival in Michigan. And for the third successive season, the London Symphony Orchestra even crossed the Atlantic for the Daytona Beach Festival in Florida. Many of the orchestras' musicians also double as instructors at summer music schools affiliated with the festivals.

And the record-breaking 1968 attendance at most of the festivals proved how really popular the concerts themselves are. At Tanglewood, Mass., for example, pianist Van Cliburn and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to nearly 15,000 people at one concert—more than five times the standing-room-only capacity of the major concert halls of Boston or New York.

But the record of records was maintained again this summer at the free outdoor concerts given by the New York Philharmonic in New York City's principal parks—with more than 70,000 attending several of the Central Park concerts.

There was a major new festival this summer: the Cleveland Orchestra's new Blossom Center Festival in Ohio. This reporter regretted being unable to accept an invitation to attend the festival's gala opening in July, but others were glowing in their praise of the design of the new Blossom Center, its acoustics, and the quality of its first season's programs as led by George Szell and others.

Among other festivals this reporter did get to, here is a rundown of some of their highlights:

▶ Tanglewood, Mass.: Considerable excitement greeted the first Boston Symphony concert William Steinberg has led since being named the new music director of the orchestra (to begin in 1969). Audience enthusiasm for the colorful Pittsburgh maestro boded well for future festivals at Tanglewood. Also most enthusiastic was the reception given Minneapolis conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski the night he led the BSO in a brilliantly played program of Berlioz, Dvorak, and Lutoslawski. Among soloists, pianist Malcolm Frager—first in a solo recital and then performing the recently discovered original version of Schumann's Piano Concerto—proved that he was no longer one of America's most promising young pianists but already one of its handful of great ones.

▶ Saratoga, N. Y.: July featured the incomparable New York City Ballet—dancing fantastically in the most far-ranging repertory of any ballet company in the world (from baroque divertimentos to the jazzy Slaughter on 10th Avenue). August spotlighted the Philadelphia Orchestra, proving week after week why anyone with a good set of ears considers it the world's greatest orchestra. Conductor Eugene Ormandy shone particularly in an all-Rachmaninoff program.

▶ Greensboro, N. C.: The Eastern Music Festival at Guilford College made impressive strides toward establishing itself as one of the South's major festivals. In one of several programs I heard, conductor Sheldon Morgenstern and pianist Warren Rich (in a program of Ives, Dohnanyi, and Stravinsky) gave clear evidence of the exciting and offbeat music-making taking place in some of the U. S.'s less-publicized locales. Morgenstern and Rich also scored a first—giving the first integrated symphonic concert ever held on the campus of primarily Negro Bennett College.

▶ Lincoln Center, N. Y.: Far and away the most exciting and enterprising festival of all 1968 could be reached by New York City subways rather than by superhighways. Lincoln Center hosted the Rome Opera for several weeks, spotlighting productions of Rossini's Otello and Verdi's early I Due Foscari, not seen in America for generations. From Britain came the splendid English Chamber Orchestra, for a series of programs with the brillant, young conductor-pianist Daniel Barenboim and his equally brilliant and young wife, cellist Jacqueline du Pré. The American Ballet Theatre offered a representative sampling of its still-unique mixture of theatre and dance. But most interesting of all was a series of exceptional concerts by the New York Philharmonic (under Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland), the Boston Symphony (under Erich Leinsdorf), the Pittsburgh Symphony (under André Previn and Jorge Mester), and a chamber orchestra (under Richard Dufallo)—all featuring works commissioned over the past 30 years by the Koussevitzky Foundation from such composers as Bernstein, Copland, Bartok, Ginastera, Henze, Stravinsky, etc. The series provided an amazing eye-opener into the heritage of remarkable contemporary works that have been quietly accumulating right under our noses—and which may well turn out to be some of the mainstays of musical fesitivals come the year 2001, and beyond. □

58

Sixth Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 9 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

BERKSHIRE BOY CHOIR
BRIAN RUNNETT Music Director
LOWELL LACEY organ

POULENC	Timor et tremor venerunt super me (1939)
BRUCKNER	Christus factus est pro nobis obediens
PINKHAM	Wedding cantata
BRITTEN	Missa brevis for boys' voices and organ op. 63
DEBUSSY	Trois chansons de Charles d'Orléans Dieu! qu'il la fait bon regarder Quant j'ai ouy le tabourin Yver, vous n'estes qu'un villain

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

The BERKSHIRE BOY CHOIR makes its second appearance at the Festival this weekend. Founded in 1967, it has already established itself as one of the outstanding musical organizations of the United States. The members, who are selected by audition on a competitive basis, come from as far afield as Portland, Oregon, Washington, DC and Canada. The Music Director, BRIAN RUNNETT, is Organist and Master of the Choristers at Norwich Cathedral, England, and is a distinguished chorus master and recitalist. During its eight-week season this summer, the Choir has sung at the Festivals at Hartford and Saratoga, at the University of Rhode Island, Castle Hill, Rutgers University, Syracuse University, and in Washington, DC, among other appearances. They will perform next week at Lincoln Center.

Boy Choir Sings

The Berkshire Boy Choir, which sang six pieces for the 7 p. m. prelude and is based at the Stockbridge School down the road from Tanglewood, is in its second summer of existence.

It is made up of 14 paid adult choices and 46 boys from choirs all over the country. It is supported by contributions.

Last summer it sounded fine. Friday it sounded first class . . . clean, exact, dynamically nimble, tonally balanced and unusually precise with its diction.

It gave evidence of thorough discipline under tasteful coaching. The director is Brian Runnett, master of the choristers at Norwich Cathedral, England.

Most impressive, perhaps, on the program were Bruckner's "Christus Factus Est Pro Nobis Obediens" and a motet for three choirs written by Thomas Tomkins and sung as an encore. Other composers represented were Poulenc, Pinkham, Britten and Debussy.

Springfield Union 8-10-68

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

First for Tanglewood

Gina Bachauer to Play Three Concerts in Single Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Gina Bachauer, pianist, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in each of its fifth weekend concerts, laying three concrtos, two Rachmaninoff and one Brahms.

First for Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, noted that while other soloists have appeared more than once in a single Tanglewood season, this will be the first time cne artist has been the only weekend soloist, appearing three times.

* * *

On Friday, Miss Bachauer will play the Rachmanioff Third Concerto as part of an all - Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Wilson, making his first Tanglewood appearance of the season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also director of the Berkshire Chorus and head of vocal music activities of the Berkshire Music Center. In addition to the Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to Ruslan and Ludmila, and Rimsky - Korsakov's Sheherazade Suite.

GINA BACHAUER

* * *

On Saturday evening, Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto. Erich Leinsdorf conducts. His program also includes Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and Strauss's Also Sprach Zarathustra.

* * *

Sunday afternoon Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto, again with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The program is all - Brahms. The other works are the Tragic Overture and the Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

* * *

The Weekend Prelude of Friday is a choral program by the Berkshire Boy Choir. The Sunday morning chamber music concert will be played by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players as the concluding event of the 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Gina Bachauer To Appear At Berkshire Festival Concerts

Gina Bachauer will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in all three concerts of the Berkshire Festival's fifth weekend, at Tanglewood, Lenox, starting Aug. 9.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, noted this is the first time one artist will be the only weekend soloist. On Friday, Aug. 9, Miss Bachauer will play the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto as part of an all-Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition to Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmila," and Rimsky - Korsakov's "Sheherazade" suite.

Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto with Erich Leinsdorf conducting Saturday, Aug. 10. His program also includes Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto, again with Leinsdorf conducting, on Sunday, afternoon, Aug. 11. The program is all Brahms and includes the Tragic Overture and the Variations on the Theme of Haydn.

The Sunday morning chamber music concert will be played by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players as the concluding event of the 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Summertime Aug 8

GINA BACHAUER . . . pianist, who will be featured in all three Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the weekend August 9-11 at Tanglewood. She will play Rachmaninoff's Piano Concertos no. 3 and no. 2, and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat.

The Weekend at Tanglewood

A romantic and colorful musical bill of fare has been prepared for listeners at Tanglewood this weekend. Friday evening the Berkshire Boy Choir will offer a seraphic prelude at 7 for pre-concert picnickers. At 9 Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will direct an all - Russian program which includes Glinka's Ruslan and Ludmila; Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherezade and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto, No. 3 featuring Gina Bachauer, pianist.

Mme Bachauer will play Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto at the 8 p.m. concert Saturday. Other compositions included in this concert will be Also Sprach Zarathustra by Strauss and excerpts from L'Arlesienne by Bizet. Erich Leinsdorf will be the conductor.

Director Leinsdorf will again hold the baton Sunday afternoon for the all-Brahms program at 2:30. Selections will include the Tragic Overture; Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Three Hungarian Dances; and Piano Concerto No. 2 featuring Mme. Bachauer.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN & Union
SPRINGFIELD, MASS. 8-4-68
CIRC. 115,950

AUG 4 1968 New England Newsclip

* * *

Gina Bachauer Set As Tanglewood Soloist

Gina Bachauer will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in each of its concerts next weekend, playing three concertos, two Rachmaninoff and one Brahms. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Orchestras, noted this was the first time one artist had been the only weekend soloist.

Next Friday, Miss Bauchauer will play the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto as part of an all - Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson. In addition to the Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to Russlan and Ludmila, and Rimsky - Korsakov's Scheherazade Suite.

On next Saturday evening, Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto. Erich Leinsdorf conducts. His program also includes Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and Strauss's Also Sprach Zarathustra.

On Sunday afternoon, August 11, Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto, again with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The program is all -Brahms. The other works are the Tragic Overture and the Variation on a Theme by Haydn.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, August 9, 1968

Gina Bachauer at Tanglewood

GINA BACHAUER

LENOX, Massachusetts — Gina Bachauer will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in each of this weekend's concerts, playing treee concertos, two by Rachmaninoff and one Brahms. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, noted today that while other soloists have appeared more than once on a single Tanglewood season, this was the first time one artist had been the only weekend soloist, appearing three times.

Tonight at 9, Miss Bachauer will play the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto as part of an all-Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Wilson, making his first Tanglewood appearance of the season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also director of the Berkshire Chorus and head of vocal music activities of the Berkshire Music Center. In addition to the Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to Ruslan and Ludmila, and Rimsky Korsakov's "Sheherazade Suite."

Tomorrow at 8:30 p.m., Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto. Eric Leinsdorf conducts. His program also includes Wagners "Siegrfried Idyll" and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra.'

Sunday afternoon, Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto again with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The program is all-Brahms. The other works are the "Tragic Overture' and the "Variations on a Theme" by Haydn.

The Weekend Prelude tonight at 7 is a choral program by the Berkshire Boy Choir. The Sunday morning chamber-music concert will be played by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players as the concludng event of the 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

58

Sixth Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 9 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

BERKSHIRE BOY CHOIR
BRIAN RUNNETT Music Director
LOWELL LACEY organ

POULENC	Timor et tremor venerunt super me (1939)
BRUCKNER	Christus factus est pro nobis obediens
PINKHAM	Wedding cantata
BRITTEN	Missa brevis for boys' voices and organ op. 63
DEBUSSY	Trois chansons de Charles d'Orléans Dieu! qu'il la fait bon regarder Quant j'ai ouy le tabourin Yver, vous n'estes qu'un villain

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

The BERKSHIRE BOY CHOIR makes its second appearance at the Festival this weekend. Founded in 1967, it has already established itself as one of the outstanding musical organizations of the United States. The members, who are selected by audition on a competitive basis, come from as far afield as Portland, Oregon, Washington, DC and Canada. The Music Director, BRIAN RUNNETT, is Organist and Master of the Choristers at Norwich Cathedral, England, and is a distinguished chorus master and recitalist. During its eight-week season this summer, the Choir has sung at the Festivals at Hartford and Saratoga, at the University of Rhode Island, Castle Hill, Rutgers University, Syracuse University, and in Washington, DC, among other appearances. They will perform next week at Lincoln Center.

Boy Choir Sings

The Berkshire Boy Choir, which sang six pieces for the 7 p. m. prelude and is based at the Stockbridge School down the road from Tanglewood, is in its second summer of existence.

It is made up of 14 paid adult choices and 46 boys from choirs all over the country. It is supported by contributions.

Last summer it sounded fine. Friday it sounded first class . . . clean, exact, dynamically nimble, tonally balanced and unusually precise with its diction.

It gave evidence of thorough discipline under tasteful coaching. The director is Brian Runnett, master of the choristers at Norwich Cathedral, England.

Most impressive, perhaps, on the program were Bruckner's "Christus Factus Est Pro Nobis Obediens" and a motet for three choirs written by Thomas Tomkins and sung as an encore. Other composers represented were Poulenc, Pinkham, Britten and Debussy.

Springfield Union 8-10-68

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

First for Tanglewood

Gina Bachauer to Play Three Concerts in Single Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Gina Bachauer, pianist, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in each of its fifth weekend concerts, playing three concrtos, two Rachmaninoff and one Brahms.

First for Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, noted that while other soloists have appeared more than once in a single Tanglewood season, this will be the first time one artist has been the only weekend soloist, appearing three times.

* * *

On Friday, Miss Bachauer will play the Rachmanioff Third Concerto as part of an all - Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Wilson, making his first Tanglewood appearance of the season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also director of the Berkshire Chorus and head of vocal music activities of the Berkshire Music Center. In addition to the Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to Ruslan and Ludmila, and Rimsky - Korsakov's Sheherazade Suite.

GINA BACHAUER

* * *

On Saturday evening, Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto. Erich Leinsdorf conducts. His program also includes Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and Strauss's Also Sprach Zarathustra.

* * *

Sunday afternoon Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto, again with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The program is all - Brahms. The other works are the Tragic Overture and the Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

* * *

The Weekend Prelude of Friday is a choral program by the Berkshire Boy Choir. The Sunday morning chamber music concert will be played by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players as the concluding event of the 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Gina Bachauer To Appear At Berkshire Festival Concerts

Gina Bachauer will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in all three concerts of the Berkshire Festival's fifth weekend, at Tanglewood, Lenox, starting Aug. 9.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, noted this is the first time one artist will be the only weekend soloist. On Friday, Aug. 9, Miss Bachauer will play the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto as part of an all-Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition to Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmila," and Rimsky - Korsakov's "Sheherazade" suite.

Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto with Erich Leinsdorf conducting Saturday, Aug. 10. His program also includes Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto, again with Leinsdorf conducting, on Sunday, afternoon, Aug. 11. The program is all Brahms and includes the Tragic Overture and the Variations on the Theme of Haydn.

The Sunday morning chamber music concert will be played by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players as the concluding event of the 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, August 9, 1968

Gina Bachauer Set As Tanglewood Soloist

Gina Bachauer will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in each of its concerts next weekend, playing three concertos, two Rachmaninoff and one Brahms. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Orchestras, noted this was the first time one artist had been the only weekend soloist.

Next Friday, Miss Bauchauer will play the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto as part of an all - Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson. In addition to the Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to Russlan and Ludmila, and Rimsky - Korsakov's Scheherazade Suite.

On next Saturday evening, Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto. Erich Leinsdorf conducts. His program also includes Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and Strauss's Also Sprach Zarathustra.

On Sunday afternoon, August 11, Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto, again with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The program is all -Brahms. The other works are the Tragic Overture and the Variation on a Theme by Haydn.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Summer time Aug 8

GINA BACHAUER . . . pianist, who will be featured in all three Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the weekend August 9-11 at Tanglewood. She will play Rachmaninoff's Piano Concertos no. 3 and no. 2, and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat.

The Weekend at Tanglewood

A romantic and colorful musical bill of fare has been prepared for listeners at Tanglewood this weekend. Friday evening the Berkshire Boy Choir will offer a seraphic prelude at 7 for preconcert picnickers. At 9 Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will direct an all - Russian program which includes Glinka's Ruslan and Ludmila; Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherezade and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto, No. 3 featuring Gina Bachauer, pianist.

Mme Bachauer will play Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto at the 8 p.m. concert Saturday. Other compositions included in this concert will be Also Sprach Zarathustra by Strauss and excerpts from L'Arlesienne by Bizet. Erich Leinsdorf will be the conductor.

Director Leinsdorf will again hold the baton Sunday afternoon for the all-Brahms program at 2:30. Selections will include the Tragic Overture; Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Three Hungarian Dances; and Piano Concerto No. 2 featuring Mme. Bachauer.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN & Union
SPRINGFIELD, MASS. 8-4-68
CIRC. 115,950

AUG 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Gina Bachauer at Tanglewood

GINA BACHAUER

LENOX, Massachusetts — Gina Bachauer will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in each of this weekend's concerts, playing treee concertos, two by Rachmaninoff and one Brahms. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, noted today that while other soloists have appeared more than once on a single Tanglewood season, this was the first time one artist had been the only weekend soloist, appearing three times.

Tonight at 9, Miss Bachauer will play the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto as part of an all-Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Wilson, making his first Tanglewood appearance of the season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also director of the Berkshire Chorus and head of vocal music activities of the Berkshire Music Center. In addition to the Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to Ruslan and Ludmila, and Rimsky Korsakov's "Sheherazade Suite."

Tomorrow at 8:30 p.m., Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto. Eric Leinsdorf conducts. His program also includes Wagners "Siegrfried Idyll" and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra.'

Sunday afternoon, Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto again with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The program is all-Brahms. The other works are the "Tragic Overture' and the "Variations on a Theme" by Haydn.

The Weekend Prelude tonight at 7 is a choral program by the Berkshire Boy Choir. The Sunday morning chamber-music concert will be played by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players as the concludng event of the 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

4141 SCHENECTADY GAZETTE

Boston Symphony Tops at Tanglewood

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

The Boston Symphony Orchestra really made great music at Tanglewood Friday night. Under the baton of Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson, the orchestra proved that even a thrice-familiar program can be delivered in a wholly convincing manner.

* * *

Wilson's excellent artistic direction and thorough technique were the crucial factors in this dramatic demonstration, of course. His command of the score seemed very complete, and he appeared to inspire in the musicians a special kind of confidence. Performances directed in such a manner cannot fail to be emotionally uplifting and technically stimulating.

You could feel this right from the start with Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" overture. Not only was the sense of precision a major achievement, but it had that undefinable quotient of artistic-emotional energy that tells you the music isn't just being played, it's being created right there in front of you. The wonderful, fast tempo may have helped hit the spot, but it was never allowed to become an end in itself.

* * *

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sheherazade" followed, and here again that extra something was clearly evident in the way the music was played. Granted, the ensemble was less than perfect, but the few intonation problems (especially in the horns) were not enough to dispel the artistic contributions by a remarkably responsive orchestra. As soloists, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, Cellist Jules Eskin, Oboist Ralph Gomberg, Clarinetist Gino Cioffi, and Flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer gave sensitive accounts of their spotlighted roles while the rest of the orchestra backed them up with a good, firm sound.

The first and second movements were very fine, but the third movement was magnificent. Wilson and the BSO played this music with such genuine feeling that it made me wonder how another major orchestra can become so detached and uncommitted in their own performances. The fourth movement was its usual exciting self, and with the aid of a great percussion section this excitement was indescribably multiplied.

* * *

Everywhere I walked (during intermission and following the concert) could be heard the concertgoers talking about how great things sounded. Charles Wilson's Tanglewood conducting debut augers well for the future.

After intermission was a single work, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, with Gina Bachauer as soloist. Miss Bachauer's playing was the only disappointment of the evening, for it lacked presence. She can hit all the notes, that's for sure, but the Rachmaninoff concerti require an unusually strong pianist capable of delivering huge hunks of sound (if only in self-defense against a sonorous orchestra). This Miss Bachauer cannot do. She did become a bit louder as the work progressed, but then there was nothing in reserve for the more imposing solo passages. Too bad. Wilson gave a sterling accompaniment.

Saturday evening at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium for three works, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2. The Wagner opened the concert, and Leinsdorf's interpretation can only be described as perfect in every detail. The intimacy and chamber-music textures he elicited were just so delicate and beautiful that this performance will long be remembered by me as the one to which all others must be compared. The opening was tenderness personified, and as the work unfolded Leinsdorf's reading became ever more touchingly sentimental. At those happy trumpet notes (played magnificently by Armando Ghitalla) it seemed impossible that the music could sound any better, but with the closing pages came the most peaceful and ecstatic moments of all. Leinsdorf achieved here such a profoundly noble sound that he actually defined (in musical terms, of mourse) what Love means. Truly the finest we've heard from the conductor all season.

* * *

Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was next, and the performance may best be described as uneven. The opening sunrise was simply brilliant, as was much of what followed, but the orchestra continued to break down in spots by missing entrances or losing their intonation. Leinsdorf underplayed the horns until the second half of the piece, which hurt the first half somewhat. He also underplayed the tubas, which was a disappointing surprise.

The most well-done sections were found after the "Of Science." "The Convalescent" was the best, with the waltzing "Dance Song" similarly good. The "Song of the Night Wanderer" was excellent, and was great to hear that first bell-clap for a change, which too-often gets lost in the cataclysmic orchestral forces it ushers in. Leinsdorf did well with the B Major conclusion, bringing Strauss' subtle harmonic distinction between Nature and Man (respectively C major and B major) to the fore. Amazing how these two fundamental elements cannot be harmonized . . . amazing, too, how the deep C major has the last word in Strauss' epic philosophical description of the origin and development of Mankind.

* * *

The post-intermission work was Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, again with Miss Bachauer as soloist. Regrettably, her tone did not carry Saturday evening, either. She played the solo part less well this time, too, emphasizing the continuity but ignoring the little shadings that are so essential to Rachmaninoff.

Andre Watts has an exceptional way with the second concerto, and should be asked to play it sometime. The conductor and orchestra contributed a soaring accompaniment that was as notable for its craftsmanship as its sensitivity.

Mme. Bachauer, Pianist, In Tanglewood Debut

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Tanglewood — The opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festivals sixth weekend brought a standing ovation for pianist Gina Bachauer from an audience of 5,697.

Mme. Bachauer played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time last season, in Boston. Friday night was her Tanglewood debut.

Friday night's performance of Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto was the start of what she calls a "marathon." Last night she played Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, and this afternoon it's the Brahms Second, the last two conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Assistant Conductor

Charles Wilson conducted Friday night. He's the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor. This is by no means a reflection on his ability. But merely identifies his official status.

The weekend prelude on Friday night was given by the 58 voice Berkshire Boy Choir. The 46 youngsters, ages nine to 13, were assisted by 12 adult male voices.

They were directed by Brian Runnett, with Lowell Lacey as organ accompanist.

Two Worcester lads were among them, Michael Loftus and John Vescera, both of St. Peter's Choir School.

Rare Reception

Such receptions are rare as Mme. Bachauer received on Friday night. After repeated curtain calls, she finally appeased the audience by playing Rameau Minuet as an encore.

Perhaps the best clue to Mme. Bachauer's magnetism lies in this choice for an encore. It's a pastel-like work of flight body structure and singing lyricism. It stands on its musical vaue, without eclat.

Mme. Bachauer played the original version of the Rachmaninoff Third which enlarges on its structural scope at the expense of compact brilliance.

Every tone sang and occupied its exact position and purpose in the phrase pattern. In the first movement, the orchestra was occasionally allowed to trespass on solo territory, but in every other respect sensitive relationships were maintained.

Throughout the work, Mme. Bachauer played as a beautiful technician of deepset poetry. She made a brilliant matter of the two sizzling cadenzas without resorting to digital or physical histrionics.

Crisp Tone Production

It was clear, crisp tone production, interspersed with big sonorities and light crystaline passages. The brief choral midway in the finale was a richly-voiced unit that led to a sweeping, rhapsodic close.

Wilson was an attractive, highly efficient conductor whose cues were prompt and pointed.

He conducted an abosrbing performance of Rimsky Korsakoff's "Sheherazade." An opening blotch in cellos was soon forgotten when the work got underway in earnest. Concert Master Joseph Silverstein's violin solos were superb.

Strings produced rich, lustrous sounds. Brasses cut through the mixtures brilliantly.

Although the program did not identify the four movements, it was the standard version.

Undemonstrative Style

Wilson's undemonstrative style exerted no curtailment of the work's dramatic magnitude. He was as mindful and attentive to sentimental areas in the "Prince and The Princess" and "Tale of the Kalendar Prince."

A lot of excitement was generated in the "Festival at Bagdad" setting the stage for huge crashes, tricky rhythms and avalanches of sound that depict the wrecking of Sinbad's ship.

Wilson conducted the "Russian and Ludmill" overture by Glinka at top speed giving a feeling of haste without disrupting accuracy or quality.

Earlier in the evening, the Berkshire Choir sang exacting repertory with impressive authority. Even the youngest boys seemed to react confidently to their texts and direction.

They were heard in choruses by Poulenc, Bruckner, Pinkham, Britten and Debussy. Their encore was Tomkins' 12 part motet, "O Praise the Lord."

Except for a slight stridency in soprano voices and a tendency to flat when volume was forced. Quality and mechanics were admirably presented.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
AUG 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Plans Russian Program; Bachauer Soloist

Gina Bachauer will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox in each of its fifth weekend concerts, playing three concertos, two Rachmaninoff and one Brahms.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, noted today that while other soloists have appeared more than once in a single Tanglewood season, this was the first time one artist had been the only weekend soloist, appearing three times.

Tonight, Miss Bachauer will play the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto as part of an all-Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Wilson, making his first Tanglewood appearance of the season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also director of the Berkshire Chorus and head of the Vocal Music Activities of the Berkshire Music Center. In addition to the Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to Ruslan and Ludmila, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Sheherazade Suite.

Saturday evening, Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto. Erich Leinsdorf conducts. His program also includes Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and Strauss' Also Sprach Zarathustra.

Sunday afternoon, Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto, again with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The program is all-Brahms. The other work is Brahms Second Symphony.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
AUG 9 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 9 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

CHARLES WILSON conductor

GLINKA	Overture to 'Russlan and Ludmila'
RIMSKY-KORSAKOV	Sheherazade op. 35
intermission
RACHMANINOV	Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor op. 30*
	Allegro ma non tanto
	Intermezzo: adagio
	Finale
	GINA BACHAUER

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 22

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct an all-Russian concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening. The program will include works by Glinka, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Rachmaninoff at Tanglewood in Lenox.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250
AUG 7 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts . . . . Gina Bachauer, pianist, will be featured in all three Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the weekend August 9-11.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 111,000
AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Tops at Tanglewood

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

The Boston Symphony Orchestra really made great music at Tanglewood Friday night. Under the baton of Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson, the orchestra proved that even a thrice-familiar program can be delivered in a wholly convincing manner.

* * *

Wilson's excellent artistic direction and thorough technique were the crucial factors in this dramatic demonstration, of course. His command of the score seemed very complete, and he appeared to inspire in the musicians a special kind of confidence. Performances directed in such a manner cannot fail to be emotionally uplifting and technically stimulating.

You could feel this right from the start with Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" overture. Not only was the sense of precision a major achievement, but it had that undefinable quotient of artistic-emotional energy that tells you the music isn't just being played, it's being created right there in front of you. The wonderful, fast tempo may have helped hit the spot, but it was never allowed to become an end in itself.

* * *

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sheherazade" followed, and here again that extra something was clearly evident in the way the music was played. Granted, the ensemble was less than perfect, but the few intonation problems (especially in the horns) were not enough to dispel the artistic contributions by a remarkably responsive orchestra. As soloists, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, Cellist Jules Eskin, Oboist Ralph Gomberg, Clarinetist Gino Cioffi, and Flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer gave sensitive accounts of their spotlighted roles while the rest of the orchestra backed them up with a good, firm sound.

The first and second movements were very fine, but the third movement was magnificent. Wilson and the BSO played this music with such genuine feeling that it made me wonder how another major orchestra can become so detached and uncommitted in their own performances. The fourth movement was its usual exciting self, and with the aid of a great percussion section this excitement was indescribably multiplied.

* * *

Everywhere I walked (during intermission and following the concert) could be heard the concertgoers talking about how great things sounded. Charles Wilson's Tanglewood conducting debut augers well for the future.

After intermission was a single work, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, with Gina Bachauer as soloist. Miss Bachauer's playing was the only disappointment of the evening, for it lacked presence. She can hit all the notes, that's for sure, but the Rachmaninoff concerti require an unusually strong pianist capable of delivering huge hunks of sound (if only in self-defense against a sonorous orchestra). This Miss Bachauer cannot do. She did become a bit louder as the work progressed, but then there was nothing in reserve for the more imposing solo passages. Too bad. Wilson gave a sterling accompaniment.

Saturday evening at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium for three works, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2. The Wagner opened the concert, and Leinsdorf's interpretation can only be described as perfect in every detail. The intimacy and chamber-music textures he elicited were just so delicate and beautiful that this performance will long be remembered by me as the one to which all others must be compared. The opening was tenderness personified, and as the work unfolded Leinsdorf's reading became ever more touchingly sentimental. At those happy trumpet notes (played magnificently by Armando Ghitalla) it seemed impossible that the music could sound any better, but with the closing pages came the most peaceful and ecstatic moments of all. Leinsdorf achieved here such a profoundly noble sound that he actually defined (in musical terms, of mourse) what Love means. Truly the finest we've heard from the conductor all season.

* * *

Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was next, and the performance may best be described as uneven. The opening sunrise was simply brilliant, as was much of what followed, but the orchestra continued to break down in spots by missing entrances or losing their intonation. Leinsdorf underplayed the horns until the second half of the piece, which hurt the first half somewhat. He also underplayed the tubas, which was a disappointing surprise.

The most well-done sections were found after the "Of Science." "The Convalescent" was the best, with the waltzing "Dance Song" similarly good. The "Song of the Night Wanderer" was excellent, and was great to hear that first bell-clap for a change, which too-often gets lost in the cataclysmic orchestral forces it ushers in. Leinsdorf did well with the B Major conclusion, bringing Strauss' subtle harmonic distinction between Nature and Man (respectively C major and B major) to the fore. Amazing how these two fundamental elements cannot be harmonized . . . amazing, too, how the deep C major has the last word in Strauss' epic philosophical description of the origin and development of Mankind.

* * *

The post-intermission work was Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, again with Miss Bachauer as soloist. Regrettably, her tone did not carry Saturday evening, either. She played the solo part less well this time, too, emphasizing the continuity but ignoring the little shadings that are so essential to Rachmaninoff.

Andre Watts has an exceptional way with the second concerto, and should be asked to play it sometime. The conductor and orchestra contributed a soaring accompaniment that was as notable for its craftsmanship as its sensitivity.

Mme. Bachauer, Pianist, In Tanglewood Debut

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Tanglewood — The opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festivals sixth weekend brought a standing ovation for pianist Gina Bachauer from an audience of 5,697.

Mme. Bachauer played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time last season, in Boston. Friday night was her Tanglewood debut.

Friday night's performance of Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto was the start of what she calls a "marathon." Last night she played Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, and this afternoon it's the Brahms Second, the last two conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Assistant Conductor

Charles Wilson conducted Friday night. He's the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor. This is by no means a reflection on his ability. But merely identifies his official status.

The weekend prelude on Friday night was given by the 58 voice Berkshire Boy Choir. The 46 youngsters, ages nine to 13, were assisted by 12 adult male voices.

They were directed by Brian Runnett, with Lowell Lacey as organ accompanist.

Two Worcester lads were among them, Michael Loftus and John Vescera, both of St. Peter's Choir School.

Rare Reception

Such receptions are rare as Mme. Bachauer received on Friday night. After repeated curtain calls, she finally appeased the audience by playing Rameau Minuet as an encore.

Perhaps the best clue to Mme. Bachauer's magnetism lies in this choice for an encore. It's a pastel-like work of flight body structure and singing lyricism. It stands on its musical vaue, without eclat.

Mme. Bachauer played the original version of the Rachmaninoff Third which enlarges on its structural scope at the expense of compact brilliance.

Every tone sang and occupied its exact position and purpose in the phrase pattern. In the first movement, the orchestra was occasionally allowed to trespass on solo territory, but in every other respect sensitive relationships were maintained.

Throughout the work, Mme. Bachauer played as a beautiful technician of deepset poetry. She made a brilliant matter of the two sizzling cadenzas without resorting to digital or physical histrionics.

Crisp Tone Production

It was clear, crisp tone production, interspersed with big sonorities and light crystaline passages. The brief choral midway in the finale was a richly-voiced unit that led to a sweeping, rhapsodic close.

Wilson was an attractive, highly efficient conductor whose cues were prompt and pointed.

He conducted an abosrbing performance of Rimsky Korsakoff's "Sheherazade." An opening blotch in cellos was soon forgotten when the work got underway in earnest. Concert Master Joseph Silverstein's violin solos were superb.

Strings produced rich, lustrous sounds. Brasses cut through the mixtures brilliantly.

Although the program did not identify the four movements, it was the standard version.

Undemonstrative Style

Wilson's undemonstrative style exerted no curtailment of the work's dramatic magnitude. He was as mindful and attentive to sentimental areas in the "Prince and The Princess" and "Tale of the Kalendar Prince."

A lot of excitement was generated in the "Festival at Bagdad" setting the stage for huge crashes, tricky rhythms and avalanches of sound that depict the wrecking of Sinbad's ship.

Wilson conducted the "Russian and Ludmill" overture by Glinka at top speed giving a feeling of haste without disrupting accuracy or quality.

Earlier in the evening, the Berkshire Choir sang exacting repertory with impressive authority. Even the youngest boys seemed to react confidently to their texts and direction.

They were heard in choruses by Poulenc, Bruckner, Pinkham, Britten and Debussy. Their encore was Tomkins' 12 part motet, "O Praise the Lord."

Except for a slight stridency in soprano voices and a tendency to flat when volume was forced. Quality and mechanics were admirably presented.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
AUG 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Plans Russian Program; Bachauer Soloist

Gina Bachauer will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox in each of its fifth weekend concerts, playing three concertos, two Rachmaninoff and one Brahms.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, noted today that while other soloists have appeared more than once in a single Tanglewood season, this was the first time one artist had been the only weekend soloist, appearing three times.

Tonight, Miss Bachauer will play the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto as part of an all-Russian program under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Wilson, making his first Tanglewood appearance of the season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is also director of the Berkshire Chorus and head of the Vocal Music Activities of the Berkshire Music Center. In addition to the Rachmaninoff, the program includes Glinka's Overture to Ruslan and Ludmila, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Sheherazade Suite.

Saturday evening, Miss Bachauer plays the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto. Erich Leinsdorf conducts. His program also includes Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and Strauss' Also Sprach Zarathustra.

Sunday afternoon, Miss Bachauer plays the Brahms Second Concerto, again with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The program is all-Brahms. The other work is Brahms Second Symphony.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
AUG 9 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 9 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

CHARLES WILSON conductor

GLINKA	Overture to 'Russlan and Ludmila'
RIMSKY-KORSAKOV	Sheherazade op. 35
intermission
RACHMANINOV	Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor op. 30*
	Allegro ma non tanto
	Intermezzo: adagio
	Finale
	GINA BACHAUER

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 22

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct an all-Russian concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening. The program will include works by Glinka, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Rachmaninoff at Tanglewood in Lenox.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,059
AUG 7 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts . . . . Gina Bachauer, pianist, will be featured in all three Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the weekend August 9-11.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 111,000
AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

60.

5697 at Tanglewood Hear Gina Bachauer

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Gina Bachauer, who has been known on occasion, to overpower the keyboard, had nothing but motherly love to offer Rachmaninov and the 5697 listners at Tanglewood Friday night.

Wilson on Podium

She played the solo part for that composer's Piano Concerto No. 3 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, on the podium.

She played it with a warm, enveloping benevolence. She seemed to embrace it with her housewifely, ample personality. The sound was round and soft, like her.

All the thousands of notes were there, of course. She is a consummate technician. Her fingers were almost machine-like in their accuracy, and Rachmaninov demands a lavish dexterity from those who dare to play his romances.

Generous, Bountiful

But Miss Bachauer made no attempt to dazzle us with glittering pianowork. On the contrary, she captured us with generous and bountiful music.

The audience liked her so much they kept calling her back until she played an encore, a minuet by Rameau.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sherherazade," which followed Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmila" before intermission, is not much more substantial nor less popular than that overture, but it certainly is longer.

The piece, as nearly everyone knows, is very colorful, orchestrally, and full of appealing melodies. For that reason it has sold just about as many records as any other semi - serious piece.

It Is Long

It is, however, if I may repeat, long. It is long because it seems long, and it seems long because it is insubstantial.

Wilson conducted it seriously, that is, without too much exaggeration, which was a blessing, because the piece has enough smaltz all by itself without pouring on more.

One nice thing about it, aside from those undulating melodies, is the opportunity ot offers members of the orchestra to present short solo passages, thereby rising up momentarily for special notice. They were invariably pleasing Friday.

Boy Choir Sings

The Berkshire Boy Choir, which sang six pieces for the 7 p. m. prelude and is based at the Stockbridge School down the road from Tanglewood, is in its second summer of existence.

It is made up of 14 paid adult choices and 46 boys from choirs all over the country. It is supported by contributions.

Last summer it sounded fine. Friday it sounded first class . . . clean, exact, dynamically nimble, tonally balanced and unusually precise with its diction.

It gave evidence of thorough discipline under tasteful coaching. The director is Brian Runnett, master of the choristers at Norwich Cathedral, England.

Most impressive, perhaps, on the program were Bruckner's "Christus Factus Est Pro Nobis Obediens" and a motet for three choirs written by Thomas Tomkins and sung as an encore. Other composers represented were Poulenc, Pinkham, Britten and Debussy.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,434

AUG 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 10, 1968

047

Gina Bachauer At Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

Gina Bachauer made her first appearance at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood last night, playing the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 3 in D minor for piano and orchestra.

★ ★ ★

The debut was a smashing success as the large and more than enthusiastic audience gave her an ovation at the conclusion of the concerto, refusing to leave until an encore was played, a thing not usually done at symphony concerts.

This concerto is considered to be the best of the four that Rachmaninoff composed, and has the reputation of being one of the most difficult in the piano literature.

★ ★ ★

While Miss Bachauer has ample sweep and power in her playing, she emphasized the more lyric sections, giving a somewhat different interpretation than the conventional reading.

Her tone was beautiful, the phrasing masterly, the technique fluent and brilliant. A musical thrill was provided by Miss Bachauer' ability to keep the piano to the fore in the exhilarating final movement, as here the piano must ride atop the orchestra to be effective. This was romantic playing in the best style.

★ ★ ★

The conductor was Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, who began the concert with a lively reading of the Overture to "Russlan and Ludmila" by Glinka.

The Symphonic Suite "Sheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakov was the other piece on this all Russian program. While this is one of the more familiar classics, it was a pleasure to hear it played by a major orchestra. The composer was one of the greatest masters of orchestration, and this piece gives every section of the orchestra a chance t come to the fore.

★ ★ ★

Charles Wilson was a most meticulous conductor in this work. Every entrance was clean, and the precision was outstanding, no matter how complicated the rhythms or rapid the tempo.

The violin solos in the suite were superbly played by Joseph Silverstein. In fact all sections of the orchestra did a virtuoso job on a virtuoso piece.

★ ★ ★

Gina Bachauer will be heard Saturday night in the Rachmaninoff concerto No. 2 in C minor, and on Sunday afternoon in the Brahms Concerto No. 2 in B Flat.

Music Review

Bachauer at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SIXTH WEEKEND of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood had a novel feature which delighted each of the audiences at the three major concerts. The celebrated Greek pianist Gina Bachauer appeared on each program as soloist; in a Rachmaninoff on Friday and Saturday evenings and the B Flat Brahms yesterday afternoon. She was tendered an ovation at all three concerts and well deserved them.

* * *

ANOTHER INNOVATION of the weekend was the manner in which Leinsdorf played the Siegfried Idyll on Saturday night. Wagner composed this justly famous love song for the 33rd birthday of his wife Cosima, who was born at Bellagio on Lake Como on Christmas Day in 1837 while her parents, Franz Liszt and the Countess d'Agoult, happened to be making an extended sejour. Wagner brought a company of musicians to the staircase of his villa Tribschen and early in the morning awakened his wife with the jewel-like matin.

* * *

IT IS WRITTEN for orchestra. Leinsdorf altered the balance of participants by having only the principals of the string sections play the opening phrase, then engaging their deskmates and a second desk as the narrative proceeds and finally employing the full strength of his forces. In certain situations, he reverted to reduced sections and to soloists with decidedly admirable effect.

The all-Brahms program yesterday was devoted to the Second Piano Concerto and the Second Symphony. A performance such as Leinsdorf and his peerless orchestra turn in when, as they were yesterday, in their best fettle is like an exhibition of a masterpiece in a gallery. The years which the conductor and the musicians have devoted to the polish and the acquisition of tradition and distillation of refinement give but a fleeting glimpse, but it establishes a firm criterion and engraves a lasting impression.

Whitestone

Pianist Gina Bachauer, the only soloist who ever performed for a full weekend of concerts at Tanglewood, is brought forward for the plaudits of the audience by conductor Erich Leinsdorf after the Sunday concert.

* * *

LEINSDORF'S MAJOR orchestral portion Saturday night was the Strauss tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This massive romance—massive in conception and in orchestral demands—was played with all-out dramatic effects and colorful contrasts. There is no more apt a vehicle to reveal the virtuosity of the Boston orchestra, and the performance reached the peak of moving and exciting incandescence. Strauss distributes solo assignments all around the orchestra. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein had the greatest share, as he had on the previous evening in the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Sheherazade," and he discharged them with superb mastery. His tone from the depths of the G string to the apogee of the chanterelle was pure gold.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, was given an opportunity to make his Tanglewood debut. He made a distinctly favorable impression in an all-Russian program: Glinka, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Rachmaninoff.

Glinka's overture "Russlan and Ludmila" and Rimsky's "Scheherazade" are unfailing crowd-pleasers and Wilson's manner and authority compounded their intrinsic appeal. He is both at ease and vigorous. He has had considerable experience in opera pits, but his orchestral capacity is no less estimable. His baton technic is natural and assertive.

* * *

ONE OF THE factors of a conductor's responsibility not readily visible is his choice of tempos. Wilson didn't spare the horses in his Glinka, but was less in a hurry in his Arabian Nights tale. The Boston orchestra played for him with their consummate potential, despite a logy humidity which raised havoc with strings.

Wilson was not convincing, however, in his tonal balance, allowing some voices to become more prominent than the message seemed to suggest. He might well have taken a leaf from his soloist's book and emulated the remarkable delineation of phrases Miss Bachauer sketched, never for an instant leaving any doubt where a line or a verse of poetry began or ended.

* * *

MISS BACHAUER gave a cachet of validity to all the concertos she played. The Rachmaninoff Third Piano Concerto Friday night has not quite the popular charm of the Second which she played Saturday. Furthermore, all three of her vehicles are of near-symphonic proportions in the orchestral accompaniment and neither Wilson nor Leinsdorf took complete account of their soloist's dynamic potential, with the result that many of Rachmaninoff's (and Miss Bachauer's) arpeggios were absorbed into the stringed woodwork.

Her technic is abundantly adequate to any and all demands in the concertos and she plays with easy conviction. Most persuasive is her grasp of phrasing. The clarity she exposes in her nuances and the inflections by which she establishes poetic significance are marks of her artistic personality only rarely encountered. One missed occasionally a dominance of the keyboard over the total background. This debit should not be assigned totally to her, however.

Official attendance figures of 5,697, 7,863 and 9,358 on the three successive days were made public by the management.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 16,238

AUG 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Tops at Tanglewood

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

The Boston Symphony Orchestra really made great music at Tanglewood Friday night. Under the baton of Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson, the orchestra proved that even a thrice-familiar program can be delivered in a wholly convincing manner.

* * *

Wilson's excellent artistic direction and thorough technique were the crucial factors in this dramatic demonstration, of course. His command of the score seemed very complete, and he appeared to inspire in the musicians a special kind of confidence. Performances directed in such a manner cannot fail to be emotionally uplifting and technically stimulating.

You could feel this right from the start with Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" overture. Not only was the sense of precision a major achievement, but it had that undefinable quotient of artistic-emotional energy that tells you the music isn't just being played, it's being created right there in front of you. The wonderful, fast tempo may have helped hit the spot, but it was never allowed to become an end in itself.

* * *

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sheherazade" followed, and here again that extra something was clearly evident in the way the music was played. Granted, the ensemble was less than perfect, but the few intonation problems (especially in the horns) were not enough to dispel the artistic contributions by a remarkably responsive orchestra. As soloists, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, Cellist Jules Eskin, Oboist Ralph Gomberg, Clarinetist Gino Cioffi, and Flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer gave sensitive accounts of their spotlighted roles while the rest of the orchestra backed them up with a good, firm sound.

The first and second movements were very fine, but the third movement was magnificent. Wilson and the BSO played this music with such genuine feeling that it made me wonder how another major orchestra can become so detached and uncommitted in their own performances. The fourth movement was its usual exciting self, and with the aid of a great percussion section this excitement was indescribably multiplied.

* * *

Everywhere I walked (during intermission and following the concert) could be heard the concertgoers talking about how great things sounded. Charles Wilson's Tanglewood conducting debut augers well for the future.

After intermission was a single work, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, with Gina Bachauer as soloist. Miss Bachauer's playing was the only disappointment of the evening, for it lacked presence. She can hit all the notes, that's for sure, but the Rachmaninoff concerti require an unusually strong pianist capable of delivering huge hunks of sound (if only in self-defense against a sonorous orchestra). This Miss Bachauer cannot do. She did become a bit louder as the work progressed, but then there was nothing in reserve for the more imposing solo passages. Too bad. Wilson gave a sterling accompaniment.

Saturday evening at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium for three works, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2. The Wagner opened the concert, and Leinsdorf's interpretation can only be described as perfect in every detail. The intimacy and chamber-music textures he elicited were just so delicate and beautiful that this performance will long be remembered by me as the one to which all others must be compared. The opening was tenderness personified, and as the work unfolded Leinsdorf's reading became ever more touchingly sentimental. At those happy trumpet notes (played magnificently by Armando Ghitalla) it seemed impossible that the music could sound any better, but with the closing pages came the most peaceful and ecstatic moments of all. Leinsdorf achieved here such a profoundly noble sound that he actually defined (in musical terms, of mourse) what Love means. Truly the finest we've heard from the conductor all season.

* * *

Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was next, and the performance may best be described as uneven. The opening sunrise was simply brilliant, as was much of what followed, but the orchestra continued to break down in spots by missing entrances or losing their intonation. Leinsdorf underplayed the horns until the second half of the piece, which hurt the first half somewhat. He also underplayed the tubas, which was a disappointing surprise.

The most well-done sections were found after the "Of Science." "The Convalescent" was the best, with the waltzing "Dance Song" similarly good. The "Song of the Night Wanderer" was excellent, and was great to hear that first bell-clap for a change, which too-often gets lost in the cataclysmic orchestral forces it ushers in. Leinsdorf did well with the B Major conclusion, bringing Strauss' subtle harmonic distinction between Nature and Man (respectively C major and B major) to the fore. Amazing how these two fundamental elements cannot be harmonized . . . amazing, too, how the deep C major has the last word in Strauss' epic philosophical description of the origin and development of Mankind.

* * *

The post-intermission work was Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, again with Miss Bachauer as soloist. Regrettably, her tone did not carry Saturday evening, either. She played the solo part less well this time, too, emphasizing the continuity but ignoring the little shadings that are so essential to Rachmaninoff.

Andre Watts has an exceptional way with the second concerto, and should be asked to play it sometime. The conductor and orchestra contributed a soaring accompaniment that was as notable for its craftsmanship as its sensitivity.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

AUG 12 1968

Gina Bachauer Thrills Audience At Tanglewood

With but two more weekend concerts to go, to finish off a superlative season at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Berkshire Music Festival, featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opinions are gathering in both camps, of sorrow and anticipation. Sorrow that this is the final Tanglewood summer school and Berkshire Festival to be under the musical direction of Erich Leinsdorf, beloved conductor of the Boston symphony, and anticipation that the 1969-70 season will be in the capable hands of William Steinberg, long established as the conductor of the famed Pittsburgh symphony.

The program of the recent weekend, featuring Gina Bachauer, gifted musician who presided at the pianaforte for three consecutive days will go in the annals of music history among the Berkshire Hills as a momentous weekend. This reviewer was unable to hear her opening night's program, the third piano concerto of Rachmaninov; from reports the winds and the rain paid havoc with the beautiful grounds which surround the music shed, but did nothing to dampen the spirit and enthusiasm of the audience.

Her second appearance, on the evening of Aug. 10, when her program took the entire second half of the evening, consisted of Rachmaninov's Second piano concerto. On Sunday, on an all-Brahms program, which featured also the Brahms Second symphony, her program consisted of the second piano concerto.

There is so much to be said about this fine artist. Reminiscent of the grande dames of the European music world, in character, dress and person, in a fashion, the pages of history turned back to another world and day. The piano and the artist were as one; the love of the artist for the instrument was beyond compare; the technique was flawless — and the execution breath-taking. Never have I seen a more graceful movement of the arms and hands fleeting over the keys and through the air like some soft waves from both a gentle breeze and a torrential gale — whichever applicable. Or just like a stream that gently flowed.

It was all indeed, so beautiful, it was one of those rare occasions when you feel deeply inside that it just should never end, power that towered over the orchestral beauty, with surprises of joy, in every shaded change. The orchestra itself, came to an even newer life; the conductor seemed indued with a fresh electric charge — and the pathos and lovliness of the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner, and the powerful and strongly challenging long-time favored of Richard Strauss — the "Also Sprach Zarathustra," published forth new meaning, and sent hearers home with new zest for more.

Gina Bachauer, born in Athens, Greece — a prodigy from the age of eight in first recital, then a study of law, because her father did not believe an international career for her would be possible. She provided music for the allied troops in hospitals during the war. Yet her talent made her famous overnight. I, and the thousands of others in this recent weekend are grateful. This was her debut at the Berkshire Festival. It will not be her last, we feel sure.

The annual Boston Pops Concert will be on Tuesday, Aug. 20 in the evening, the following two weekends will wind up the season for another year.

r.e.h.

HOUR (e)
NORWALK, CONN.
CIRC. 21,500

AUG 17 1968

New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday August 10 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER	Siegfried Idyll
STRAUSS	Also sprach Zarathustra op. 30
intermission
RACHMANINOV	Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor op. 18 Moderato Adagio sostenuto Allegro scherzando GINA BACHAUER

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 33

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

AUG 11 1968

New England Newsclip

Bachauer Superlative in Shed

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Gina Bachauer, who was here at Tanglewood Friday night with Rachmannov's Third Piano Concerto, returned Saturday night with his Second. The superlatives she earned Friday were equally appropriate Saturday.

One of World's Best

She is truly one of the world's leading female pianists. Her technical command of the keyboard is especially impressive. And her sensitivity to the warm and comforting aspects of Rachmaninov's music is as complete a s it is to his luxurious spaciousness.

She has the temperament and understanding that seems perfectly appropriate to the Rachmaninov concertos and the technical command to express them.

The program opened with an arrangement by Leinsdorf of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," which, in its original form for chamber group, is a lovely, tranquil little piece.

There was nothing seriously wrong with the Leinsdorf arrangement for varying number of players from four to 108, but somehow it lost its aura of intimacy and romance.

Wagner wrote it as a gift for his wife, Cosima, and organized a little group to play it for her as a surprise at 7.30 on Christmas morning in 1870. It was a successful gift and a sentimental personal possession for Cosima until Wagner sold it to a publisher because he needed money.

It was not as successful Saturday night. Tanglewood's vast 6000-seat shed is too big for it.

The shed is not too big for the piece which followed, however, Richard Strauss tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a great jungle of humid growth founded on the philosophical ideas of Nietzche.

Leinsdorf was able to keep it from getting too turgid. It was about as clearly and lucidly stated as it can be, and I'm reasonably sure those in the audience (7863) who especially like the piece had little reason to be disappointed, but it is not one of my favorite pieces no matter how neatly delivered.

Today Miss Bachauer will return with Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2. It is a piece that calls for a greater depth of expression, if not a s much dexterity, as the Rachmaninov concertos. I am looking forward to Miss Bachauer's view of it.

Boston Symphony Tops at Tanglewood

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

The Boston Symphony Orchestra really made great music at Tanglewood Friday night. Under the baton of Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson, the orchestra proved that even a thrice-familiar program can be delivered in a wholly convincing manner.

* * *

Wilson's excellent artistic direction and thorough technique were the crucial factors in this dramatic demonstration, of course. His command of the score seemed very complete, and he appeared to inspire in the musicians a special kind of confidence. Performances directed in such a manner cannot fail to be emotionally uplifting and technically stimulating.

You could feel this right from the start with Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" overture. Not only was the sense of precision a major achievement, but it had that undefinable quotient of artistic-emotional energy that tells you the music isn't just being played, it's being created right there in front of you. The wonderful, fast tempo may have helped hit the spot, but it was never allowed to become an end in itself.

* * *

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sheherazade" followed, and here again that extra something was clearly evident in the way the music was played. Granted, the ensemble was less than perfect, but the few intonation problems (especially in the horns) were not enough to dispel the artistic contributions by a remarkably responsive orchestra. As soloists, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, Cellist Jules Eskin, Oboist Ralph Gomberg, Clarinetist Gino Cioffi, and Flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer gave sensitive accounts of their spotlighted roles while the rest of the orchestra backed them up with a good, firm sound.

The first and second movements were very fine, but the third movement was magnificent. Wilson and the BSO played this music with such genuine feeling that it made me wonder how another major orchestra can become so detached and uncommitted in their own performances. The fourth movement was its usual exciting self, and with the aid of a great percussion section this excitement was indescribably multiplied.

* * *

Everywhere I walked (during intermission and following the concert) could be heard the concertgoers talking about how great things sounded. Charles Wilson's Tanglewood conducting debut augers well for the future.

After intermission was a single work, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, with Gina Bachauer as soloist. Miss Bachauer's playing was the only disappointment of the evening, for it lacked presence. She can hit all the notes, that's for sure, but the Rachmaninoff concerti require an unusually strong pianist capable of delivering huge hunks of sound (if only in self-defense against a sonorous orchestra). This Miss Bachauer cannot do. She did become a bit louder as the work progressed, but then there was nothing in reserve for the more imposing solo passages. Too bad. Wilson gave a sterling accompaniment.

Saturday evening at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium for three works, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2. The Wagner opened the concert, and Leinsdorf's interpretation can only be described as perfect in every detail. The intimacy and chamber-music textures he elicited were just so delicate and beautiful that this performance will long be remembered by me as the one to which all others must be compared. The opening was tenderness personified, and as the work unfolded Leinsdorf's reading became ever more touchingly sentimental. At those happy trumpet notes (played magnificently by Armando Ghitalla) it seemed impossible that the music could sound any better, but with the closing pages came the most peaceful and ecstatic moments of all. Leinsdorf achieved here such a profoundly noble sound that he actually defined (in musical terms, of mourse) what Love means. Truly the finest we've heard from the conductor all season.

* * *

Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was next, and the performance may best be described as uneven. The opening sunrise was simply brilliant, as was much of what followed, but the orchestra continued to break down in spots by missing entrances or losing their intonation. Leinsdorf underplayed the horns until the second half of the piece, which hurt the first half somewhat. He also underplayed the tubas, which was a disappointing surprise.

The most well-done sections were found after the "Of Science." "The Convalescent" was the best, with the waltzing "Dance Song" similarly good. The "Song of the Night Wanderer" was excellent, and was great to hear that first bell-clap for a change, which too-often gets lost in the cataclysmic orchestral forces it ushers in. Leinsdorf did well with the B Major conclusion, bringing Strauss' subtle harmonic distinction between Nature and Man (respectively C major and B major) to the fore. Amazing how these two fundamental elements cannot be harmonized . . . amazing, too, how the deep C major has the last word in Strauss' epic philosophical description of the origin and development of Mankind.

* * *

The post-intermission work was Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, again with Miss Bachauer as soloist. Regrettably, her tone did not carry Saturday evening, either. She played the solo part less well this time, too, emphasizing the continuity but ignoring the little shadings that are so essential to Rachmaninoff.

Andre Watts has an exceptional way with the second concerto, and should be asked to play it sometime. The conductor and orchestra contributed a soaring accompaniment that was as notable for its craftsmanship as its sensitivity.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

AUG 12 1968

Gina Bachauer Thrills Audience At Tanglewood

With but two more weekend concerts to go, to finish off a superlative season at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Berkshire Music Festival, featuring the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opinions are gathering in both camps, of sorrow and anticipation. Sorrow that this is the final Tanglewood summer school and Berkshire Festival to be under the musical direction of Erich Leinsdorf, beloved conductor of the Boston symphony, and anticipation that the 1969-70 season will be in the capable hands of William Steinberg, long established as the conductor of the famed Pittsburgh symphony.

The program of the recent weekend, featuring Gina Bachauer, gifted musician who presided at the pianaforte for three consecutive days will go in the annals of music history among the Berkshire Hills as a momentous weekend. This reviewer was unable to hear her opening night's program, the third piano concerto of Rachmaninov; from reports the winds and the rain paid havoc with the beautiful grounds which surround the music shed, but did nothing to dampen the spirit and enthusiasm of the audience.

Her second appearance, on the evening of Aug. 10, when her program took the entire second half of the evening, consisted of Rachmaninov's Second piano concerto. On Sunday, on an all-Brahms program, which featured also the Brahms Second symphony, her program consisted of the second piano concerto.

There is so much to be said about this fine artist. Reminiscent of the grande dames of the European music world, in character, dress and person, in a fashion, the pages of history turned back to another world and day. The piano and the artist were as one; the love of the artist for the instrument was beyond compare; the technique was flawless — and the execution breath-taking. Never have I seen a more graceful movement of the arms and hands fleeting over the keys and through the air like some soft waves from both a gentle breeze and a torrential gale — whichever applicable. Or just like a stream that gently flowed.

It was all indeed, so beautiful, it was one of those rare occasions when you feel deeply inside that it just should never end, power that towered over the orchestral beauty, with surprises of joy, in every shaded change. The orchestra itself, came to an even newer life; the conductor seemed indued with a fresh electric charge — and the pathos and lovliness of the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner, and the powerful and strongly challenging long-time favored of Richard Strauss — the "Also Sprach Zarathustra," published forth new meaning, and sent hearers home with new zest for more.

Gina Bachauer, born in Athens, Greece — a prodigy from the age of eight in first recital, then a study of law, because her father did not believe an international career for her would be possible. She provided music for the allied troops in hospitals during the war. Yet her talent made her famous overnight. I, and the thousands of others in this recent weekend are grateful. This was her debut at the Berkshire Festival. It will not be her last, we feel sure.

The annual Boston Pops Concert will be on Tuesday, Aug. 20 in the evening, the following two weekends will wind up the season for another year.

r.e.h.

HOUR (e)
NORWALK, CONN.
CIRC. 21,500

AUG 17 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday August 10 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER	Siegfried Idyll
STRAUSS	Also sprach Zarathustra op. 30
intermission
RACHMANINOV	Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor op. 18 Moderato Adagio sostenuto Allegro scherzando GINA BACHAUER

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 33

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

AUG 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Bachauer Superlative in Shed

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Gina Bachauer, who was here at Tanglewood Friday night with Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto, returned Saturday night with his Second. The superlatives she earned Friday were equally appropriate Saturday.

One of World's Best

She is truly one of the world's leading female pianists. Her technical command of the keyboard is especially impressive. And her sensitivity to the warm and comforting aspects of Rachmaninov's music is as complete a s it is to his luxurious spaciousness.

She has the temperament and understanding that seems perfectly appropriate to the Rachmaninov concertos and the technical command to express them.

The program opened with an arrangement by Leinsdorf of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," which, in its original form for chamber group, is a lovely, tranquil little piece.

There was nothing seriously wrong with the Leinsdorf arrangement for varying number of players from four to 108, but somehow it lost its aura of intimacy and romance.

Wagner wrote it as a gift for his wife, Cosima, and organized a little group to play it for her as a surprise at 7.30 on Christmas morning in 1870. It was a successful gift and a sentimental personal possession for Cosima until Wagner sold it to a publisher because he needed money.

It was not as successful Saturday night. Tanglewood's vast 6000-seat shed is too big for it.

The shed is not too big for the piece which followed, however, Richard Strauss tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a great jungle of humid growth founded on the philosophical ideas of Nietzche.

Leinsdorf was able to keep it from getting too turgid. It was about as clearly and lucidly stated as it can be, and I'm reasonably sure those in the audience (7863) who especially like the piece had little reason to be disappointed, but it is not one of my favorite pieces no matter how neatly delivered.

Today Miss Bachauer will return with Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2. It is a piece that calls for a greater depth of expression, if not a s much dexterity, as the Rachmaninov concertos. I am looking forward to Miss Bachauer's view of it.

62.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 11 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BRAHMS

Tragic Overture op. 81*

Variations on a theme by Haydn op. 56a

intermission

Piano Concerto no. 2 in B flat op. 83

Allegro non troppo
Allegro appassionato
Andante
Allegretto grazioso

GINA BACHAUER

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 38

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Greek pianist at Tanglewood

The new Greek Consul in Boston Tity Bilimatsis, and his pretty wife are invited to Tanglewood to hear their famous fellow countryman Gina Bachauer solo with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony on Sunday. The last time the marvelous pianist played with the BSO she had a rapt audience—including her longtime piano pupl Princess Irene, who flew here especially to reunion with her music teacher and listen, incognito, to the BSO.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Gina Bachauer Gives Virtuoso Performance at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Gina Bachauer knows that there is more than one right way to play a piece of music. She proved it Sunday afternoon and Friday and Saturday evenings at Tanglewood when she played the solo piano parts for concertos with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Large-Scale Work

Sunday she played Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium. It is a large-scale work requiring a virtuoso at the keyboard as well as a maturity of attitude which can accept it as a symphonic partnership rather than as an accompaniment for soloist.

Miss Bachauer is indeed a virtuoso, although she looks more like a housewife. And she has the depth of musical insight that can rephrase a musical cliche, present it in unusual terms and make it convincing.

Warm, Charming

Thus it was that Friday and Saturday nights she played two Rachmaninov concertos as if they were warm, charming romances rather than display pieces intended to dazzle audiences with digital dexterity, which is the way most pianists treat them. They sounded better her way.

And Sunday she played the first two movements of the Brahms' second concerto as if she were a man. It was full of muscle and aggression. The tone was firm and vigorous. It is proud music, and she played it assertively.

Not so the middle, quiet, lyrical movement; that was offered with the same sort of expansive benevolence that characterized the Rachmaninov concertos. And the final movement, too, was warm and generous.

Motherly Music

So in Miss Bachauer's hands, Rachmaninov's music became motherly instead of theatrical, and Brahms' music became fatherly instead of thoughtful. She made their concertos almost personal, and that is a real feat with pieces designed on such a vast scale, and she made them sound right, which earns her the title of artist.

Following the concerto Sunday, Leinsdorf led his forces through a leisurely performance of Braham's second symphony. It was nice. . .neither exciting nor dead, perhaps too nice.

Leinsdorf Mellowing?

Leinsdorf has been pacing many symphonies at a leisurely rate recently. Perhaps he is mellowing. More likely he is growing away from the youthful influence of Toscanini, who tended to infuse everything with electronic tension.

Either approach, of course, is right. The listener must hope that whichever approach is chosen, it is done well. It was done well Sunday, but I would have liked it with more zap.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The Sunday Morning chamber-music session in the Tanglewood Theater (10.30) was presented as the seventh and last concert in this year's Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Basic Trends

Members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group which consists of first-desk players from the parent orchestra plus Richard Goode, pianist, presented four 20th century pieces requiring unusual combinations of instruments and which, in many ways, illustrate basic trends in contemporary American music.

The pieces were "Octandre" (1924) by Edgard Varese, "Duo Concertante" (1966) by Ingolf Dahl, "Concerto for Nine Instruments " (1934) by Anton Webern and "Nonet" (1959) by Bohuslav Martinu.

The Varese piece was considerably more piquant and beguiling than many of its subsequent polytonal imitations; the Dahl piece was typical of the serialistic works involving disjunct techniques of harmony and time; the Webern piece, a modern classic, was surprisingly disappointing, as if the players were ill-rehearsed and out-of-phase with this sort of pointillistic delicacy; the Martinu was jazzy, haunting or dancing, depending upon which movement is referred to, and was closest of the four to the sort of music the retreating generation is accustomed to.

Once again I am induced to say that the high quality of music being presented at Tanglewood on Sunday mornings this summer is deserving of a far larger audience than that which seems to have the energy to appear . . . even with the free coffee being served as a courtesy by the society called 'The Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 12 1968 New England Newsclip

COURIER
WHITEFIELD, N. H.
COMB. CIRC. 1,250

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

COURIER
LITTLETON, N. H.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,150

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Brahms for Haydn Sunday Afternoon At Tanglewood

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon, August 11. Under Leinsdorf's direction, the orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Leinsdorf and the orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Marks 30th Birthday

RECORD THRONGS WERE ON HAND FRIDAY, SATURDAY AND SUNDAY AT TANGLEWOOD in Lenox, Mass., when the highlight of the 1968 Berkshire Festival featured three concertos on succeeding days by Gina Bachauer, considered the world's greatest woman pianist, playing with the world's greatest symphony orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Top photo shows a portion of the some 7,000 people who attended Sunday afternoon's concert, many of them enjoying the musical treat while lounging on the spacious lawn. Bottom picture shows the pianist with Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, as the capacity audience of 6,000 in The Music Shed gave them tumultuous ovations. This was the first time in the 30-year history of Tanglewood that an artist was heard in more than one consecutive program. Leinsdorf revealed his talents as one of the world's greatest conductors as the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed superbly to complement the thrilling renditions by Gina Bachauer. The throngs comprised music lovers who traveled distances requiring more than four hours in many cases to attend. It was a historic milestone in the world of music and was a memorable 30th Anniversary event for the famed Berkshire Music Center.

TANGLEWOOD PROGRAM CHANGE

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon.

Under Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

Waterbury Sunday Republican 8/11/68

Tanglewood Program Change Announced

TANKLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. —Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced a change of program for this afternoon. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program. Gina Bachauer will join Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, August 10, 1968

All Brahms Program

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon, August 11, at Tanglewood. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphhony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

NEW YORK POST
Thursday, August 8, 1968

Tanglewood Program Changed

Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra director, has announced a change of program for the Sunday afternoon concert at Tanglewood. The orchestra will play Brahms' Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join the orchestra in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

62.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 11 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BRAHMS

Tragic Overture op. 81*

Variations on a theme by Haydn op. 56a

intermission

Piano Concerto no. 2 in B flat op. 83

Allegro non troppo
Allegro appassionato
Andante
Allegretto grazioso

GINA BACHAUER

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 38

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Greek pianist at Tanglewood

The new Greek Consul in Boston Tity Bilimatsis, and his pretty wife are invited to Tanglewood to hear their famous fellow countryman Gina Bachauer solo with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony on Sunday. The last time the marvelous pianist played with the BSO she had a rapt audience—including her longtime piano pupl Princess Irene, who flew here especially to reunion with her music teacher and listen, incognito, to the BSO.

LEDGER GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 176,033
AUG 8 1968
New England Newsclip

Gina Bachauer Gives Virtuoso Performance at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Gina Bachauer knows that there is more than one right way to play a piece of music. She proved it Sunday afternoon and Friday and Saturday evenings at Tanglewood when she played the solo piano parts for concertos with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Large-Scale Work

Sunday she played Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium. It is a large-scale work requiring a virtuoso at the keyboard as well as a maturity of attitude which can accept it as a symphonic partnership rather than as an accompaniment for soloist.

Miss Bachauer is indeed a virtuoso, although she looks more like a housewife. And she has the depth of musical insight that can rephrase a musical cliche, present it in unusual terms and make it convincing.

Warm, Charming

Thus it was that Friday and Saturday nights she played two Rachmaninov concertos as if they were warm, charming romances rather than display pieces intended to dazzle audiences with digital dexterity, which is the way most pianists treat them. They sounded better her way.

And Sunday she played the first two movements of the Brahms' second concerto as if she were a man. It was full of muscle and aggression. The tone was firm and vigorous. It is proud music, and she played it assertively.

Not so the middle, quiet, lyrical movement; that was offered with the same sort of expansive benevolence that characterized the Rachmaninov concertos. And the final movement, too, was warm and generous.

Motherly Music

So in Miss Bachauer's hands, Rachmaninov's music became motherly instead of theatrical, and Brahms' music became fatherly instead of thoughtful. She made their concertos almost personal, and that is a real feat with pieces designed on such a vast scale, and she made them sound right, which earns her the title of artist.

Following the concerto Sunday, Leinsdorf led his forces through a leisurely performance of Braham's second symphony. It was nice. . .neither exciting nor dead, perhaps too nice.

Leinsdorf Mellowing?

Leinsdorf has been pacing many symphonies at a leisurely rate recently. Perhaps he is mellowing. More likely he is growing away from the youthful influence of Toscanini, who tended to infuse everything with electronic tension.

Either approach, of course, is right. The listener must hope that whichever approach is chosen, it is done well. It was done well Sunday, but I would have liked it with more zap.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The Sunday Morning chamber-music session in the Tanglewood Theater (10.30) was presented as the seventh and last concert in this year's Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Basic Trends

Members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group which consists of first-desk players from the parent orchestra plus Richard Goode, pianist, presented four 20th century pieces requiring unusual combinations of instruments and which, in many ways, illustrate basic trends in contemporary American music.

The pieces were "Octandre" (1924) by Edgard Varese, "Due Concertante" (1966) by Ingolf Dahl, "Concerto for Nine Instruments " (1934) by Anton Webern and "Nonet" (1959) by Bohuslav Martinu.

The Varese piece was considerably more piquant and beguiling than many of its subsequent polytonal imitations; the Dahl piece was typical of the serialistic works involving disjunct techniques of harmony and time; the Webern piece, a modern classic, was surprisingly disappointing, as if the players were ill-rehearsed and out-of-phase with this sort of pointillistic delicacy; the Martinu was jazzy, haunting or dancing, depending upon which movement is referred to, and was closest of the four to the sort of music the retreating generation is accustomed to.

Once again I am induced to say that the high quality of music being presented at Tanglewood on Sunday mornings this summer is deserving of a far larger audience than that which seems to have the energy to appear . . . even with the free coffee being served as a courtesy by the society called 'The Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

COURIER
WHITEFIELD, N. H.
CIRC. 1,250
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Brahms for Haydn Sunday Afternoon At Tanglewood

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon, August 11. Under Leinsdorf's direction, the orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Leinsdorf and the orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

COURIER
HAVERHILL, MASS.
CIRC. 9,250
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
AUG 8 1968
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
AUG 8 1968
New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
AUG 12 1968
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Marks 30th Birthday

RECORD THRONGS WERE ON HAND FRIDAY, SATURDAY AND SUNDAY AT TANGLEWOOD in Lenox, Mass., when the highlight of the 1968 Berkshire Festival featured three concertos on succeeding days by Gina Bachauer, considered the world's greatest woman pianist, playing with the world's greatest symphony orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Top photo shows a portion of the some 7,000 people who attended Sunday afternoon's concert, many of them enjoying the musical treat while lounging on the spacious lawn. Bottom picture shows the pianist with Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, as the capacity audience of 6,000 in The Music Shed gave them tumultuous ovations. This was the first time in the 30-year history of Tanglewood that an artist was heard in more than one consecutive program. Leinsdorf revealed his talents as one of the world's greatest conductors as the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed superbly to complement the thrilling renditions by Gina Bachauer. The throngs comprised music lovers who traveled distances requiring more than four hours in many cases to attend. It was a historic milestone in the world of music and was a memorable 30th Anniversary event for the famed Berkshire Music Center.

TANGLEWOOD PROGRAM CHANGE

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon.

Under Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

Waterbury Sunday Republican 8/11/68

Tanglewood Program Change Announced

TANKLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. —Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced a change of program for this afternoon. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program. Gina Bachauer will join Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, August 10, 1968

All Brahms Program

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon, August 11, at Tanglewood. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphhony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

NEW YORK POST
Thursday, August 8, 1968

Tanglewood Program Changed

Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra director, has announced a change of program for the Sunday afternoon concert at Tanglewood. The orchestra will play Brahms' Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join the orchestra in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

62.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 11 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BRAHMS

Tragic Overture op. 81*

Variations on a theme by Haydn op. 56a

intermission

Piano Concerto no. 2 in B flat op. 83

Allegro non troppo
Allegro appassionato
Andante
Allegretto grazioso

GINA BACHAUER

Gina Bachauer plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 38

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Greek pianist at Tanglewood

The new Greek Consul in Boston Tity Bilimatsis, and his pretty wife are invited to Tanglewood to hear their famous fellow countryman Gina Bachauer solo with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony on Sunday. The last time the marvelous pianist played with the BSO she had a rapt audience—including her longtime piano pupl Princess Irene, who flew here especially to reunion with her music teacher and listen, incognito, to the BSO.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Gina Bachauer Gives Virtuoso Performance at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Gina Bachauer knows that there is more than one right way to play a piece of music. She proved it Sunday afternoon and Friday and Saturday evenings at Tanglewood when she played the solo piano parts for concertos with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Large-Scale Work

Sunday she played Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium. It is a large-scale work requiring a virtuoso at the keyboard as well as a maturity of attitude which can accept it as a symphonic partnership rather than as an accompaniment for soloist.

Miss Bachauer is indeed a virtuoso, although she looks more like a housewife. And she has the depth of musical insight that can rephrase a musical cliche, present it in unusual terms and make it convincing.

Warm, Charming

Thus it was that Friday and Saturday nights she played two Rachmaninov concertos as if they were warm, charming romances rather than display pieces intended to dazzle audiences with digital dexterity, which is the way most pianists treat them. They sounded better her way.

And Sunday she played the first two movements of the Brahms' second concerto as if she were a man. It was full of muscle and aggression. The tone was firm and vigorous. It is proud music, and she played it assertively.

Not so the middle, quiet, lyrical movement; that was offered with the same sort of expansive benevolence that characterized the Rachmaninov concertos. And the final movement, too, was warm and generous.

Motherly Music

So in Miss Bachauer's hands, Rachmaninov's music became motherly instead of theatrical, and Brahms' music became fatherly instead of thoughtful. She made their concertos almost personal, and that is a real feat with pieces designed on such a vast scale, and she made them sound right, which earns her the title of artist.

Following the concerto Sunday, Leinsdorf led his forces through a leisurely performance of Braham's second symphony. It was nice. . .neither exciting nor dead, perhaps too nice.

Leinsdorf Mellowing?

Leinsdorf has been pacing many symphonies at a leisurely rate recently. Perhaps he is mellowing. More likely he is growing away from the youthful influence of Toscanini, who tended to infuse everything with electronic tension.

Either approach, of course, is right. The listener must hope that whichever approach is chosen, it is done well. It was done well Sunday, but I would have liked it with more zap.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The Sunday Morning chamber-music session in the Tanglewood Theater (10.30) was presented as the seventh and last concert in this year's Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Basic Trends

Members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group which consists of first-desk players from the parent orchestra plus Richard Goode, pianist, presented four 20th century pieces requiring unusual combinations of instruments and which, in many ways, illustrate basic trends in contemporary American music.

The pieces were "Octandre" (1924) by Edgard Varese, "Due Concertante" (1966) by Ingolf Dahl, "Concerto for Nine Instruments " (1934) by Anton Webern and "Nonet" (1959) by Bohuslav Martinu.

The Varese piece was considerably more piquant and beguiling than many of its subsequent polytonal imitations; the Dahl piece was typical of the serialistic works involving disjunct techniques of harmony and time; the Webern piece, a modern classic, was surprisingly disappointing, as if the players were ill-rehearsed and out-of-phase with this sort of pointillistic delicacy; the Martinu was jazzy, haunting or dancing, depending upon which movement is referred to, and was closest of the four to the sort of music the retreating generation is accustomed to.

Once again I am induced to say that the high quality of music being presented at Tanglewood on Sunday mornings this summer is deserving of a far larger audience than that which seems to have the energy to appear . . . even with the free coffee being served as a courtesy by the society called 'The Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

COURIER
WHITEFIELD, N. H.
COMB. CIRC. 1,250

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Brahms for Haydn Sunday Afternoon At Tanglewood

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon, August 11. Under Leinsdorf's direction, the orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Leinsdorf and the orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

COURIER
LITTLETON, N. H.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,150

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 12 1968 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD PROGRAM CHANGE

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon.

Under Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

Waterbury Sunday Republican 8/11/68

Tanglewood Program Change Announced

TANKLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. —Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced a change of program for this afternoon. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program. Gina Bachauer will join Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, August 10, 1968

All Brahms Program

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today announced a change of program for Sunday afternoon, August 11, at Tanglewood. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, the Orchestra will play Brahms Second Symphhony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra in the Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

NEW YORK POST
Thursday, August 8, 1968

Tanglewood Program Changed

Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra director, has announced a change of program for the Sunday afternoon concert at Tanglewood. The orchestra will play Brahms' Second Symphony in place of the previously announced Tragic Overture and Variations on a Theme by Haydn. On the first half of the program, Gina Bachauer will join the orchestra in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto.

Tanglewood Marks 30th Birthday

RECORD THRONGS WERE ON HAND FRIDAY, SATURDAY AND SUNDAY AT TANGLEWOOD in Lenox, Mass., when the highlight of the 1968 Berkshire Festival featured three concertos on succeeding days by Gina Bachauer, considered the world's greatest woman pianist, playing with the world's greatest symphony orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Top photo shows a portion of the some 7,000 people who attended Sunday afternoon's concert, many of them enjoying the musical treat while lounging on the spacious lawn. Bottom picture shows the pianist with Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, as the capacity audience of 6,000 in The Music Shed gave them tumultuous ovations. This was the first time in the 30-year history of Tanglewood that an artist was heard in more than one consecutive program. Leinsdorf revealed his talents as one of the world's greatest conductors as the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed superbly to complement the thrilling renditions by Gina Bachauer. The throngs comprised music lovers who traveled distances requiring more than four hours in many cases to attend. It was a historic milestone in the world of music and was a memorable 30th Anniversary event for the famed Berkshire Music Center.

NEWBURGH-BEACON NEWS
Friday, August 16, 1968

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
26,000
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Pianist Gina Bachauer Excels

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The Tanglewood Berkshire Festival event last Sunday afternoon has left me in such a fire that I'll have to bank it for a moment to speak of Friday and Saturday.

For the seven o'clock Friday warm-up, August 9, Brian Runnett, organist and master of the choristers at Norwich Cathedral, England, conducted the Berkshire Boy Choir for the second time at Tanglewood. I missed Poulenc and Bruckner but caught Pinkham's "Wedding Cantata," an engaging pleasantry with a touch of dissonant pepper, Britten's 'Missa Brevis," a distinguished setting for boys voices and organ (opus 63) and Debussy's "Trois Chansons de Charles d'Orleans" in which the composer proves that he could write as expressive projections of French poetry for chorus as for solo voice and piano. But the prize was Britten's piece. Puristic groups of American composers look askance at B.B. because he persists in using any technique that suits his idea and (worse luck) is successful. Granted an effective technical facility that gets him through moments of weak inspiration (like Bach and Mozart), he can write so strongly to the point that technique disappears in the experienced fact. So, here, with the sounds out of the sacred Latin—not as spare and uncompromising as Stravinsky's but leanly differentiated in recognition of the qualities and attitudes of the text. Britten's is neo-primitive but he has imagination for basic Biblical states of mind-felling. The organ, expertly handled by Lowell Lacy, who used a canny selection of stops, had its own authority, as needed, and also made the proper supplement of bass or colorful obligatto to the flutey white of boys' voices.

Mr. Runnett uses a large group of these moppets (balancing them nicely with a few fine tenors and baritones. Again I longed for one basso profundo) so that he does not have to force them sharp in climaxes—or just a hair off once or twice. The "heavenly" clarity of the unchanged voice, with its lack of vibratto and overtones, has been known for so many years that we tend to accept, without appreciation of the careful training demanded, musically as well as vocally—not to speak of the discipline to metamorphose imps-of-satan into temporary cherubs.

Friday and Saturday nights brought out the big guns, especially contrived I'm sure, by Rimsky - Korsakov and R. Strauss for these festivals of twelve thousand devotees.

Glinka's glinting Overture was taken at a clip that made the fiddles swirl but with time for the sonorous and expansive cello melody and a fast unison passage that gives the bases a moment of glory, trombones that recalled the great Sousa's Band and woodwinds as needed to color the pot-pourri. We continued with Russian Russians. The Sheherazade Suite is such a showpiece for the B.S.O. the program book no longer lists the movements. But a good show. Rimsky's infection with orientalism (like the French with Spanish- exotic) gave the professor of instrumentation and chromatic harmony a good reason to shine brightly, and the Boston, by now, knows how to play with good taste. Charles Wilson presided and did nothing to interfere (except for one exposed attack of winds when his beat was so anxiously precise that the result was imprecise). The concert-master was his most slinky best in the narrator's role and the many long climaxes managed to pile Ossa on Pelion without apparent fatigue. Such endless variation, harmonic, instrumental and dynamic requires more virtuosity in performance than does the B minor Mass, and it was there Friday, in all its sensuous immediacy.

Gina Bachauer and the orchestra resurrected the brooding ghost of Rachmaninov in his No. 3 "Piano Concerto." The involuted pianistic passion came off with all its swooning rubatos and drippings of the harp. Miss Bachauer gave an infusion of musical strength that saved the evening.

We could wish to have been Frau Wagner to be allowed to wake up to the lovely lyricism of the Seigried Idyll as played this night. Wagner is much more convincing when he interrupts the cloudy tragedy of the Ultimate (the Ring) for such slight operas as Tristan and Die Meistersinger and this charming tone poem to love. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra did it delicate justice.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" is certainly a mouthful of spaking, with its endless modulation of small material but this operatic composer does well by the settings of his variegated scenes wherein Zarathustra decends from the heights of Illumination to roam the lower worlds of men. There are wonderful passages: the assertive thrust of the trumpet out of underground rumble, a powerfully serence choral of winds, a richly disturbing susurrus of divided basses and cellos, etc. It sounded even more thrilling in the Shed than in Symphony Hall, perhaps the wide air of the Berkshires helped, but also top performance.

Again Gina Bachauer assayed Rachmaninov (Piano Concerto No. 2). It was a great beginning: plangent chords in the piano with the powerful pound of the deep pedal-note urging them on and up. The tremendous sweep of the unison strings in a melody extending itself from within, like some of Brahms and then the drive too soon dissolved into the usual dripping over one's sorry soul. Again Miss Bachauer infused some inner reason and strength, as if from the best of Chopin Nocturnes, but could not, of course, recapture the grand promise of the opening.

On Sunday, Gina Bachauer and the Boston Symphony relived the second Brahms Concerto with an imaginative fulfillment I have not heard since Schnable with the same orchestra. The way Miss Bachauer seconded the French horn, matching it in authority but with no coy attracting of attention as soloist, set the style for the whole great concerto. The pianist knew when to oppose equal strength to the instruments, when to be a rhythmic radiance within the orchestra (including some tonal impressionism). Again there was attitudenizing, no strutting or sobbing. With all its evolved strength (Brahms is a master of emergent form because that is the way he thinks, in fact, the way he grew). This non troppo Allegro opens up a wide range of experience emotionally congruent with the next passionate Allegro (no Scherzo), the singing melancholy of the slow Andante and the graceful Allegretto as conclusion, as if all four movements were contrasts-in-unity, all radiating from a hidden common center. All I can say is that orchestra and pianist made this manifest with a hundred felicities in the great flow of continuity.

Mr. Eskin played the cello solo that opens the Andante with fine tone and heart, so that it was overlayed, for me, by the sound of Kipnis singing (Immer leisser) that song of troubled dream, and the piano enters and proceeds with a dialogue gently but strong. There is resignation without despair. The lilt of the last movement lifts the mood and with second theme swings into a melody of gypsy abandon so characteristic of Brahm's world. And here, heaven bless Bachauer, she asked for (and got) a continuity in the section piano completes orchestra phrases and vice versa. We have heard this chopped in other Boston performances.

The Concerto was all I could take (Brahms Symphony No. 2 was to follow intermission) and the curving sweep of the Berkshire Hills stretched by the late sun, made an appropriate going away.

Tanglewood Debut Bachauer Triumph

BY BERNARD LOTH

TANGLEWOOD, Mass — The Sunday concert of the Boston Symphony under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf was a study in contrasts despite the fact that the two compositons played were by the same composer, Johannes Brahms.

First, the program was changed without notice so that instead of missing part of an overture upon arrival five minutes late, imagine the shock of hearing the composition scheduled for last. A hasty check of watch es and a look at added page in the program finally determined that we were not an hour and five minutes late.

For some unannounced reason the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 with Gina Bachauer as soloist was played first and the Brahms Second Symphony completed the program.

Gina Bachauer, born in Athens, Greece, where she gave her first recital at the tender age of eight, tried law school before music, happily, won out as her major interest, and she studied with Alfred Cortot. She played for allied troops and hospitals for six years during the war and an immediate sensation in her London debut after the war. Strangely this was her debut at Tanglewood, and what a debut it was!

She started Friday evening playing the Rachmaninov Third Piano Concerto, continued Saturday evening with his Second Concerto and completed the weekend with the Brahms Second. Playing three different major concertos on three successive days with a major orchestra is not without precedent, but it is not done very often, and this may be one of the very few times it has been done at Tanglewood.

The performance itself was nothing short of magnificent. The total sound was lush, silken, and beautiful. The piano alone and with subdued orchestra displayed such superb artistry and a clear singing tone in all registers that one hears only from a real master, and the orchestra under Leinsdorf matched the beauty of the piano all the way through. It was a perfect blend of great soloist, great conductor and great orchestra.

The thousands of music-lovers in the shed and on the lawns for as far as the eye could see gave the performance a tremendous ovation. It must have been ten minutes before Madame Bachauer was permitted to leave the stage because of the bravos and the excitement.

One of the contrasts of the concert was the quality of sound at various points. Hundreds of people on either side both in and outside the Shed heard the orchestra in full but only half a piano. Those in the center but extreme rear of the shed and on the lawns behind heard a balanced concert but one in which tones were so rounded and softened that there was a lack of detail and nuance. In the cneter everything was perfect but way up front center the detail overshadowed the blend.

The most striking contrast, however, was in the playing of the two compositions. The concerto was well nigh perfect, but the symphony left much to be desired. Once again as in past years, the conductor's demands were not complied with by the orchestra on many occasions. Mr. Leinsdorfs obvious motions for a crescendo or a loud attack elicited no change from the musicians at several points, and the Brahms Symphony suffered. Although the second is not one of Brahms most spectacular works, it has beauty that was too often hidden in this rendition by the Boston Symphony.

Tanglewood will continue its symphony concerts until Sunday, August 25th, which is also the end of the symphony season at Saratoga.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD WEEKEND

FRIDAY, AUGUST 9
By A. C. S.

This review is one week too late to do any good. It should have been printed last week in order to urge those who love fine music to take advantage of the opportunity to hear Gina Bachauer play the piano. Miss Bachauer made her Tanglewood debut tonight and was a smash success. She was soloist in the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 3 and, from the first note onward, had every listener sitting on the edge of his seat with excitement and admiration. A formidable technique, wonderful control of tone color, and unfeigned musicality made her playing a memorable experience. The audience was too captivated to let her go and she finally obliged with an encore.

Charles Wilson made his Tanglewood debut as conductor of the symphony. Officially the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, he had earlier been heard as an organist, harpsichordist, and choral director. He chose two old favorites for the first part of the program: Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmila" which seemed to go by without any pause for breath, and Rimsky - Korsakov's Scheherazade.

The Berkshire Boy Choir, under the direction of Brian Runnett, sang a varied program for the Weekend Prelude. The group performed with assurance and a beautiful choral tone.

SATURDAY, AUG. 10
By D. D.

Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium this evening to lead the orchestra in three works. Despite rainy weather and soggy parking lots, an empty seat was not to be seen. Probably the best known and admired of Wagner's shorter compositions, the Siegfried Idyll, which served as opener, was given a beautifully expressive reading by the orchestra.

This tender mood was quickly dissipated by Strauss' Also Sprach Zarathustra, one of the great post - Wagnerian monsters and a fine example of the excesses of the program style in music. There is no denying that the work, in spite of its pretentiousness and bombast, being a so - called musico - philosophical journey of the human soul through the vicissitudes of its destiny, does have certain moments of intense drama, and on these Leinsdorf knew how to capitalize, turning a somewhat ludicrous albeit gorgeously orchestrated showpiece, into something well worth hearing.

Rachmaninoff's popular Piano Concerto No. 3, as performed by Gina Bachauer was the highlight of the evening. No dazzling display of sheer virtuosity here, but rather a deep insight into the music, combined with the powers of the mature artist.

SUNDAY, AUG. 11
By D. D.

A capacity audience, and a clamorous one, filled the shed this cool Sunday afternoon to hear an all Brahms program, featuring in the last of three appearances with the orchestra, Gina Bachauer, pianist. For unexplained reasons, the Concerto No. 3 began the program and two shorter works were replaced by the Symphony No. 2 for the second half. Those who had the good fortune to hear Miss Bachauer perform on preceding evenings were as enthralled by her playing of Brahms as they had been moved by her masterful interpretations of Rachmaninoff. In a very demanding work comprised of four lengthy movements, each one containing different and subtle musical patterns, the soloist received fine support from the orchestra.

Preferring a somewhat subdued, poetic approach to this music, Miss Bachauer conveyed the most delicate shades of lyrical expression with characteristic assurance and conviction. Leinsdorf, while not always the ideal Brahms interpreter, did more than justice to the Second Symphony. More pliant and vigorous than he has been for some time, he poured real excitement into the score, notably the last allegro, which earned him a standing ovation.

TT

64.

Pianist Bachauer Inspires Enthusiasm at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — In her three appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood over the weekend, Greek pianist Gina Bachauer must have set a new record in audience enthusiasm for the Berkshire Music Festival's 31 years.

She received standing ovations after performances of three different piano concertos.

Friday night's was the Rachmaninoff Third, conducted by Charles Wilson. Saturday night, Mme. Bachauer played Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, and yesterday afternoon, the Brahms Second. Erich Leinsdorf conducted for the last two.

Unusual Span

Yesterday's audience of 9,358 made a weekend total of 25,755.

Several pianists could have played any of the three concertos as well as Mme. Bachauer from both the technical and interpretive standpoints.

Very few would have undertaken the three in less than three full days.

The Bachauer keyboard magic is not that outstanding unless it's coupled with the woman's personality.

Although heavyset, she has a regal manner, reeks of confidence, and seems so immersed in her music that her audience shares the absorption.

A truly great pianist doesn't stop growing artistically when rust affects digital prowess and rust affects digital prowess and memory.

These things haven't happened to Mme. Bachauer, who is 55. But there have been some mighty changes in her art since she played at the Worcester Music Festival eight years ago.

Both Saturday night and yesterday, occasional miscalculations caused wrong notes. Ringing sonorities were heard in the bass, especially in the Brahms, but there was some haziness of texture above, in spite of the superlative collaboration Leinsdorf gave her.

Some of the speeds in the Brahms concerto were curtailed. These were interpretive decisions, because any number of dazzling passages in the three concertos proved that tempo compromise was not necessary.

In everything Mme. Bachauer played, melody constantly glowed. There was total lack of display, beyond action needed for physical performance.

Perhaps the greatness lies in the simple fact that Mme. Bachauer is a stickler for the truth. Leinsdorf evidently felt so. We've never seen him conduct for a soloist with such musical vitality and dedication.

The Saturday and Sunday orchestral programs were far apart in merit.

Saturday night it was Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Yesterday, the orchestra substituted Brahms' Second Symphony for the scheduled "Tragic" Overture and Variations on a Theme of Haydn, also by Brahms.

The Wagner Idyll overflowed with the purest sound. Startling significance was brought to the Strauss tone poem. The work itself has too many weaknesses to reach a true Strauss zenith. The performance remained absorbing.

Brahms' Second Symphony received a "standard" treatment. It had neither the bigness nor gumption of which it is capable.

Some of this can be attributed to the brass, which failed at too many critical points.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 52,350

AUG 12 1968 New England Newsclip

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

AUG 14 1968 New England Newsclip

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, August 12, 1968

047

Gina Bachauer Soloist in Three Tanglewood Concerts

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

This was the weekend of the soloist at Tanglewood.

Pianist Gina Bachauer performed for all three weekend concerts, the only soloist of the weekend, something that had never happened before in the history of the Berkshire Music Festival.

The fact that Madame Bachauer was chosen to be displayed in this manner says unusual things about both her artistry and her personality. Concert soloists, aside from their musical contributions, are also valuable for their variety. And although only the more honest say so, they assist at the box office.

Madame Bachauer was quite capable of fulfilling all obligations. Saturday night she played Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 with superb style and won long, drawn out applause, shouts and demands for an encore.

She didn't give one although she did on Friday night following her performance of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3. On Sunday she was scheduled to play Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2 as part of an all-Brahms program.

GINA BACHAUER

Madame Bachauer has power but didn't use it in her performance Saturday night. Rather, she subtlely understated her music, letting the score speak for itself. This is difficult to do without throwing the performance away. Madame Bachauer was entirely successful.

Her approach was laced with second thoughts, resisting the temptation to give into the crashing showmanship to which the Concerto also lends itself. She reached her peak in the gentle presentation of the beautiful theme of the second movement, proving it exquisite rather than brilliant and glossy.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Saturday and Sunday's performances. Assistant conductor Charles Wilson took the podium on Friday night.

The balance of Satuday's program consisted of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

Orchestra Sedate

The orchestra's performance Saturday could only be called sedate. The presentation of the "Siegfried Idyll" was routinely pleasant with with several good sections for the violins. It is a slightly delicate work that was played without full respect for its fragility.

"Also Sprach Zarathustra," although a different kind of piece received much the same treatment. Nowhere was the playing bad, it just wasn't outstanding, falling short of the level generally associated with the Boston Symphone.

The Berkshire Music Festival will offer its annual self-celebration this Wednesday with some new and unusual additions to the program. The "Tanglewood-On-Parade" concert is traditionally a marathon of performances by everyone associated with the Festival and its classes ending in a concert by the Boston Symphony.

Day-Long Fling

The Norman Walker Dance Company from the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival and a representative from the Berkshire Theater will participate in a theater, dance and music, and what the Festival itself calls a "Gala Concert."

The evening music program, beginning at 8 p.m., will consist of Prokovieff's "Peter and the Wolf," Wagner's "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," the Funeral from "Gotterdamerung" and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

Tanglewood Packed For 3 Concerts

Last weekend's debut of one of the world's leading pianists, introduced to Tanglewood audiences of 25,755, the famed Gina Bachauer.

Friday's evening concert was led by the Boston Symphony's Assistant Conductor, Charles Wilson, performing Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmila", followed by Rimsky-Korsakov's Sheherazade. After intermission Miss Bachauer was heard in a magnificent and powerful performance of Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor.

For a time during the first movement the soloist and orchestra were at some odds, and Wilson's direction did not seem solid enough to control both orchestra and soloist. However, this dynamic pianist was always in control and earned the thunderous ovation she received from the audience. Their enthusiasm finally persuaded Miss Bachauer to play a charming encore — A Minuet by Rameau.

Saturday evening Miss Bachauer returned to the podium under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, and proved her tremendous technical command of the keyboard in Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor. Her performance of this beautiful concerto was impressive and captivated the audience of 7,863. Leinsdorf opened the program with his own arrangement of Wagner's Siegfried Idyll, which in its original form was composed for a small chamber group by Wagner, as a surprise for his wife Comima, presented to her on Christmas morning in 1870.

Its intimacy was somewhat diffused as performed by the Boston Symphony, but nevertheless it thoroughly delighted the audience. Richard Strauss' tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra" was in turn pleasing and stirring. The audience responded most appreciatively, according Leinsdorf well-earned applause.

However, Miss Bachauer's brilliant performance of Rachmaninov's Concerto was the highlight of the evening.

Sunday afternoon's program was changed and Leinsdorf conducted an all-Brahms concert. Miss Bachauer returned for a third performance of the weekend in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2. Her rendition of this great concerto did not disappoint the eager audience of 9,358. It was a beautiful, clear, dry and sunny day. Perfect weather for Brahms, and both the concerto and the Brahms 2nd Symphony as performed by the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf's direction was outstanding. The large audience filled the shed and overflowed in thousands spilling over onto the well-groomed lawns. This was a most memorable and beautiful concert, and one will long remember Miss Bachauer's deeply moving performance.

SSM

Mendelssohn, Beethoven Program Will Be Featured at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, Aug. 16 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist.

Incidental Music

The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the Midsummer Night's Dream Incidental Music, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts.

Both Miss Toohey, who is a 19-year-old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Leading Player

Narrator for the Midsummer Night's Dream excerpts will be Patricia Reardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall. Miss Reardon, a leading player for several seasons at the Stratford, Conn., Shakespeare Festival, is also a serious sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4).

The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf.

Cancelled by Illness

He replaces the orchestra's former music director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all - Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr .Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, No. 1, and Op. 110. The orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10.30 on Saturday morning for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music of Ravel and Dvorak.

Patricia Reardon will narrate Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf next Friday evening at Tanglewood in Lenox.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950
AUG 11 1968
New England Newsclip

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be featured as a soloist in a performance of Beethoven's Violin concerto in an all-Beethoven program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Tanglewood Featuring Mendelssohn, Beethoven

LENOX—The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening at 9. Erich Leinsdorf music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the g minor Piano Concerto, with Lillian Kallir as soloist.

The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the Midsummer Night's Dream Incidental Music, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts.

On Saturday evening, August 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4).

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the week-end begin with the Friday week-end Prelude at 7 p. m., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas. Op. 31, nol. and Op. 110.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,400
AUG 11 1968
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Audience Is Enchanted by Mendelssohn Magic 047

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There was a fine, gentle mist falling over Tanglewood Friday night as Patricia Peardon, Erich Leinsdorf, about 45 girls from the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus and the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered nearly an hour of Mendelssohn's enchantment to 4688 listeners.

Faulty Reproduction

The enchantment came from Leinsdorf's combination of Mendelssohn's Overture (Opus 21) and Incidental Music (Opus 61) to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" interspersed with appropriate excerpts from the play chosen by the conductor.

The music is a classic among the scores dedicated to fairy queens and elves, and the damp air failed to diminish its magic, but, unfortunately Miss Peardon's narration was marred by faulty reproduction.

When she and the orchestra first presented this piece, her voice was augmented through a microphone hung around her neck, a decoration ill suited to her Elizabethan, princess-like appearance.

Better on Lawn

But her words were clearly understood, if my memory serves well, and the performance was one of the finest moments of the 1963 season.

Friday night she was speaking to a stand-up microphone, and most of her words were not understandable along the sides and rear of the shed.

Out on the lawn where a scattered handful of music lovers were huddled under blankets and umbrellas, she was easier to understand . . . probably because there were seven great speakers spread across the roof of the shed directing the sound over the lawn from microphones at the stage.

Wedding March

Be that as it may, the piece in this version includes 10 sections, one is the famous wedding march nearly everyone is married to, and the orchestra and girls chorus performed it beautifully . . . so did Miss Peardon, but she was to be appreciated abstractly for her appearance and animation rather than for Shakespeare's tale of gentle mystery.

Before intermission Lillian Kallir came out to play a perky and sprightly piano with the orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf. They did Mendelsshon's G Minor Concerto, Opus 25, with a good deal of light-footed verve.

She was pretty and bright in a scarlet gown, and she played in incisive articulation, and a cool, clean manner.

Dew Drops in Sun

The notes of her runs and decorations were spread out like shimmering dew drops in the sun, and the lyrical middle section was like the translucence of springtime trees screening the sun.

The little scherzo, which opened the program, had much the same easy, airy quality. It was an orchestration Mendelssohn made of the scherzo movement from an octet for strings, Opus 27, which he wrote when he was 16.

He was, indeed, a composer of magical facility when he was young.

Beethoven Sonatas →

One of my favorite young pianists appeared for the 7 p. m. prelude concert to play two of Beethoven's sonatas, No. 1 of Opus 31 and Opus 110.

He is Claud Frank, who has made many appearances with the Boston Symphony Ochestra, and is a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. He is recording all 32 of the Beethoven sonatas for RCA.

Franks' most famous teacher, Arthur Schnabel, was known as an interpreter of Beethoven's piano music. He also recorded all of the sonatas and on the basis of that evidence and Frank's playing Friday, it may be reasonably assumed that Frank absorbed some of the best of Schnabel's view of Beethoven without his pedantry.

Constantly Expressive

The performances Friday were without excessive drama or mannerism. The music was constantly expressive without reaching extremes of dynamics or accent, and Frank revealed that his understanding of Beethoven is as graceful as his understanding of Mozart is elegant.

Grace seemed to be the most memorable characteristic of his playing, that and easily flowing, unforced continuity. His recordings should sell well.

Tonight Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, will make his first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
AUG 17 1968
New England Newsclip

Seventh Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 16 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

CLAUDE FRANK piano

BEETHOVEN

Sonata for piano in G major op. 31 no. 1

Sonata for piano in A flat major op. 110

Claude Frank plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Born in Nuremburg, Germany, CLAUDE FRANK was surrounded by music from his earliest childhood. He was six when he started learning the piano, and only five years later had a chance to play for Artur Schnabel. Encouraged to continue, he began to study with one of Schnabel's former pupils when his family moved to Paris shortly afterwards. Under the threat of the Nazi invasion, the Franks moved again, and eventually arrived in New York in 1941. Schnabel had moved too, and Frank became one of his students.

After service in the US Army, Claude Frank resumed his studies and in 1946 was at the Berkshire Music Center as a conducting student. He started teaching, but after a summer at Marlboro, Vermont, he turned to performing. In 1956 he made the first of his many European tours, and after his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch and the New York Philharmonic under Leonard Bernstein in 1959, he was engaged by most of the major symphony orchestras in the United States.

He has appeared many times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf during the last years, has made several recordings for RCA Victor with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and is a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Claude Frank is recording the complete sonatas of Beethoven for RCA Victor.

Mendelssohn, Beethoven Program Will Be Featured at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, Aug. 16 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist.

Incidental Music

The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the Midsummer Night's Dream Incidental Music, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts.

Both Miss Toohey, who is a 19-year-old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Leading Player

Narrator for the Midsummer Night's Dream excerpts will be Patricia Reardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall. Miss Reardon, a leading player for several seasons at the Stratford, Conn., Shakespeare Festival, is also a serious sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4).

The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf.

Cancelled by Illness

He replaces the orchestra's former music director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all - Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr .Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, No. 1, and Op. 110. The orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10.30 on Saturday morning for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music of Ravel and Dvorak.

Patricia Reardon will narrate Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf next Friday evening at Tanglewood in Lenox.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

AUG 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be featured as a soloist in a performance of Beethoven's Violin concerto in an all-Beethoven program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Tanglewood Featuring Mendelssohn, Beethoven

LENOX—The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening at 9. Erich Leinsdorf music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the g minor Piano Concerto, with Lillian Kallir as soloist.

The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the Midsummer Night's Dream Incidental Music, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts.

On Saturday evening, August 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4).

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the week-end begin with the Friday week-end Prelude at 7 p. m., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas. Op. 31, nol. and Op. 110.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,400

AUG 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Audience Is Enchanted by Mendelssohn Magic

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There was a fine, gentle mist falling over Tanglewood Friday night as Patricia Peardon, Erich Leinsdorf, about 45 girls from the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus and the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered nearly an hour of Mendelssohn's enchantment to 4688 listeners.

Faulty Reproduction

The enchantment came from Leinsdorf's combination of Mendelssohn's Overture (Opus 21) and Incidental Music (Opus 61) to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" interspersed with appropriate excerpts from the play chosen by the conductor.

The music is a classic among the scores dedicated to fairy queens and elves, and the damp air failed to diminish its magic, but, unfortunately Miss Peardon's narration was marred by faulty reproduction.

When she and the orchestra first presented this piece, her voice was augmented through a microphone hung around her neck, a decoration ill suited to her Elizabethan, princess-like appearance.

Better on Lawn

But her words were clearly understood, if my memory serves well, and the performance was one of the finest moments of the 1963 season.

Friday night she was speaking to a stand-up microphone, and most of her words were not understandable along the sides and rear of the shed.

Out on the lawn where a scattered handful of music lovers were huddled under blankets and umbrellas, she was easier to understand . . . probably because there were seven great speakers spread across the roof of the shed directing the sound over the lawn from microphones at the stage.

Wedding March

Be that as it may, the piece in this version includes 10 sections, one is the famous wedding march nearly everyone is married to, and the orchestra and girls chorus performed it beautifully . . . so did Miss Peardon, but she was to be appreciated abstractly for her appearance and animation rather than for Shakespeare's tale of gentle mystery.

Before intermission Lillian Kallir came out to play a perky and sprightly piano with the orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf. They did Mendelsshon's G Minor Concerto, Opus 25, with a good deal of light-footed verve.

She was pretty and bright in a scarlet gown, and she played in incisive articulation, and a cool, clean manner.

Dew Drops in Sun

The notes of her runs and decorations were spread out like shimmering dew drops in the sun, and the lyrical middle section was like the translucence of springtime trees screening the sun.

The little scherzo, which opened the program, had much the same easy, airy quality. It was an orchestration Mendelssohn made of the scherzo movement from an octet for strings, Opus 27, which he wrote when he was 16.

He was, indeed, a composer of magical facility when he was young.

Beethoven Sonatas →

One of my favorite young pianists appeared for the 7 p. m. prelude concert to play two of Beethoven's sonatas, No. 1 of Opus 31 and Opus 110.

He is Claud Frank, who has made many appearances with the Boston Symphony Ochestra, and is a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. He is recording all 32 of the Beethoven sonatas for RCA.

Franks' most famous teacher, Arthur Schnabel, was known as an interpreter of Beethoven's piano music. He also recorded all of the sonatas and on the basis of that evidence and Frank's playing Friday, it may be reasonably assumed that Frank absorbed some of the best of Schnabel's view of Beethoven without his pedantry.

Constantly Expressive

The performances Friday were without excessive drama or mannerism. The music was constantly expressive without reaching extremes of dynamics or accent, and Frank revealed that his understanding of Beethoven is as graceful as his understanding of Mozart is elegant.

Grace seemed to be the most memorable characteristic of his playing, that and easily flowing, unforced continuity. His recordings should sell well.

Tonight Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, will make his first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,484

AUG 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Seventh Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 16 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

CLAUDE FRANK piano

BEETHOVEN

Sonata for piano in G major op. 31 no. 1

Sonata for piano in A flat major op. 110

Claude Frank plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Born in Nuremburg, Germany, CLAUDE FRANK was surrounded by music from his earliest childhood. He was six when he started learning the piano, and only five years later had a chance to play for Artur Schnabel. Encouraged to continue, he began to study with one of Schnabel's former pupils when his family moved to Paris shortly afterwards. Under the threat of the Nazi invasion, the Franks moved again, and eventually arrived in New York in 1941. Schnabel had moved too, and Frank became one of his students.

After service in the US Army, Claude Frank resumed his studies and in 1946 was at the Berkshire Music Center as a conducting student. He started teaching, but after a summer at Marlboro, Vermont, he turned to performing. In 1956 he made the first of his many European tours, and after his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch and the New York Philharmonic under Leonard Bernstein in 1959, he was engaged by most of the major symphony orchestras in the United States.

He has appeared many times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf during the last years, has made several recordings for RCA Victor with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and is a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Claude Frank is recording the complete sonatas of Beethoven for RCA Victor.

66.

Berkshire Eagle 8/13/68

Movies TV Art

All-Mendelssohn Program Opens Tanglewood Weekend

The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will begin Friday evening at 9 with an all-Mendelssohn program. Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, the G Minor Piano Concerto, with soloist Lilian Kallir, and a performance of the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." The incidental music will feature the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, with Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, soprano soloists. Patricia Peardon will narrate.

On Saturday evening, Karl Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigeneia at Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and, in a first performance at Tanglewood, Dvorak's Symphony No. 8. Ancerl will replace Charles Munch, whose illness forced him to cancel all engagements.

Silverstein Is Soloist

Sunday afternoon's concert will be all-Beethoven. Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony, will play the Violin Concerto, and Leinsdorf will conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The weekend's events will begin with the Friday prelude concert at 7 p.m., when pianist Claude Frank will play two sonatas by Beethoven, Opus 31, No. 1 and Opus 110. The orchestra will present its weekly open rehearsal on Saturday morning at 10:30 for the benefit of the pension fund. On Sunday morning at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the ensembles of the Boston Symphony, will play music of Ravel and Dvorak.

Tanglewood-Parade Revised Schedule

The Berkshire Music Center has announced a revised schedule of events for the Tanglewood-on-Parade gala tomorrow.

The gates at Tanglewood will open at 1 p.m., and the afternoon's recitals will begin at 2 with the Boston University Young Artist Orchestra in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Other events during the afternoon will include chamber music, choral music by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus, a composers' forum and a dance program by the students of the Boston University Institute.

The Gala Concert in the Shed will begin at 8 p.m. The program will include the Brahms Academic Festival Overture, conducted by Charles Wilson; "As Quiet As . . ." by Colgrass, conducted by Gunther Schuller; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," and Wagner's music from "Die Gotterdammerung," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl will follow the concert.

Music and Emotion

The psychological relationships between music and emotion is described in a special two-part "Pantechnicon" Wednesdays, August 14 and 21 at 10 pm on WGBH radio.

Recorded in Boston at a meeting of the American Psychiatric Association, the program will be repeated Thursday, August 15 and 22 at 12 noon; Fridays August 16 and 23 at 5:30 pm and Sundays, August 17 and 24 at 5 pm. Participating in the symposium are British musicologist Deryck Cooke, New England Conservatory of Music President Gunther Schuller and John E. Snell, Director of the Outpatient Department at the Boston State Hospital.

Erich Leinsdorf and Karel Ancerl will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts to be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH-FM the week of August 11.

Leinsdorf directs an all-Brahms program Sunday at 2:30 pm as he conducts Brahms' "Tragic Overture", "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and Piano Concerto No. 2 with Gina Bachauer as soloist. The following Friday (Aug. 16) at 9 pm he offers an all-Mendelssohn concert, including the Scherzo from Octet for Strings, Piano Concerto in G minor (Lilian Kallir, soloist) and "Midsummer Night's Dream".

Karel Ancerl conducts Saturday, August 17 at 8 pm the Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" by Gluck. Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8.

BAY STATE BANNER
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Sunday 2.9 - 8/16

KAREL ANCERL . . . conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra since 1950, who will lead the Boston Symphony Saturday evening in lieu of Charles Munch, who dropped out because of ill health.

Tanglewood Offers Interesting Week

Tanglewood promises especially interesting programs and guest musicians during this next to final week of the Berkshire Music Festival.

After a prelude by Claude Frank on Friday at 7 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Boston Symphony in an all Mendelssohn program at 9. It will open with Scherzo from the Octet for Strings followed by the Piano Concerto in G Minor, featuring pianist Lilian Kallir. The final number of the evening will be A Midsummer Night's Dream with the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir and Patricia Peardon serving as Narrator.

On Saturday evening at 8 the program originally designed for the leadership of Charles Munch has been withdrawn due to the Conductor's ailing health. Instead the orchestra will be under the direction of Karel Ancerl who has chosen a different program as follows:

Gluck, Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis; Shostakovich, Symphony No. 1; Dvorak, Symphony No. 8 in G (old No. 4).

The 60-year-old Mr. Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra, and his appearances throughout the world as a guest conductor. This will be his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munch, former Music Director of the B.S.O., was to have conducted Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

Sunday afternoon (Aug. 18) at 2:30 Erich Leinsdorf will conduct an all-Beethoven program opening with the Fidelio Overture, following with a Violin Concerto featuring Joseph Silverstein, and closing with the famous Fifth Symphony.

Tuesday evening, Aug. 20, Arthur Fiedler and his popular "Boston Pops" will perform their annual Tanglewood concert. This year it will feature Peter Nero, pianist and composer, who will play Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F and his own composition, Fantasy and Improvisations.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, August 16, 1968

Mendelssohn, Beethoven Programs at Tanglewood

Mendelssohn and Beethoven programs and an appearance by guest conductor Karel Ancerl are features of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this weekend to be herd live from Tanglewood on WAMC-FM, 90.3 mc.

* * *

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, leads the all-Mendelssohn program, starting at 9 tonight. Included in the program are the Piano Concerto No. 1 with pianist Lillian Kallir as soloist; and a performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" featuring the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir.

Guest conductor Karel Ancerl will lead the orchestra in tomorrow's concert which starts at 8 p.m. The program includes Overture to Iphigenie en Aulide by Gluck, Symphony No. 1 in F, opus 10 by Shostakovich and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G, opus 88.

Erich Leinsdorf will return to conduct an all-Beethoven program starting at 2:30 p.m. Sunday. Violinist Joseph Silverstein will be featured soloist in a performance of the Beethoven Violin Concerto. Also on the program are The Fidelio Overture and Symphony No. 5.

WAMC, the FM station of Albany Medical College, is broadcasting live from Tanglewood each concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Festival for the third consecutive year.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,930

AUG 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Mendelssohn, Beethoven Programs At Tanglewood

The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday, Aug. 16, at 9 p. m.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the G-Minor Piano Concerto, with Lillian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over to a performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Incidental music, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. One, and Dvorak's Symphony No. Eight.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Leinsdorf will also conduct the "Fidelio" Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p. m., when pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, No. 1 and Op. 110. The Orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10:30 a. m. on Saturday, for the benefit of the Pension Fund. On Sunday morning at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play the music of Ravel and Dvorak.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, August 9, 1968

All-Mendelssohn Program to Begin With Scherzo at Tanglewood Tonight

The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkeshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program at 9 tonight in the shed at Tanglewood, Mass.

* * *

Erich Leisendorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, followed by the G Minor Piano Concerto with Lillian Kallir as sololist.

The second half of the evening will be devoted "Midsummer Night's Dream" Incidental Music, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts in the Mendelssohn work. Both Miss Toohey, a 19-year-old sophomore at Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are associate fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the "Midsummer Night's Dream" excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has done the narration previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall.

Miss Peardon, a leading player for several season at the Startford, Conn., Shakespeare Festival, is also a sculptress. This month, a special exhibit of her work is on display in the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On tomorrow evening's program, Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8. The Dvorak work will be heard for the first time at the festival.

Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at special invitation of Leinsdorf. He replaces the orchestra's former music director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally planned.

The concert Sunday afternoon will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist in the Violin Concerto. Leinsdorf will also conduct the "Fidelio" Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

Weekend events will be prefaced by the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. today, when pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31 and Op. 110.

The orchestra will give its weekly open rehearsal at 10:30 tomorrow morning, for benefit of the pension fund, and at 10:30 a.m. Sunday the Boston Trio, one of the ensembles of the Boston Symphony, will play music of Ravel and Dvorak.

Mendelssohn at Tanglewood

LENOX — The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program next Friday at 9.

Incidental Music

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Archestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will conduct a performance of the Piano Concerto in G Minor, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the Incidental Music to Midsummer Night's Dream, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, a 19-year-old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the Midsummer Night's Dream excerpts will be a leadng player for several seasons at the Stratford, Conn., Shakespeare Festival.

Czech to Conduct

Saturday night, Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to Iphigeniain Aulis, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (Old No. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the festival concerts. Ancerl was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, but made the trip early at the special invitation of Leinsdorf.

He replaces the orchestra's former music director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist in the violin concerto. Leinsdorf also will conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The weekend events begin with the Friday evening prelude at 7. Pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, No. 1, and Op. 110. The orchestra will give its weekly open rehearsal at 10.30 a. m. Saturday. At 10.30 a. m. Sunday, the Boston Trio, an ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music by Ravel and Dvorak.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
AUG 10 1968
New England Newsclip

CITIZEN (E)
WINSTED, CONN.
CIRC. 4000
AUG 10 1968
New England Newsclip

All-Mendelssohn Program Friday At Tanglewood Opens Weekend

The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, Aug. 16, at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entriely to a performance of the Midsummer Night's Dream Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a nineteen-year old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the Midsummer Night's Dream excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall. Miss Peardon, a leading player for several seasons at the Stratford, Connecticut, Shakespeare Festival, is also a serious sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4).The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf. He replaces the Orchestra's former Music Director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, No. 1, and Op. 110. The orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10:30 a.m. on Saturday morning, for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning at 10:30 a.m., the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music of Ravel and Dvorak.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Exciting Weekend Of Music Slated For Tanglewood

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.—The Seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, Aug. 16 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the g minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the Midsummer Night's Dream Incidental Music, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a 19-year-old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Jospeh Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, nol, and Op. 110. The orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10:30 on Saturday morning, for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music of Raval and Dvorak.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
AUG 12 1968
New England Newsclip

All-Mendelssohn Program Friday At Tanglewood

LENOX — The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will begin Friday night at 9 p.m. with an all-Mendelssohn program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The Boston Symphony orchestra that will perform the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, the G minor Piano Concerto with Lilian Kallir as soloist and the Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with vocal soloists Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie and narrator Patricia Peardon.

On Saturday at 8 p.m. Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8. Ancerl is substituting for Charles Munch, who is ill.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, will be soloist in Beethoven's Violin Concerto at Sunday's 2:30 concert. Leinsdorf will also conduct Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and the Symphony No. 5.

KAREL ANCERL, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, will conduct works by Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak at this Saturday's Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Tanglewood To Begin All Mendelsshon Program Fri.

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, — The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all - Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, August 16 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a nineteen - year old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the "Midsummer Night's Dream" excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall. Miss Peardon, a leading player for several seasons at the Stratford, Connecticut, Shakespeare Festival, is also a serious sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On August 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony no. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerss. Mr. Anceri, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf.

He replaces the Orchestra's former Music Director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all - Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, will play music of Ravel certo. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the "Fidelio" Overture and the Fifth Symphony

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 pm., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, nol, and Op. 110. The Orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10:30 on Saturday morning, for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music o fRavel and Dvorak.

HUDSON REGISTER STAR
Friday, August 16, 1968

Berkshire To Feature Mendelssohn, Beethoven

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS–The seventh weekend of the 1968 Bershir Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on tonght at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boson Symphony Orchestra, will o pen the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the g minor Piano Concerto, with Liliam Kallir as soloist.

The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the 'MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey hnd Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a nineteen-year old sophmore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the 'MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM' excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boson at Symphony Hall. Miss Peardon, a leading player for several sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On Saturday evening, August 17, KarelAncerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consiting of Gluck's Overtue to 'IPHIGENIA IN AULIS,' Shostakovich's Symphony no. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). 'the Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Jos eph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra as soloist in th violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the "FIDELIO' Overture and th Fifth Symphony.

The vents of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. when the pianist Claude Frank will play tow Beethoven sonatas, op. 31, nol, and Op. 110. The Orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehersal at 10.30 on Saturday morning. for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10.30 ,the Boston Trio, on of the Ensembles of the Boston Sympnony Orchestra,. will play music of Ravel and Dvorakc.

ENTERPRISE (E)
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
CIRC. 4600
AUG 12 1968
New England Newsclip

Mendelssohn at Tanglewood

LENOX — The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program next Friday at 9.

Incidental Music

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Archestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will conduct a performance of the Piano Concerto in G Minor, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the Incidental Music to Midsummer Night's Dream, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, a 19-year-old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the Midsummer Night's Dream excerpts will be a leadng player for several seasons at the Stratford, Conn., Shakespeare Festival.

Czech to Conduct

Saturday night, Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to Iphigeniain Aulis, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (Old No. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the festival concerts. Ancerl was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, but made the trip early at the special invitation of Leinsdorf.

He replaces the orchestra's former music director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist in the violin concerto. Leinsdorf also will conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The weekend events begin with the Friday evening prelude at 7. Pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, No. 1, and Op. 110. The orchestra will give its weekly open rehearsal at 10.30 a. m. Saturday. At 10.30 a. m. Sunday, the Boston Trio, an ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music by Ravel and Dvorak.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIR. 77,434

AUG 10 1968 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN (E)
WINSTED, CONN.
CIRC. 4000

AUG 10 1968 New England Newsclip

All-Mendelssohn Program Friday At Tanglewood Opens Weekend

The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, Aug. 16, at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entriely to a performance of the Midsummer Night's Dream Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a nineteen-year old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the Midsummer Night's Dream excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall. Miss Peardon, a leading player for several seasons at the Stratford, Connecticut, Shakespeare Festival, is also a serious sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4).The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf. He replaces the Orchestra's former Music Director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, nol, and Op. 110. The orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10:30 on Saturday morning, for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music of Ravel and Dvorak.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 5,000

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Exciting Weekend Of Music Slated For Tanglewood

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.—The Seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, Aug. 16 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the g minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the Midsummer Night's Dream Incidental Music, with the orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a 19-year-old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Jospeh Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, nol, and Op. 110. The orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10:30 on Saturday morning, for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music of Raval and Dvorak.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIR. 230,517

AUG 12 1968 New England Newsclip

All-Mendelssohn Program Friday At Tanglewood

LENOX — The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will begin Friday night at 9 p.m. with an all-Mendelssohn program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The Boston Symphony orchestra that will perform the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, the G minor Piano Concerto with Lilian Kallir as soloist and the Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with vocal soloists Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie and narrator Patricia Peardon.

On Saturday at 8 p.m. Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8. Ancerl is substituting for Charles Munch, who is ill.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, will be soloist in Beethoven's Violin Concerto at Sunday's 2:30 concert. Leinsdorf will also conduct Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and the Symphony No. 5.

KAREL ANCERL, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, will conduct works by Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak at this Saturday's Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Tanglewood To Begin All Mendelsshon Program Fri.

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX. — The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all - Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, August 16 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a nineteen - year old sophomore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the "Midsummer Night's Dream" excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall. Miss Peardon, a leading player for several seasons at the Stratford, Connecticut, Shakespeare Festival, is also a serious sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On August 17, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony no. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerss. Mr. Anceri, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf.

He replaces the Orchestra's former Music Director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all - Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, will play music of Ravel certo. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the "Fidelio" Overture and the Fifth Symphony

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 pm., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, Op. 31, nol, and Op. 110. The Orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10:30 on Saturday morning, for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music o fRavel and Dvorak.

HUDSON REGISTER STAR
Friday, August 16, 1968

Berkshire To Feature Mendelssohn, Beethoven

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS–The seventh weekend of the 1968 Bershir Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on tonght at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boson Symphony Orchestra will o pen the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the g minor Piano Concerto, with Liliam Kallir as soloist.

The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the 'MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey hnd Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a nineteen-year old sophmore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the 'MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM' excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boson at Symphony Hall. Miss Peardon, a leading player for several sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

On Saturday evening, August 17, KarelAncerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consiting of Gluck's Overtue to 'IPHIGENIA IN AULIS,' Shostakovich's Symphony no. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). 'the Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Jos eph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra as soloist in th violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the "FIDELIO' Overture and th Fifth Symphony.

The vents of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. when the pianist Claude Frank will play tow Beethoven sonatas, op. 31, nol, and Op. 110. The Orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehersal at 10.30 on Saturday morning. for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10.30 .the Boston Trio, on of the Ensembles of the Boston Sympnony Orchestra, will play music of Ravel and Dvorakc.

ENTERPRISE (E)
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
CIRC. 4600

AUG 12 1968 New England Newsclip

68.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 16 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MENDELSSOHN

Scherzo from Octet in E flat for strings op. 20*

Piano concerto no. 1 in G minor op. 25
Molto allegro con fuoco
Andante
Presto: molto allegro e vivace
LILIAN KALLIR

intermission

Overture (op. 21) and incidental music (op. 61) to Shakespeare's 'A midsummer night's dream'*
Overture
Scherzo
March of the fairies
Song with chorus: You spotted snakes
Intermezzo
Nocturne
Fanfare
Dance of the clowns (Bergomask)
Wedding march
Finale

PATRICIA PEARDON narrator
KATHLEEN TOOHEY soprano
LAURY CHRISTIE soprano
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR and BERKSHIRE CHORUS
CHARLES WILSON director
JOHN OLIVER assistant director

Lilian Kallir plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 19

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 17, 1968

All-Mendelssohn at Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

The all Mendelssohn program at Tanglewood last night was one of the most enjoyable events of the season.

The first half consisted of the Scherzo from the octet for strings, and the Piano Concerto in G minor with Lilian Kallir as soloist.

Never has the Boston Symphony string section sounded better than it did in the Scherzo. The precision was perfect and the playing had the deftness, style, and delicacy so necessary in playing Mendelssohn.

Mendelssohn wrote his piano concerto in G minor primarily for his own use for in addition to being a ranking composer he was one of the foremost pianists of his time.

It is an exhibition piece pure and simple with contrasting bravura and melodic sections with more emphasis on the technical passages.

Lilian Kallir is a brilliant young pianist who has played with most of the major orchestras here and abroad. She tossed off the technical passages of the concerto with great assurance and ease, and in the slow movement where a different kind of playing was required, the tone had a fine singing quality.

The final presto with its rapid pace and sparkling clear passage work brought the concerto to a brilliant conclusion. The audience loved it and applauded her to the hilt.

LILLIAN KALLIR

However this is one of the Mendelssohn pieces that sounds dated. The technical writing sounds old fashioned, a quality not present in the violin concerto or the other pieces on the program. This somewhat dated sound is also characteristic of the Von Weber Concert Piece for piano and orchestra heard earlier in the season.

The performance of the Overture and incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" required the orchestra, the women's sections of the Tanglewood and Berkshire choruses, Kathleen Toohey and Laury Christie, sopranos, and Patricia Peardon, a most attractive and capable narrator who read the speeches of Shakespear selected by Mr. Leinsdorf to go with the score.

The music had the qualities of imagination, delicacy and grace to envoke for us the magic world of fantasy in the play. Incidentally it was good to hear clearly and distintly the words of Shakespeare which inspired the music.

We feel that this was one of the finer performances of the Tanglewood season.

Saturday night Karel Ancerl will be the guest conductor in music by Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak.

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS . . . PATRICIA PEARDON will narrate Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on Friday evening, August 16.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD MASS.
111,000
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Aug. 16: PATRICIA PEARDON will narrate Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream in a concert with the Boston Symphone Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. (See Entertainment calendar).

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,150
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GT. BARRINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,400
047
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Mendelssohn Program At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX—The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program tomorrow evening. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the g minor Piano Concerto, with Liliam Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts.

Narrator for the "Midsummer Night's Dream" excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall.

On Saturday evening, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis", Shostakovich's Symphony no. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf. He replaces the Orchestra's former Music Director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the "Fidelio" Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

68.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 16 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MENDELSSOHN

Scherzo from Octet in E flat for strings op. 20*

Piano concerto no. 1 in G minor op. 25
Molto allegro con fuoco
Andante
Presto: molto allegro e vivace

LILIAN KALLIR

intermission

Overture (op. 21) and incidental music (op. 61) to Shakespeare's 'A midsummer night's dream'*
Overture
Scherzo
March of the fairies
Song with chorus: You spotted snakes
Intermezzo
Nocturne
Fanfare
Dance of the clowns (Bergomask)
Wedding march
Finale

PATRICIA PEARDON narrator
KATHLEEN TOOHEY soprano
LAURY CHRISTIE soprano
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR and BERKSHIRE CHORUS
CHARLES WILSON director
JOHN OLIVER assistant director

Lilian Kallir plays the Steinway piano

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 19

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 17, 1968

All-Mendelssohn at Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

The all Mendelssohn program at Tanglewood last night was one of the most enjoyable events of the season.

The first half consisted of the Scherzo from the octet for strings, and the Piano Concerto in G minor with Lilian Kallir as soloist.

Never has the Boston Symphony string section sounded better than it did in the Scherzo. The precision was perfect and the playing had the deftness, style, and delicacy so necessary in playing Mendelssohn.

Mendelssohn wrote his piano concerto in G minor primarily for his own use for in addition to being a ranking composer he was one of the foremost pianists of his time.

It is an exhibition piece pure and simple with contrasting bravura and melodic sections with more emphasis on the technical passages.

Lilian Kallir is a brilliant young pianist who has played with most of the major orchestras here and abroad. She tossed off the technical passages of the concerto with great assurance and ease, and in the slow movement where a different kind of playing was required, the tone had a fine singing quality.

The final presto with its rapid pace and sparkling clear passage work brought the concerto to a brilliant conclusion. The audience loved it and applaudel her to the hilt.

LILLIAN KALLIR

However this is one of the Mendelssohn pieces that sounds dated. The technical writing sounds old fashioned, a quality not present in the violin concerto or the other pieces on the program. This somewhat dated sound is also characteristic of the Von Weber Concert Piece for piano and orchestra heard earlier in the season.

The performance of the Overture and incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" required the orchestra, the women's sections of the Tanglewood and Berkshire choruses, Kathleen Toohey and Laury Christie, sopranos, and Patricia Peardon, a most attractive and capable narrator who read the speeches of Shakespear selected by Mr. Leinsdorf to go with the score.

The music had the qualities of imagination, delicacy and grace to envoke for us the magic world of fantasy in the play. Incidentally it was good to hear clearly and distintly the words of Shakespeare which inspired the music.

We feel that this was one of the finer performances of the Tanglewood season.

Saturday night Karel Ancerl will be the guest conductor in music by Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak.

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS . . . PATRICIA PEARDON will narrate Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on Friday evening, August 16.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
111 000
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Aug. 16: PATRICIA PEARDON will narrate Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream in a concert with the Boston Symphone Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. (See Entertainment calendar).

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3.150
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GT. BARRINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC 3.100
047
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Mendelssohn Program At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX—The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program tomorrow evening. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the g minor Piano Concerto, with Liliam Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts.

Narrator for the "Midsummer Night's Dream" excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall.

On Saturday evening, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis", Shostakovich's Symphony no. 1, and Dvorak's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf. He replaces the Orchestra's former Music Director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the "Fidelio" Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

Tanglewood Features Leinsdorf On Friday

The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival begins with an all-Mendelssohn program on Friday evening, at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the program with the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, after which he will lead a performance of the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lilian Kallir as soloist. The second half of the evening will be given over entirely to a performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Incidental Music, with the Orchestra joined by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, sopranos, sing the solo parts. Both Miss Toohey, who is a nineteen-year old sophmore at the Hartt College of Music in Hartford, and Miss Christie, who has sung extensively in Europe, are Associate Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center.

Narrator for the "Midsummer Night's Dream" excerpts will be Patricia Peardon, who has narrated these excerpts previously both at Tanglewood and in Boston at Symphony Hall. Miss Peardon, a leading player for several seasons at the Stratford, Connecticut, Shakespeare Festival, is also a serious sculptress; during the month of August, a special exhibit of her work is on display at the library in Lenox, near Tanglewood.

Saturday

On Saturday evening, Karel Ancerl, distinguished conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony no. 8 (old no. 4). The Dvorak will be heard for the first time at the Festival concerts. Mr. Ancerl, who was not scheduled to conduct in this country until later this summer, has made the trip early at the special invitation of Mr. Leinsdorf. He replaces the Orchestra's former Music Director, Charles Munch, who was prevented by illness from conducting as originally scheduled.

Sunday

Sunday afternoon's concert will be an all-Beethoven program with Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist in the violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The events of the weekend begin with the Friday Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m., when the pianist Claude Frank will play two Beethoven sonatas, op. 31, nol, and op. 110. The Orchestra will give its weekly Open Rehearsal at 10:30 on Saturday morning, for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and on Sunday morning, at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play music of Ravel and Dvorak.

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 15,900
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,250
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

All-Mendelssohn Program Opens Tanglewood Weekend

The seventh weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival, will begin Friday evening at 9 with an all-Mendelssohn program. Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Scherzo from the Octet for Strings, the G Minor Piano Concerto, with soloist Lilian Kallir, and a performance of the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." The incidental music will feature the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, with Kathleen Toohey and Laurie Christie, soprano soloists. Patricia Peardon will narrate.

On Saturday evening, Karl Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, will conduct a program consisting of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigeneia at Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and, in a first performance at Tanglewood, Dvorak's Symphony No. 8. Ancerl will replace Charles Munch, whose illness forced him to cancel all engagements.

Silverstein Is Soloist

Sunday afternoon's concert will be all-Beethoven. Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony, will play the Violin Concerto, and Leinsdorf will conduct the Fidelio Overture and the Fifth Symphony.

The weekend's events will begin with the Friday prelude concert at 7 p.m., when pianist Claude Frank will play two sonatas by Beethoven, Opus 31, No. 1 and Opus 110. The orchestra will present its weekly open rehearsal on Saturday morning at 10:30 for the benefit of the pension fund. On Sunday morning at 10:30, the Boston Trio, one of the ensembles of the Boston Symphony, will play music of Ravel and Dvorak.

Tanglewood-Parade Revised Schedule

The Berkshire Music Center has announced a revised schedule of events for the Tanglewood-on-Parade gala tomorrow.

The gates at Tanglewood will open at 1 p.m., and the afternoon's recitals will begin at 2 with the Boston University Young Artist Orchestra in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Other events during the afternoon will include chamber music, choral music by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus, a composers' forum and a dance program by the students of the Boston University Institute.

The Gala Concert in the Shed will begin at 8 p.m. The program will include the Brahms Academic Festival Overture, conducted by Charles Wilson; "As Quiet As . . ." by Colgrass, conducted by Gunther Schuller; Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," and Wagner's music from "Die Gotterdammerung," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl will follow the concert.

Titania Speaks

Patricia Peardon will narrate Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on Friday evening, August 16, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

BEE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
AUG 9 1968 New England Newsclip

70.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday August 17 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

KAREL ANCERL conductor

GLUCK	Overture to 'Iphigénie en Aulide'†
SHOSTAKOVICH	Symphony no. 1 in F major op. 10†
	Allegretto - allegro non troppo
	Allegro
	Lento
	Allegro molto

intermission

DVOŘÁK	Symphony no. 8 in G major op. 88*
	Allegro con brio
	Adagio
	Allegretto grazioso
	Finale: allegro ma non troppo

†First performance at the Festival concerts

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 24

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Czech Conductor Inspires Enthusiasm at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The outstanding event of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend was the Saturday night debut of Karel Ancerl conducting the Boston Symphony.

He is regular conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra and crossed the Atlantic especially for this concert at Tanglewood.

We have rarely seen the Boston Symphony men express such enthusiasm for a guest conductor.

At one point they refused to rise at his bidding, giving him full benefit of the applause. They even joined the audience in rhythmic hand-clapping, something new for Tanglewood.

With it all, Ancerl impressed more as a musician's conductor than a dynamic podium personality.

The man is medium height, 60 years old, thin, distinguished looking. With a total absence of melodrama, every move he made was pertinent, moderate and clear.

He conducted from memory in a program tailored to his best points.

Gluck's 'Iphigenia'

Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" tends to pale when matched with corresponding 18th century works. Ancerl made it sound big without forced volume. Everyone was zealously attentive to notes and the conductor's wishes in balances, accents, dynamics.

After a hesitant start, Shostakovich's First Symphony sailed along with good momentum, uncovering many excellent features.

Ancerl took the dance movement at racetrack speed with exhilirating results and no pronounced blemishes. The Lento alternated between soft laments and full-voiced anguish. The rowdy Finale moved nervously to a blatant, bursting climax.

Special interest was focussed on Ancerl's conducting of Symphony No. 8 in G major by his fellow countryman, Dvorak.

Afternoon Concert

The work was fully immersed in the Slavic tradition, clearly the conductor's own language. Strings were particularly helpful in making it a rapturous experience.

Audience attendance for the weekend was 23,331, of whom 10,345 attended yesterday afternoon to hear Erich Leinsdorf conduct the orchestra with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

It was an all-Bethoven program, including the "Fidelio" Overture, Violin Concerto, and Fifth Symphony.

Silverstein's musicianship was sound, tone vibrant if not large, and technique reliable. Orchestral interludes had symphonic intensity, but elsewhere Leinsdorf made skillful adjustments to conform with the solist's tone and style.

The Rondo didn't have 'ull sparkle but the solo part was played efficiently. The cadenza was on the verge of brilliance.

Fifth Symphony received an above-standard performance. Leinsdorf stayed close to tradition in interpretive matters. The orchestra did outstanding work, notably the string basses in challenging passages of the Scherzo and the brasses with spotless, penetrating tone in the Finale.

The "Fidelio" Overture was far less polished. One sensed that Lainsdorf wasn't too pleased, since he failed to return to stage center for his one curtain call.

Leinsdorf did attempt neatly chiselled phrases with flexibility within. Intonation was faulty, conspicuously in brass.

Tragedy Precedes Friday Concert

LENOX — Unless they sensed a slight listlessness in the performance, Friday night's audience of 4,688 was unaware that anything was amiss at the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh week.

Samuel Diamond didn't show up for rehersal that morning to take his place in the second violin section of the Boston Symphony.

Orchestral management put through a call to his hotel in Pittsfield. He was discovered dead in bed, and his death was attributed by a medical examiner to a heart attack.

Mr. Diamond, 75, was the oldest member of the orchestra in length of service. This was his 50th year with the orchestra.

Another undermining development was the hospitalization on the previous night, Thursday, of Norman S. Shirk, the orchestra's assistant manager, for what was described as a heart attack. Yesterday, Pittsfield General Hospital reported Shirk to be in "fair condition."

Shirk is known in Worcester because he was manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra during the time of its appearances at the Worcester Music Festival.

Friday night's program certainly didn't lend itself to such emotional reverses.

It was all Mendelssohn and contained some of the composer's most whimsical works.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the orchestra in the Scherzo from Octet in E flat for strings, Opus 20, and the overture and incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Soloists for "Midsummer Night's Dream" were Patricia Peardon, narrator; Kathleen Toohey and Laury Christie, sopranos. Fifty female singers were from the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

Lilian Kallir was soloist in Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Opus 25.

Much of the lightsome spirit of the "Midsummer" music was stimulated by the blond and beautiful Miss Peardon. She reacted exulantly to very phrase of the music and punctuated the nine sections (following the overture) in a rich speaking voice that savored every syllable of the Shakesepere text.

The commentary not only kept the audience informed of events but seemed to spur the orchestra to match her enthusiasm.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Czech Conductor To Replace Munch At BSO Concert

Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czechoslovakian Philharmonic, will replace the ailing Charles Munch at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Tanglewood on Aug. 17. Munch was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," which has been canceled. A new program will be announced in the near future.

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 11, 1968

ON THE PODIUM, Karl Ancerl will take over the podium from ailing Charles Munch to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert Saturday at 8 p.m. at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will lead the musicians in Gluck's "Overture to Iphigenia in Aulus"; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorzak's Symphony No. 8 in G. Ancerl, 60 has been conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra since 1950.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 92,350

AUG 19 1968 New England Newsclip

POST (E.)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 380,764

JUL 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Ancerl Leads at Tanglewood

Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 17 at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Mass. His program includes Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's "Symphony No. 1" and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 8 in G." Ancerl will be replacing the ailing Charles Munch originally scheduled to conduct the concert.

CZECH CONDUCTOR Karel Ancerl will make his Boston Symphony debut Saturday at Tanglewood as a replacement for Charles Munch. It will be at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed, featuring works of Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 16 1968 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

AUG 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Saturday, Aug. 17

Ancerl to Conduct Berkshire Concert

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the orchestra under the direction of Karel Ancerl on Saturday, Aug. 17, when Mr. Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by the ailing Charles Munch, at Tanglewood.

PROGRAM

GLUCK Overture to IPHIGENIA IN AULIS
SHOSTAKOVICH Symphony no. 1
DVORAK Symphony no. 8 in G (old no. 4)

The 60 year old Mr. Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra, and his appearances throughout the

KAREL ANCERL

the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munich, former music director of the B.S.O. was to have conducted Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

Illness Cancels Engagement

"We are delighted to welcome Karel Ancerl to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Tanglewood," said Music Director Erich Leinsdorf in a statement issued when he announced Mr. Ancerl's program, "though we regret that it should be occasioned by the illness of Charles Munch, who holds a very special place in our hearts and to whom we send our warmest good wishes. We are very grateful to Mr. Ancerl for kindly revising his plans and coming early to this country for his first conducting appearances of the season."

70.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday August 17 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

KAREL ANCERL conductor

GLUCK	Overture to 'Iphigénie en Aulide'†
SHOSTAKOVICH	Symphony no. 1 in F major op. 10†
	Allegretto - allegro non troppo
	Allegro
	Lento
	Allegro molto
intermission
DVOŘÁK	Symphony no. 8 in G major op. 88*
	Allegro con brio
	Adagio
	Allegretto grazioso
	Finale: allegro ma non troppo

†First performance at the Festival concerts

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 24

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Czech Conductor Inspires Enthusiasm at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The outstanding event of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend was the Saturday night debut of Karel Ancerl conducting the Boston Symphony.

He is regular conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra and crossed the Atlantic especially for this concert at Tanglewood.

We have rarely seen the Boston Symphony men express such enthusiasm for a guest conductor.

At one point they refused to rise at his bidding, giving him full benefit of the applause. They even joined the audience in rhythmic hand-clapping, something new for Tanglewood.

With it all, Ancerl impressed more as a musician's conductor than a dynamic podium personality.

The man is medium height, 60 years old, thin, distinguished looking. With a total absence of melodrama, every move he made was pertinent, moderate and clear.

He conducted from memory in a program tailored to his best points.

Gluck's 'Iphigenia'

Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" tends to pale when matched with corresponding 18th century works. Ancerl made it sound big without forced volume. Everyone was zealously attentive to notes and the conductor's wishes in balances, accents, dynamics.

After a hesitant start, Shostakovich's First Symphony sailed along with good momentum, uncovering many excellent features.

Ancerl took the dance movement at racetrack speed with exhilirating results and no pronounced blemishes. The Lento alternated between soft laments and full-voiced anguish. The rowdy Finale moved nervously to a blatant, bursting climax.

Special interest was focussed on Ancerl's conducting of Symphony No. 8 in G major by his fellow countryman, Dvorak.

Afternoon Concert

The work was fully immersed in the Slavic tradition, clearly the conductor's own language. Strings were particularly helpful in making it a rapturous experience.

Audience attendance for the weekend was 23,331, of whom 10,345 attended yesterday afternoon to hear Erich Leinsdorf conduct the orchestra with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

It was an all-Bethoven program, including the "Fidelio" Overture, Violin Concerto, and Fifth Symphony.

Silverstein's musicianship was sound, tone vibrant if not large, and technique reliable. Orchestral interludes had symphonic intensity, but elsewhere Leinsdorf made skillful adjustments to conform with the solist's tone and style.

The Rondo didn't have 'ull sparkle but the solo part was played efficiently. The cadenza was on the verge of brilliance.

Fifth Symphony received an above-standard performance. Leinsdorf stayed close to tradition in interpretive matters. The orchestra did outstanding work, notably the string basses in challenging passages of the Scherzo and the brasses with spotless, penetrating tone in the Finale.

The "Fidelio" Overture was far less polished. One sensed that Lainsdorf wasn't too pleased, since he failed to return to stage center for his one curtain call.

Leinsdorf did attempt neatly chiselled phrases with flexibility within. Intonation was faulty, conspicuously in brass.

Another undermining development was the hospitalization on the previous night, Thursday, of Norman S. Shirk, the orchestra's assistant manager, for what was described as a heart attack. Yesterday, Pittsfield General Hospital reported Shirk to be in "fair condition."

Shirk is known in Worcester because he was manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra during the time of its appearances at the Worcester Music Festival.

Friday night's program certainly didn't lend itself to such emotional reverses.

It was all Mendelssohn and contained some of the composer's most whimsical works.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the orchestra in the Scherzo from Octet in E flat for strings, Opus 20, and the overture and incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Soloists for "Midsummer Night's Dream" were Patricia Peardon, narrator; Kathleen Toohey and Laury Christie, sopranos. Fifty female singers were from the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

Lilian Kallir was soloist in Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Opus 25.

Much of the lightsome spirit of the "Midsummer" music was stimulated by the blond and beautiful Miss Peardon. She reacted exulantly to very phrase of the music and punctuated the nine sections (following the overture) in a rich speaking voice that savored every syllable of the Shakesepere text.

The commentary not only kept the audience informed of events but seemed to spur the orchestra to match her enthusiasm.

Tragedy Precedes Friday Concert

LENOX — Unless they sensed a slight listlessness in the performance, Friday night's audience of 4,688 was unaware that anything was amiss at the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh week.

Samuel Diamond didn't show up for rehersal that morning to take his place in the second violin section of the Boston Symphony.

Orchestral management put through a call to his hotel in Pittsfield. He was discovered dead in bed, and his death was attributed by a medical examiner to a heart attack.

Mr. Diamond, 75, was the oldest member of the orchestra in length of service. This was his 50th year with the orchestra.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Czech Conductor To Replace Munch At BSO Concert

Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czechoslovakian Philharmonic, will replace the ailing Charles Munch at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Tanglewood on Aug. 17. Munch was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," which has been canceled. A new program will be announced in the near future.

ON THE PODIUM. Karl Ancerl will take over the podium from ailing Charles Munch to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert Saturday at 8 p.m. at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will lead the musicians in Gluck's "Overture to Iphigenia in Aulus"; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorzak's Symphony No. 8 in G. Ancerl, 60 has been conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra since 1950.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.

AUG 19 1968

New England Newsclip

POST (E.)
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JUL 26 1968

New England Newsclip

Ancerl Leads at Tanglewood

Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 17 at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Mass. His program includes Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's "Symphony No. 1" and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 8 in G." Ancerl will be replacing the ailing Charles Munch originally scheduled to conduct the concert.

CZECH CONDUCTOR
Karel Ancerl will make his Boston Symphony debut Saturday at Tanglewood as a replacement for Charles Munch. It will be at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed, featuring works of Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,700

AUG 16 1968

New England Newsclip

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

AUG 11 1968

New England Newsclip

Saturday, Aug. 17

Ancerl to Conduct Berkshire Concert

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the orchestra under the direction of Karel Ancerl on Saturday, Aug. 17, when Mr. Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by the ailing Charles Munch, at Tanglewood.

PROGRAM

GLUCK Overture to IPHIGENIA IN AULIS
SHOSTAKOVICH Symphony no. 1
DVORAK Symphony no. 8 in G (old no. 4)

The 60 year old Mr. Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra, and his appearances throughout the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

KAREL ANCERL

Mr. Munich, former music director of the B.S.O. was to have conducted Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

Illness Cancels Engagement

"We are delighted to welcome Karel Ancerl to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Tanglewood," said Music Director Erich Leinsdorf in a statement issued when he announced Mr. Ancerl's program, "though we regret that it should be occasioned by the illness of Charles Munch, who holds a very special place in our hearts and to whom we send our warmest good wishes. We are very grateful to Mr. Ancerl for kindly revising his plans and coming early to this country for his first conducting appearances of the season."

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., JULY 28, 1968

Earl J. Dias Says:

Czech Conductor a Hit At Tanglewood Concert

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

AUG 20 1968

New England Newsclip

Last weekend's festivities at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were favored by bright, cool weather that made me recall two crisp days I once spent in August in Helsinki.

Highlight of the weekend was the appearance on Saturday night of Karel Ancerl as guest conductor. Ancerl, who is 60, is a slim, gray-haired man who has won an enviable reputation as conductor of the Czech Philharmonic. For his debut with the Boston Symphony, he chose to perform Gluck's "Overture to 'Ipphigenie en Aulide,'" Shostakovich's "Symphony No. 1 in F Major," and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 8 in G Major."

Ancerl directs with a sure and steady beat and with much grace and passion. Moreover, he obviously had the orchestra on his side (the ensemble played brilliantly), and he won an ovation at the end of the concert—an ovation that was perhaps partly for his musicianship and partly because of the audience's warm feelings toward Ancerl's native land in the light of current developments there.

Particularly Responsive

I thought that the orchestra was particularly responsive in the genial Shostakovich. As for the Dvorak with its many variations on folk tunes, Ancerl, as might be expected, gave a warm and bright reading of this work by his fellow Czech. Ancerl, incidentally, will become music director of the Toronto Symphony during the 1969-70 season.

Friday night's concert was preceded by a prelude during which pianist Claude Frank performed two Beethoven sonatas, the "G Major, Opus 31, No. 1" and the "A Flat Major, Opus 110." Mr. Frank performed as ably as I have ever heard him, communicating the power and the introversion of the two selections.

3 Mendelssohn Works

The regular program, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, featured three Mendelssohn works —the "Scherzo from Octet in E Flat for Strings," the "Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor," and the Overture and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with Patricia Peardon as an ultra-dramatic narrator, solo work by sopranos Kathleen Toohey and Laury Christie, and vocal accompaniment by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

Mendelssohn, of course, is easy to take on a pleasant, comfortable August evening. The Scherzo skipped along delicately and subtly; Lillian Kallir was an excellent, lady-like soloist in the melodie and good-natured piano concerto, and the incidental music to Shakespeare's early masterpiece was, as always, inordinately appealing and rhythmically contagious.

All-Beethoven Concert

For the Sunday afternoon program, Mr. Leinsdorf offered an all-Beethoven concert — the "Overture to Fidelio," the "Violin Concerto in D Major," with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and the "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor." Certainly, there is not much new to be said about these familiar works.

Violinist Silverstein gave a beautifully-controlled and technically impeccable reading of the concerto—but a reading lacking in much emotional impact. As for the "Fifth," Mr. Leinsdorf's reading was impressive but very rapid—a fact which enabled all of us to get to an unusually early cocktail hour.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, August 19, 1968

Ancerl's Baton Spirited

Tanglewood Has Rousing Night

By JAKE SHERMAN

By Tanglewood standards Saturday night's crowd was not a large one, but in the volume and enthusiasm of its cheers it more than made up for what it lacked in numbers.

The occasion was the first appearance of Czech conductor Karel Ancerl with the Boston Symphony, a comination which produced one of the most spirited evenings of music we have heard in the Berkshires all season.

The program — Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," Shostakovich's First Symphony and Dvorak's Eight Symphony — was an interesting one but far from representing these composers at their best. The biggest tribute to Ancerl and the Boston was that they were able to do so much with it.

Best Offering

By far the most engaging work of the evening was the Shostakovich written by the composer at the age of 20.

It's a happy hodgepodge of melodies which in its use of plucked strings, brass and drums clearly shows itself a forerunner of the more celebrated Fifth Symphony. This early work, however, possesses little of the drive or strength of purpose which characterized the later one.

It remains a fun piece to play though nnd provoked the usually businesslike Boston to a surprising zest and gaiety. Some droll, honky-tonk piano riffs in the Allegro movement even prompted some of the usually granite-faced violinists to smile.

Theme Explained

The program notes explain that one theme in the symphony has to do with a struggle between a grasshopper and an ant. Another is supposed to be the musical evocation of a Hans Christian Andersen fairy tale called "The Little Mermaid."

It's certainly not necessary to know these things in order to enjoy this symphony, however, and you will enjoy it, provided, of course, that you're not one of those for whom music has to be either full of deep meanings or else an exercise in the formal beauty of composition.

KAREL ANCERL

Dvorak's Eighth, written in 1889, rflects the Czech composer's attraction to folk melodies and peasant dance rythms.

The first movement seems an overelaboration of a fairly skimpy theme, but a haunting, gypsy melody is introduced in the second with some fine passages for strings. The climax is certainly dramatic enough but appears arbitrary.

Horns Excel

The Boston gave the work an excellent performance. The powerful and strident horns which blare forth in the last movement to suggest a peasant dance were especially well done.

Ancerl, presently conductor of the Czech Philharmonic and slated to take over the Toronto Symphony in 1969, is the kind of conductor you watch to find out what that art is all about.

His movements are always a split second ahead of the orchestra so that you know he knows the score like the back of his hand. And he's plenty demonstrative, too, crouching or rocking up on his toes to get the effect he wants, though never merely exhibitionistic.

Rousing Soud

His sound is full and rousing yet always well-defined, and the switches in tempo and volume ar as clean as one could ask.

Erich Leisdorf led the Boeton Symphony Sunday afternoon in an all-Beethoven program. Featured were the Overture to "Fidelio," and D major Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein, soloist, and the Fifth Symphony.

An all-Mendelssohm program under Leinsdorf Friday night included the Scherzo movement from the E-flat Octet for strings, the First Piano Concerto and the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

AUG 18 1968

New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Guest Conductor Ancerl Shows Color, Authority

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —Karel Ancerl made a strong impression Saturday night on his first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He conducted Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak with color and authority.

Conducting Since '51

Ancerl has been music director and conductor of the Czech Philharmonic since 1951 and will be conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra starting with the 1969-70 season.

He was at Tanglewood Saturday as a replacement for Charles Munch who contracted pneumonia last spring and canceled his summer commitments on his doctor's advice. There was no suggestion Saturday that he would not appear for a guest performance in Boston next winter.

Ancerl is a man of slight stature, near-white hair and lithe motion. His podium manner Saturday was purposeful, direct and businesslike. He was agile, even athletic, and seemed to waste no motion.

Startling Accents

There was a wider variance in his music. The Gluck overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," which opened the program flowed smoothly and evenly without apparent directional comment on the score.

The Shostakovich Symphony No. 1, which followed, seemed to be offered with even more crescendos and diminuendos, delays, pauses, sudden speedups and startling accents than is usually heard from this colorful, youthful score.

It seemed exaggerated, but, of course, the symphony was exaggerated when it was written. Ancerl conducted it seriously, somewhat pretentiously. There was no fun in it.

The Dvorak Symphony No. 8 which followed intermission was, of course, less colorful, but no less interesting. Where the Shostakovich was theatrical, the Dvorak was dramatic. Where the Shostakovich was bright and flashy, the Dvorak was strong and deep.

It was a secure and stable evening of music, almost stern. Ancerl didn't trifle with us. Too bad. We began to hanker for a little frivilous amiability. But that's our fault.

He apparently set out to serve up an evening of solid stuff—important, significant, and that is what it was.

There were 6009 in the audience. Today Leinsdorf will offer an afternoon of Beethoven includng the Violin Concerto, Op. 61, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and the Fifth Symphony.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

AUG 20 1968

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Hails Ancell

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

LENOX — Its disheartening to think that Carel Ancell would not have been engaged as B. S. O. guest conducter this season if Charles Meunch hadn't taken ill, for his Tanglewood Concert Saturday night showed many good qualities, the most valuable among these the ability to get some life and interest into the playing of a group of men usually bored and taking little pride in its work.

His program was not wildly adventurous, but judging from previous concerts I have heard him conduct, representative of the things he does best. Shostakovich's First Symphony, conservativly modern, got a lively intelligent reading, and its most interesting moments — the deceptive ending of the second movement and the transition between the last two—showed how well Ancell understands the function and value of musical silence.

They showed too, I think that the audience was a cut above the usual Tanglewood crowd; in the second movement for example almost nobody fell into the trap and applauded between Shostakovich's slam bang ending and the piano chords that take the movement to its close.

The performances of Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide" Overture and Dvorak's G Major Symphony, though well led and delivered with more than the usual orchestral spirit, had some inexcusable playing.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, July 29, 1968

Ancerl Program Listed For Boston Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the orchestra under direction of Karel Ancerl Aug. 17 in a concert which was to have been conducted by the ailing Charles Munch.

The program will include Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" Shostakovich's "Symphony No. 1" and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 8 in G" (old No. 4).

The 60-year-old Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra and his appearances throughout the world as a guest conductor.

* * *

This will be his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch, former music director of the Boston Symphony, was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

72.

Visiting Conductor Cheered in Debut

Karel Ancerl, the conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night at Tanglewood where he received a standing ovation from a crowd of 6,000 persons.

No doubt the political situation in Czechoslovakia had something to do with the fervor of the demonstration. Yet it would be a mistake not to credit his conductorial skills. He knows how to inspire an exciting and persuasive performance from this great orchestra.

Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" was done with the full orchestra, which is contrary to the dictates of modern scholarship. Nevertheless, he elicited such a suave, graceful sound from the strings that one could hardly resist the blandishments of this reading.

In the Shostakovich First Symphony, which remains remarkably fresh - sounding after all these years, he managed to stress the monolithic power of the work without kowtowing to tradition. His tempi for the second movement and the finale were unconventionally crisp and exhilarating.

Ancerl's baton technique was authoritative without being in the least showy or pretentious. He conducted the whole program without a score and obviously knew exactly what he wanted at any given moment.

For many Saturday night's highlight was Dvorak's lyrical 8th Symphony, which is actually heard with more frequency than the "New World" (No. 9) these days. Ancerl allowed the music to exfoliate deliciously. Never were tempi driven and brilliance was subordinated to warmth and tonal variety.

The Allegretto grazioso was something that will linger long in this reviewer's memory. It was not surprising that many players in the orchestra joined in the applause at the end of the Dvorak symphony. Ancerl's debut was an unqualified success.

Because of the illness of Charles Munch (who was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Saturday night) the Czech conductor was a last-minute substitution.

G.W.S.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

AUG 19 1968 New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

JUL 24 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood sets Aug. 17 program

The program has been announced for the Czech conductor Karel Ancerl's guest engagement at Tanglewood Aug. 17. He replaces Charles Munch who is recuperating from pneumonia.

For his Boston Symphony debut, Ancerl, music director of the Prague Philharmonic, has chosen Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4). Munch was to have lead his former orchestra in Berliozs' "Romeo and Juliet."

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, July 29, 1968

SUBSTITUTE CONDUCTOR—Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Aug. 17 replacing the ailing Charles Munch who was originally scheduled.

Conductor Ancerl's Tanglewood Program for August 17 Announced

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the Orchestra under the direction of Karel Ancerl on Saturday, August 17, when Mr. Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by the ailing Charles Munch.

Mr. Ancerl's program will include: Gluck, Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis; Shostakovich, Symphony No. 1; Dvorak, Symphony No. 8 in G (old No. 4).

The 60-year-old Mr. Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra and his appearances throughout the world as a guest conductor. This will be his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munch, former music director of the B.S.O., was to have conducted Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

"We are delighted to welcome Karel Ancerl to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Tanglewood," said Music Director Erich Leinsdorf in a statement issued when he announced Mr. Ancerl's program, "though we regret that it should be occasioned by the illness of Charles Munch, who holds a very special place in our hearts and to whom we send our warmest good wishes. We are very grateful to Mr. Ancerl for kindly revising his plans and coming early to this country for his first conducting appearance of the season."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. [illegible] Y CIRC. 26,000

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JUL 27 1968 New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUL 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Munch cancels date with BSO

Conductor Charles Munch has been advised by his doctor to cancel his appearances this Summer at American music festivals.

His Aug. 17 concert with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood will be taken over by Karel Ancerl, music director of the Czech Philharmonic. Ancerl's program will be announced shortly.

Munch was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," a work he did this past season with the BSO in Symphony Hall.

A bout of pneumonia this Spring is given as reason for Munch's change in Summer plans.

His 1968 plans include leading L'Orchestre de Paris in Boston this Fall and the BSO in Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" this Winter.

BSO Announces Program Change

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the orchestra under the direction of Karl Ancerl on Aug. 17, when Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by Charles Munch, who is ailing.

The program will consist of Gluck's "Overture to Iphigeneia in Aulis," the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8.

The 60-year-old Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech Orchestra and his appearances throughout the world as guest conductor. This will be his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch, former music director of the BSO, was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

"We are delighted to welcome Karl Ancerl to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Tanglewood," said Leinsdorf in a statement when he announced the new program, "though we regret that it should be occasioned by the illness of Charles Munch, who holds a very special place in our hearts and to whom we send our warmest good wishes. We are very grateful to Mr. Ancerl for kindly revising his plans and coming early to this country for his first conducting appearance of the season."

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 1,300

AUG 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

The program has been announced for the Czech conductor Karel Ancerl's guest engagement at Tanglewood Aug. 17. He replaces Charles Munch who is recuperating from pneumonia.

For his Boston Symphony debut, Ancerl, music director of the Prague Philharmonic, has chosen Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4). Munch was to have lead his former orchestra in Berliozs' "Romeo and Juliet."

Karel Ancerl To Conduct at Lenox, Aug. 17

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the orchestra under the direction of Karel Ancerl on Saturday, Aug. 17, when Mr. Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by the ailing Charles Munch.

Ancerl's program will include Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major.

The 60-year-old Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra, and his appearances throughout the world as a guest conductor. This will be his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

KARL ANCERL

Czech Unrest Makes Ancerl Move to Canada Yr. Earlier

TORONTO — Czechoslovakian conductor Karel Ancerl, who was scheduled to take over as conductor of the Toronto Symphony in the 1969-1970 season, has taken up residence in Toronto a year earlier than planned as a result of the political situation in Czechoslovakia.

Ancerl's original contract with the Toronto was for a minimum of 15 weeks, divided in two parts, at the beginning and end of the season, to make it possible for him to continue as conductor of the Czech Philharmonic as well. However, he told the press in Toronto Sept. 12, "I had 16 concerts still to do, but I cannot go back. I understand some of the players are leaving. Who knows what changes will take place?"

It is expected major American orchestras will take advantage of Ancerl's availability in Toronto in the upcoming season. He will also conduct some 20 concerts in Holland, Italy, England and West Germany from February to July.

It was only because of a last-minute engagement, replacing Charles Munch as conductor of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, that Ancerl was not in Prague when the Russians invaded his country. He delayed announcing that he would take up residence in Toronto until he heard that his wife, older son and daughter-in-law (who is a pop singer) were safely in Germany, and his younger son was in Copenhagen. His family will join him in Toronto.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

SEP 28 1968

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

AUG 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Notes on Music

Munch Cancels Concerts Here

Conductor Charles Munch has canceled all of his European and American appearances for the summer season due to poor health. His schedule included concerts at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center with the Philadelphia Orchestra in August.

Julius Rudel will conduct the August 8 concert at Saratoga in pace of Munch at the invitation of conductor Eugene Ormandy.

Munch, who lives outside Paris, had planned an all-French program for which Rudel will substitute a mixture of French and Spanish. Tanglewood has not yet announced a substitute.

* * *

A series of three "Contemporary Trends" concerts on Wednesday in July was announced by the Berkshire Music Center at opening exercises on Sunday.

A Jazz/Folk program will be presented on July 17, followed by "Music from India" on July 24. The last will be given over to "rock" on July 31.

Performers for these programs have not yet been announced.

The date of the Boston Pops at Tanglewood concert has been changed from Aug. 14 to Aug. 21. The Tanglewood-On-Prade Concert scheduled for Aug. 21 will be re-scheduled later.

* * *

Barton Mumaw, staff and faculty member at the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival and staff pianist Jess Meeker will give a special lecture-demonstration on Sunday, July 14, honoring the 35th anniversary of the dance festival in Lee, Mass.

The lecture will be part of the Sunday evening Dance Appreciation series held at 8:30 p.m. in the Ted Shawn Theater.

* * *

Violist Alan de Veritch and cellist Daniel Rothmuller will be guest performers with the Berkshire String Quartet this Saturday at Music Mountain in Falls Village, Conn.

The Music Mountain chamber concerts are scheduled for 3:00 p.m. on Saturdays in order to allow time for patrons to travel to Tanglewood comfortably for Saturday night concerts.

* * *

The Beers Family will give a benefit concert for Powell House at Powell House at 8:15 p.m. Friday.

Powell House is a Quaker Meeting House in Old Chatham.

The program will include the Shaker hymn "Simple Gifts" and a song the Beers have recorded, "Dumbarton Drums."

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006

JUL 2 1968

72.

Visiting Conductor Cheered in Debut

Karel Ancerl, the conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night at Tanglewood where he received a standing ovation from a crowd of 6,000 persons.

No doubt the political situation in Czechoslovakia had something to do with the fervor of the demonstration. Yet it would be a mistake not to credit his conductorial skills. He knows how to inspire an exciting and persuasive performance from this great orchestra.

Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" was done with the full orchestra, which is contrary to the dictates of modern scholarship. Nevertheless, he elicited such a suave, graceful sound from the strings that one could hardly resist the blandishments of this reading.

In the Shostakovich First Symphony, which remains remarkably fresh - sounding after all these years, he managed to stress the monolithic power of the work without kowtowing to tradition. His tempi for the second movement and the finale were unconventionally crisp and exhilarating.

Ancerl's baton technique was authoritative without being in the least showy or pretentious. He conducted the whole program without a score and obviously knew exactly what he wanted at any given moment.

For many Saturday night's highlight was Dvorak's lyrical 8th Symphony, which is actually heard with more frequency than the "New World" (No. 9) these days. Ancerl allowed the music to exfoliate deliciously. Never were tempi driven and brilliance was subordinated to warmth and tonal variety.

The Allegretto grazioso was something that will linger long in this reviewer's memory. It was not surprising that many players in the orchestra joined in the applause at the end of the Dvorak symphony. Ancerl's debut was an unqualified success.

Because of the illness of Charles Munch (who was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Saturday night) the Czech conductor was a last-minute substitution.

G.W.S.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

AUG 19 1968

New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

JUL 24 1968

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood sets Aug. 17 program

The program has been announced for the Czech conductor Karel Ancerl's guest engagement at Tanglewood Aug. 17. He replaces Charles Munch who is recuperating from pneumonia.

For his Boston Symphony debut, Ancerl, music director of the Prague Philharmonic, has chosen Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4). Munch was to have lead his former orchestra in Berliozs' "Romeo and Juliet."

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, [illegible], 1968

SUBSTITUTE CONDUCTOR—Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Aug. 17 replacing the ailing Charles Munch who was originally scheduled.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUL 19 1968

New England Newsclip

Munch cancels date with BSO

Conductor Charles Munch has been advised by his doctor to cancel his appearances this Summer at American music festivals.

His Aug. 17 concert with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood will be taken over by Karel Ancerl, music director of the Czech Philharmonic. Ancerl's program will be announced shortly.

Munch was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," a work he did this past season with the BSO in Symphony Hall.

A bout of pneumonia this Spring is given as reason for Munch's change in Summer plans.

His 1968 plans include leading L'Orchestre de Paris in Boston this Fall and the BSO in Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" this Winter.

BSO Announces Program Change

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the orchestra under the direction of Karl Ancerl on Aug. 17, when Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by Charles Munch, who is ailing.

The program will consist of Gluck's "Overture to Iphigeneia in Aulis," the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8.

The 60-year-old Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech Orchestra and his appearances throughout the world as guest conductor. This will be his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch, former music director of the BSO, was to have conducted Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

"We are delighted to welcome Karl Ancerl to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Tanglewood," said Leinsdorf in a statement when he announced the new program, "though we regret that it should be occasioned by the illness of Charles Munch, who holds a very special place in our hearts and to whom we send our warmest good wishes. We are very grateful to Mr. Ancerl for kindly revising his plans and coming early to this country for his first conducting appearance of the season."

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 1,300

AUG 10 1968

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

The program has been announced for the Czech conductor Karel Ancerl's guest engagement at Tanglewood Aug. 17. He replaces Charles Munch who is recuperating from pneumonia.

For his Boston Symphony debut, Ancerl, music director of the Prague Philharmonic, has chosen Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 (old No. 4). Munch was to have lead his former orchestra in Berliozs' "Romeo and Juliet."

Czech Unrest Makes Ancerl Move to Canada Yr. Earlier

TORONTO — Czechoslovakian conductor Karel Ancerl, who was scheduled to take over as conductor of the Toronto Symphony in the 1969-1970 season, has taken up residence in Toronto a year earlier than planned as a result of the political situation in Czechoslovakia.

Ancerl's original contract with the Toronto was for a minimum of 15 weeks, divided in two parts, at the beginning and end of the season, to make it possible for him to continue as conductor of the Czech Philharmonic as well. However, he told the press in Toronto Sept. 12, "I had 16 concerts still to do, but I cannot go back. I understand some of the players are leaving. Who knows what changes will take place?"

It is expected major American orchestras will take advantage of Ancerl's availability in Toronto in the upcoming season. He will also conduct some 20 concerts in Holland, Italy, England and West Germany from February to July.

It was only because of a last-minute engagement, replacing Charles Munch as conductor of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, that Ancerl was not in Prague when the Russians invaded his country. He delayed announcing that he would take up residence in Toronto until he heard that his wife, older son and daughter-in-law (who is a pop singer) were safely in Germany, and his younger son was in Copenhagen. His family will join him in Toronto.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

SEP 28 1968

Karel Ancerl To Conduct at Lenox, Aug. 17

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the orchestra under the direction of Karel Ancerl on Saturday, Aug. 17, when Mr. Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by the ailing Charles Munch.

Ancerl's program will include Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major.

The 60-year-old Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra, and his appearances throughout the world as a guest conductor. This will be his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

KARL ANCERL

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

AUG 4 1968

New England Newsclip

Conductor Ancerl's Tanglewood Program for August 17 Announced

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the program to be played by the Orchestra under the direction of Karel Ancerl on Saturday, August 17, when Mr. Ancerl conducts a concert originally to have been conducted by the ailing Charles Munch.

Mr. Ancerl's program will include: Gluck, Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis; Shostakovich, Symphony No. 1; Dvorak, Symphony No. 8 in G (old No. 4).

The 60-year-old Mr. Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, was born in Bohemia and educated at the Prague Conservatory. He is widely known through his recordings, his tours with the Czech orchestra and his appearances throughout the world as a guest conductor. This will be his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munch, former music director of the B.S.O., was to have conducted Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet until illness required the cancellation of his American engagements this summer.

"We are delighted to welcome Karel Ancerl to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Tanglewood," said Music Director Erich Leinsdorf in a statement issued when he announced Mr. Ancerl's program, "though we regret that it should be occasioned by the illness of Charles Munch, who holds a very special place in our hearts and to whom we send our warmest good wishes. We are very grateful to Mr. Ancerl for kindly revising his plans and coming early to this country for his first conducting appearance of the season."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. [illegible] 26,000

AUG 1 1968

New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 53,900

JUL 27 1968

New England Newsclip

Notes on Music

Munch Cancels Concerts Here

Conductor Charles Munch has canceled all of his European and American appearances for the summer season due to poor health. His schedule included concerts at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center with the Philadelphia Orchestra in August.

Julius Rudel will conduct the August 8 concert at Saratoga in pace of Munch at the invitation of conductor Eugene Ormandy.

Munch, who lives outside Paris, had planned an all-French program for which Rudel will substitute a mixture of French and Spanish. Tanglewood has not yet announced a substitute.

* * *

A series of three "Contemporary Trends" concerts on Wednesday in July was announced by the Berkshire Music Center at opening exercises on Sunday.

A Jazz/Folk program will be presented on July 17, followed by "Music from India" on July 24. The last will be given over to "rock" on July 31.

Performers for these programs have not yet been announced.

The date of the Boston Pops at Tanglewood concert has been changed from Aug. 14 to Aug. 21. The Tanglewood-On-Prade Concert scheduled for Aug. 21 will be re-scheduled later.

* * *

Barton Mumaw, staff and faculty member at the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival and staff pianist Jess Meeker will give a special lecture-demonstration on Sunday, July 14, honoring the 35th anniversary of the dance festival in Lee, Mass.

The lecture will be part of the Sunday evening Dance Appreciation series held at 8:30 p.m. in the Ted Shawn Theater.

* * *

Violist Alan de Veritch and cellist Daniel Rothmuller will be guest performers with the Berkshire String Quartet this Saturday at Music Mountain in Falls Village, Conn.

The Music Mountain chamber concerts are scheduled for 3:00 p.m. on Saturdays in order to allow time for patrons to travel to Tanglewood comfortably for Saturday night concerts.

* * *

The Beers Family will give a benefit concert for Powell House at Powell House at 8:15 p.m. Friday.

Powell House is a Quaker Meeting House in Old Chatham.

The program will include the Shaker hymn "Simple Gifts" and a song the Beers have recorded, "Dumbarton Drums."

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. [illegible] SUN. 129,096

JUL 2 1968

The question of tempo—III

Original Beethoven hardly recognizable

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

If Beethoven's Violin Concerto had been lost in 1810 and only recently rediscovered, its first 20th century performance would, I am sure, be very different from almost any performance we are actually likely to find in concert or on records in 1968. The biggest difference probably would occur in the tempi of the first and second movements, both of which I should imagine to be played much faster than we are used to hearing them.

In this article, as well as in the preceding two, which also dealt with question of tempo, I am indebted to Rudolf Kolisch, a great musician, and one of the very few ever to have thought systematically about the tempo problem. In his study of "Tempo and Character in Beethoven's Music," published in the Musical Quarterly in 1943, Kolisch suggests that the tempo for the first movement of the Violin Concerto ought to be about the same as that for the first movement of the A major Cello Sonata, Op. 69, and indeed thesimilarity of melodic, rhythmic, harmonic, and figurational detail that supports Kolisch's thesis is very striking. In fact, a standard tempo today for the sonata movement is somewhere between 60 and 70 to the half note — Kolisch, invoking further similarities to other movements for which Beethoven gave metronome marks, thinks that something like 84 would be better — whereas a "normal," familiar for the concerto movement, is between 48 and 54.

Likewise, the evidence of similar things in Beethoven suggests that half note 30 is about right for the slow movement, Larghetto. Klemperer and Furtwaengler (both with Menuhin) take it at 20 and 21, respectively, and with no suggestion that there are two beats in a bar rather than four; Leinsdorf (with Milstein) goes 22 and also, not only because of the tempo, does better on the two vs. four question. After his Harvard lecture last Spring, Kolisch remarked that it was inconceivable that anyone who had any connection with the knowledge of music at all could take the score of that movement and infer from it the tempo that is usually taken.

STEINBERG
Continued on Page A-44

Composer vs. performance, tradition

★ STEINBERG
Continued from Page A-41

Menuhin and Milstein, Furtwaengler, Klemperer, and Leinsdorf, are men whose relation to and knowledge of music is more than casual, and the same is true of the many violinists and conductors whose interpretations would, with respect to tempo, not be startlingly different from theirs. If these tempi do not come from a reading of Beethoven's score, which represents an experienced professional's best attempt to translate an idea onto paper for further translation into sound, where do they come from?

A violinist or conductor might tell you that the first movement of the Beethoven concerto is marked Allegro ma non troppo (quick, but not too much so) and that it is a spaciously meditative composition whose character is best realized at 54 or so to the half note. One might reply that Allegro moderato and Allegro ma non troppo are at the slow end of Beethoven's Allegro spectrum (with Allegro molto and Allegro con brio at the quick end, and plain Allegro in the middle), but that Beethoven's metronome marks tell us that even his "slow" Allegros are not meant to be all that slow.

Then we might raise the question of how we know that the character of the movement is spaciously contemplative or meditative. Since this idea of character seems to exist in defiance of what we can infer to be the composer's intentions about the tempo, the answer would seem to be that we "know" it because that is the way we always have heard it played.

It is a multi-faceted movement that survives being played slowly. We have heard it done beautifully that way; indeed, the performance I still remember as moving me more than any, one by Morini and Walter around 1950, may well have been the slowest I ever heard. But because of how the tempo affected the character, it was, no matter how beautiful, not the piece Beethoven intended. We have a nice circular argument here: We play the piece in a certain way in order to realize a character whose supposed existence we infer only from other performances.

Take a fresh look at the Violin Concerto's first movement and imagine it perhaps one and a half times as fast as usual. Imagine it also without the further absurdity of the traditional extreme slowings down for the G minor section at the end of the development (with the horn's invocation of the opening drum taps completely unintelligible at the no-tempo-at-all), and again in the passage immediately following the cadenza (where the coughing of audiences all over the world might have suggested to violinists that something was wrong). With that, and with an appropriate restoration of the Larghetto, we almost would have a different piece, no less beautiful, and more characteristic.

The problem of misrepresentation sanctified by tradition arises because fundamental confusions remain about the relation of performance to composition. That is why the ridiculous "Boris Godunov" controversy is still with us, based on the false assumption that a composer's score and someone else's "improvements" on it present equally valid alternatives. That is why a conductor who would be scandalized at the idea of himself rewriting a Haydn symphony does not, upon learning that the score he has been using is in fact full of changes by some other outsider, and upon having Haydn's own version made available to him, at once drop the spurious article for the genuine. Misprints in poetry are not continued in circulation once discovered and corrected, and no one in the visual arts has expressed a preference that the grime be restored to Rembrandt's "Night Watch." Musicians are not generally trained to that kind of integrity and intelligence.

To find out what a composer meant, to eliminate what he could not have meant or would have wished to avoid, requires intelligent, imaginative, and knowing evaluation of complicated, often ambiguous evidence. Taste is necesary, but all by itself, unsupported by knowledge, it can become capricious preference and an unreliable guide to performance. Musicians' education should include equipping them to evaluate evidence, and to recognize the basic difference in value between what the composer tells us and what a performance tradition tells us.

It is no good to have pieces turned into other pieces, the various Beethoven works I have mentioned, the Mozart G minor Symphony, whose first movement has been turned from an impassioned Molto allegro to a pathetic Andante, the Brahms B flat Piano Concerto, whose graceful Andante has become a sentimental Adagio. It is true that Toscanini's example restored something of the character of the second movement of Beethoven's 7th after generations of conductors had dragged it. Perhaps it means there is hope, but it is a slender thread at best, and I can't help thinking that most of the men who took up the quicker tempo were imitating Toscanini rather than finding Beethoven.

Boston Globe

Beethoven Program Draws 10,345 at Lenox

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The last concert of Tanglewood's seventh weekend drew 10,345 yesterday, almost as many as Friday and Saturday evenings combined. The program was a standard one, all Beethoven, with concert master Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Gazette Review

Friday's weekend prelude had Claude Frank, pianist, in two Beethoven sonatas, and the main concert was all Mendelssohn, with Lillian Kallir, pianist, in the No. 1 Concerto, plus narrator, soloists and chorus in the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

On Saturday, Karel Anceri, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony, replacing the ill Charles Munch and offering Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak.

Yesterday's Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72, was well done but not especially exciting. Some of the horn attacks were on the uneasy side.

Violin Concerto

Silverstein played the violin concerto in D major, Op. 61, with delightfully smooth tone which though not large, carried well. Except at the very start of the work, Leinsdorf tempered the orchestral volume to form a charming and well-balanced sound. The performance made up in artistry what it lacked in strong contrasts. The second movement, "Larghetto," was especially noble and beguiling.

The first movement cadenza was Fritz Kreisler's; the others were Silverstein's own composition. Ovations by the audience and orchestra at the conclusion of the concerto demonstrated once again how popular Silverstein is, and how worthy a musician.

Leinsdorf led the Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67, with extreme energy, seeming determined to make it sound like a fresh new piece rather than one of the best known symphonies.

Brasses and percussion had a field day, but there were also daintily-handled poetic episodes. The audience loved it, and recalled Leinsdorf to the stage many times.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

AUG 19 1968 New England Newsclip

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, August 14, 1968

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in the Beethoven Violin Concerto in an all-Beethoven program at Tanglewood in Lenox on Sunday afternoon.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 18 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Overture to 'Fidelio' op. 72*

Violin concerto in D major op. 61*
Allegro ma non troppo
Larghetto
Rondo
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

intermission

Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67 *
Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro - Allegro

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 36

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

The Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 19, 1968

Silverstein Sensational at Lenox

By C. ROBIE BOOTH

At the Concert

LENOX, Mass. — The trim and mighty Erich Leinsdorf whipped, cajoled and shouted his white-suited warriors through an all-Beethoven program at Tanglewood yesterday before one of the largest audiences of the season.

About 11,000 enthusiastic souls witnessed the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concert-master-soloist Joseph Silverstein and the maestro Leinsdorf demonstrate what Beethoven is all about.

Taking last and most important things first, Beethoven's Fifth was just smashing. Probably the finet this reviewer has ever heard.

The allegro con brio of Symphony No. 5 in C Minor was powerful, impeccable. The andante con moto, second movement, swept from the light beginning to the broadly stated theme. The allegro-allegro (third movement) featured magnificent lower register strings and baritone and bass horns. The muted bass violin pizzicato was impressive; the percussion and high reeds, flawless.

It seemed like some sorcerer in Leinsdorf's clothing reached into Beethoven's spirit to reveal this sparkling gem.

Solverstein won five bows, several bravos and caused many in the audience to profer standing cheers with his excellent bowmanship in Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D Major. In this, the orchestral depth was as stunning, the percussion and second violins notable; the solo, crystaline and emotional. Silverstein used his original cadenzas in the larghetto and rondo. They were entirely compatible, though more moderate, then the Fritz Kreisler cadenza Silverstein employed for the allegro man non troppo first movement. The horns, bases and oboes excelled in the rondo.

The opener was the "Fidelio" overture, written in its first edition in the same year 1806 as the violin concerto. This showcased gorgeous oboe punctuation of the string melody and subsequent statement of the theme. The brass was beautiful, sepecially the trombone and French horn melodic passages.

As a young-at-hearter wagged on the way out: "That's some band, baby."

The question of tempo—III

Original Beethoven hardly recognizable

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

If Beethoven's Violin Concerto had been lost in 1810 and only recently rediscovered, its first 20th century performance would, I am sure, be very different from almost any performance we are actually likely to find in concert or on records in 1968. The biggest difference probably would occur in the tempi of the first and second movements, both of which I should imagine to be played much faster than we are used to hearing them.

In this article, as well as in the preceding two, which also dealt with question of tempo, I am indebted to Rudolf Kolisch, a great musician, and one of the very few ever to have thought systematically about the tempo problem. In his study of "Tempo and Character in Beethoven's Music," published in the Musical Quarterly in 1943, Kolisch suggests that the tempo for the first movement of the Violin Concerto ought to be about the same as that for the first movement of the A major Cello Sonata, Op. 69, and indeed thesimilarity of melodic, rhythmic, harmonic, and figurational detail that supports Kolisch's thesis is very striking. In fact, a standard tempo today for the sonata movement is somewhere between 60 and 70 to the half note — Kolisch, invoking further similarities to other movements for which Beethoven gave metronome marks, thinks that something like 84 would be better — whereas a "normal," familiar for the concerto movement, is between 48 and 54.

Likewise, the evidence of similar things in Beethoven suggests that half note 30 is about right for the slow movement, Larghetto. Klemperer and Furtwaengler (both with Menuhin) take it at 20 and 21, respectively, and with no suggestion that there are two beats in a bar rather than four; Leinsdorf (with Milstein) goes 22 and also, not only because of the tempo, does better on the two vs. four question. After his Harvard lecture last Spring, Kolisch remarked that it was inconceivable that anyone who had any connection with the knowledge of music at all could take the score of that movement and infer from it the tempo that is usually taken.

STEINBERG
Continued on Page A-44

Composer vs. performance, tradition

★ STEINBERG
Continued from Page A-41

Menuhin and Milstein, Furtwaengler, Klemperer, and Leinsdorf, are men whose relation to and knowledge of music is more than casual, and the same is true of the many violinists and conductors whose interpretations would, with respect to tempo, not be startlingly different from theirs. If these tempi do not come from a reading of Beethoven's score, which represents an experienced professional's best attempt to translate an idea onto paper for further translation into sound, where do they come from?

A violinist or conductor might tell you that the first movement of the Beethoven concerto is marked Allegro ma non troppo (quick, but not too much so) and that it is a spaciously meditative composition whose character is best realized at 54 or so to the half note. One might reply that Allegro moderato and Allegro ma non troppo are at the slow end of Beethoven's Allegro spectrum (with Allegro molto and Allegro con brio at the quick end, and plain Allegro in the middle), but that Beethoven's metronome marks tell us that even his "slow" Allegros are not meant to be all that slow.

Then we might raise the question of how we know that the character of the movement is spaciously contemplative or meditative. Since this idea of character seems to exist in defiance of what we can infer to be the composer's intentions about the tempo, the answer would seem to be that we "know" it because that is the way we always have heard it played.

It is a multi-faceted movement that survives being played slowly. We have heard it done beautifully that way; indeed, the performance I still remember as moving me more than any, one by Morini and Walter around 1950, may well have been the slowest I ever heard. But because of how the tempo affected the character, it was, no matter how beautiful, not the piece Beethoven intended. We have a nice circular argument here: We play the piece in a certain way in order to realize a character whose supposed existence we infer only from other performances.

Take a fresh look at the Violin Concerto's first movement and imagine it perhaps one and a half times as fast as usual. Imagine it also without the further absurdity of the traditional extreme slowings down for the G minor section at the end of the development (with the horn's invocation of the opening drum taps completely unintelligible at the no-tempo-at-all), and again in the passage immediately following the cadenza (where the coughing of audiences all over the world might have suggested to violinists that something was wrong). With that, and with an appropriate restoration of the Larghetto, we almost would have a different piece, no less beautiful, and more characteristic.

The problem of misrepresentation sanctified by tradition arises because fundamental confusions remain about the relation of performance to composition. That is why the ridiculous "Boris Godunov" controversy is still with us, based on the false assumption that a composer's score and someone else's "improvements" on it present equally valid alternatives. That is why a conductor who would be scandalized at the idea of himself rewriting a Haydn symphony does not, upon learning that the score he has been using is in fact full of changes by some other outsider, and upon having Haydn's own version made available to him, at once drop the spurious article for the genuine. Misprints in poetry are not continued in circulation once discovered and corrected, and no one in the visual arts has expressed a preference that the grime be restored to Rembrandt's "Night Watch." Musicians are not generally trained to that kind of integrity and intelligence.

To find out what a composer meant, to eliminate what he could not have meant or would have wished to avoid, requires intelligent, imaginative, and knowing evaluation of complicated, often ambiguous evidence. Taste is necesary, but all by itself, unsupported by knowledge, it can become capricious preference and an unreliable guide to performance. Musicians' education should include equipping them to evaluate evidence, and to recognize the basic difference in value between what the composer tells us and what a performance tradition tells us.

It is no good to have pieces turned into other pieces, the various Beethoven works I have mentioned, the Mozart G minor Symphony, whose first movement has been turned from an impassioned Molto allegro to a pathetic Andante, the Brahms B flat Piano Concerto, whose graceful Andante has become a sentimental Adagio. It is true that Toscanini's example restored something of the character of the second movement of Beethoven's 7th after generations of conductors had dragged it. Perhaps it means there is hope, but it is a slender thread at best, and I can't help thinking that most of the men who took up the quicker tempo were imitating Toscanini rather than finding Beethoven.

Boston Globe

Beethoven Program Draws 10,345 at Lenox

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The last concert of Tanglewood's seventh weekend drew 10,345 yesterday, almost as many as Friday and Saturday evenings combined. The program was a standard one, all Beethoven, with concert master Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Gazette Review

Friday's weekend prelude had Claude Frank, pianist, in two Beethoven sonatas, and the main concert was all Mendelssohn, with Lillian Kallir, pianist, in the No. 1 Concerto, plus narrator, soloists and chorus in the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

On Saturday, Karel Anceri, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony, replacing the ill Charles Munch and offering Gluck, Shostakovich and Dvorak.

Yesterday's Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72, was well done but not especially exciting. Some of the horn attacks were on the uneasy side.

Violin Concerto

Silverstein played the violin concerto in D major, Op. 61, with delightfully smooth tone which though not large, carried well. Except at the very start of the work, Leinsdorf tempered the orchestral volume to form a charming and well-balanced sound. The performance made up in artistry what it lacked in strong contrasts. The second movement, "Larghetto," was especially noble and beguiling.

The first movement cadenza was Fritz Kreisler's; the others were Silverstein's own composition. Ovations by the audience and orchestra at the conclusion of the concerto demonstrated once again how popular Silverstein is, and how worthy a musician.

Leinsdorf led the Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67, with extreme energy, seeming determined to make it sound like a fresh new piece rather than one of the best known symphonies.

Brasses and percussion had a field day, but there were also daintily-handled poetic episodes. The audience loved it, and recalled Leinsdorf to the stage many times.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,513

AUG 19 1968 New England Newsclip

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, August 14, 1968

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 250,817

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in the Beethoven Violin Concerto in an all-Beethoven program at Tanglewood in Lenox on Sunday afternoon.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 18 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Overture to 'Fidelio' op. 72*

Violin concerto in D major op. 61*
Allegro ma non troppo
Larghetto
Rondo
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

intermission

Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67 *
Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro - Allegro

The program notes for this afternoon's concert begin on page 36

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

The Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 19, 1968

Silverstein Sensational at Lenox

By C. ROBIE BOOTH

At the Concert

LENOX, Mass. — The trim and mighty Erich Leinsdorf whipped, cajoled and shouted his white-suited warriors through an all-Beethoven program at Tanglewood yesterday before one of the largest audiences of the season.

About 11,000 enthusiastic souls witnessed the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concert-master-soloist Joseph Silverstein and the maestro Leinsdorf demonstrate what Beethoven is all about.

Taking last and most important things first, Beethoven's Fifth was just smashing. Probably the finet this reviewer has ever heard.

The allegro con brio of Symphony No. 5 in C Minor was powerful, impeccable. The andante con moto, second movement, swept from the light beginning to the broadly stated theme. The allegro-allegro (third movement) featured magnificent lower register strings and baritone and bass horns. The muted bass violin pizzicato was impressive; the percussion and high reeds, flawless.

It seemed like some sorcerer in Leinsdorf's clothing reached into Beethoven's spirit to reveal this sparkling gem.

Solverstein won five bows, several bravos and caused maby in the audience to profer standing cheers with his excellent bowmanship in Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D Major. In this, the orchestral depth was as stunning, the percussion and second violins notable; the solo, crystaline and emotional. Silverstein used his original cadenzas in the larghetto and rondo. They were entirely compatible, though more moderate, then the Fritz Kreisler cadenza Silverstein employed for the allegro man non troppo first movement. The horns, bases and oboes excelled in the rondo.

The opener was the "Fidelio" overture, written in its first edition in the same year 1806 as the violin concerto. This showcased gorgeous oboe punctuation of the string melody and subsequent statement of the theme. The brass was beautiful, sepecially the trombone and French horn melodic passages.

As a young-at-hearter wagged on the way out: "That's some band, baby."

74.

At Tanglewood

Beethoven's Appeal Still Bright for Symphony Audience

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —There were 10,345 listeners at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to defy anyone who might claim that the drawing power of Beethoven is on the wane.

Undiluted Program

The program offered three of his sure-fire, often-played works, and there were no special guests to augment the box office. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, was soloist.

The program began with the Opus 72 overture to the opera "Fidelio" and ended with the Symphony No. 5, In the middle was the Violin Concerto, Opus 61, with Kreisler's cadenza in the first movement and the soloist's cadenzas in the second and third.

Aside from the orchestra, whose reliability and excellence become easy to take fro granted, the great beauty of the afternoon came from Silverstein's fiddle.

Bell-Like Beauty

He invariably plays with a sweet, slender, lithe and willowy tone of bell-like beauty, and Sunday his accuracy and gracefulness, also normal for him, were unerring.

Silverstein plays with an unforced, flowing ease that matches his mild manner. His style is better suited to works like Sunday's Beethoven (and the Bach concerto he played here July 12) than it is to the strong music of Schonberg and Bartok, which he also keeps in his repertory for solo appearances.

The overture and symphony which started and ended the program, were as might be expected, smooth exact and lean.

New Vitality

They seemed, also, to be a bit more robust and vigorous than other symphonic fare Leinsdorf has been serving up lately. There was a vitality in the music that belied the tiresome repetition with which it appears on concert programs (the same concert was given in Boston last November).

Its success with Sunday's audience was high and wide. No matter how often this music is played, it always seems to have strong appeal.

Next weekend, the orchestra will wind up its 1968 season with Aaron Copland Friday night, an all-Wagner program Saturday night and an all-Brahms program Sunday afternoon with the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

At the 10.30 a. m. chamber music concert in the Tanglewood Theater, the Boston Trio presented two classic trios for a contented audience — about 75 of whom were lolling on the grass in the sunshine with heavylidded eyes.

The choice of the program was oddly suited to the circumstances even though the two pieces were stylistically different from each other (Dvorak's "Dumka" Trio Opus 90, and Ravel's Trio in A Minor, 1914).

With its sources in folk melodies and dances (Czech for Dvorak and Basque for Ravel) the music reflected the setting —lush green grass and trees, blue sky, bright sun, cool breeze.

Blends With Day

And the elements of peaceful reverence in both pieces were not incompatible with other, more common, areas of activity on Sunday morning.

Roger Shermont, violinist, and John San Ambrogio, cellist, both members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Phyllis Moss, pianist, of the Wellesley College faculty, make up the trio.

Their soft, firm tones, accuracy, balance and depth of expression Sunday morning sustained with distinction the very high standard which has been set by their associates in the Sunday morning series.

Next Sunday morning, the final concert of the series will offer music by Beethoven, Fine and Brahms by members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Of special interest will be that little novelty created by the giant Beethoven called "Duet in E Flat for Violin and Cello with two Obbligato Eyeglasses."

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Ancerl Conducts at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought the seventh, and last but one, weekend of the Berkshire Festival to a rousing close yesterday afternoon when he played the Beethoven Fifth Symphony with relentless, driving energy.

He ceded the central concert of the weekend's trio to a newcomer, Karel Ancerl, conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra and conductor-appointee for 1969 of the Toronto Symphony. Ancerl made a sensational impression with a program from the less-heard shelves of the repertory.

* * *

LEINSDORF CONFINED each of his two programs to a single composer: yesterday to Beethoven and Friday night to Mendelssohn. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was the soloist in the Beethoven Violin Concerto in which his immaculate performance and unfailingly glowing tone earned him a tremendous ovation, although the whole afternoon evoked responses of unsurpassed acclaim.

Silverstein played the statement of the theme at the close of the first movement, after the cadenza, with lofty and simple majesty but not until the cadenza, of Fritz Kreisler, did he reveal his greater potential. He sacrificed eclat for perfection. What he chose to accentuate was no less worthy but he could have applied the same virtues to Kreutzer, Rode or Gavinies. It was marvelous violin playing but not conspicuously Beethoven.

* * *

AN EVENING of Mendelssohn is, in a sense, like the platforms of the political parties: designed to offend no one. Indeed, there was much to please: the scherzo from the string octet, the first piano concerto, G Minor, Opus 20, with lovely Lilian Kallir as soloist, and the overture and incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Whitestone

Karel Ancerl

The G Minor concerto is appropriate and particularly suitable in a woman's hands and, one might ask, where better than in those of Miss Kallir? Her initial phrase was as saucy as her appearance in a flamered gown. Without apparent effort, she produced a tone which not only carried well but was exactly adapted to the character of her concerto.

* * *

Whitestone

Patricia Peardon flies through "A Midsummer Night's Dream" in her role as narrator.

THE OVERTURE to the Midsummer Dream is like a continuation of the octet scherzo in its moto perpetuo pattern. The Dream Scherzo is one of the most subtly modulated gems in all Mendelssohn. James Stagliano played the French horn solo in the nocturne with notable sonority. The Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus of some 40 female voices had only two modest demands but executed them gratifyingly. Miss Patricia Peardon, as at last year's performance, was again the delightful narrator. She was dressed in a long, flowing, spring-leaf-green robe with sleeves which, when she raised her arms, became lepidopteral wings and figuratively, carried her and her audience to mythical regions as she voiced the speeches from Shakespeare which Leinsdorf personally had chosen. The insufficiently slight solos which fell to soprano soloists Laury Christie and Pittsfield-born Kathleen Toohey were effectively sung.

* * *

POSSIBLY the mark of a masterpiece is its ever-persistent freshness. Beethoven's C Minor Symphony is always a new experience and bears rehearing as we always welcome "Macbeth" and "Hamlet." Leinsdorf exhausted the energies of his musicians in his reading, piling on excitement in accumulating layers. In his headlong and compulsive thrust he missed the potential noble triumph where the scherzo leads into the magnificent finale, but his musicians were more than capable of conveying his conception of the symphony and roused the audience of more than 10,000 to exuberant enthusiasm.

* * *

ANCERL'S PROGRAM was stimulating once he had passed the Gluck overture to "Iphigeneia at Aulis," an example which has not retained its youth as has the music of his immortal contemporaries. One could not easily find a more exact antipode to the Shostakovich F Major Symphony, No. 1, Opus 10, than the Dvorak G Major, No. 8, Opus 88. The Russian opus is noisy to gaudy, abrasive and argumentative. That of the Czech is purely ecumenical, asking only to live in peace and good will with his neighbors. Dvorak here is gentle and affable, lighted occasionally by a joie de vivre whose background the guest conductor probably appreciated and conveyed with more than average empathy.

Whether the cordial reception tendered the Czech guest had any political overtones would be anybody's guess, but there could have been no doubt of the pleasure his music afforded his audience.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 19 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

MASSACHUSETTS

LENOX (Berkshire Festival) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a Beethoven program today at 2:30, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Overture from Fidelio, and Symphony No. 5, with Violin Concerto by Joseph Silverstein. Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra on Tuesday evening in an All-American Program, featuring selections by Gould, Copland, Gershwin, and Peter Nero will appear as pianist. The Friday evening concert at 9 p.m. will include Carter's Holiday Overture; the Pelleas et Melisande Suite, Faure; Sinfonia India, Chavez; Inscape, Copland; Ode, Stravinsky, and Billy the Kid, Copland. Saturday's 8 p.m. concert will be a Wagner Program: Tristen und Isolde Prelude; Das Rheingold—Finale; Die Valkure, Act 1.

Karel Ancerl

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

ANCERL AT TANGLEWOOD

A distinguished replacement has been found for Charles Munch who was scheduled to conduct the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Aug. 17.

Munch cancelled his American tour this summer because of illness.

Because the music of Berlioz is one of Munch's specialties, his conducting of the "Romeo and Juliet" music was greatly anticipated.

Under ordinary circumstances, another conductor would be invited to perform the scheduled program.

Munch's place will be taken by Karel Ancerl, conductor since 1950 of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra. He is known in this country through recordings and tours, although this will be his debut with the Boston Symphony.

The 60-year-old Ancerl has selected an entirely different program. It consists of the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," Symphony No. 1 by Shostakovich, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major.

NEWS BEAT

One needed only look at titles on the program to know that the Festival of Contemporary American Music has been in progress during the past week at Tanglewood.

A few examples: "Horizon Circled," "Immobiles," "Ludus," "Elephant Steps," "The Distinguished Thing," "Eonta," and "Whirl."

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

AUG 11 1968 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

AUG 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Wagnerian Soprano Outshines Composer Copland at Tanglewood

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
AUG 25 1968
New England Newsclip

Eighth Week

LENOX — An unusually small audience of 4,100 came to Tanglewood Friday night to see American composer Aaron Copland conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festivals eighth and final weekend.

The program was largely contemporary music including a fair share of Copland's own compositions.

Choicest music and performance of the evening was the weekend prelude recital by the German dramatic soprano, Hann-Lore Kuhse, accompanied by Charles Wilson.

Little Known

Miss Kuhse is little known in this country. After her American debut in January of last year, she sang the title role in a concert performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" at Tanglewood last summer.

She is a singer of Wagnerian proportions an d voice. Friday night's program was Brahms and Wagner lieder.

She is a singer of Wagnerian proportions and voice. vel in itself because the selection did not cover a wide dramatic field.

The Kuhse voice has incredible opulence and is projected with equally remarkable ease. Everything poured forth with utter control and almost inaudible breathing.

Her expressive scope reached from full-throated sounds of Brahms' "Die Mainacht" that bounced from acoustical panels overhead to intimate disclosures of Wagner's "Traume."

Great Voice

Surely Miss Kuhse has one of the great voices of this generation along with musical intelligence.

The least agitating work on the orchestral program was Faure's sweetly-scented suite from the incidental music to "Pelleas and Melisande."

It gave the content string players an opportunity to make exquisite sounds. Copland benefitted the work with a knowledgeable reading, achieving almost impressionistic results.

Flute, harp and strings made a beautiful chapter of the Sicilienne. While the Faure treatment of the subject doesn't approach DeBussy's which came later, orchestra and conductor gave the music definite stature.

That's about as far as the program went without creating general reproach or argument.

First Performance

Elliott Carter's "Holiday Overture" received its first performance by the Boston Symphony.

It proved to be a boisterous, vigorous hodge-podge of enthusiastic ideas. The overture's close made a noisy bid for applause. The composer was present to acknowledge its restraint.

A good "fun" piece was "Sinfonia India," written by the Mexican composer Carlos Chavez over 30 years ago.

The most obvious ethnic traits (American rather than Hindu) were spasmodic and generated by intricate, jouncy rhythms. Usual percussion instruments added much to the fascination.

Straveinsky's "Ode" was sandwiched between two Copland works, "Inscape" and the suite from "Billy the Kid."

In this unique position, the Stravinsky melodies sounded downright friendly. Most telling was the "Eclogue" with its capricious action and crafty orchestration.

Raymond Morin

Hanne-Lore Kuhse

Aaron Copland

David Ward

Jess Thomas

THE NOTED QUARTET above will be featured this weekend at the Tanglewood Music Festival, Lenox, Mass. At top left is Hanne-Lore Kuhse, soprano, who will be soloist in a performance of Wagner's Rheingold-Finale and Walkure, Act I, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on Saturday, Aug. 24. At top right is Aaron Copland, former Chairman of the faculty and head of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Center, who will be guest conductor for a concert by the Boston Symphony on Friday, Aug. 23. The program will include works by Copland, Carter, Faure, Chavez and Stravinsky. At bottom left is David Ward, bass, who will be heard in Saturday's all-Wagner concert by the orchestra. He will sing the Finale of Rheingold and act I of Walkure. At bottom right is Jess Thomas, tenor, who will be featured in the same Saturday night concert with Mr. Ward and Miss Kuhse.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 23 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

HANNE-LORE KUHSE soprano
CHARLES WILSON piano

BRAHMS 1833-1897	Sonntag op. 47 no. 3
	Feins Liebchen op. 105 no. 3
	Spannung op. 84 no. 5
	Das Mädchen spricht op. 107 no. 3
	Wenn du nur zuweilen lächelst op. 57 no. 2
	Feldeinsamkeit op. 86 no. 2
	Die Mainacht op. 43 no. 2
WAGNER 1813-1883	Fünf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk
	Der Engel
	Stehe still!
	Im Treibhaus
	Schmerzen
	Träume

Charles Wilson plays the Baldwin piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

TOWN TIMES
OAKVILLE, ONT.
WEEKLY C... 3,100
AUG 22 1968
New England Newsclip

Wagnerian Soprano Outshines Composer Copland at Tanglewood

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
AUG 25 1968
New England Newsclip

LENOX — An unusually small audience of 4,100 came to Tanglewood Friday night to see American composer Aaron Copland conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festivals eighth and final weekend.

The program was largely contemporary music including a fair share of Copland's own compositions.

Choicest music and performance of the evening was the weekend prelude recital by the German dramatic soprano, Hann-Lore Kuhse, accompanied by Charles Wilson.

Little Known

Miss Kuhse is little known in this country. After her American debut in January of last year, she sang the title role in a concert performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" at Tanglewood last summer.

She is a singer of Wagnerian proportions an d voice. Friday night's program was Brahms and Wagner lieder.

She is a singer of Wagnerian proportions and voice. vel in itself because the selection did not cover a wide dramatic field.

The Kuhse voice has incredible opulence and is projected with equally remarkable ease. Everything poured forth with utter control and almost inaudible breathing.

Her expressive scope reached from full-throated sounds of Brahms' "Die Mainacht" that bounced from acoustical panels overhead to intimate disclosures of Wagner's "Traume."

Great Voice

Surely Miss Kuhse has one of the great voices of this generation along with musical intelligence.

The least agitating work on the orchestral program was Faure's sweetly-scented suite from the incidental music to "Pelleas and Melisande."

It gave the content string players an opportunity to make exquisite sounds. Copland benefitted the work with a knowledgeable reading, achieving almost impressionistic results.

Flute, harp and strings made a beautiful chapter of the Sicilienne. While the Faure treatment of the subject doesn't approach DeBussy's which came later, orchestra and conductor gave the music definite stature.

That's about as far as the program went without creating general reproach or argument.

First Performance

Elliott Carter's "Holiday Overture" received its first performance by the Boston Symphony.

It proved to be a boisterous, vigorous hodge-podge of enthusiastic ideas. The overture's close made a noisy bid for applause. The composer was present to acknowledge its restraint.

A good "fun" piece was "Sinfonia India," written by the Mexican composer Carlos Chavez over 30 years ago.

The most obvious ethnic traits (American rather than Hindu) were spasmodic and generated by intricate, jouncy rhythms. Usual percussion instruments added much to the fascination.

Straveinsky's "Ode" was sandwiched between two Copland works, "Inscape" and the suite from "Billy the Kid."

In this unique position, the Stravinsky melodies sounded downright friendly. Most telling was the "Eclogue" with its capricious action and crafty orchestration.

Raymond Morin

Hanne-Lore Kuhse

Aaron Copland

David Ward

Jess Thomas

THE NOTED QUARTET above will be featured this weekend at the Tanglewood Music Festival, Lenox, Mass. At top left is Hanne-Lore Kuhse, soprano, who will be soloist in a performance of Wagner's Rheingold-Finale and Walkure, Act I, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on Saturday, Aug. 24. At top right is Aaron Copland, former Chairman of the faculty and head of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Center, who will be guest conductor for a concert by the Boston Symphony on Friday, Aug. 23. The program will include works by Copland, Carter, Faure, Chavez and Stravinsky. At bottom left is David Ward, bass, who will be heard in Saturday's all-Wagner concert by the orchestra. He will sing the Finale of Rheingold and act I of Walkure. At bottom right is Jess Thomas, tenor, who will be featured in the same Saturday night concert with Mr. Ward and Miss Kuhse.

Eighth Week

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 23 at 7 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

WEEKEND PRELUDE

HANNE-LORE KUHSE soprano
CHARLES WILSON piano

BRAHMS
1833-1897
- Sonntag op. 47 no. 3
- Feins Liebchen op. 105 no. 3
- Spannung op. 84 no. 5
- Das Mädchen spricht op. 107 no. 3
- Wenn du nur zuweilen lächelst op. 57 no. 2
- Feldeinsamkeit op. 86 no. 2
- Die Mainacht op. 43 no. 2

WAGNER
1813-1883
- Fünf Gedichte von Mathilde Wesendonk
- Der Engel
- Stehe still!
- Im Treibhaus
- Schmerzen
- Träume

Charles Wilson plays the Baldwin piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

TOWN TIMES
AUG 22 1968
New England Newsclip

76.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 22 1968 New England Newsclip

Final Tanglewood Weekend Features Wagner, Brahms

The eighth and final weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will begin on Friday evening at 9 with a concert conducted by composer-conductor Aaron Copland.

Copland is the founder of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center, and headed it for 25 years, until his retirement two years ago. For his program, he has chosen Elliot Carter's "Holiday Overture," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite, Chavez's "Sinfonia India," Stravinsky's "Ode," and two of his own compositions, the recently composed "Inscape," and the popular classic ballet music, "Billy the Kid."

Saturday's concert at 8 p.m. under the direction of the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act I of Die Walkuere. Singers in both will be Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas and David Ward. Also singing in the Rheingold Finale are three members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides and Phyllis Elhady.

Ward Makes Debut

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of "Fidelio." She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin and is widely known throughout Eastern Europe as well as the capitals of Western Europe. The appearance will mark Miss Kuhse's second concert tour to the U.S. While at Tanglewood, she will also join Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recital of songs by Brahms and Wagner. This will be the weekend prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed.

Jess Thomas, one of the world's foremost heldentenors, is a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, a recipient of the Bayreuth Festival's gold medal and an active recitalist. He first appeared with the BSO at Symphony Hall last fall.

David Ward, born in Scotland, will be making his debut with the Boston Symphony. He joined the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1960, and the Metropolitan Opera in 1964. Last fall, he appeared with the San Francisco Opera for the first time.

Little-Heard Works

On Sunday afternoon, the concluding concert of the season will again be conducted by Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Three unusual and rarely heard works for chorus and orchestra will open the program. They are the "Gesang der Parzen" (Song of Fates), Opus 89, "Schickalslied" (Song of Destiny), Opus 54, and "Naenie" (Goddess of Funerals). Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in Brahms' Vienna, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin and Schiller respectively, and deal with the relation of man to the gods. Leinsdorf has noted that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The "Gesang der Parzen" and "Naenie" will be performed by the BSO for the first time. The program will conclude with the Brahms Symphony No. 1.

There will be an open rehearsal on Saturday at 10:30 a.m. and a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday morning at 10:30.

Leinsdorf to Off Rarely-Heard Brahms in Finale at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open Friday evening with a concert at 9 p.m. conducted by composer - conductor Aaron Copland.

Founded Center

Copland founded the composition department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and headed it for 25 years, retiring two seasons ago.

For his program, he has chosen Elliot Carter's holiday Overture, Faure's Pelleas and Melisande Suit, Chavez's Sinfonia India, Stravinsky's Ode, and two of his own compositions, the recently - composed Inscape, and the popular ballet classic, Billy the Kid.

All-Wagner Program

Saturday's concert at 8 p.m. under the direction of the orchestra's Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act I of Die Walkuere.

Singers in both are Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, and David Ward. Also singing in the Rheingold finale, are three members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Erich Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of Fidelio. She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin and is widely known throughout eastern Europe as well as the capitals of western Europe. This is Miss Kuhse's second performing trip to the United States.

Join in Recital

While at Tanglewood, she will also join Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recital of Brahms and Wagner songs. This will be the Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Music Shed.

Jess Thomas, one of the world's foremost heldentenors, appeared with the Boston Symphony last season in Symphony Hall. After

JANNE-LORE KUHSE

JESS THOMAS

DAVID WARD

Tanglewood, he will sing at the Hollywood Bowl, then at the San Francisco Opera during its fall season. He is a member of the Metropolitan Opera, a recipient of the Bayreuth Festival's gold medal, and an active recitalist.

David Ward, born in Scotland, makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood debuts in these concerts. He joined the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1960, and the Metropolitan Opera in 1964. Last fall, he appeared for the first time with the San Francisco Opera. He is now considered one of the world's front-ranking interpreters of the Wagnerian repertory.

Next Sunday afternoon the concluding concert of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will again be conducted by Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the Gesang der Parzen (Song of Fates), Op. 89, Schicksalslied (Song of Destiny), Op. 54, and Naenie (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82.

Choral Music

Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of his day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. Leinsdorf noted that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The Gesang der Parzen and Naenie will be performed by the orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the First Symphony of Brahms.

AARON COPLAND

There will be another of the orchestra's Open Rehearsals Saturday morning at 10.30, and a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players Sunday morning at 10.30.

The Berkshire Music Center will offer vocal and chamber music programs tomorrow and Wednesday evenings, in the Theater-Concert Hall. Thursday there will be the third performance of Stanley Silverman's theater piece, Elephant Steps, which was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with Fromm Music Foundation and had its premiere during the recent Festival of Contemporary Music.

Theodore Strongin, reviewing the work for the New York Times, wrote, "Silverman and his colleague, Richard Foreman, who wrote the libretto, for Elephant Steps and staged it, are courageous men. What they have done is taken all the senses, not just hearing, and given them equal value. They have stretched the awareness. . .and are successful enough on first try to make Elephant Steps very beguiling."

Saturday, in the Theater-Concert Hall at 2.30 p.m. the Berkshire Music Center will be conducted by Aaron Copland. The program includes works by Britten, Ives, Smetana and Stravinsky, in addition to Copland's Short Symphony.

These four Berkshire Music Center events are open to the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, who help support the work of the Center. A Rockefeller Foundation matching grant was recently announced, challenging the Friends to increase their giving and thus earn $50,000 this year against the three-year goal of $125,000. Membership in the Friends is open to the public and the Friends office is at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, phone (413) 637-1600.

The annual Tanglewood appearance of the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler will be Tuesday at 8 p.m. in the Music Shed. Peter Nero will be piano soloist in the Gershwin Concerto in F as well as in his own Fantasy and Improvisations.

In the latter, Nero will be joined by Joe Cusatis, drummer, and Gene Cherico, bassist. Fiedler opens the program with Morton Gould's American Salute, and Aaron Coplands' Outdoor Overture. He will also lead the Boston Pops Orchestra in some of its popular favorites, including Love is Blue, Lover's Concerto, and a group called A la Glenn Miller.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

AUG 18 1968 New England Newsclip

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 500

AUG 22 1968

Final Week At Tanglewood

The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open this Friday evening, August 23, with a concert at 9 p. m. by composer-conductor Aaron Copland. Mr. Copland founded the Composition Department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and headed it for twenty-five years, retiring two seasons ago. For his program, he has chosen Elliot Carter's "Holiday Overture", Faure's "Pelleas and Meisande Suite," Chavez's "Sinfonia India", Stravinsky's 'Ode' and two of his own compositions, the recently-composed "Inscape", and the popular ballet classic, "Billy The Kid."

Saturday's concert at 8 p. m. under the direction of the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act. I of Die Walkuere. Singers in both are Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, and David Ward. Also singing in the Rheingold Finale are three members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Erich Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of Fidelio. She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin and is widely known throughout eastern Europe as well as the capitals of western Europe. This is Miss Kuhse second performing trip to the United States. While at Tanglewood, she will also join Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recital of Brahms and Wagner songs. This will be the Weekend Prelude on Friday, August 23 at 7 p. m. in the Music Shed.

On Sunday afternoon, August 25, the concluding concert of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will again be conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the Gesang der Parzen (Song of the Fates), Op. 89, Schicksalslied (Song of Destiny), Op. 54, and Naenie (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82. Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of his day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin & Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. Mr. Leinsdorf noted that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The Gesang der Parzen and Naenie will be performed by the Orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the First Symphony of Brahms.

There will be another of the Orchestra's Open Rehearsals on Saturday morning at 10:30, and a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday morning at 10:30.

The Berkshire Music Center will offer a vocal and chamber music program on Wednesday evening, August 21, in the Theater-Concert Hall. On Thursday, Aug. 22, there will be the third performance of Stanley Silverman's theater piece, Elephant Steps, which was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation and had its premiere during the recent Festival of Contemporary Music.

On Saturday, August 24, in the Theater-Concert Hall at 2:30, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will be conducted by Aaron Copland. The program includes works by Britten, Ives, Smetana and Stravinsky, in addition to Mr. Copland's Short Symphony.

The three Berkshire Music Center events areopen to the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, who help support the work of the Center. A Rockefeller Foundation matching grant was recently announced, challenging the Friends to increase their giving and thus earn $50,000 this year against the three-year goal of $125,000. Membership in the Friends is open to the public and the Friends office is at Tanglewood, Lenox. Phone (413) 637-1600.

77

SARATOGA SARATOGIAN
Tuesday, August 20, 1968

At Tanglewood

Copland Opens Final Week

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. — The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open Friday evening, with a concert at 9 by composer-conductor Aaron Copland.

Copland founded the Composition Department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and headed it for 25 years, retiring two seasons ago. For his program, he has chosen Elliot Carter's Holiday Overture, Faure's Pelleas and Melisande Suite, Chavez's Sinfonia India, Stravinsky's Ode, and two of his own compositions, the recently-composed Inscape, and the popular ballet classic, Billy the Kid.

Saturday's concert at 8 p.m., under the direction of the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act I of Die Walkuere. Singers in both are Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, and David Ward. Also singing in the Rheingold Finale are three members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Erich Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of Fidelio. She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin and is widely known throughout eastern Europe as well as the capitals of western Europe. This is Miss Kuhse's second performing trip to the United States. While at Tanglewood, she will also join Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recital of Brahms and Wagner songs. This will be the weekend prelude on Friday, at 7 p.m. in the Music Shed.

Jess Thomas, one of the world's foremost heldentenors, first appeared with the Boston Symphony last season in Symphony Hall. After Tanglewood, he will sing at the Hollywood Bowl, then at the San Francisco Opera during its fall season. He is a member of the Metropolitan Opera, a recipient of the Bayreuth Festival's Gold Medal, and an active recitalist.

David Ward, born in Scotland, makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood debut in this concert. He joined the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1960, and the Metropolitan Opera in 1964. Last Fall, he appeared for the first time with the San Francisco Opera. He is now considered one of the world's front-ranking interpreters of the Wagnerian repertory.

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 25, the concluding concert of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will again be conducted by Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the Gesang der Parzen (Song of the Fates), Op. 89, Schicksalslied (Song of Destiny), Op. 54, and Naenie (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82. Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of his day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. Mr. Leinsdorf noted that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The Gesang der Parzen and Naenie will be performed by the Orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the First Symphony of Brahms.

There will be another of the Orchestra's Open Rehearsals on Saturday morning at 10:30, and a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday morning at 10:30.

On Saturday, in the Theater-Concert Hall at 2:30, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will be conducted by Aaron Copland. The program includes works by Britten, Ives, Smetana and Stravinsky, in addition to Mr. Copland's Short Symphony.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500

AUG

New England Newsclip

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Monday, August 19, 1968

Berkshire Festival ending with Aaron Copeland concert

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open Friday with a concert at 9 p.m. by composer-conductor Aaron Copland.

Copland founded the composition department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and headed it for twenty-five years, retiring two seasons ago.

He has chosen Elliot Carter's "Holiday Overture," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande Suite," Chavez's "Sinfonia India," Stravinsky's "Ode," and two of his own compositions, the and the popular ballet classic, recently-composed "Inscape," "Billy The Kid."

Saturday's concert at 8 p.m. under the direction of the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde." Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of "Das Rheingold," and Act I of "Die Walkuere." Singers in both are Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, and David Ward. Also singing in the "Rheingold" Finale are three members of the Berkshire Music Center fellowship program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Erich Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of "Fidelio." She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin and is widely known throughout eastern Europe as well as the capitals of western Europe. This is Miss Kuhse's second performing trip to the United States.

While at Tanglewood, she will also join Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recital of Brahms and Wagner songs. This will be the Weekend Prelude on Friday 7 p.m. in the Music Shed.

JESS THOMAS, one of the world's foremost heldentenors, first appeared with the Boston Symphony last season in Symphony Hall. After Tanglewood, he will sing at the Hollywood Bowl, then at the San Francisco Opera during its fall season. He is a member of the Metropolitan Opera, a recipient of the Bayreuth Festival's Gold Medal, and an active recitalist.

David Ward, born in Scotland, makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood debut in this concert. He joined the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1960, and the Metropolitan Opera in 1964. Last fall, he appeared for the first time with the San Francisco Opera.

Next Sunday afternoon, the concluding concert of the festival will again be conducted by Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program.

Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the "Gesang der Parzen" ("Song of the FATES"), Op. 89, "Schicksalslied" ("Song of Destiny"), Op. 54, and "Naenie" ("Godes of Funerals"), Op. 82 Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of his day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. The "Gesang der Parzen" and "Naenie" will be performed by the orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the first symphony of Brahms.

There will be another of the Orchestra's open rehearsals on Saturday at 10:30 a.m. and a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday at 10:30 a.m.

The Bershire Music Center will offer vocal and chamber music programs on this evening Theater-Concert Hall. Thursday, and Wednesday evening in the there will be the third performance of Stanley Silverman's theater piece, Elephant Steps which was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation and had its premiere during the recent Festival of Contemporary Music.

On Saturday in the Theater-Concert Hall at 2:30 p.m., the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will be conducted by Aaron Copland. The program includes works by Britten, Ives, Smetana and Stravinsky, in addition to Copland's "Short Symphony."

AARON COPLAND, . . . former Chairman of the Faculty and head of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Center, will be the guest conductor for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Friday, August 23. The program will include works by Copland, Carter, Faure, Chavez and Stravinsky.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 23 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

AARON COPLAND conductor

CARTER — Holiday Overture†
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

FAURÉ — Suite from the incidental music to 'Pelléas et Mélisande' op. 80
Prelude: quasi adagio
'Fileuse': andantino quasi allegretto
Sicilienne: allegretto molto moderato
'The death of Mélisande': molto adagio

CHÁVEZ — Sinfonia India

intermission

COPLAND — Inscape†
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

STRAVINSKY — Ode (1943)†
Eulogy: lento
Eclogue: con moto
Epitaph: lento

COPLAND — Suite from the ballet 'Billy the Kid'†

†First performance at the Festival concerts

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 22

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

AUG 20 1968

New England Newsclip

AARON COPLAND, composer and former chairman of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct the Boston Symphony Friday night at Tanglewood in a program of Copland, Carter, Faure, Chavez and Stravinsky.

77

SARATOGA SARATOGIAN
Tuesday, August 20, 1968

At Tanglewood

Copland Opens Final Week

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. — The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open Friday evening, with a concert at 9 by composer-conductor Aaron Copland.

Copland founded the Composition Department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and headed it for 25 years, retiring two seasons ago. For his program, he has chosen Elliot Carter's Holiday Overture, Faure's Pelleas and Melisande Suite, Chavez's Sinfonia India, Stravinsky's Ode, and two of his own compositions, the recently-composed Inscape, and the popular ballet classic, Billy the Kid.

Saturday's concert at 8 p.m., under the direction of the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act I of Die Walkuere. Singers in both are Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, and David Ward. Also singing in the Rheingold Finale are three members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Erich Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of Fidelio. She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin and is widely known throughout eastern Europe as well as the capitals of western Europe. This is Miss Kuhse's second performing trip to the United States. While at Tanglewood, she will also join Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recital of Brahms and Wagner songs. This will be the weekend prelude on Friday, at 7 p.m. in the Music Shed.

Jess Thomas, one of the world's foremost heldentenors, first appeared with the Boston Symphony last season in Symphony Hall. After Tanglewood, he will sing at the Hollywood Bowl, then at the San Francisco Opera during its fall season. He is a member of the Metropolitan Opera, a recipient of the Bayreuth Festival's Gold Medal, and an active recitalist.

David Ward, born in Scotland, makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood debut in this concert. He joined the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1960, and the Metropolitan Opera in 1964. Last Fall, he appeared for the first time with the San Francisco Opera. He is now considered one of the world's front-ranking interpreters of the Wagnerian repertory.

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 25, the concluding concert of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will again be conducted by Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the Gesang der Parzen (Song of the Fates), Op. 89, Schicksalslied (Song of Destiny), Op. 54, and Naenie (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82. Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of his day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. Mr. Leinsdorf noted that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The Gesang der Parzen and Naenie will be performed by the Orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the First Symphony of Brahms.

There will be another of the Orchestra's Open Rehearsals on Saturday morning at 10:30, and a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday morning at 10:30.

On Saturday, in the Theater-Concert Hall at 2:30, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will be conducted by Aaron Copland. The program includes works by Britten, Ives, Smetana and Stravinsky, in addition to Mr. Copland's Short Symphony.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500

AUG

New England Newsclip

SYRACUSE [illegible] NAL
Mo[illegible]

Berkshire Festival ending with Aaron Copeland concert

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open Friday with a concert at 9 p.m. by composer-conductor Aaron Copland.

Copland founded the composition department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and headed it for twenty-five years, retiring two seasons ago.

He has chosen Elliot Carter's "Holiday Overture," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande Suite," Chavez's "Sinfonia India," Stravinsky's "Ode," and two of his own compositions, the and the popular ballet classic, recently-composed "Inscape," "Billy The Kid."

Saturday's concert at 8 p.m. under the direction of the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde." Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of "Das Rheingold," and Act I of "Die Walkuere." Singers in both are Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, and David Ward. Also singing in the "Rheingold" Finale are three members of the Berkshire Music Center fellowship program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Erich Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of "Fidelio." She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin and is widely known throughout eastern Europe as well as the capitals of western Europe. This is Miss Kuhse's second performing trip to the United States.

While at Tanglewood, she will also join Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recital of Brahms and Wagner songs. This will be the Weekend Prelude on Friday 7 p.m. in the Music Shed.

JESS THOMAS, one of the world's foremost heldentenors, first appeared with the Boston Symphony last season in Symphony Hall. After Tanglewood, he will sing at the Hollywood Bowl, then at the San Francisco Opera during its fall season. He is a member of the Metropolitan Opera, a recipient of the Bayreuth Festival's Gold Medal, and an active recitalist.

David Ward, born in Scotland, makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood debut in this concert. He joined the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1960, and the Metropolitan Opera in 1964. Last fall, he appeared for the first time with the San Francisco Opera.

Next Sunday afternoon, the concluding concert of the festival will again be conducted by Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program.

Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the "Gesang der Parzen" ("Song of the FATES"), Op. 89, "Schicksalslied" ("Song of Destiny"), Op. 54, and "Naenie" ("Godes of Funerals"), Op. 82 Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of his day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. The "Gesang der Parzen" and "Naenie" will be performed by the orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the first symphony of Brahms.

There will be another of the Orchestra's open rehearsals on Saturday at 10:30 a.m. and a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday at 10:30 a.m.

The Bershire Music Center will offer vocal and chamber music programs on this evening Theater-Concert Hall. Thursday, and Wednesday evening in the there will be the third performance of Stanley Silverman's theater piece, Elephant Steps which was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation and had its premiere during the recent Festival of Contemporary Music.

On Saturday in the Theater-Concert Hall at 2:30 p.m., the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will be conducted by Aaron Copland. The program includes works by Britten, Ives, Smetana and Stravinsky, in addition to Copland's "Short Symphony."

AARON COPLAND, . . . former Chairman of the Faculty and head of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Center, will be the guest conductor for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Friday, August 23. The program will include works by Copland, Carter, Faure, Chavez and Stravinsky.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Friday August 23 at 9 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

AARON COPLAND conductor

CARTER — Holiday Overture†
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

FAURÉ — Suite from the incidental music to 'Pelléas et Mélisande' op. 80
Prelude: quasi adagio
'Fileuse': andantino quasi allegretto
Sicilienne: allegretto molto moderato
'The death of Mélisande': molto adagio

CHÁVEZ — Sinfonia India

intermission

COPLAND — Inscape†
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

STRAVINSKY — Ode (1943)†
Eulogy: lento
Eclogue: con moto
Epitaph: lento

COPLAND — Suite from the ballet 'Billy the Kid'†

†First performance at the Festival concerts

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 22

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

AUG 20 1968

New England Newsclip

AARON COPLAND, composer and former chairman of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct the Boston Symphony Friday night at Tanglewood in a program of Copland, Carter, Faure, Chavez and Stravinsky.

78.

Copland Tanglewood conductor

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

LENOX — Aaron Copland was the Boston Symphony's guest conductor at Tanglewood Friday night, leading Elliott Carter's "Holiday Overture," some of Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et. Melisande," the "Simfonia India" by Chavez, Stravinsky's "Ode", as well as, two of his own works, "Inscape" and a suite from the ballet, "Billy the Kid."

The Holiday Overture, having been written in 1944, is very early Carter. It sounds a lot like Copland's Americana, but that resemblance doesn't really hold below the engaging surface. Its polyphony, and many features of its harmonic and structural life make it essentially a very different kind of music, one in fact already recognizable as Carter's.

'FULL OF LIFE'

Not surprisingly Copland most of all found the Copland in the piece, giving a performance whose high spirits were extraordinary, but whose very energy at the same time seemed to obscure some of the other dimensions.

The Chavez "Sinfonia India" is Coplandesque, too, actually proto-Copland with maracas, full of life and a splendid audience piece. It, too, got a captivatingly vital performance.

The "Ode," written in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky (the conductor's second wife, who died in 1942), is one of Stravinsky's most neglected works, a pity, because it is an elegant and ingenious charmer.

Copland "Inscape," written last year for the New York Philharmonic, is a modest and precise piece, thoroughly professional, with a few textural mannerisms to remind us of Copland, though in most ways quite impersonal.

The "Billy the Kid" score on the other hand, continues to be wonderfully evocative, even poetic. Being the nearest thing to a repertory piece on the program, it probably got the least rehearsal time; so I should guess, anyway from the exceedingly shaky performance.

Otherwise, though, things generally went fairly well, and the program itself made this an unusually interesting concert all round.

COPLAND 'WILD'

On Saturday afternnoon, Copland conducted a concert with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, choosing an ambitious program, his own Short Symphony, Stravinsky's Symphony in C, "Decoration Day" by Ives and beginning and ending a little less interestingly with "The Bartered Bride" overture and Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra."

Copland brings enormous zest, and of course, an unusual musical intelligence to his conduction, but his technique is wild, and to go by results, he must be extremely disconcerting to play for.

One of the differences between a professional orchestra like the Boston Symphony and an orchestra of even superbly equipped students like the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, is that the professionals can carry on under almost any sort of conditions, while the students do not have such secure routines when it comes to necessary rescue operations.

The Boston Symphony on Friday managed most of the time to do very well, often in spite of Copland's conducting as much as because of it, but for the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, the experience of playing for him seemed to be mostly one of continuous frustration.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

AUG 26 1968 New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Saturday, August 24, 1968

Copland conducts a Symphony beautifully

By CORAL CROSMAN
Union-Star Staff

Aaron Copland, the American composer, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at Tanglewood in a beautifully-balanced program well-flavored with a contemporary sound.

Including his own "Inscape," a first performance for the Boston Symphony, and the well-known suite from the ballet, "Billy the Kid," there was also music by Elliott Carter, Gabriel Faure, Carlos Chavez and Igor Stravinsky, all of whom have lived in the 20th century.

★ ★ ★

It was a refreshing change of pace. The opening "Holiday Overture" by Carter is pure mirth, zestfully joyous and awakening. The instruments seemed to dance in this work and Copland's sprightly, exacting conducting brought out the best in them. Composed in 1944, it is a bright, witty work, its form with interplaying themes a highly-integrated and pleasing structure.

In contrast, the dreamy, Impressionistic sound of Faure's "Suite from the Incidental Music to 'Pelleas et Melisande'" followed with its soft webwork of texture. Copland employed a special delicacy in allowing this French work to breathe its airy fantasies, captivating in expressiveness.

Then the percussionists had loads of fun (or at least kept quite awake) in Chavez' "Sinfonia India," a composition which quite literally evokes the spirit of the primitive (Indian) in the Mexican culture. It is full of fire and life, charged with energy and excitement.

★ ★ ★

Two Copland selections, the 12-tone "Inscape," commissioned for the 125th birthday of the New York Philharmonic during 1967-68 and his "Billy the Kid," followed the intermission. While the later composition appears (at one hearing, hardly fair) to be a haunting, introspective work the familiar ballet suite contrasts with it markedly.

The ballet is, of course, program music and you can envision the American cowboy in all the scenes of his adventurous existence, complete with rousing gun battles. Copland himself might have been riding a horse, in such a way did he convey his involvement with the music. It was a delight to watch and hear.

Also on the program was Stravinsky's "Ode," composed in 1943. It reflects the genius of the Russian master, but with a quietly personal touch. It has been used as ballet music.

There was a coolness in the air last night that reminded one that this is the final concert weekend for the Boston Symphony. After Sunday's 2:30 p.m. matinee, orchestra members will bid farewell to their summer home in the lovely Berkshires.

★ ★ ★

One was saddened and puzzled by empty seats in the forward section, wondering how any music-lover could miss such an exceptionally fine program. But perhaps the trek away from the summer places has already begun and the patrons are readying their winter residences where the metropolitan orchestras will resume their music-making.

At Tanglewood

Aaron Copland Back, Conducts Own Works

BY R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Aaron Copland returned to his old haunts at Tanglewood Friday night to conduct a half-dozen 20th Century works, two of them of his own composition, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

25 Years in Berkshires

His association with the orchestra and Tanglewood has been long and close. He was for 25 years chairman of the faculty and head of the composition department of the Berkshire music center.

He is known throughout the world as a composer and author. In recent years he has been expanding his activity as a conductor.

On the podium Friday he exhibited a verve and vitality that belied his 67 years (he'll be 68 Nov. 14). He bounced and jazzed and beat his arms vigorously and with a wide sweep.

Serious Boston Pops

His grin, also, was wide. He was obviously enjoying himself. It was the kind of music he is best known for . . . a kind of serious Boston Pops.

Two of the works before intermission are typical. The Carter "Holiday Overture" (1944) and the Chavez "Sinfonia India" (1935-36) were full of bright orchestral colors.

The rhythms were orthodox but hopped up with frequent syncopations, the harmonies were tonal but spiced with dissonances, the melodies were more thematic than singable.

Very Entertaining

It is in the orchestrations that these pieces shine; they are busy, fussy and brassy . . . lots of entertainment.

Such was not the case with the Faure suite from the incidental music he wrote for the play. "Pelleas et Melisande," nor for the 12 tone work by Copland "Inscape," immediately following intermission.

The Faure piece was deceptiove in that it seemed a lot lighter and more ephemeral than it is in truth. Its values are substantive a good bit more satisfying than the feathery surfaces indicate.

Crowd Sizable

"Inscape," however had everything it owned right up there to be seen. . .lots of close, pretentious atonal chords and little else.

The rest of the evening, the Stravinsky "Ode" and the Copland suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid", were, as indicated earlier, serious pop.

There were 6342 in the audience. . .a nice size for an unfamiliar program on a cool evening.

Soloist Tonight

Miss Hanne-Lore Kuhse, soprano, who will be one of the soloists tonight during the all Wagner program, offered 14 songs accompanied by Charles Wilson for the 7 p.m. prelude program.

Seven were written by Brahms, five by Wagner and two (encores) by Richard Strauss. Somehow, they all sounded as if they had been composed by the same musician.

Miss Kuhse is a first-class soprano, a leading dramatic soprano at the Berlin State Opera since 1963. Tanglewood listeners heard her here last year when she sang in the American premiere of Beethoven's original version of "Fidelio".

Sounded Detached

Friday she sounded detached. She sang the romantic poems more as a narrator than as a prticipant. Her voice, as expected, was clean, strong and full with a tasteful technical control, but emotion was lacking.

Tonight the all Wagner program will start with the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and continue with the Entry of the gods into Valhalla from "Das Rheingold." After intermission seven soloists will help recreate the first act of "Die Walkure."

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

AUG 24 1968 New England Newsclip

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

TANGLEWOOD: LAST WEEK OF CONCERTS

Each summer Sunday, the American Automobile Association tells Herald Traveler readers where the action-for-the-vacationer is in New England.

Routes, mileage, driving time and tolls are included.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at TANGLEWOOD; Lenox, Mass.; Aug. 23, 24, 25. Eighth and last week of the season for the summer concerts. Also "Tanglewood on Parade," the afternoon and evening benefit for the Berkshire Music Center, Wednesday. On Friday, Aaron Copeland will be guest conductor and the program will include his Inscape and Billy the Kid. Saturday is Wagner day, featuring the finale of Das Rheingold and Act I of Die Walkuere. Sunday's audience will hear a Brahms program. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct both days. General admission $2.50, the day of the concert. Reserved seats, $3.50 to $7.50 ordered from Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Overnight reservations necessary. Reserved seats are in the Music Shed which holds 6,000. In addition, vast general admission crowds listen to the concerts on the spacious lawns of the beautiful Berkshire Hills estate which serves as summer home for the Boston Symphony Orhestra.

AAA Recommended Route From Boston: Mass. Turnpike to Lee Exit. U. S. 20 and local road into Lenox, Hawthorne Road to Tanglewood. 137 miles, 2 hours 20 minutes driving time. $2.95 tolls.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 301,436

AUG 18 1968 New England Newsclip

78

Copland Tanglewood conductor

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

LENOX — Aaron Copland was the Boston Symphony's guest conductor at Tanglewood Friday night, leading Elliott Carter's "Holiday Overture," some of Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande," the "Simfonia India" by Chavez, Stravinsky's "Ode", as well as two of his own works, "Inscape" and a suite from the ballet, "Billy the Kid."

The Holiday Overture, having been written in 1944, is very early Carter. It sounds a lot like Copland's Americana, but that resemblance doesn't really hold below the engaging surface. Its polyphony, and many features of its harmonic and structural life make it essentially a very different kind of music, one in fact already recognizable as Carter's.

'FULL OF LIFE'

Not surprisingly Copland most of all found the Copland in the piece, giving a performance whose high spirits were extraordinary, but whose very energy at the same time seemed to obscure some of the other dimensions.

The Chavez "Sinfonia India" is Coplandesque, too, actually proto-Copland with maracas, full of life and a splendid audience piece. It, too, got a captivatingly vital performance.

The "Ode," written in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky (the conductor's second wife, who died in 1942), is one of Stravinsky's most neglected works, a pity, because it is an elegant and ingenious charmer.

Copland "Inscape," written last year for the New York Philharmonic, is a modest and precise piece, thoroughly professional, with a few textural mannerisms to remind us of Copland, though in most ways quite impersonal.

The "Billy the Kid" score on the other hand, continues to be wonderfully evocative, even poetic. Being the nearest thing to a repertory piece on the program, it probably got the least rehearsal time; so I should guess, anyway from the exceedingly shaky performance.

Otherwise, though, things generally went fairly well, and the program itself made this an unusually interesting concert all round.

COPLAND 'WILD'

On Saturday afternnoon, Copland conducted a concert with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, choosing an ambitious program, his own Short Symphony, Stravinsky's Symphony in C, "Decoration Day" by Ives and beginning and ending a little less interestingly with "The Bartered Bride" overture and Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra."

Copland brings enormous zest, and of course, an unusual musical intelligence to his conduction, but his technique is wild, and to go by results, he must be extremely disconcerting to play for.

One of the differences between a professional orchestra like the Boston Symphony and an orchestra of even superbly equipped students like the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, is that the professionals can carry on under almost any sort of conditions, while the students do not have such secure routines when it comes to necessary rescue operations.

The Boston Symphony on Friday managed most of the time to do very well, often in spite of Copland's conducting as much as because of it, but for the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, the experience of playing for him seemed to be mostly one of continuous frustration.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
AUG 26 1968
New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY UNION STAR
Saturday, August 24, 1968

Copland conducts a Symphony beautifully

By CORAL CROSMAN
Union-Star Staff

Aaron Copland, the American composer, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at Tanglewood in a beautifully-balanced program well-flavored with a contemporary sound.

Including his own "Inscape," a first performance for the Boston Symphony, and the well-known suite from the ballet, "Billy the Kid," there was also music by Elliott Carter, Gabriel Faure, Carlos Chavez and Igor Stravinsky, all of whom have lived in the 20th century.

★ ★ ★

It was a refreshing change of pace. The opening "Holiday Overture" by Carter is pure mirth, zestfully joyous and awakening. The instruments seemed to dance in this work and Copland's sprightly, exacting conducting brought out the best in them. Composed in 1944, it is a bright, witty work, its form with interplaying themes a highly-integrated and pleasing structure.

In contrast, the dreamy, Impressionistic sound of Faure's "Suite from the Incidental Music to 'Pelleas et Melisande' " followed with its soft webwork of texture. Copland employed a special delicacy in allowing this French work to breathe its airy fantasies, captivating in expressiveness.

Then the percussionists had loads of fun (or at least kept quite awake) in Chavez' "Sinfonia India," a composition which quite literally evokes the spirit of the primitive (Indian) in the Mexican culture. It is full of fire and life, charged with energy and excitement.

★ ★ ★

Two Copland selections, the 12-tone "Inscape," commissioned for the 125th birthday of the New York Philharmonic during 1967-68 and his "Billy the Kid," followed the intermission. While the later composition appears (at one hearing, hardly fair) to be a haunting, introspective work the familiar ballet suite contrasts with it markedly.

The ballet is, of course, program music and you can envision the American cowboy in all the scenes of his adventurous existence, complete with rousing gun battles. Copland himself might have been riding a horse, in such a way did he convey his involvement with the music. It was a delight to watch and hear.

Also on the program was Stravinsky's "Ode," composed in 1943. It reflects the genius of the Russian master, but with a quietly personal touch. It has been used as ballet music.

There was a coolness in the air last night that reminded one that this is the final concert weekend for the Boston Symphony. After Sunday's 2:30 p.m. matinee, orchestra members will bid farewell to their summer home in the lovely Berkshires.

★ ★ ★

One was saddened and puzzled by empty seats in the forward section, wondering how any music-lover could miss such an exceptionally fine program. But perhaps the trek away from the summer places has already begun and the patrons are readying their winter residences where the metropolitan orchestras will resume their music-making.

At Tanglewood

Aaron Copland Back, Conducts Own Works

BY R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Aaron Copland returned to his old haunts at Tanglewood Friday night to conduct a half-dozen 20th Century works, two of them of his own composition, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

25 Years in Berkshires

His association with the orchestra and Tanglewood has been long and close. He was for 25 years chairman of the faculty and head of the composition department of the Berkshire music center.

He is known throughout the world as a composer and author. In recent years he has been expanding his activity as a conductor.

On the podium Friday he exhibited a verve and vitality that belied his 67 years (he'll be 68 Nov. 14). He bounced and jazzed and beat his arms vigorously and with a wide sweep.

Serious Boston Pops

His grin, also, was wide. He was obviously enjoying himself. It was the kind of music he is best known for . . . a kind of serious Boston Pops.

Two of the works before intermission are typical. The Carter "Holiday Overture" (1944) and the Chavez "Sinfonia India" (1935-36) were full of bright orchestral colors.

The rhythms were orthodox but hopped up with frequent syncopations, the harmonies were tonal but spiced with dissonances, the melodies were more thematic than singable.

Very Entertaining

It is in the orchestrations that these pieces shine; they are busy, fussy and brassy . . . lots of entertainment.

Such was not the case with the Faure suite from the incidental music he wrote for the play, "Pelleas et Melisande," nor for the 12 tone work by Copland "Inscape," immediately following intermission.

The Faure piece was deceptiove in that it seemed a lot lighter and more ephemeral than it is in truth. Its values are substantive a good bit more satisfying than the feathery surfaces indicate.

Crowd Sizable

"Inscape," however has everything it owned right up there to be seen. . .lots of close, pretentious atonal chords and little else.

The rest of the evening, the Stravinsky "Ode" and the Copland suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid", were, as indicated earlier, serious pop.

There were 6342 in the audience. . .a nice size for an unfamiliar program on a cool evening.

Soloist Tonight

Miss Hanne-Lore Kuhse, soprano, who will be one of the soloists tonight during the all Wagner program, offered 14 songs accompanied by Charles Wilson for the 7 p.m. prelude program.

Seven were written by Brahms, five by Wagner and two (encores) by Richard Strauss. Somehow, they all sounded as if they had been composed by the same musician.

Miss Kuhse is a first-class soprano, a leading dramatic soprano at the Berlin State Opera since 1963. Tanglewood listeners heard her here last year when she sang in the American premiere of Beethoven's original version of "Fidelio".

Sounded Detached

Friday she sounded detached. She sang the romantic poems more as a narrator than as a prticipant. Her voice, as expected, was clean, strong and full with a tasteful technical control, but emotion was lacking.

Tonight the all Wagner program will start with the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and continue with the Entry of the gods into Valhalla from "Das Rheingold." After intermission seven soloists will help recreate the first act of "Die Walkure."

AUG 24 1968
New England Newsclip

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

TANGLEWOOD: LAST WEEK OF CONCERTS

Each summer Sunday, the American Automobile Association tells Herald Traveler readers where the action-for-the-vacationer is in New England.

Routes, mileage, driving time and tolls are included.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at TANGLEWOOD; Lenox, Mass.; Aug. 23, 24, 25. Eighth and last week of the season for the summer concerts. Also "Tanglewood on Parade," the afternoon and evening benefit for the Berkshire Music Center, Wednesday. On Friday, Aaron Copeland will be guest conductor and the program will include his Inscape and Billy the Kid. Saturday is Wagner day, featuring the finale of Das Rheingold and Act I of Die Walkuere. Sunday's audience will hear a Brahms program. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct both days. General admission $2.50, the day of the concert. Reserved seats, $3.50 to $7.50 ordered from Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Overnight reservations necessary. Reserved seats are in the Music Shed which holds 6,000. In addition, vast general admission crowds listen to the concerts on the spacious lawns of the beautiful Berkshire Hills estate which serves as summer home for the Boston Symphony Orhestra.

AAA Recommended Route From Boston: Mass. Turnpike to Lee Exit. U. S. 20 and local road into Lenox, Hawthorne Road to Tanglewood. 137 miles, 2 hours 20 minutes driving time. $2.95 tolls.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 18 1968
New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Expansive Power of Wagner Envelops 6100 Listeners

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There's no gainsaying the opinion that a large degree of the power in Wagner's operas is in the orchestra. It was continuously evident Saturday night at Tanglewood.

7 Soloists

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with three major and four minor soloists presented the final scene from "Das Rheingold" and the first act from "Die Valkure."

The three major soloists were Jess Thomas, tenor, David Ward, bass, and Miss Hanne - Lore Kuhse, soprano. As thoroughly experienced journeymen in the vast vineyards that sprung from Wagner's infinite imagination, they performed reliably and dramatically.

Miss Kuhse was notably more expressive than she was during her Lieder recital here Friday evening, and Ward, especially as Hunding in "Die Walkure," was unusually impressive.

Plenty Happening

For those of us who are not unquestioning fans of Wagner, the first half of the "Walkure" segment (scheduled for 62 minutes) seemed to be more talk than action, but the dark and foreboding, slow - moving atmosphere gradually expands and, although, the characters don't bound around, there is plenty happening in the music.

Wagner's orchestrations are sonic splendor. They envelope the listener in grand expanses of sound which are seldom fully heard in the opera house because of the muffling effect of the musicians' pit and because of the parallel interest in the staging.

At a place like Tanglewood, however, the orchestration comes into its own and the frowning double - basses (nine of them) and demanding brasses let the listeners (6102 Saturday) know how wide and deep Wanger's music really is.

Thick Melodies

The program opened with the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde," a lushly orchestrated piece whose thick melodies weave and undulate and insinuate themselves into the listener with patient but relentless insistance.

It was followed by the closing scene from "Das Rheingold" (the entry of the gods into Balhalla), which played four soloists up against the back wall and three rheinmaidens in the wings accompanied by a harp.

Its rousing finish brought cheers from the audience, as did "Die Walkure."

This afternoon the 1969 season will end with an all - Brahms program, three works for chorus and orchestra and Symphony No. 1.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

AUG 25 1968 New England Newsclip

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY CIRC. 111,000

AUG 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts . . . . Hanne-Lore Kuhse, soprano, will be featured as a soloist in a performance of Wagner's Rheingold — Finale and Walkure, Act I by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on Saturday, August 24.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006

AUG 26 1968

Trio of Concerts Close Out Taglewood's Season

By JAKE SHERMAN

Erich Leinsdorf and Aaron Copland led the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend in its final concerts of the 1968 summer season at Tanglewood. Leinsdorf conducted two programs, one devoted tc Wagner, the other to Brahms, while Copland took the podium for an evening given over to a wide-ranging selection of works by modern composers.

Audiences of about 10,000 responded with true Tanglewood enthusiasm to each of the concerts, though if one produced more ecstatic applause and bravos than the others, it was Saturday night's Wagner program.

To the disgruntlement of some in the audience, Leinsdorf chose for this Wagner tribute not the Ride of the Valkyries or the Gotterdammerung finale but two relatively obscure and undistinguished sections of the Ring Cycle: the last act of "Das Rheingold" depicting the entry of the gods into Valhalla and the first act of "Die Walkure." Also featured was the achingly beautiful Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," considered by many to be the apex of the composer's musical achievement.

"Das Rheingold" contains much that is commonplace, though here and there are echoes of the greater music that is to come. Hearing it in concert form affords the twin satisfaction of being able to concentrate on the music and at the same time to let it evoke Wagner's Teutonic never-never land of buxom maidens and white-bearded horned gods without having the images circumscribed by costumes and stage machinery.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Offstage Voice Effective

Jess Thomas as Loge, David Ward as Wotan and Hanne-Lore Kuhse as Wotan's wife, Fricka, sing skillfully, managing to inject some drama into what are essentially declamatory and Frances roles. Emily Deer, Frances Pavlides and Phyllis Elhady are the Rhine maidens lamenting in eerie and plaintive voices the loss of their gold. Their song of sorrow wafts in from offstage, a device which both suggests their home in the depths of the river and keeps them off the already sorely overcrowded stage.

Miss Kuhse, the leading soprano at the Berliner Staatsoper since 1963, and Mr. Ward, who will debut this fall with the San Francisco Opera company, have much more forceful vocal roles in the first act of "Die Walkure," though the plot itself is somewhat leaden.

Thomas acquits himself excellently as Siegmund who, fleeing his enemies, arrives exhausted at a forest hut where live, unknown to him, his long-lost sister Sieglinde and her brutish husband, Hunding. Miss Kuhse is Sieglinde, Mr. Ward Hunding.

Firm Control Throughout

Leinsdorf is firm in his control of the orchestra, concentrating on the total needs of the score rather than on any florid or spectacular effects. In the "Tristan and Isolde" Prelude he evokes all of Wagner's sensuality and sense of tragedy, without ever becoming merely syrupy.

Featured on the Brahms program Sunday afternoon were the First Symphony and three choral works, the "Gesang der Parzen," the "Song of Destiny" and "Nanie." The singing was done by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Charles Wilson.

Friday evening's program featured Copland conducting Carter's "Holiday Overture," Chavez' "Sinfonia India," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande, Stravinskys "Ode," and his own "Inscape" and suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid."

The weekend prelude was given over to several songs of Brahms and Wagner sung by Miss Kuhse accompanied by Charles Wilson.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday August 24 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER

Prelude to 'Tristan und Isolde'*

Das Rheingold — The entry of the gods into Valhalla

Froh	JESS THOMAS
Wotan	DAVID WARD
Fricka	HANNE-LORE KUHSE
Loge	JESS THOMAS
Woglinde	EMILY DERR
Wellgunde	FRANCES PAVLIDES
Flosshilde	PHYLLIS ELHADY

intermission

Die Walküre — Act one

Sieglinde	HANNE-LORE KUHSE
Siegmund	JESS THOMAS
Hunding	DAVID WARD

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 26

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

AUG 22 1968 New England Newsclip

HANNE-LORE KUHSE, German soprano, will be a soloist in Boston Symphony performances of the finale from Wagner's "Das Rheingold" and Act I from "Die Walkuere," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, on Saturday night at Tanglewood.

At Tanglewood

Expansive Power of Wagner Envelops 6100 Listeners

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There's no gainsaying the opinion that a large degree of the power in Wagner's operas is in the orchestra. It was continuously evident Saturday night at Tanglewood.

7 Soloists

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with three major and four minor soloists presented the final scene from "Das Rheingold" and the first act from "Die Valkure."

The three major soloists were Jess Thomas, tenor, David Ward, bass, and Miss Hanne - Lore Kuhse, soprano. As thoroughly experienced journeymen in the vast vineyards that sprung from Wagner's infinite imagination, they performed reliably and dramatically.

Miss Kuhse was notably more expressive than she was during her Lieder recital here Friday evening, and Ward, especially as Hunding in "Die Walkure," was unusually impressive.

Plenty Happening

For those of us who are not unquestioning fans of Wagner, the first half of the "Walkure" segment (scheduled for 62 minutes) seemed to be more talk than action, but the dark and foreboding, slow - moving atmosphere gradually expands and, although, the characters don't bound around, there is plenty happening in the music.

Wagner's orchestrations are sonic splendor. They envelope the listener in grand expanses of sound which are seldom fully heard in the opera house because of the muffling effect of the musicians' pit and because of the parallel interest in the staging.

At a place like Tanglewood, however, the orchestration comes into its own and the frowning double - basses (nine of them) and demanding brasses let the listeners (6102 Saturday) know how wide and deep Wanger's music really is.

Thick Melodies

The program opened with the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde," a lushly orchestrated piece whose thick melodies weave and undulate and insinuate themselves into the listener with patient but relentless insistance.

It was followed by the closing scene from "Das Rheingold" (the entry of the gods into Balhalla), which played four soloists up against the back wall and three rheinmaidens in the wings accompanied by a harp.

Its rousing finish brought cheers from the audience, as did "Die Walkure."

This afternoon the 1969 season will end with an all - Brahms program, three works for chorus and orchestra and Symphony No. 1.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
AUG 25 1968

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY CIRC. 111,000
AUG 18 1968
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts . . . . Hanne-Lore Kuhse, soprano, will be featured as a soloist in a performance of Wagner's Rheingold — Finale and Walkure, Act I by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on Saturday, August 24.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
DAILY & SUN. 129,006
AUG 26 1968

Trio of Concerts Close Out Taglewood's Season

By JAKE SHERMAN

Erich Leinsdorf and Aaron Copland led the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend in its final concerts of the 1968 summer season at Tanglewood. Leinsdorf conducted two programs, one devoted to Wagner, the other to Brahms, while Copland took the podium for an evening given over to a wide-ranging selection of works by modern composers.

Audiences of about 10,000 responded with true Tanglewood enthusiasm to each of the concerts, though if one produced more ecstatic applause and bravos than the others, it was Saturday night's Wagner program.

To the disgruntlement of some in the audience, Leinsdorf chose for this Wagner tribute not the Ride of the Valkyries or the Gotterdammerung finale but two relatively obscure and undistinguished sections of the Ring Cycle: the last act of "Das Rheingold" depicting the entry of the gods into Valhalla and the first act of "Die Walkure." Also featured was the achingly beautiful Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," considered by many to be the apex of the composer's musical achievement.

"Das Rheingold" contains much that is commonplace, though here and there are echoes of the greater music that is to come. Hearing it in concert form affords the twin satisfaction of being able to concentrate on the music and at the same time to let it evoke Wagner's Teutonic never-never land of buxom maidens and white-bearded horned gods without having the images circumscribed by costumes and stage machinery.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Offstage Voice Effective

Jess Thomas as Loge, David Ward as Wotan and Hanne-Lore Kuhse as Wotan's wife, Fricka, sing skillfully, managing to inject some drama into what are essentially declamatory and Frances roles. Emily Deer, Frances Pavlides and Phyllis Elhady are the Rhine maidens lamenting in eerie and plaintive voices the loss of their gold. Their song of sorrow wafts in from offstage, a device which both suggests their home in the depths of the river and keeps them off the already sorely overcrowded stage.

Miss Kuhse, the leading soprano at the Berliner Staatsoper since 1963, and Mr. Ward, who will debut this fall with the San Francisco Opera company, have much more forceful vocal roles in the first act of "Die Walkure," though the plot itself is somewhat leaden.

Thomas acquits himself excellently as Siegmund who, fleeing his enemies, arrives exhausted at a forest hut where live, unknown to him, his long-lost sister Sieglinde and her brutish husband, Hunding. Miss Kuhse is Sieglinde, Mr. Ward Hunding.

Firm Control Throughout

Leinsdorf is firm in his control of the orchestra, concentrating on the total needs of the score rather than on any florid or spectacular effects. In the "Tristan and Isolde" Prelude he evokes all of Wagner's sensuality and sense of tragedy, without ever becoming merely syrupy.

Featured on the Brahms program Sunday afternoon were the First Symphony and three choral works, the "Gesang der Parzen," the "Song of Destiny", and "Nanie." The singing was done by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus under the direction of Charles Wilson.

Friday evening's program featured Copland conducting Carter's "Holiday Overture," Chavez' "Sinfonia India," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande, Stravinskys "Ode," and his own "Inscape" and suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid."

The weekend prelude was given over to several songs of Brahms and Wagner sung by Miss Kuhse accompanied by Charles Wilson.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 22 1968
New England Newsclip

HANNE-LORE KUHSE, German soprano, will be a soloist in Boston Symphony performances of the finale from Wagner's "Das Rheingold" and Act I from "Die Walkuere," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, on Saturday night at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Saturday August 24 at 8 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER

Prelude to 'Tristan und Isolde'*

Das Rheingold — The entry of the gods into Valhalla

Froh	JESS THOMAS
Wotan	DAVID WARD
Fricka	HANNE-LORE KUHSE
Loge	JESS THOMAS
Woglinde	EMILY DERR
Wellgunde	FRANCES PAVLIDES
Flosshilde	PHYLLIS ELHADY

intermission

Die Walküre — Act one

Sieglinde	HANNE-LORE KUHSE
Siegmund	JESS THOMAS
Hunding	DAVID WARD

The program notes for tonight's concert begin on page 26

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

80.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, August 26, 1968

Boston Symphony Keeps Vitality Through Stretch

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Saturday evening at Tanglewood an all-Wagner program was featured.

NE

* * *

Although this was the last weekend for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its summer home, neither the players nor their music director and conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, showed any signs of tiring in the stretch. Three ambitious and stimulating selections were offered, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," "Entry of the Gods into Valhalla" from "Das Rheingold" and Act I of "Die Walkuere."

The concert began with the Tristan prelude, which was given a ravishing performance.

I half-expected Leinsdorf to speed through it, but instead he took a very measured pace, entirely to the music's benefit. In this manner the various dovetailed motifs emerged with astonishing clarity and the music was permitted to build to an intense, very passionate climax.

After hearing the prelude done so beautifully, it whetted one's appetite to hear the Liebestod which usually follows in concert performances. Perhaps one day the conductor will give us this treat.

* * *

Next on the program was "Entry of the Gods," the scene which brings "Das Rheingold," the first opera in the Ring tetralogy, to a close. Here the orchestra was augmented by a vocal septet to realize the various characters of the final scene.

Jess Thomas as both Froh and Lege, David Ward as Wotan, and Hanne-Lore Kuhse as Fricka were all excellent in their roles. Leslie Guinn was acceptable as Donner in his call to the mist. The same could not be said of the trio of Rhine Maidens (sung offstage) by Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady, whose intonation lapsed. One could have wished for a more violent orchestral thunderstrom, but under concert conditions I don't suppose you get them much louder than that. Leinsdorf did a great job controling everybody and made the music sound brilliant.

Act I of "Die Walkuere" was given after intermission. The part of Sieglinde was sung by Miss Kuhse, Siegmund by Jess Thomas, and Hunding by David Ward.

The soloists were all so superb and dramatic that it would be impossible to cite one of them as being more impressive than the others.

The stormy prelude was helped along by the suggestive wind machine and bass drum off-stage, and elsewhere Leinsdorf kept things marvelously clear and simple by carefully detailing the representational motifs.

The Boston Globe — Tuesday, August 27, 1968

Leinsdorf Evokes Timbral Poetry at Tanglewood

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX — The Boston Symphony's Tanglewood season finished with a Wagner concert Saturday night and a Brahms program Sunday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf conducting both.

The main work Saturday was the first act of "Die Walkuere." Jess Thomas was the Siegmund, as he had been in Boston last September, but the Sieglinde this time was the great East German soprano, Hanne-Lore Kuhse. The Scotch bass, Davis Ward, sang Hunding Kuhse has a powerful soprano of beautiful quality especially in its rich, unforced low register, a somewhat problematic technique that leaves her a touch short-winded sometimes, and as her most precious gift, an uncommon feeling for words, their meaning, and their effect on the musical line. Her facial play, the strength and warmth of her personality, enable her to hold an audience in spell remarkably. Her poetic and musical insight, the fascination she exercises especially in passages of narrative, her knowing use of her artistic and personal qualities, made her for me, the most touching Sieglinde since Lehmann.

Thomas, too, is extraordinary in his ability to communicate sympathetically with an audience, in his feeling for language, sense of poetry, musical taste and intelligence. Only the voice itself, neither as robust nor as a brilliant as it might be, and inclined to be unsteady in piano and pianissimo, keeps him from being a truly great Wagner tenor. Ward was dramatically and vocally superb in every respect. The suggestion of action on the part of all three singers, who were on a raised platform behind the orchestra, contributed strikingly to the efectiveness of the whole performance.

So, of course, did Leinsdorf's conducting, of great intensity and energy throughout and especially in the second half of the act, convincing in the cohesiveness of the tempi. The orchestral playing was on the highest level, and the cello solo was exquisitely played by Jules Eskin. I was sorry though that Leinsdorf again allowed the effect of the prelude to be spoiled by the comic wheezing of a wind machine.

Earlier, Leinsdorf conducted the Entry of the Gods into Valhalla, the finale of "Das Rheingold," a passage that, while frustratingly short, has the advantage over most Wagner concert excerpts in at least having an end, if not quite a proper beginning.

Ward, though anything but bad, was not as convincing as "Rheingold" baritone Wotan as he was later as Hunding, or as I imagine he would be as the lower and darker Wotan of the later "ring" operas. Kuhse as Fricka and Thomas, singing both the few lines of Froh and part of Loge were superb, and there was good work as well from Leslie Guinn as Donner and from Emily Derr Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady, as the off-stage trio of Rhine maidens. The concert began with the "Tristan" prelude, the version with the magical A major concert ending, beautifully conducted and played.

The special point of Sunday's Brahms concert was the inclusion of three choral works, "Gesang der Parzen," "Schicksalslied," and "Naenie," a melancholy and even despairing Triptych. The Brahms interpretations of the Goethe, Hoelderline, and Schiller texts are extraordinarily penetrating and also fascinatingly aggressive in the dominance he assumes of musical form over poetic. These three pieces are among Brahms' most remarkable from the point of view of rhythmic elasticity, textural and timbral beauty (there is an entrance for piccolo and muted strings at the end of "Gesang der Parzen" that is one of the most spine-chillingly beautiful things ever written for orchestra), and they have, as well, marvelous resources of musical imagery (I think especially of "Naenie" with its evocation of Thetis and her sisters rising from the ocean to lead the lament for the slain Achilles.

I was able to hear only the dress rehearsals, but the performances, with the Tanglewood choir and the Berkshire Chorus, excellently prepared as usual by Charles Wilson with John Oliver promised to be beautiful.

Brahms also came in for a moment of particular glory at Sunday mornings chamber music concert, when violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode played the B major Trio with such a wealth of musical insight and feeling, nobility of taste, and instrumental resourcefullness as to make it one of the greatest chamber music performances I have ever heard.

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, August 24, 1968

Tanglewood in Finale

The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, in nearby Lenox, Mass., winds up tonight and tomorrow.

This evening's concert at 8 p. m. under the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts fill out the balance of the program: the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act I of Die Walkuere. Singers Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas and David Ward will sing in both. Also singing in the Rheingold Finale will be Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides and Phyllis Elhady, members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of Fidelio. She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin; is famed throughout Europe; and is currently on her second performing trip in the U. S.

Famed Heldentenor

Jess Thomas, one of the world's foremost heldentenors, is a member of the Metropolitan Opera, a gold medal winner at the Bayreuth Festival, and an active recitalist across the U.S. Scotland-born David Ward is making his Tanglewood debut in this concert after appearances as one of the world's front-ranking interpreters of the Wagnerian repertory in England and the U. S.

This Sunday afternoon, the concluding concert of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will again be conducted by Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the Gesang der Parzen (Song of the Fates), Op. 89, Schicksalslied (Sond of Destiny), Op. 54, and Naenie (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82. Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of Brahms' day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. Leinsdorf notes that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The Gesang der Parzen and Naenie will be performed by the orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the First Symphony of Brahms.

There will also be a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday morning at 10:30.

Director Of WJC Chorus To Be In Tanglewood Cast

Miss Phyllis Elhady, director of the Westbrook Junior College chorus, will be in the cast of Wagner's opera "Das Rheingold" to be presented at Tanglewood, Mass., Saturday.

The opera will be presented in concert form by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its last concert of the season at Tanglewood.

Miss Elhady has been a Tanglewood Fellow this summer, and won her solo part through competitive audition. She will appear opposite the American tenor star of the Metropolitan Opera, Jess Thomas, and the East German soprano, Hanna-Lore Kuhse.

A member of the humanities faculty at Westbrook Junior College, Miss Elhady appeared last year as contralto soloist in the Portland Symphony Orchestra performance of Handel's "Messiah".

Last summer she was a soloist in Robert Shaw's performances of Bach's "Saint John Passion" at Meadowbrook, Mich.

A graduate of Boston University, Miss Elhady is continuing her vocal studies with Marshall F. Bryant of this city. She will become director of music at Woodfords Congregational Church in September, while continuing her teaching at Westbrook Junior.

EXPRESS (e)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 29,750

AUG 21 1968

New England Newsclip

60.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, August 26, 1968

Boston Symphony Keeps Vitality Through Stretch

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Saturday evening at Tanglewood an all-Wagner program was featured.

NE

* * *

Although this was the last weekend for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its summer home, neither the players nor their music director and conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, showed any signs of tiring in the stretch. Three ambitious and stimulating selections were offered, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," "Entry of the Gods into Valhalla" from "Das Rheingold" and Act I of "Die Walkuere."

The concert began with the Tristan prelude, which was given a ravishing performance.

I half-expected Leinsdorf to speed through it, but instead he took a very measured pace, entirely to the music's benefit. In this manner the various dovetailed motifs emerged with astonishing clarity and the music was permitted to build to an intense, very passionate climax.

After hearing the prelude done so beautifully, it whetted one's appetite to hear the Liebestod which usually follows in concert performances. Perhaps one day the conductor will give us this treat.

* * *

Next on the program was "Entry of the Gods," the scene which brings "Das Rheingold," the first opera in the Ring tetralogy, to a close. Here the orchestra was augmented by a vocal septet to realize the various characters of the final scene.

Jess Thomas as both Froh and Lege, David Ward as Wotan, and Hanne-Lore Kuhse as Fricka were all excellent in their roles. Leslie Guinn was acceptable as Donner in his call to the mist. The same could not be said of the trio of Rhine Maidens (sung offstage) by Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady, whose intonation lapsed. One could have wished for a more violent orchestral thunderstrom, but under concert conditions I don't suppose you get them much louder than that. Leinsdorf did a great job controling everybody and made the music sound brilliant.

Act I of "Die Walkuere" was given after intermission. The part of Sieglinde was sung by Miss Kuhse, Siegmund by Jess Thomas, and Hunding by David Ward.

The soloists were all so superb and dramatic that it would be impossible to cite one of them as being more impressive than the others.

The stormy prelude was helped along by the suggestive wind machine and bass drum off-stage, and elsewhere Leinsdorf kept things marvelously clear and simple by carefully detailing the representational motifs.

The Boston Globe — Tuesday, August 27, 1968

Leinsdorf Evokes Timbral Poetry at Tanglewood

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX — The Boston Symphony's Tanglewood season finished with a Wagner concert Saturday night and a Brahms program Sunday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf conducting both.

The main work Saturday was the first act of "Die Walkuere." Jess Thomas was the Siegmund, as he had been in Boston last September, but the Sieglinde this time was the great East German soprano, Hanne-Lore Kuhse. The Scotch bass, Davis Ward, sang Hunding Kuhse has a powerful soprano of beautiful quality especially in its rich, unforced low register, a somewhat problematic technique that leaves her a touch short-winded sometimes, and as her most precious gift, an uncommon feeling for words, their meaning, and their effect on the musical line. Her facial play, the strength and warmth of her personality, enable her to hold an audience in spell remarkably. Her poetic and musical insight, the fascination she exercises especially in passages of narrative, her knowing use of her artistic and personal qualities, made her for me, the most touching Sieglinde since Lehmann.

Thomas, too, is extraordinary in his ability to communicate sympathetically with an audience, in his feeling for language, sense of poetry, musical taste and intelligence. Only the voice itself, neither as robust nor as a brilliant as it might be, and inclined to be unsteady in piano and pianissimo, keeps him from being a truly great Wagner tenor. Ward was dramatically and vocally superb in every respect. The suggestion of action on the part of all three singers, who were on a raised platform behind the orchestra, contributed strikingly to the efectiveness of the whole performance.

So, of course, did Leinsdorf's conducting, of great intensity and energy throughout and especially in the second half of the act, convincing in the cohesiveness of the tempi. The orchestral playing was on the highest level, and the cello solo was exquisitely played by Jules Eskin. I was sorry though that Leinsdorf again allowed the effect of the prelude to be spoiled by the comic wheezing of a wind machine.

Earlier, Leinsdorf conducted the Entry of the Gods into Valhalla, the finale of "Das Rheingold," a passage that, while frustratingly short, has the advantage over most Wagner concert excerpts in at least having an end, if not quite a proper beginning.

Ward, though anything but bad, was not as convincing as "Rheingold" baritone Wotan as he was later as Hunding, or as I imagine he would be as the lower and darker Wotan of the later "ring" operas. Kuhse as Fricka and Thomas, singing both the few lines of Froh and part of Loge were superb, and there was good work as well from Leslie Guinn as Donner and from Emily Derr Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady, as the off-stage trio of Rhine maidens. The concert began with the "Tristan" prelude, the version with the magical A major concert ending, beautifully conducted and played.

The special point of Sunday's Brahms concert was the inclusion of three choral works, "Gesang der Parzen," "Schicksalslied," and "Naenie," a melancholy and even despairing Triptych. The Brahms interpretations of the Goethe, Hoelderline, and Schiller texts are extraordinarily penetrating and also fascinatingly aggressive in the dominance he assumes of musical form over poetic. These three pieces are among Brahms' most remarkable from the point of view of rhythmic elasticity, textural and timbral beauty (there is an entrance for piccolo and muted strings at the end of "Gesang der Parzen" that is one of the most spine-chillingly beautiful things ever written for orchestra), and they have, as well, marvelous resources of musical imagery (I think especially of "Naenie" with its evocation of Thetis and her sisters rising from the ocean to lead the lament for the slain Achilles.

I was able to hear only the dress rehearsals, but the performances, with the Tanglewood choir and the Berkshire Chorus, excellently prepared as usual by Charles Wilson with John Oliver promised to be beautiful.

Brahms also came in for a moment of particular glory at Sunday mornings chamber music concert, when violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode played the B major Trio with such a wealth of musical insight and feeling, nobility of taste, and instrumental resourcefullness as to make it one of the greatest chamber music performances I have ever heard.

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, August 24, 1968

Tanglewood in Finale

The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, in nearby Lenox, Mass., winds up tonight and tomorrow.

This evening's concert at 8 p. m. under the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts fill out the balance of the program: the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act I of Die Walkuere. Singers Hanne-Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas and David Ward will sing in both. Also singing in the Rheingold Finale will be Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides and Phyllis Elhady, members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse made her Tanglewood debut last summer when Leinsdorf conducted the original 1805 version of Fidelio. She is the leading dramatic soprano of the State Opera of Berlin; is famed throughout Europe; and is currently on her second performing trip in the U. S.

Famed Heldentenor

Jess Thomas, one of the world's foremost heldentenors, is a member of the Metropolitan Opera, a gold medal winner at the Bayreuth Festival, and an active recitalist across the U.S. Scotland-born David Ward is making his Tanglewood debut in this concert after appearances as one of the world's front-ranking interpreters of the Wagnerian repertory in England and the U. S.

This Sunday afternoon, the concluding concert of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will again be conducted by Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Threee unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the Gesang der Parzen (Song of the Fates), Op. 89, Schicksalslied (Sond of Destiny), Op. 54, and Naenie (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82. Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of Brahms' day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. Leinsdorf notes that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The Gesang der Parzen and Naenie will be performed by the orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the First Symphony of Brahms.

There will also be a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday morning at 10:30.

Director Of WJC Chorus To Be In Tanglewood Cast

Miss Phyllis Elhady, director of the Westbrook Junior College chorus, will be in the cast of Wagner's opera "Das Rheingold" to be presented at Tanglewood, Mass., Saturday.

The opera will be presented in concert form by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its last concert of the season at Tanglewood.

Miss Elhady has been a Tanglewood Fellow this summer, and won her solo part through competitive audition. She will appear opposite the American tenor star of the Metropolitan Opera, Jess Thomas, and the East German soprano, Hanna-Lore Kuhse.

A member of the humanities faculty at Westbrook Junior College, Miss Elhady appeared last year as contralto soloist in the Portland Symphony Orchestra performance of Handel's "Messiah".

Last summer she was a soloist in Robert Shaw's performances of Bach's "Saint John Passion" at Meadowbrook, Mich.

A graduate of Boston University, Miss Elhady is continuing her vocal studies with Marshall F. Bryant of this city. She will become director of music at Woodfords Congregational Church in September, while continuing her teaching at Westbrook Junior.

EXPRESS (e)
PORTLAND, ME.
(90,750)

AUG 21 1968

New England Newsclip

Brahms' concert brings Tanglewood '68 to a close

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX — The Boston Symphony's Tanglewood season finished with a Wagner concert Saturday night and a Brahms program Sunday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf conducting both.

The main work Saturday was the first act of "Die Walkuere." Jess Thomas was the Siegmund, as he had been in Boston last September, but the Sieglinde this time was the great East German soprano, Hanne-Lore Kuhse. The Scotch bass, Davis Ward, sang Hunding Kuhse has a powerful soprano of beautiful quality especially in its rich, unforced low register, a somewhat problematic technique that leaves her a touch short-winded sometimes, and as her most precious gift, an uncommon feeling for words, their meaning, and their effect on the musical line. Her facial play, the strength and warmth of her personality, enable her to hold an audience in spell remarkably. Her poetic and musical insight, the fascination she exercises especially in passages of narrative, her knowing use of her artistic and personal qualities, made her for me, the most touching Sieglinde since Lehmann.

Thomas, too, is extraordinary in his ability to communicate sympathetically with an audience, in his feeling for language, sense of poetry musical taste and intelligence. Only the voice itself, neither as robust nor as a brilliant as it might be, and inclined to be unsteady in piano and pianissimo, keeps him from being a truly great Wagner tenor. Ward was dramatically and vocally superb in every respect. The suggestion of action on the part of all three singers, who were on a raised platform behind the orchestra, contributed strikingly to the efectiveness of the whole performance.

So, of course, did Leinsdorf's conducting, of great intensity and energy throughout and especially in the second half of the act, convincing in the cohesiveness of the tempi. The orchestral playing was on the highest level, and the cello solo was exquisitely played by Jules Eskin. I was sorry though that Leinsdorf again allowed the effect of the prelude to be spoiled by the comic wheezing of a wind machine.

Earlier, Leinsdorf conducted the Entry of the Gods into Valhalla, the finale of "Das Rheingold," a passage that, while frustratingly short, has the advantag over most Wagner concert excerpts in at least having an end, if not quite a proper beginning.

Ward, though anything but bad, was not as convincing as "Rheingold" baritone Wotan as he was later as Hunding, or as I imagine he would be as the lower and darker Wotan of the later "ring" operas. Kuhse as Fricka and Thomas, singing both the few lines of Froh and part of Loge were superb, and there was good work as well from Leslie Guinn as Donner and from Emily Derr Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady, as the off-stage trio of Rhine maidens. The concert began with the "Tristan" prelude, the version with the magical A major concert ending, beautifully conducted and played.

The special point of Sunday's Brahms concert was the inclusion of three choral works, "Gesang der Parzen," "Schicksalslied," and "Naenie," a melancholy and even despairing Triptych. The Brahms interpretations of the Goethe, Hoelderline, and Schiller texts are extraordinarily penetrating and also fascinatingly aggressive in the dominance he assumes of musical form over poetic. These three pieces are among Brahms' most remarkable from the point of view of rhythmic elasticity, textural and timbral beauty (there is an entrance for piccolo and muted strings at the end of "Gesang der Parzen" that is one of the most spine-chillingly beautiful things ever written for orchestra), and they have, as well, marvelous resources of musical imagery (I think especially of "Naenie" with its evocation of Thetis and her sisters rising from the ocean to lead the lament for the slain Achilles.

I was able to hear only the dress rehearsals, but the performances, with the Tanglewood choir and the Berkshire Chorus, excellently prepared as usual by Charles Wilson with John Oliver promised to be beautiful.

Brahms also came in for a moment of particular glory at Sunday mornings chamber music concert, when violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode played the B major Trio with such a wealth of musical insight and feeling, nobility of taste, and instrumental resourcefullness as to make it one of the greatest chamber music performances I have ever heard.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 26,000

AUG 22 1968 New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf, Orchestra Give Resplendent Tanglewood Farewell

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf wound up his summer with the Boston Symphony Orchestry at Tanglewood with a rich and resplendent performance of Brahms' first symphony Sunday afternoon.

Seldom-Heard Works

At first glance, the bill of fare seemed to suggest that more nourishment would be had from the first half of the program which listed three seldom-heard works for chorus and orchestra than from the second, the tried-and-true Symphony No. 1.

But the symphony was superb. Leinsdorf moulded its proportions with great care and shaped its phrases with clarity.

He protected its old-fashioned value without resorting to old-fashioned, heavy romanticism. The lyricism flowed smoothly with easy continuity, and the chordal strength was varied with logical control of dynamics.

Light, Mobil Sound

The instrumental blend was so neat as to make the senority almost palpable, but through it all Leinsdorf kept the sound light and mobile. I don't think I have heard a more impressive live performance of Brahms' first.

The three choral works before intermission were sung by about 80 members of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus with the orchestra.

They were "Gesang der Parzen" (Song of the Fates), "Schicksalslied" (Song of Destiny) and 'Nanie" (goddess of funerals).

Acceptance of Invitable

All three are calm and hymnlike, tranquil and serene. Their atmosphere is of peace and contentment and acceptance of the inevitable. Brahms must have been a thoroughly well-adjusted bachelor to have been able to write such gently and unprotesting music about destiny and death.

The chorus, unfortunately, didn't make the best of its opportunity. The singing was balanced and expressive, the melodic lines beautiful and the peaceful spirit almost reverent; but the diction was blurred more than is usual among chouses, and the loss of verbal precision damaged the musical clarity.

It was pleasant music, though, especially the "Schicksalslied," a graceful work which may be remembered here as part of the program of the Pioneer Valley Symphony in 1964 and of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra and chorus in 1965.

Attendence for the day was 6008; for the season for all events at which records were kept it was 222,293. Attendence for the 24 weekend orchestra concerts plus eight open rehearsals was 188,734; it was 185,551 last year.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 26 1968 New England Newsclip

FESTIVAL ON WGBH

The 1968 Berkshire Festival concludes Sunday, Aug. 25 with an all-Brahms program to be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH radio, 89.7 megacycles, starting at 2:30 p.m. Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the concert will feature the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir, and will be heard direct from the Shed in Lenox.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 25 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BRAHMS

Gesang der Parzen for chorus and orchestra op. 89†
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra op. 54†

Nänie for chorus and orchestra op. 82†
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TANGLEWOOD CHOIR and BERKSHIRE CHORUS
CHARLES WILSON director
JOHN OLIVER assistant director

intermission

Symphony no. 1 in C minor op. 68*

Un poco sostenuto - allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio - allegro non troppo, ma con brio

†First performance at the Festival concerts

The program notes and texts for this afternoon's concert begin on page 37

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

FINAL CONCERT of the 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood took place yesterday before an audience of 6,088. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony, the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus in an all-Brahms program, which included three little-known choral works and the First Symphony. Review is on Page 6.

Brahms' concert brings Tanglewood '68 to a close

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX — The Boston Symphony's Tanglewood season finished with a Wagner concert Saturday night and a Brahms program Sunday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf conducting both.

The main work Saturday was the first act of "Die Walkuere." Jess Thomas was the Siegmund, as he had been in Boston last September, but the Sieglinde this time was the great East German soprano, Hanne-Lore Kuhse. The Scotch bass, Davis Ward, sang Hunding Kuhse has a powerful soprano of beautiful quality especially in its rich, unforced low register, a somewhat problematic technique that leaves her a touch short-winded sometimes, and as her most precious gift, an uncommon feeling for words, their meaning, and their effect on the musical line. Her facial play, the strength and warmth of her personality, enable her to hold an audience in spell remarkably. Her poetic and musical insight, the fascination she exercises especially in passages of narrative, her knowing use of her artistic and personal qualities, made her for me, the most touching Sieglinde since Lehmann.

Thomas, too, is extraordinary in his ability to communicate sympathetically with an audience, in his feeling for language, sense of poetry musical taste and intelligence. Only the voice itself, neither as robust nor as a brilliant as it might be, and inclined to be unsteady in piano and pianissimo, keeps him from being a truly great Wagner tenor. Ward was dramatically and vocally superb in every respect. The suggestion of action on the part of all three singers, who were on a raised platform behind the orchestra, contributed strikingly to the efectiveness of the whole performance.

So, of course, did Leinsdorf's conducting, of great intensity and energy throughout and especially in the second half of the act, convincing in the cohesiveness of the tempi. The orchestral playing was on the highest level, and the cello solo was exquisitely played by Jules Eskin. I was sorry though that Leinsdorf again allowed the effect of the prelude to be spoiled by the comic wheezing of a wind machine.

Earlier, Leinsdorf conducted the Entry of the Gods into Valhalla, the finale of "Das Rheingold," a passage that, while frustratingly short, has the advantag over most Wagner concert excerpts in at least having an end, if not quite a proper beginning.

Ward, though anything but bad, was not as convincing as "Rheingold" baritone Wotan as he was later as Hunding, or as I imagine he would be as the lower and darker Wotan of the later "ring" operas. Kuhse as Fricka and Thomas, singing both the few lines of Froh and part of Loge were superb, and there was good work as well from Leslie Guinn as Donner and from Emily Derr Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady, as the off-stage trio of Rhine maidens. The concert began with the "Tristan" prelude, the version with the magical A major concert ending, beautifully conducted and played.

The special point of Sunday's Brahms concert was the inclusion of three choral works, "Gesang der Parzen," "Schicksalslied," and "Naenie," a melancholy and even despairing Triptych. The Brahms interpretations of the Goethe, Hoelderline, and Schiller texts are extraordinarily penetrating and also fascinatingly aggressive in the dominance he assumes of musical form over poetic. These three pieces are among Brahms' most remarkable from the point of view of rhythmic elasticity, textural and timbral beauty (there is an entrance for piccolo and muted strings at the end of "Gesang der Parzen" that is one of the most spine-chillingly beautiful things ever written for orchestra), and they have, as well, marvelous resources of musical imagery (I think especially of "Naenie" with its evocation of Thetis and her sisters rising from the ocean to lead the lament for the slain Achilles.

I was able to hear only the dress rehearsals, but the performances, with the Tanglewood choir and the Berkshire Chorus, excellently prepared as usual by Charles Wilson with John Oliver promised to be beautiful.

Brahms also came in for a moment of particular glory at Sunday mornings chamber music concert, when violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode played the B major Trio with such a wealth of musical insight and feeling, nobility of taste, and instrumental resourcefullness as to make it one of the greatest chamber music performances I have ever heard.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS
CIRC. 26,000

AUG 22 1968 New England Newsclip

FESTIVAL ON WGBH

The 1968 Berkshire Festival concludes Sunday, Aug. 25 with an all-Brahms program to be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH radio, 89.7 megacycles, starting at 2:30 p.m. Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the concert will feature the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir, and will be heard direct from the Shed in Lenox.

Leinsdorf, Orchestra Give Resplendent Tanglewood Farewell

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf wound up his summer with the Boston Symphony Orchestry at Tanglewood with a rich and resplendent performance of Brahms' first symphony Sunday afternoon.

Seldom-Heard Works

At first glance, the bill of fare seemed to suggest that more nourishment would be had from the first half of the program which listed three seldom-heard works for chorus and orchestra than from the second, the tried-and-true Symphony No. 1.

But the symphony was superb. Leinsdorf moulded its proportions with great care and shaped its phrases with clarity.

He protected its old-fashioned value without resorting to old-fashioned, heavy romanticism. The lyricism flowed smoothly with easy continuity, and the chordal strength was varied with logical control of dynamics.

Light, Mobil Sound

The instrumental blend was so neat as to make the senority almost palpable, but through it all Leinsdorf kept the sound light and mobile. I don't think I have heard a more impressive live performance of Brahms first.

The three choral works before intermission were sung by about 80 members of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus with the orchestra.

They were "Gesang der Parzen" (Song of the Fates), "Schicksalslied" (Song of Destiny) and 'Nanie" (goddess of funerals).

Acceptance of Invitable

All three are calm and hymnlike, tranquil and serene. Their atmosphere is of peace and contentment and acceptance of the inevitable. Brahms must have been a thoroughly well - adjusted bachelor to have been able to write such gently and unprotesting music about destiny and death.

The chorus, unfortunately, didn't make the best of its opportunity. The singing was balanced and expressive, the melodic lines beautiful and the peaceful spirit almost reverent; but the diction was blurred more than is usual among chouses, and the loss of verbal precision damaged the musical clarity.

It was pleasant music, though, especially the "Schicksalslied," a graceful work which may be remembered here as part of the program of the Pioneer Valley Symphony in 1964 and of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra and chorus in 1965.

Attendence for the day was 6008; for the season for all events at which records were kept it was 222,293. Attendence for the 24 weekend orchestra concerts plus eight open rehearsals was 188,734; it was 185,551 last year.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 27,424

AUG 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,210

AUG 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Sunday August 25 at 2.30 pm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BRAHMS

Gesang der Parzen for chorus and orchestra op. 89†
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra op. 54†

Nänie for chorus and orchestra op. 82†
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TANGLEWOOD CHOIR and BERKSHIRE CHORUS
CHARLES WILSON director
JOHN OLIVER assistant director

intermission

Symphony no. 1 in C minor op. 68*

Un poco sostenuto - allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio - allegro non troppo, ma con brio

†First performance at the Festival concerts

The program notes and texts for this afternoon's concert begin on page 37

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

Whitestone

FINAL CONCERT of the 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood took place yesterday before an audience of 6,088. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony, the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus in an all-Brahms program, which included three little-known choral works and the First Symphony. Review is on Page 6.

82.

Rare Brahms at Tanglewood

MICHAEL STEINBERG BG 8/21

At the closing Tanglewood concert Sunday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct three relatively rare choral works by Brahms, "Schicksalslied," "Naenie," and "Gesang der Parzen," to list them in order of composition. Along with the performance of the Requiem a couple of weeks ago, it is all that remains, Leinsdorf regretfully says, of a scheme to do a complete survey of Brahms's choral music.It is a remarkable repertory, Leinsdorf feels, but neglected because most choral societies, when they are going to undertake something difficult and costly, will generally go for one of what he likes to call the "world series pieces," the Brahms Requiem, for example, "Messiah" or the B minor Mass.

The three pieces on Leinsdorf's program span 12 years of Brahms's life. He was 38 when he wrote "Schicksalslied" in 1871; the other two works came close together, in 1881 and 1882. In the decade between, Brahms composed, among other things, the Haydn Variations, the C minor Piano Quartet, the B flat String Quartet, the First and Second Symphonies (the First will complete Sunday's program), the Violin Concerto, the G major Violin Sonata, the two Overtures.

Musically, "Schicksalslied," "Naenie," and "Gesang der Parzen," are as individualized as, say, the three String Quartets or the three Violin Sonatas. They are joined by strong bonds, too. Each, in its way, is about death, a subject often in Brahms's musical thoughts from the Funeral Hymn he wrote when he was 25 to the organ chorales that were the last music he worked on (the last of them is on the hymn, "O World, now I must leave thee"). Each is informed by the atmosphere of classical antiquity. Each, to point out a similarity on another level, is on the same scale, taking about 15 minutes in performance.

Every one of the three pieces sets one of the greatest pages of German poetry: "Schicksalslied" is Hoelderlin, "Naenie" is Schiller, and "Gesang der Parzen" closes the fourth act of Goethe's "Iphigenie auf Tauris." Leinsdorf points out that it is striking that while Brahms is more often than not content to use a far less than first-rate poem for a solo song, in his choral music he turns always to the greatest — often to the Bible (most famously in the Requiem), and here to the three most imposing of the writers of profound poetry in German.

In "Schicksalslied," or Song of Fate, Hoelderlin contrasts those who "walk above in the light, weightlessly treading a soft floor . . . their blissful eyes eternally tranquil, eternally clear," and ourselves, "fated to find no foothold . . . hurled like water from ledge to ledge." The less than onstration of the difference between musical and verbal half of the poem that describes man's condition takes up by far the largest part of musical time, an angry allegro in the key, meter, and mood of "death, where is thy sting" in the Requiem. But the sense of space, of scale, is provided by the music of the fateless, blessed genii, a broad melody, one of Brahm's greatest lyric inspiration, marked "slow and full of longing," marked by a relentless kettledrum beat (again, think of the Requiem, "all flesh is as grass," especially the triplets).

Hoelderlin ends with man hurled into the abyss. Brahms returns, to what? To the music of the fateless genii? One can say for sure that he returns to the music of the orchestral prelude, though in another key (C instead of E flat, and it is very unusual for Brahms to end on a tonic other than the one from which he began), and with the threatening timpani much soothed. What does it mean? This demform certainly makes a different thing of the poem by giving it, as it were, a non-violent end. Those last pages troubled Brahms, and at one time he thought to have the chorus superimpose the opening lines of the poem this recapitulation of the prelude. He finally left the music to speak for itself, and to Leinsdorf this return, especially in the alabaster whiteness of C major, and after the unflinching description of man's fate, is an even more sharply focussed portrait of the indifferent gods, making an ending of bitterness and pessimism.

In "Gesang der Parzen," Song of the Fates, Iphigenie recalls a song her nurse had sung to her, a song the Fates had sung about the fall of King Tantalus. Let men fear the gods, we are told, and most of all those men whom the gods have raised high. Again, Brahms, in the piece that has perhaps the most dramatic musical gestures he ever used, confronts us with the picture of man's helplessness in the hands of the indifferent gods, who are seated, as once was Tantalus, at golden tables, and who stride from mountain to mountain.

Schiller's "Naenie," which means "dirge," views the problem from another angle. "Even the beautiful must die. What rules the hearts of men and gods does not stir the brazen breast of the Stygian Zues" (in other words, Pluto or Minos). Schiller evokes the deaths of Euridice, of Adonis, and of Achilles. It is glorious, he tells us, to be a lament in the mouth of the beloved, for — and we are back with Hoelderlin and the plunge into the abyss — "the common de-

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
AUG 2 1968
New England Newsclip

Concert Calendar

TODAY

Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf — all-Brahms program, Gesang der Parzen; Schicksalslied; Nanie (Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir); Symphony No. 1, Opus 68, 2:30 p.m.

Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y., Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy —Strauss' Don Juan; Saffi's Sonatdy — Strauss' "Gypsy Baron" and Czardas from Strauss' Fledermaus (Martina Arroyo, soprano); J. Strauss' Perpetuum Mobile, New Pizzicato Polka, Tales from the Vienna Woods, 3:30 p.m.

MONDAY

Saratoga Performing Arts Center — McGill Chamber Orchestra (Montreal, Canada), conducted by Alexander Brott, Canfield Casino, 8:30 p.m.

THURSDAY

Saratoga Performing Arts Center — The BeeGees, 8:30 p.m.

Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, Lee, Mass. — Jacob's Pillow Dancers; Afro-American Dance Ensemble, 3 p.m.

(Same program, Fri., 3 and 8:40 p.m.; Sat., 3:00 p.m. and 8:40 p.m.)

SATURDAY

Saratoga Performing Arts Festival — Rowan and Martin in a Saratoga "Laff-In," 8:30 p.m.

Providencetown Music Festival — New York Pro Musica, Provincetown Town Hall, 8:45 p.m.

Music Mountain Festival, Falls Village, Conn., Berkshire String Quartet — Mozart's Viola Quintets in C minor, D major, and G minor (David Dawson, violist), 3 p.m.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 167,589
AUG 25 1968
New England Newsclip

MUSIC

MASSACHUSETTS

LENOX (Berkshire Festival)—The final offering of The Boston Symphony Orchestra today will include Gesang der Parzen; Schicksalslied, Op. 54; Nanie, Op. 82; Symphony No. 1, Op. 68. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the all-Brahms program, with the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir featured.

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800
AUG 25 1968
New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
AUG 27 1968
New England Newsclip

BSO Slights Choral Pieces By Brahms

By GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

LENOX—Shadowed by the "German Requiem" are some half dozen smaller choral pieces by Brahms, three of which Erich Leinsdorf programmed on the final BSO Tanglewood concert Sunday.

The choruses — "Schicksalslied", "Naenie", and the "Gesang de Parzen"—share certain features; one lasts about as long as another, and the subject of each is death. But Brahms' discerning choice of texts leads him to three individualized, and as heard Sunday in Quick succession, strikingly different pieces.

"Gesang", which sets verses from Goethe's "Iphigenie auf Tauris", is the latest of the three and the most adventurous in both harmonic structure and orchestration. It was written only a year after the 1881 "Naenie" (with verses by Schiller) and with its theatrical gestures and scenic lay-out, it speaks of death quite differently from the contemplative, succinct Schiller setting.

Hoelderlin's verses are used in the "Schicksalslied," which in several ways is the most familiar of the pieces. It dates from 1871, before the great orchestral works, and is extremely close to parts of the tration, and temperament.

These are the kinds of pieces with which Leinsdorf is usually at his best, and for this reason his readings were all the more disappointing. The Tanglewood Choir sounded rougher than it did earlier in the season, the orchestra under-rehearsed, and for all Leinsdorf's obvious good intentions, the performances weren't more than okay.

I heard only the first two movements of Brahms' First Symphony, which completed the program, and these sounded earnest if unrevealing.

Music Review

Final Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

YESTERDAY afternoon the last concert of the Tanglewood season marked the completion of the 35th year of Berkshire Symphonic Festivals. It was the 33rd festival in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has participated, the 32nd on the grounds of Tanglewood and the 31st under the Great Shed which today still dominates American summer orchestral activities.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston orchestra, devoted his entire program yesterday to Brahms and on Saturday night to Wagner. Friday he ceded the baton to a long-absent but deeply admired artist, the composer Aaron Copland, who was the first chairman of the Berkshire Music Center and for 25 years head of its composition department.

* * *

YESTERDAY THERE were three Brahms choral works in which the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus, directed by Charles Wilson, collaborated with the Boston Orchestra with effective alertness. They sang the "Gesang der Parzen" (Song of Fates); "Schicksalslied" (Song of Destiny); and "Nanie" (Goddess of Funerals).

On the previous evening Leinsdorf directed concert performances of the final scene from Wagner's "Rheingold" and the first act of "Valkyrie" with a list of eminent soloists.

Friday evening Copland confined his program to 20th century music. The diversity of the weekend's programs was striking. The Brahms vocal choices were impressively affectionate; the Wagner, dramatically moving and Copland's evening, stimulating. He struck sparks by his enthusiastic involvement in the glittering but not flammable music, some by confreres and some by himself, which he directed. But there was not the emotional intensity inherent in the operatic music of the next evening.

Hanne-Lore Kuhse

* * *

LEINSDORF BEGAN his Wagner evening with an exceptionally surging performance of the "Tristan Prelude." The opening phrase by the cello section was remarkably telling and the voluptuous development was cumulatively kindled until it glowed with vibrancy.

The strikingly cogent soloists were Hanne-Lore Kuhse as Fricka in Das Rheingold and then as Sieglinde in the "Valkyrie;" Jess Thomas as Froh and subsequently as Siegmund; and David Lord as Wotan and Hunding. They were stationed to the rear of the orchestra on an elevated platform and, except for occasional gestures and exits and re-entrances, confined themselves to the vocal demands of the opera, but they conveyed vividly the content of the mythical story Wagner concocted for his "Ring."

* * *

WAGNER'S allegorical characters pursue lofty ideals but are obsessed by the most sordid of human motives. He clothes all their utterances in such glorious music that one is transported to think the action is on transcendental levels. Wagner became inebriated with infinity but successfully translated it into terrestrial language. Everyone concerned Saturday, from Leinsdorf to the orchestral instruments, which announced the forest downpour before the entrance of Siegmund, was inoculated with the graphic spirit of the evening for one of the most telling performances of the season.

Friday evening Elliott Carter was in the audience and was called to the front of the Shed to acknowledge the applause earned by his "Holiday Overture," a vigorous, syncopated work which benefited by Copland's rough-shod direction.

Carlos Chavez, Mexico's foremost composer, who was on the faculty of the Berkshire Music center in 1950, is concerned that his "Sinfonia India" be understood as genuine Mexican folk rhythm dances and tunes. It consists of primitive idioms adumbrated by tom-tom drones. Its rhythmic compulsion is compounded by reiteration which creates a hypnotic effect not unlike, in its way, the music heard in the contemporary Trends concerts in the middle of the season.

* * *

COPLAND'S OWN music contributed his "Inscape," commissioned by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra last year. It is far different from his "Billy the Kid" music, the suite from his ballet with which he closed his program. "Billy" has Copland's individual harmonic cachet and is identifiable from the days of his Appalachian Suite and his opera "The Tender Land." "Inscape" uses an entirely different vocabulary. He dumps the whole palette of orchestral potential at the outset and then pulls out sinuous strands which he ties up with more academic skill than inspiration.

The Stravinsky "Ode" was mysteriously bland; Faure's suite from his incidental music to "Pelleas and Melisande" was almost touchingly endearing but, while thoroughly delightful, was a strange bedfellow in such company. Faure needs no further advocacy however, as we think him a composer unjustifiably neglected.

* * *

IT IS OF minor interest to note that the first Berkshire Symphonic Festival ended exactly 34 years ago today, Aug. 26, 1934, with a program which included the Tristan Prelude. The second festival ended in August 1935 with the same symphony, the Brahm's First Symphony with which Leinsdorf ended his concert and the season yesterday afternoon. He and the orchestra received a long and tremendously vociferous ovation.

For those first two years, the conductor was Henry Hadley, with an orchestra consisting of 65 members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society Orchestra. The concerts took place on the Hanna Farm, now the site of the Stockbridge School. This season just closing, to be absolutely exact, was the 34th festival. Because of gas coupons and transportation difficulties, there was no festival in 1943.

Tanglewood Attendance Up

Over-all attendance at the 1968 Berkshire Festival was higher than last season. The number of people who attended the 24 Boston Symphony Concerts, eight open rehearsals, Pops Night, the gala concert and three Contemporary Trends concerts totaled 222,293 this year, as opposed to 216,506 in 1967. The Contemporary Trends concerts were introduced for the first time this year.

Attendance for the 24 Boston Symphony concerts and the eight rehearsals alone was 188,734, as compared to last year's figure of 185,551.

In the festival's final week, a total of 30,377 attended events at Tanglewood. There were 2,070 people at Saturday morning's open rehearsal; 6,342 at the Friday night concert, 6,102 Saturday night and 6,088 at the last concert yesterday afternoon.

All-Mozart Program Aug. 31 at Music Mt.

The final concert at Music Mountain in Falls Village, Conn. on Aug. 31 at 3 p.m. will feature an all-Mozart program. The Berkshire Quartet, with violist David Dawson as guest artist, will perform the viola quintets in C minor, D major and G minor.

Dawson is one of the founding members of the Berkshire Quartet, now in its 20th year at Music Mountain. A professor of viola at the University of Indiana, he performs regularly with the quartet during the school year.

Prior to joining the quartet and the Indiana faculty, Dawson was first violist of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Mitropouls, the NBC Symphony under Toscanini and the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra.

The recital will be held in the concert hall, which is just south of the intersection of Routes 126 and 63, east of Falls Village. Tickets for unreserved seats are available at the box office at the rear of the hall.

83.

Tanglewood

The best for last

By Craig Stinson

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Best things came last this year at Tanglewood. At the end of a season that had distinguished itself chiefly by its run-of-the-mill repertoire and commonplace performances, the Berkshire Music Festival finally came up with a program of modern and semi-modern music, and two concerts of brilliantly played Wagner and Brahms—all in one weekend. Aaron Copland conducted the 20th-century stuff on Friday night; the last two concerts featured a triumphant-looking (and newly married) Erich Leinsdorf.

Mr. Copland's concert included, among other works, the suite from "Billy the Kid" and his most recent orchestral piece, "Inscape." The latter, composed in 1967 on a commission from the New York Philharmonic, was making its Boston Symphony debut.

According to Mr. Copland's notes, the word "inscape" was coined by Gerard Manley Hopkins to denote (in W. H. Gardner's words) "a quasi-mystical illumination, a sudden perception of that deeper pattern, order, and unity, which gives meaning to external forms." The piece seemed, so far as one could judge, an effective translation of that sensation into musical language.

Inward Copland

It is, at any rate, one of Mr. Copland's more austere, inward-looking works. Certain features of rhythm and timbre give it an unmistakably "Coplandish" sound, but the effervescence that characterizes most of Copland's more frequently heard music is absent. One could call it an extended mood piece, put together with first-rate craftsmanship and musical imagination.

The rest of the concert consisted largely of the kind of folksy pan-Americana for which Copland is well known. Elliot Carter's "Holiday" Overture opened the pageant in a festive spirit, and Mr. Copland's "Billy the Kid" Suite brought it to a lively close.

The really memorable performances, however, came Saturday night. Mr. Leinsdorf, of course, knows how to conduct Wagner; but he outdid himself this time. He began with a reading of the "Tristan" Prelude that was ideally balanced and paced and so intense that it approached the threshold of pain, then continued with excerpts from "Das Rheingold" (the last scene) and "Die Walküre" (Act I).

All this Wagner was incomparably more convincing than the program that opened the BSO season last September. Chief among the differences was the cast of soloists. Jess Thomas, who also sang last fall, seemed in far better voice this time, recreating roles of Froh, Loge, and Siegmund with untiring brilliance. David Ward brought an uncommon level of credibility to the role of Hunding; and Hanne-Lore Kuhse, despite a few wobbles up top, was a clear and strong-voiced Fricka and Sieglinde.

Sober Brahms

On Sunday, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted three of Brahms's choral pieces and the First Symphony. Of the choral works, only the "Schicksalslied," Op. 54, is anything like a commonly heard item. It is also the best of the three, although Mr. Leinsdorf, the Tanglewood Choir, and the Berkshire Chorus managed to make a strong case for the "Gesang der Parzen" and "Nänie" as well. All three were Tanglewood premières.

Mr. Leinsdorf's treatment of the symphony was solid and sober, but not unexciting. The balancing of voices, in particular, lent effectiveness to the performance. Horn parts stood out in unusual prominence, and other passages such as the clarinet counter-melody toward the beginning of the third movement were more than normally audible and interesting.

Surprisingly enough, the music never quite came unbuttoned during the first three movements. But this restraint received its compensation in a fourth movement of extraordinary speed and fury that brought the 1968 Tanglewood season to a stunning conclusion.

Tanglewood and Norfolk Finales

FRIDAY, AUG. 23
By D. D.

An all-modern program was presented at Tanglewood this evening, two of the works featured being by Aaron Copland, guest conductor. A first performance by the B.S.O. of Elliot Carter's Holiday Overture opened the program. Unknown until quite recently, Carter is fast gaining a foothold on the American musical scene. The overture suggested numerous influences, Copland, Ives and a touch of Webern. Its complex harmonic structure, striking rhythmic patterns and colorful orchestration, was given a sympathetic reading by Mr. Copland. The nostalgically lyrical Pelleas et Melisande Suite by Faure formed a quiet contrast to the blatant Sinfonia India of Carlos Chavez, with its strong, obsessive rhythms and novel percussion effects based on material drawn from Mexican Indian folk dances. Following intermission was a short piece by Copland, Inscape. Not couched in this composer's usual style, this vague, impressionistic picture of some scene inner or outer, was interesting if nothing else. No program with Copland on the podium would be complete without Billy the Kid. Everything was there in fine style from the pistol shots to the how down, and if you were in the front row you left with ears ringing.

SATURDAY, AUG. 24
By D. D.

An all-Wagner program seems to have become part of the Tanglewood tradition. The shed appeared filled with perfervid Wagnerites, and they were not disappointed, in spite of a heat and humidity most inappropriate to the cold, winter setting of the Walkure. It is difficult to select meaningful concert fare from the body of Wagner's works, but Mr. Leinsdorf did manage to abstract at least two segments not frequently done in the concert hall. The opener, the overture to Tristan and Isolde might have been more compelling; the love potion seemed to have lost some of its virtue, perhaps because of the heat. The ascent of the Gods into Valhalla, excerpted from Das Rheingold, although stunningly performed by singers, orchestra and Rhein maidens offstage, was too short. One would have willingly sacrificed the overture for a more extended portion of this seldom heard work. The highlight of the evening was Act I in toto of the Walkure. The soloists, now in full voice, gave a full measure of their talents. Hanne-Lore Kuse as Sieglinde was convincing in her portrayal of the ill-fated heroine, while Jess Thomas as Siegmund, although not quite so articulate, gave a good account of himself. The deep, rich voice of David Ward was a perfect vehicle for the somber, suspicious Hunding.

SUNDAY, AUG. 25
By D. D.

Beautiful music, a beautiful afternoon brought to a climax another season at Tanglewood. Featured on the first part of the program were less familiar choral works by Brahms. The schicksalslied, Nanie, and Gesang der Parzen, were performed in succession without interruption. Based on poems by Goethe, Holderlin, and Schiller, they express the idea of destiny, a favorite motif of the German romantic, Sturm und Drang period. Brahms' score is thoroughly in the spirit of these grandiose tableaux; Leinsdorf, past master of the dramatic, turned in a highly moving, almost sensuous reading of all three. Although some diction of the chorus was not always well articulated, the effect was a powerful one. Orchestra and chorus mingled as one great instrument. Finally, the orchestra performed Brahms' Symphony No. 1. Again Leinsdorf captured every subtle mood, every cadence with the usual precision, but this time with a vitality and drive that left one breathless. All considered, this concert should rank as one of if not the finest of this season, or any other.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500

AUG 29 1968 New England Newschip

Festival Ends at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The 31st Berkshire Music Festival ended yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony in an all-Brahms program.

Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus of 80 mixed voices were heard in "Song of Fates," "Song of Destiny," and "Goddess of Funerals." The orchestral work was Symphony No. 1.

Saturday night's program was all-Wagner — Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," "Entry of the Gods into Valhalla" from "Das Rheingold," and the first act of "Die Walkure."

Leading soloists in the operatic scenes were Hanne-Lore Kuhne, Jess Thomas, and David Ward.

Weekend total attendance was 30,377.

Total Attendance

Total attendance at the 1968 Berkshire Festival for all events was 222,293. This figure includes the 24 Boston Symphony concerts, eight open rehearsals, Pops, Gala, and three contemporary trend concerts.

Attendance for the eight weekends only (24-regular concerts and eight open rehearsals) was 188,734.

In 1967, attendance at all events for which records were kept was 216,506. The eight weekends only last summer attracted 185,551.

The overall artistic quality of the festival was good.

Nine conductors led the orchestra in 25 concerts, including the Pops and Gala.

It may not always be possible to say who is conducting the Boston Symphony merely by the sound. It is much easier to detect who is not conducting it.

Most Vibrant Response

The orchestra's most vibrant response was to Ancerl, Steinberg, Krips, Ehrling and Leinsdorf. This is not to compare their comparative merits, but the quality that emerged from each conductor-orchestra union.

In more than a few instances, repertory was chosen unwisely. When secondary music and batons were combined, standard, interest and response were low.

For example, Zinman and the Boccherini First Symphony, Copland and his "Inscape," and Leinsdorf conducting the Kraft Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra.

Soloists ranged from spectacular to adequate. An example of contrast was Gina Bachauer's stirring performance of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto and Lilian Kallir's treatment of Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto in G minor, good student fodder.

Most Generous

The Tanglewood audience may well be the nation's most generous listeners. It is never stingy with applause. A goodly number apparently abided by their premonitions because attendance ranged from 4,000 to 13,000.

Management is still persuaded that composer Aaron Copland should mount the Tanglewood podium at least once each summer and perform his own music. The summer's smallest audience came to hear him last Friday night, 4,100, and not the inflated figure that was released.

The orchestra is less engaged with presenting new music than during the Koussevitzky regime of several years ago. The recent reception to Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra justified that this effort be increased, when quality warrants it.

Saturday night's Wagnerian program was great art without being consistently absorbing. This was clearly Leinsdorf's metier.

Warm Quality

In "Tristan," the orchestra responded with a satiny-smooth tone, luscious and warm quality. Leinsdorf built the Prelude's dramatic structure to an imposing summit.

For the "Rheingold" and "Walkure" scenes, soloists were on a raised platform behind the orchestra, same as in a regular production.

Concert version drawback (particularly in "Walkure") was the necessity for long, voiceless interludes during which the principals held poses and tried to look emotionally involved.

Thomas was superb as Siegmund in "Walkure." David Ward's Wotan ("Rheingold") and Hunding ("Walkure") were perceptive but thickly toned at times.

Miss Kuhse's "Fricka" ("Rheingold") did not do her justice, but the last portion of her "Walkure" scene as Sieglinde was magnificent.

Brahms Choruses

Yesterday afternoon, the three Brahms choruses were opportune for the singers, but hardly made an auspicious festival close. Singing was clear, crisp, well-matched, and scholarly. "Gesang" and "Nanie" were first Boston Symphony performances. The singers couldn't have asked for better support.

Leinsdorf caused everything to come through vitally in the Brahms Symphony. The opening movement was a steady alternation of majesty and agitation.

The route thereafter followed formally expressed sentiment, melodic warmth, and graciousness. Leinsdorf conducted the Finale as if he was opening a jewel box by degrees. It was a magnificent galop to the end.

Applause was hearty, but not stormy as at most Tanglewood season closes.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
C 50,350

AUG 26 1968 New England Newschip

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Tuesday, August 27, 1968

Tanglewood

The best for last

By Craig Stinson

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Best things came last this year at Tanglewood. At the end of a season that had distinguished itself chiefly by its run-of-the-mill repertoire and commonplace performances, the Berkshire Music Festival finally came up with a program of modern and semi-modern music, and two concerts of brilliantly played Wagner and Brahms—all in one weekend. Aaron Copland conducted the 20th-century stuff on Friday night; the last two concerts featured a triumphant-looking (and newly married) Erich Leinsdorf.

Mr. Copland's concert included, among other works, the suite from "Billy the Kid" and his most recent orchestral piece, "Inscape." The latter, composed in 1967 on a commission from the New York Philharmonic, was making its Boston Symphony debut.

According to Mr. Copland's notes, the word "inscape" was coined by Gerard Manley Hopkins to denote (in W. H. Gardner's words) "a quasi-mystical illumination, a sudden perception of that deeper pattern, order, and unity, which gives meaning to external forms." The piece seemed, so far as one could judge, an effective translation of that sensation into musical language.

Inward Copland

It is, at any rate, one of Mr. Copland's more austere, inward-looking works. Certain features of rhythm and timbre give it an unmistakably "Coplandish" sound, but the effervescence that characterizes most of Copland's more frequently heard music is absent. One could call it an extended mood piece, put together with first-rate craftsmanship and musical imagination.

The rest of the concert consisted largely of the kind of folksy pan-Americana for which Copland is well known. Elliot Carter's "Holiday" Overture opened the pageant in a festive spirit, and Mr. Copland's "Billy the Kid" Suite brought it to a lively close.

The really memorable performances, however, came Saturday night. Mr. Leinsdorf, of course, knows how to conduct Wagner; but he outdid himself this time. He began with a reading of the "Tristan" Prelude that was ideally balanced and paced and so intense that it approached the threshold of pain, then continued with excerpts from "Das Rheingold" (the last scene) and "Die Walküre" (Act I).

All this Wagner was incomparably more convincing than the program that opened the BSO season last September. Chief among the differences was the cast of soloists. Jess Thomas, who also sang last fall, seemed in far better voice this time, recreating roles of Froh, Loge, and Siegmund with untiring brilliance. David Ward brought an uncommon level of credibility to the role of Hunding; and Hanne-Lore Kuhse, despite a few wobbles up top, was a clear and strong-voiced Fricka and Sieglinde.

Sober Brahms

On Sunday, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted three of Brahms's choral pieces and the First Symphony. Of the choral works, only the "Schicksalslied," Op. 54, is anything like a commonly heard item. It is also the best of the three, although Mr. Leinsdorf, the Tanglewood Choir, and the Berkshire Chorus managed to make a strong case for the "Gesang der Parzen" and "Nänie" as well. All three were Tanglewood premières.

Mr. Leinsdorf's treatment of the symphony was solid and sober, but not unexciting. The balancing of voices, in particular, lent effectiveness to the performance. Horn parts stood out in unusual prominence, and other passages such as the clarinet counter-melody toward the beginning of the third movement were more than normally audible and interesting.

Surprisingly enough, the music never quite came unbuttoned during the first three movements. But this restraint received its compensation in a fourth movement of extraordinary speed and fury that brought the 1968 Tanglewood season to a stunning conclusion.

Tanglewood and Norfolk Finales

FRIDAY, AUG. 23
By D. D.

An all-modern program was presented at Tanglewood this evening, two of the works featured being by Aaron Copland, guest conductor. A first performance by the B.S.O. of Elliot Carter's Holiday Overture opened the program. Unknown until quite recently, Carter is fast gaining a foothold on the American musical scene. The overture suggested numerous influences, Copland, Ives and a touch of Webern. Its complex harmonic structure, striking rhythmic patterns and colorful orchestration, was given a sympathetic reading by Mr. Copland. The nostalgically lyrical Pelleas et Melisande Suite by Faure formed a quiet contrast to the blatant Sinfonia India of Carlos Chavez, with its strong, obsessive rhythms and novel percussion effects based on material drawn from Mexican Indian folk dances. Following intermission was a short piece by Copland, Inscape. Not couched in this composer's usual style, this vague, impressionistic picture of some scene inner or outer, was interesting if nothing else. No program with Copland on the podium would be complete without Billy the Kid. Everything was there in fine style from the pistol shots to the how down, and if you were in the front row you left with ears ringing.

SATURDAY, AUG. 24
By D. D.

An all-Wagner program seems to have become part of the Tanglewood tradition. The shed appeared filled with perfervid Wagnerites, and they were not disappointed, in spite of a heat and humidity most inappropriate to the cold, winter setting of the Walkure. It is difficult to select meaningful concert fare from the body of Wagner's works, but Mr. Leinsdorf did manage to abstract at least two segments not frequently done in the concert hall. The opener, the overture to Tristan and Isolde might have been more compelling; the love potion seemed to have lost some of its virtue, perhaps because of the heat. The ascent of the Gods into Valhalla, excerpted from Das Rheingold, although stunningly performed by singers, orchestra and Rhein maidens offstage, was too short. One would have willingly sacrificed the overture for a more extended portion of this seldom heard work. The highlight of the evening was Act I in toto of the Walkure. The soloists, now in full voice, gave a full measure of their talents. Hanne-Lore Kuse as Sieglinde was convincing in her portrayal of the ill-fated heroine, while Jess Thomas as Siegmund, although not quite so articulate, gave a good account of himself. The deep, rich voice of David Ward was a perfect vehicle for the somber, suspicious Hunding.

SUNDAY, AUG. 25
By D. D.

Beautiful music, a beautiful afternoon brought to a climax another season at Tanglewood. Featured on the first part of the program were less familiar choral works by Brahms. The schicksalslied, Nanie, and Gesang der Parzen, were performed in succession without interruption. Based on poems by Goethe, Holderlin, and Schiller, they express the idea of destiny, a favorite motif of the German romantic, Sturm und Drang period. Brahms' score is thoroughly in the spirit of these grandiose tableaux; Leinsdorf, past master of the dramatic, turned in a highly moving, almost sensuous reading of all three. Although some diction of the chorus was not always well articulated, the effect was a powerful one. Orchestra and chorus mingled as one great instrument. Finally, the orchestra performed Brahms' Symphony No. 1. Again Leinsdorf captured every subtle mood, every cadence with the usual precision, but this time with a vitality and drive that left one breathless. All considered, this concert should rank as one of if not the finest of this season, or any other.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500
AUG 29 1968
Portland
Newspaper

Festival Ends at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The 31st Berkshire Music Festival ended yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony in an all-Brahms program.

Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus of 80 mixed voices were heard in "Song of Fates," "Song of Destiny," and "Goddess of Funerals." The orchestral work was Symphony No. 1.

Saturday night's program was all-Wagner — Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," "Entry of the Gods into Valhalla" from "Das Rheingold," and the first act of "Die Walkure."

Leading soloists in the operatic scenes were Hanne-Lore Kuhne, Jess Thomas, and David Ward.

Weekend total attendance was 30,377.

Total Attendance

Total attendance at the 1968 Berkshire Festival for all events was 222,293. This figure includes the 24 Boston Symphony concerts, eight open rehearsals, Pops, Gala, and three contemporary trend concerts.

Attendance for the eight weekends only (24-regular concerts and eight open rehearsals) was 188,734.

In 1967, attendance at all events for which records were kept was 216,506. The eight weekends only last summer attracted 185,551.

The overall artistic quality of the festival was good.

Nine conductors led the orchestra in 25 concerts, including the Pops and Gala.

It may not always be possible to say who is conducting the Boston Symphony merely by the sound. It is much easier to detect who is not conducting it.

Most Vibrant Response

The orchestra's most vibrant response was to Ancerl, Steinberg, Krips, Ehrling and Leinsdorf. This is not to compare their comparative merits, but the quality that emerged from each conductor-orchestra union.

In more than a few instances, repertory was chosen unwisely. When secondary music and batons were combined, standard, interest and response were low.

For example, Zinman and the Boccherini First Symphony, Copland and his "Inscape," and Leinsdorf conducting the Kraft Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra.

Soloists ranged from spectacular to adequate. An example of contrast was Gina Bachauer's stirring performance of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto and Lilian Kallir's treatment of Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto in G minor, good student fodder.

Most Generous

The Tanglewood audience may well be the nation's most generous listeners. It is never stingy with applause. A goodly number apparently abided by their premonitions because attendance ranged from 4,000 to 13,000.

Management is still persuaded that composer Aaron Copland should mount the Tanglewood podium at least once each summer and perform his own music. The summer's smallest audience came to hear him last Friday night, 4,100, and not the inflated figure that was released.

The orchestra is less engaged with presenting new music than during the Koussevitzky regime of several years ago. The recent reception to Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra justified that this effort be increased, when quality warrants it.

Saturday night's Wagnerian program was great art without being consistently absorbing. This was clearly Leinsdorf's metier.

Warm Quality

In "Tristan," the orchestra responded with a satiny-smooth tone, luscious and warm quality. Leinsdorf built the Prelude's dramatic structure to an imposing summit.

For the "Rheingold" and "Walkure" scenes, soloists were on a raised platform behind the orchestra, same as in a regular production.

Concert version drawback (particularly in "Walkure") was the necessity for long, voiceless interludes during which the principals held poses and tried to look emotionally involved.

Thomas was superb as Siegmund in "Walkure." David Ward's Wotan ("Rheingold") and Hunding ("Walkure") were perceptive but thickly toned at times.

Miss Kuhse's "Fricka" ("Rheingold") did not do her justice, but the last portion of her "Walkure" scene as Sieglinde was magnificent.

Brahms Choruses

Yesterday afternoon, the three Brahms choruses were opportune for the singers, but hardly made an auspicious festival close. Singing was clear, crisp, well-matched, and scholarly. "Gesang" and "Nanie" were first Boston Symphony performances. The singers couldn't have asked for better support.

Leinsdorf caused everything to come through vitally in the Brahms Symphony. The opening movement was a steady alternation of majesty and agitation.

The route thereafter followed formally expressed sentiment, melodic warmth, and graciousness. Leinsdorf conducted the Finale as if he was opening a jewel box by degrees. It was a magnificent galop to the end.

Applause was hearty, but not stormy as at most Tanglewood season closes.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS
AUG 26 1968
England
Newspaper

84.

The Sound of Music

Tanglewood's 87th Season Passes into History

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — On a hot, muggy afternoon, the final note of the 87th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sounded Sunday at Tanglewood. The eight-week Berkshire Festival attracted more than 222,000 persons — 6,000 over last year's attendance — and more than 188,000 for the eight weekend events alone. Who says music isn't big business?

One of the Tanglewood highlights certainly was Saturday night's triumphant presentation of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," second opera of the Ring cycle. The all-Wagner program, attended by 6,102 on an oppressively humid evening, also included the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde" and the final scene of "Das Rheingold," the entry of the gods into Valhalla, which in the Ring plot directly precedes "Walkuere."

"Rheingold" proceeds on a super-human level, with Wotan and his retinue of gods finally crossing over a rainbow bridge into their castle-in-the-air built with stolen gold. But in "Walkuere," we have a far more human atmosphere.

The first act, in fact, is a household triangle. Fleeing his enemies, Siegmund (or Wehwalt) has staggered into the rude home of Hunding, whose wife (Sieglinde, actually Siegmund's twin sister, as the result of an earthly affair by Wotan) gives him hospitality. Hunding returns, suspicious, then hostile when he learns that his guest is the foe he has been pursuing.

Dramatic Music

But his wife drugs Hunding, and while he slumbers Siegmund and Sieglinde fall in love and flee with the mighty sword Wotan had thrust into a tree. In a score rich with psychological rumblings, thick with foreboding and ablaze with ardor, Wagner unfolds the confrontation of his three characters.

The performance was an exciting blend of superb conducting by Erich Leinsdorf and glorious singing by tenor Jess Thomas (Siegmund), soprano Hanne-Lore Kuhse (Sieglinde) and bass David Ward (Hunding). Each has a voice of Wagnerian quality, dramatic gifts and superlative diction.

Thomas is an ideally-constructed heldentenor: tall, rugged, handsome with a sturdy, uncluttered tenor that remains in clear focus at any volume. He had sung the same scene with the Boston Symphony in last fall's opening series, and his singing at Tanglewood was as fully exciting as in Symphony Hall. Not the least of Thomas' virtues is taste: despite the potency of his voice, he resists vocal exhibitionism.

Miss Kuhse, star of the East Berlin opera, appeared in last year's Tanglewood production of "Fidelio." Her Sieglinde was more satisfying, exact in tone, in weight, in inflection and diction. Under pressure, her voice tends to spread and take on some stridency, and her lower register has neither the carrying power nor the tonal sheen of the rest of her compass.

But these problems were slight in her Sieglinde, and she was an impressively dramatic singer able to communicate effectively with subtle vocal inflections reinforced with more obvious physical expressions.

The veteran David Ward made a sonorous Hunding, perhaps less black-voiced and sinister than some of his Wagnerian colleagues, but showing a wider range of characterization. He was also an impressive Wotan in the "Rheingold" excerpt in which Thomas took the parts of Froh and Loge, Miss Kuhse was Fricka, Leslie Gunn sang Donner, and Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides and Phyllis Elhady were the off-stage Rhinemaidens.

Soft-Scale Playing

Leinsdorf handles this score intelligently. Unlike the grand-scaled final scene of "Rheingold," the opening of "Walkuere" is more intimate. Leinsdorf at times reduces the orchestral texture to delicate chamber proportions. As in all his work, Leinsdorf established firm control, with clarity of line and detail and a finely-managed scale of proportions. It is not a super-emotional approach, but it is a satisfying one, and particularly noteworthy was Jules Eskin's noble cello solo.

The prelude to "Tristan", that great song of ecstasy, might have had a dash of impetuosity in Leinsdorf's disciplined presentation, but the conductor builds his conception according to a thoughtful architectural plan, gradually building to a rapturous climax. And like the rest of the program, there were splendid sound and playing from the orchestra.

Sunday's fare was exclusively Brahms, and the 6,088 in the audience heard three rarely-performed choral works: "Gesang der Parzen," Opus 89; "Schicksalslied," Opus 54 (both in their first performance by the Orchestra), and "Naenie," Opus 82, plus the First Symphony.

Aside from the German Requiem, listeners are unlikely to hear many of Brahms' eight compositions for chorus and orchestra. The three heard Sunday ought not to linger in neglect. Each in its way is a gem, and all are unmistakably Brahms, rich in all components from text to melody and harmonic scheme.

They are songs on the contemplation of death and man's destiny, and thus not on a puny scale even if compressed into about a quarter-hour's length each. "Schicksalslied" (completed in 1971) or "Song of Destiny" strikes the gentle, exalted mood of the Requiem's opening in a setting of a Hoelderlin poem. But the flowing serenity turns into agitation: unlike the blissful calm of the immortals, it is man's fate to be thrown, like water "from rock to rock."

HANNE-LORE KUHSE
. . . Wagnerianly impressive

The Music Is The Message

"Naenie" (1881), the goddess of funerals, is from Schiller: "Even the beautiful must die!" but "to be a song of woe in the mouth of a loved one is glorious, for it is the vulgar that descends without sound to the underworld." These magnificent lines are garbed in music of comparable beauty, for instance, the opening wreathing woodwind introduction, the slowly moving choral parts.

"Gesang der Parzen" (1883), "Song of the Fates," takes its text from Goethe and is sterner, less contrapuntal material, striking a mood of cosmic mystery.

These works are ideal for a summer festival, even with the heat. The Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus were immaculately prepared by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, and Leinsdorf directed performances that were both powerful and beautiful. The First Symphony is another Leinsdorf specialty, familiar but solid and building in excitement to a rousing denouement.

Aaron Copland, long a major figure in American music in everything from composition to pedagogy, conducted Friday night's program on a cool evening before 6,342.

Copland for a quarter-century was chairman of the faculty and head of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Festival. He carries his nearly 68 years lightly, and his continuing energy and enthusiasm are obvious.

Not surprisingly, his program choices were exclusively from the 20th century, though the suite from Gabriel Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande," written in 1898 and first performed in 1901, barely qualifies. Certainly, there is a big gap between the gentle suavities of Faure and the aggressive syncopations and harmonies of Elliott Carter's "Holiday Overture" (1944), Carlos Chavez' "Sinfonia India" (1935) or Copland's own "Billy the Kid" ballet suite. Copland's "Inscape" (1967) and Stravinsky's "Ode" (1943) completed the program.

Carter's overture is busy, fanfarish, tautly contrapuntal and altogether a brilliantly arranged piece whipped along by crackling rhythms. In its first performance by the Boston Symphony (like "Inscape"), it put the musicians on their mettle, and either Carter at points deliberately sought a frantic atmosphere, or there was some disarray that subsequent performances will clean up. The composer was in the audience to receive the applause.

AARON COPLAND
. . . his energy goes on

Chavez' "Sinfonia India" offers a splash of orchestral colors, a variety of tricky meters, folk-tunish themes, and general high spirits, in several respects akin to Copland's "Billy the Kid." Whether the tempo is slow or fast, the underlying rhythmic pulse is continually emphasized by the percussion in an attractive collection of taps, rattles, scrapes and jingles. Like "Billy the Kid," it was given a sharp and enthusiastic performance.

Stravinsky's "Ode" is a lovely triptych, music commissioned in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky. Its first part, "Eulogy," features a beautiful, sustained melodic line, rather long and romantic for Stravinsky. "Eclogue" is a kind of hunting scherzo, playful and ablaze with horns, and the gentle "Epitaph" concludes this fine piece superbly played.

Copland's "Inscape" sets a mystical mood, despite its 12-tone technique having a good deal of tonal feeling. It's a long advance from "Billy the Kid," but there was no doubt where the audience's favor lay.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Regional Roundup

Many Highlights Recalled As Tanglewood Closes

With an all - Brahms program at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its 87th season to a close. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, conducted three seldom - heard choral works, "Gesang der Parzen, Chicksalslied," and "Naenie," in which the orchestra was joined by the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus, and the First Symphony. By the festival's end, more than 225,000 persons had come to Tanglewood for the 24 concerts, open rehearsals and special events.

Major Choral Works

Leinsdorf programmed several major choral works this season, including the Brahms "Requiem" and the Haydn "Lord Nelson Mass" in addition to the three Brahms works on the final program. In the "Requiem" and the Mendelssohn "Incidental Music to a Midsummer Night's Dream" the Berkshire Chorus, directed by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, participated.

Malcolm Frager was soloist in a performance of the Schumann Piano Concerto in which the first movement was heard in its original 1841 version.

The last weekend, in addition to the all - Brahms program, included a concert conducted by Aaron Copland, who founded the Berkshire Music Center's composition department and headed it for 25 years, and an all - Wagner program on which Leinsdorf conducted the finale of "Das Rheingold" and the first act of "Die Walkuere."

Contemporary Trends

This season marked a major innovation in programming. Under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center, three contemporary trends concerts brought jazz, folk music, music of India, and rock to Tanglewood for the first time.

The fifth annual Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored jointly by the center and the Fromm Music Foundation, took place Aug. 4-11. A total of 33 works by 29 composers were heard in seven programs during the eight days of the "festival within a festival".

A grant from the Massachusetts Council on Arts and Humanities made possible a program called A Day in the Arts. Four days each week, busloads of youngsters from the urban areas of Massachusetts were brought to Tanglewood for a day's outing. A total of 1200 boys and girls between the ages of eight and 18 participated, and for many it was a first exposure to Tanglewood and the arts.

Rockefeller Grant

Another grant, this one from the Rockefeller Foundation, was also announced during the summer. Intended to benefit the center through the fund - raising activities of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, the grant is a challenge grant on a matching basis totalling $125,000 over a three - year period.

An anniversary was observed on Aug. 4th, when the 6000-seat music shed, the most famous of the buildings on the 210 acres of the Tanglewood grounds, was 30 years old. The shed was dedicated Aug. 4, 1938, during a concert conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, then music director of the orchestra.

The Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conductor, gave its annual concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund on Aug. 20 with Peter Nero, pianist, as soloist.

Tanglewood - on parade, the annual day - long display of the many activities of the Berkshire Music Center, this year featured artists and exhibits from Tanglewood's neighboring artistic institutions, including the Berkshire Theater Festival, Jacobs Pillow Dance Festival, Hancock Shaker Village, and the Berkshire Museum. Students of the Berkshire Music Center and the Related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory gave vocal, orchestral and chamber music programs and demonstrations.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 27,[illegible]

AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

A Calendar of Events

85

Saturday, Aug. 17, through Sunday, Aug. 25

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD — Saturday, Aug. 17: Berkshire Music Center concert, 2 p.m., Theatre Concert Hall . . . BSO conducted by Karl Ancerl in Gluck's Overture to Iphigeneia in Aulis, Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 1 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 18: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Beethoven's Fidelio Overture, Violin Concerto (Silverstein) and Symphony No. 5, 2:30 p.m., Shed . . . Monday, Aug. 19: Vocal Concert, 8 p.m. Theatre Concert Hall (Friends Event) . . . Wednesday, Aug. 21: Chamber Music, 8 p.m., Theatre Concert Hall (Friends Event) . . . Thursday, Aug. 22: Vocal and Opera Concert, 8 p.m., Theatre Concert Hall (Friends Event) . . . Friday, Aug. 23: Aaron Copland conducting the BSO in Carter's Holiday Overture, Faure's Pelleas et Melisande Suite, Chavez' Sinfonia India, Copland's Inscape, Stravinsky's Ode and Copland's Billy the Kid, 9 p.m., Shed . . . Weekend Prelude with Hanne-Lore Kuhse and Charles Wilson, 7 p.m., Shed . . . Saturday, Aug. 24: Leinsdorf conducting BSO in all Wagner program of Tristan und Isolde Prelude, Das Rheingold Finale (Kuhse, Thomas, Ward) and Die Walkure, Act I (Kuhse, Thomas, Ward), 8 p.m. Shed . . . Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, conducted by Aaron Copland, 2:30 p..m Theatre Concert Hall (Friends Event) . . . Sunday, Aug. 25: Final concert of the season with Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in all-Brahms program of Gesang der Parzen, Schicksalslied Op. 54, Nanie Op. 82 (Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir) and Symphony No. 1, Op. 68, 2:30 p.m., Shed.

BOSTON POPS AT TANGLEWOOD—Tuesday, Aug. 20: Boston Pops conducted by Arthur Fiedler, with pianist Peter Nero in a program of Gould's American Salute, Copland's An Outdoor Overture, Gershwin's Concerto in F and Nero's Fantasy and Improvisations, 8 p.m., Shed.

HIGH POINT — West Mountain Road, Lenox. First season of a series of concerts by the Berkshire Chamber Players. Fourth concert on Monday, Aug. 19 at 8:45 p.m.

MERRYWOOD MUSIC SCHOOL — Stockbridge Road, Lenox. Student recitals, 3 p.m. Saturdays; faculty concerts, 7:30 p.m. Sundays. No admission charge.

MUSIC INN — Lenox. First season of Daniel Antoun's Talin Music Festival of baroque and contemporary chamber music, Thursdays at 8 p.m., Saturdays at 3 p.m., Sundays at 8 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 17: Works by Vivaldi, Tartini and C.P.E. Bach with John Hsu and Angus Whyte, soloists . . . Sunday, Aug. 18: Repeat of August 17 program . . . Thursday, Aug. 22: Solo recital for violin by Charles Castleman performing Bach's Sonata in A Minor and Partita in B Minor . . . Saturday, Aug. 24: Talin Festival Orchestra with Castleman as guest artist in program of Joachim's Concerto for Violin, Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, Couperin's Pieces en Concert and Britten's Simple Symphony . . . Sunday, Aug. 25: Repeat of Saturday program.

MUSIC MOUNTAIN — Falls Village, Conn. . . . Saturday, Aug. 17: Berkshire Quartet with guest artist Natasha Magg in Berg's Quartet Op. 3, Beethoven's Sonata for Piano and Cello in C, Op. 102 No. 1 and Brahm's Piano Quintet. Concert time: 3 p.m.

NORFOLK MUSIC SHED — Route 44, Norfolk, Conn. Summer concert series on Friday evenings at 8:30 p.m., Sunday afternoon, 3:30. Sunday, Aug. 18: Litchfield County Choral Union, 3:30 p.m., in Haydn's Creation with Bove, Stern, Rabbino, guest artists. Yale Summer Orchestra, Gustaf Meier conducting . . . Friday, Aug. 23: Chamber and orchestra concert conducted by Keith Wilson with Broadus Erle and David Schwartz as soloists in program of works by Ravel, Stravinsky and Mozart . . . Saturday, Aug. 24: Vocal and instrumental concert conducted by Gustav Meier, all-Bach program, 2:30 p.m.

RED FOX MUSIC BARN—New Marlboro. Chamber music at 8:30 p.m. Saturdays. Aug. 17: New Marlboro chamber players in works by Brahms, Vivaldi, Chausson.

William Carney

Legs and arms on Tanglewood lawn are jumbled around face hidden by new BSO program.

SPECIAL EVENTS

BAND CONCERT—Sunday, Aug. 18: VFW Band, 2 p.m., Springside Park.

BARBECUE — Saturday, Aug. 17: Chicken barbecue and fair on village common, Worthington Center, barbecue tickets in advance only.

BAZAAR — Saturday, Aug. 24: Homemade food, white elephants, toys, books, 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., St. Luke's Episcopal Church, Route 7, Lanesboro.

CONCERT—Sunday, Aug. 18: Classical guitarist, flutist and two vocalists from staff of Belvoir Terrace in free concert, Stockbridge Book Store, Lenox, 8 p.m.

CONCERT — Saturday, Aug. 17: Walter Hautzig, concert pianist, County Coffee House, Route 203, Spencertown, N.Y., 8 p.m.

CONCERTS—Chamber music series at University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Aug. 14-25. Opening concerts at 8 p.m. Aug. 14 and 4 p.m. Aug. 18 with the New England Festival String Quartet, Bartlett Auditorium.

DUPLICATE BRIDGE—American Contract Bridge League duplicate tournament at the Stanley Club, 66 Wendell Ave., Pittsfield, Mondays at 7:30 p.m.; at the GEAA, 303 Crane Ave., Pittsfield, Thursdays at 7:30.

EUGENE'S AT MUSIC INN — Saturday night political cabaret at Music Inn, Lenox, starting at 8:30 p.m. Relaxation, entertainment by Tanglewood and folk musicians. Admission by donation.

FAIRS — Aug. 16, 17: Annual 4-H County Fair, Berkshire Downs, off Route 20, west of Pittsfield . . . Aug. 21-25: Hillside Agricultural Society, Cummington.

HOUSE TOUR—Thursday, Aug. 22: Woman's Auxiliary of Berkshire District Medical Society sponsoring house tour in Stockbridge area, 1 to 5 p.m., starting at Cranwell School.

LECTURE — Sunday, Aug. 18: Sahomi Tachibana lecturing on Japanese dance, Ted Shawn Theatre, Jacob's Pillow, 8:30 p.m.

OPERA — Thursday, Aug. 22: "Elephant Steps," new opera by Stanley Silverman, 8 p.m., Theatre Concert Hall, Tanglewood.

OUTDOOR BOOKSTALL — Berkshire Athenaeum's annual bookstall on the lawn, for browsing or buying. Open Fridays, noon-5; Saturdays, 10-noon, starting July 2. At Morningside Branch, 764 Tyler St., Tuesdays and Wednesdays, 11 a.m.-5 p.m.

PANCAKE BREAKFAST—Sunday, Aug. 18: Lee Rotary Club serves juice, sausage, pancakes, coffee, milk in parking lot of Lee Super Market, Main Street, Lee, 7 a.m. to 1 p.m.

POETRY READING — Monday, Aug. 19: Halsey Davis reading his "Ballad of the Boston Strangler" and other poems, Gallery One, Hillsdale, 8 p.m.

SHAKER VILLAGE OPEN HOUSE—Saturday, Aug. 17: 2nd annual open house at teen-age community, Mt. Lebanon Shaker Village (off Route 20 at Massachusetts-New York line). Guided tours start at 6 p.m., include inspection of restored Shaker buildings and operating workshops in woodworking, broom-making, pottery, weaving and spinning. Finale is program of dance, theatre, folk dance, re-creation of Shaker religious service and 250-voice chorus. Free admission, reservations through Lebanon Springs (N.Y.) office, 7-2302.

FOR CHILDREN

CHIMES CONCERT—Half hour daily (except Wednesdays) program played on the David Dudley Fields Children's Chimes in Stockbridge, 5:30 to 6 p.m.

JUNIOR CINEMA — Little Cinema, Berkshire Museum. Every Friday in July and August, showings at 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. Friday, Aug. 23: "Billie."

LIVE ANIMAL DEMONSTRATION — Saturday, Aug. 24: Live animal demonstration for first, second and third graders. Berkshire Museum, 10:30 a.m.

THEATRE — Wednesday, Aug. 28: "Jack and the Beanstalk," Colonie Summer Theatre, Latham, N.Y., 2 p.m.

Berkshire Week

Published weekly during the summer months by The Berkshire Eagle, Pittsfield, Massachusetts. Staff: Ruth Bass, editor; William Carney, assistant. Printed by the offset process on the press of the Bennington (Vt.) Banner.

GUNSMITH ON TARGET. By Paul Witteman 6A

TAXI, GUV'NOR? TAXI. By Ruth Bass 8A

GRASSROOTS REGION. By William Carney 9A

THE LANGUAGE OF WILDFLOWERS. By Morgan Bulkeley 16A-17A

CUISINE WITH A BIG 'C' AND AN UMLAUT. By Milton R. Bass 18A

THE ANTIQUE TRAIL: LANESBORO. By Gustaf G. Pilblad 24A

SUMMER HELP: MEASURING UP. By Anne Gerard Flynn 26A

SUMMER DIRECTORY 20A

OUTDOOR RECREATION 21A

GOLF DIRECTORY 22A

NATURAL ATTRACTIONS 23A

WHERE TO EAT 30A

WHERE TO STAY 31A

ON THE COVER — Purple pasture thistle is visited by a bumble bee, as photographer William Carney focuses on some of the smaller denizens of the summer Berkshires. He continues with more insects on Page 9A, and the Morgan Bulkeleys, father and son, elaborate on wildflowers on Pages 16-17A.

Cover Photo by William Carney

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

AUG 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Attendance Rises

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — The closing concert of the 31st Berkshire Music Festival yesterday at Tanglewood brought figures from the press office for total results of the eight-week season.

In 1968, a total of 222,293 attended events for which ticket records were kept. This included 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, eight open rehearsals, and special events ("Pops," "Gala" and three Contemporary Trends concerts).

A similar figure for 1967 was 216,506, showing a slight gain this year. Attendance at the 24 major concerts and eight rehearsals went up from 185,551 to 188,734. This indicates a reversal of a previous downward trend at Tanglewood.

Closing Weekend

The closing weekend set up only moderate attendance records. Yesterday's concert, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, brought no soloists and no crowd-snatching works, but offered three fine efforts by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus and a well-played symphony in an all-Brahms program.

Of the three Brahms choral works sung yesterday, only one had been performed by the Boston Symphony at Boston, and all three were new to Tanglewood. Worcester's Festival discovered these beautiful works years ago. "Gesang der Parzen" (Song of the Fates) has been sung twice at Worcester Festivals. "Schicksalslied" (Song of Destiny) five times, and "Naenie" (Goddess of Funerals) once.

Tonal Results

Charles Wilson, choral director, and John Oliver, assistant, took bows for their preparation of the 80-voice choir. The tonal results were splendid, especially in "Naenie," but in the other two works Leinsdorf at times seemed too preoccupied with the beauties of the orchestral total picture to let the chorus sing out with full spirit. This was Brahms, beautiful Brahms, but less human and live than it could have been.

All three works, to texts by entirely different poets, are concerned with mortal woes, the carefree life of the gods, and the paths of the death which comes to all beauty on earth.

Leinsdorf had his players giving a fine performance of the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor. He conveyed to the hearer in turn the complexities and mysteries of the intricate portions and the fine directness of the first and second movement's openings. Leinsdorf has been achieving thrilling climaxes to his symphony offerings in recent weeks, and yesterday's roused the Festival's final crowd to long demonstrations.

Gazette Review

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,230

AUG 17 1968 New England Newsclip

86

MUSIC

If Only Koussevitzky Were Alive . . .

By JOHN THORNTON

THE KOUSSEVITZKY Music Foundation, now grown into America's most powerful organization in the cause of new music, celebrates its 26th year by awarding grants to nine composers, four of them in the United States.

Grants are for music of wide variety, with four awards for the composition of works for symphony.

At a time when this country has more symphony organizations than ever before, — 1500 community and metropolitan sized ensembles — we face the strange dilemma of a starvation of new symphonic creations.

Started in 1942 by the conductor as a memorial to his wife Natalie, the foundation grew in size and importance and its purpose has been carried on since Koussevitzky's death in 1951.

When the Russian maestro took over the Boston Symphony in 1925, succeeding Pierre Monteux, he almost immediately began to scout around for native talent.

He summoned Walter Piston to his office in Symphony Hall and began the conversation by immediately asking what the young composer had written for orchestra.

"Nothing yet," Piston replied, "I'm pretty busy composing small pieces."

"Why not write symphony, big orchestra music?"

Piston, a little embarrased, stated a large work would have little chance of being performed.

With a grand gesture (he was never one to miss a theatrical opportunity,) Koussevitzky flung his arms wide and said with dramatic emphasis, "You write, I play."

Piston hurried back to Harvard, wrote an overture "with everything in it but the kitchen sink," and turned the score over with some misgiving. Koussevitzky quickly scheduled the opus and immediately after it was performed accosted the Harvard professor backstage.

"Vell," he said, "vot you write next? Compose again. Ve play."

Their friendship grew with the years, and today the Rockland-born composer will readily admit that it was Koussevitzky who gave him the most encouragement when he was starting.

WHATEVER ARGUMENTS may rage over Koussevitzky's status as a conductor (some musicians recite shortcomings technically) there is little doubt he will long be remembered for championing the cause of new music.

He was an angel of promise to the talented creator, as he was a holy terror to many of the players who came under him. Through the sheer force of his willpower, he became a great conductor, making the Boston Symphony in 25 years one of the greatest in the world.

Musicians were often over-tense under his direction and the "Koussevitzky sound," an extremely brilliant tone, became his hallmark.

Fleeing the tumult of his native Russia shortly after the Revolution, Koussevitzky began his spectacular climb to greatness in France.

In Paris his orchestra rule was absolute, his temper formidable and his concerts loudly praised — at the expense of exhausted musicians who criticised his beat and his lack of technical knowledge, but who had to admit he knew how to communicate his wishes.

Once, during a dress rehearsal of a Scriabin score in France, he was most particular about an entrance on the gong. The percussionist, frightened of Koussevitzky, had worked out an elaborate system of hand cues from a fellow musician who sat just in front of his instrument. Things worked out well until the moment came when the conductor glared directly at the gongster and made a dramatic hand motion.

The poor player, paralyzed with fear, made a giant swing of his mallet, but in his haste and confusion hit his associate on the head. In place of the gong sound came a loud shriek of anguish.

Early in his career in Boston, Koussevitzky insisted that a genuine cow-horn be used as the composer (Britten) directed. After a long search, the horn was found and an unemployed musician called in to play it.

He had never performed with the BSO and was terrified when his cue came from the podium.

A long, quavering bleat emerged, and Koussevitsky stopped the orchestra. Glaring at the hapless horn. he held his hands up for silence.

"Vot you doing?" he growled. "You are supposed to sound like cow! Ve try again."

The second time around it was worse and the orchestra players could hardly stifle their laughter. Koussevitzky was enraged, but time was short and he suddenly smiled broadly at the suffering musician.

"You still not sound like cow, but you trying be natural, no? Perhaps you have only heard cow with vibrato?"

These were lighter moments, the public loved the stories and his quaint English and willingness to tangle with critics made excellent press, but today few recall there was a time when Koussevitzky almost left the Boston Symphony for New York.

Lincoln '68 to Honor Serge Koussevitzky

By RAYMOND ERICSON

NEW YORK — The memory of an injustice had far-reaching effects in the life of Serge Koussevitzky — and beyond that life. One effect is with us today, the Koussevitzky Music Foundation with its offshoot, the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress. The foundation rounded out 25 years of service last year and is being honored in the next few weeks by Lincoln Center Festival '68 through the performance of works commissioned by the foundation.

The provocative injustice was the state of music publishing in Koussevitzky's native Russia. No copyright existed and composers were not paid for their works or given any royalties. Koussevitzky, with the help of his wife, Natalie, started his own publishing house in Berlin in 1909, and the Russian composers whose music it issued — Scriabin, Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Prokofiev — were compensated from the profits of the venture.

AFTER WORLD WAR I, Koussevitzky moved his by then famous Editions Russes to Paris. In 1942, when another World War had begun, Koussevitzky had turned the Boston Symphony into America's leading orchestra and the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was just getting under way, Natalie Koussevitzky died. As a "living memorial" to her, the conductor established the Koussevitzky Music Foundation with some money of his own, a sum later augmented by friends.

Its major purpose was the commissioning of scores, and the first offer went to Benjamin Britten, who was then going back to his embattled England. The results was the opera "Peter Grimes," which has proved as durable as any commission so far. It got the foundation's activities off to a healthy start.

In the 1947-48 season, the sale of Editions Russe to the English firm of Boosey and Hawkes was completed, and the money was used to set up the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress, which carried on the commissioning process. The autograph scores for all the commissioned works now rest there. In fact, until the library receives the score, the composer does not receive payment from the foundation.

The value of the Koussevitzky Foundations, aside from the creation of works that have earned a place in the regular repertory, has been in its continuity of service over a long period of time and in its disassociation from any performing organization.

Because of its permanence, the foundation makes no demands on the composer as to when his work should be completed.

(C) New York Times News Service

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JUN 23 1968 New England

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

JUL 14 1968 N Eng

INFURIATED WITH the trustees over the BSO's long unionization battle, he flirted with the Philharmonic and came very close to closing a contract. But the union fight was settled and he decided to stay on at Boston, largely I think because of Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center.

Koussevitzky was a man of strange contrasts, one who would go to great lenghts to help composers, who fought consistently for new music and who was capable of outrageous pettiness. What his foundation continues to do for new generations of composers remains as his greatest achievement.

If he was alive today and was able with his unusual faith and vision to assess and analyze the state of music, I feel sure he would do something about our odd situation.

Koussevitzky might well have evolved a plan for continous exposure of new works so that a young talent would have the chance of having his music played by a number of orchestras within a year or two of the premiere performance.

Since 1951 a great deal of worthwhile symphonic music has been written, but little has been given wide, intelligently planned exposure.

We live in a time when much importance is given to premieres but scant attention is paid to help the composer gain following performances.

If we had a group of dedicated symphony ensembles who would agree, through some kind of carefully worked out board of control, to perform a certain amount of new music every season and to guarantee a series of concerts of high quality scores, it would at least help to overcome a condition that has become so desperate that most new composers are simply not writing scores of symphonic proportion.

Leinsdorf Directs Bostonians Here

By ALLEN HUGHES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is certainly no stranger to New York, but since it is not in the habit of playing here in summer, its appearance at Philharmonic Hall last night was unusual.

It was fitting, however, that the Bostonians were here to participate in Lincoln Center's Festival '68. One of the festival's most interesting presentations has been a multiconcert tribute to Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and Serge Koussevitzky's American career was indissolubly linked with the Boston Symphony.

The program led last night by Erich Leinsdorf consisted of five works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation. They were (in the order played) Stravinsky's Ode (1943), Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana," Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra (1951), Ginastera's Piano Concerto (1961) and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra (1943).

Considerable Substance

The Boston Symphony gave the premieres of both the Stravinsky and Bartók works under Koussevitzky's direction in the nineteen-forties.

The Bartók became a 20th-century classic in the symphonic repertory during the brief quarter-century of its existence. Its musical substance is considerable, making it relatively easy listening for those whose taste for modern music is very advanced. And it provides a brilliant vehicle for orchestras and conductors. The work is, for instance, made to order for a virtuoso conductor such as Mr. Leinsdorf.

The Stravinsky is not a major or even an especially interesting composition, but it is music of quality nonetheless and worth hearing on occasion.

Dallapiccola's work, based on excerpts from violin sonatas by Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770), presents a rather fascinating amalgam of 18th-century tunes and 20th-century musical treatments.

Silverstein Is Soloist

It pits the violin against a chamber orchestra dominated by winds and brass and is characterized by sophisticated contrapuntal variations and generally pungent sonorities. Joseph Silverstein was the excellent soloist.

The Big hit of the evening with the audience was Ginastera's somewhat brash and altogether flashy Piano Concerto, which was played for all it was worth (and possibly a bit more) by João Carlos Martins, the Bazilian pianist. The composer was present to share the audience's rapturous applause.

Although Ginastera's compositional facility and instinct for writing to the popular taste are indisputable, one can wonder at times if there is much gold in all that glitter. But since the piece makes so many people so happy when they hear it, any doubts about its genuine worth are probably not worth raising at the present time.

UTICA OBSERVER DISPATCH
Sunday, August 4, 1968

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

JUL 18 1968

Foundation Preserves Memory

By RAYMOND ERICSON
N. Y. Times News Service

NEW YORK—The memory of an injustice had far-reaching effects in the life of Serge Koussevitzky — and beyond that life. One effect is with us today the Koussevitzky Music Foundation with its offshoot, the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress. The Foundation rounded out 25 years of service last year and has been honored by Lincoln Center Festival '68 through the performance of works commissioned by the Foundation.

The provocative injustice was the state of music publishing in Koussevitzky's native Russia. No copyright existed and composers were not paid for their works or given any royalties. Koussevitzky, with the help of his wife, Natalie, started his own publishing house in Berlin in 1909, and the Russian composers whose music it issued — Scriabin, Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Prokofiev — were compensated from the profits of the venture.

• • •

AFTER WORLD WAR I, Koussevitzky moved his by then famous Editions Russes to Paris. In 1942, when another world war had begun, Koussevitzky had turned the Boston Symphony into America's leading orchestra and the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was just getting under way, Natalie Koussevizky died. As a "living memorial" to her, the conductor established the Koussevitzky Music Foundation with some money of its own, a sum later augmented by friends.

Its major purpose was the commissioning of scores, and the first offer went to Benjamin Britten, who was then going back to his embattled England. The result was the opera "Peter Grimes."

Boston Date at Philharmonic

NEW YORK—The Boston Symphony's program at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday (17) of commissions by the Koussevitzky Music Foundations will include the first work recorded by Erich Leinsdorf as the orchestra's music director.

In addition to the piece, Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," released by RCA in January, 1963, the concert will include the current RCA chart performance of Ginestera's "Piano Concerto" with Joao Carlos Martins as soloist. The program also will contain Stravinsky's "Ode" and Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana for Violin and Orchestra" with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Both of these works were included in albums deleted from the Columbia catalog.

(Continued on page 33)

Boston Date

• Continued from page 31

Koussevitzky commissions also have been featured in Lincoln Center Festival '68 concerts by the New York Philharmonic under composers Leonard Bernstein, Gunther Schuller and Aaron Copland, the Pittsburgh Symphony under Andre Previn, and two chamber programs conducted by Richard Duffalo.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUL 20 1968

MUSIC ARTISTS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
6 TI. A YR. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

SEP 1968

Philharmonic Hall; July 17, 1968; Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's only concert in the Lincoln Center Festival consisted of four works commissioned by the Koussevitsky Foundation. Two of them, the Stravinsky Ode and the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra, had their premieres under Koussevitsky's direction in the nineteen forties. The Bartok Concerto has established itself in its short lifetime as a major contribution to twentieth-century music and is a work of considerable substance, vitality, and brilliance. It was given an authoritative and luminous performance by the orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf's skilled direction. The Dallapiccola work is based on four themes taken from the violin sonatas of Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770). It is quite fantastic how these themes assert themselves in their twentieth-century guise. Joseph Silverstein was the able violin soloist pitted against a rather large cham-

86

MUSIC

If Only Koussevitzky Were Alive . . .

By JOHN THORNTON

THE KOUSSEVITZKY Music Foundation, now grown into America's most powerful organization in the cause of new music, celebrates its 26th year by awarding grants to nine composers, four of them in the United States.

Grants are for music of wide variety, with four awards for the composition of works for symphony.

At a time when this country has more symphony organizations than ever before, — 1500 community and metropolitan sized ensembles — we face the strange dilemma of a starvation of new symphonic creations.

Started in 1942 by the conductor as a memorial to his wife Natalie, the foundation grew in size and importance and its purpose has been carried on since Koussevitzky's death in 1951.

When the Russian maestro took over the Boston Symphony in 1925, succeeding Pierre Monteux, he almost immediately began to scout around for native talent.

He summoned Walter Piston to his office in Symphony Hall and began the conversation by immediately asking what the young composer had written for orchestra.

"Nothing yet," Piston replied. "I'm pretty busy composing small pieces."

"Why not write symphony, big orchestra music?"

Piston, a little embarrased, stated a large work would have little chance of being performed.

With a grand gesture (he was never one to miss a theatrical opportunity,) Koussevitzky flung his arms wide and said with dramatic emphasis, "You write, I play."

Piston hurried back to Harvard, wrote an overture "with everything in it but the kitchen sink," and turned the score over with some misgiving. Koussevitzky quickly scheduled the opus and immediately after it was performed accosted the Harvard professor backstage.

"Vell," he said, "vot you write next? Compose again. Ve play."

Their friendship grew with the years, and today the Rockland-born composer will readily admit that it was Koussevitzky who gave him the most encouragement when he was starting.

WHATEVER ARGUMENTS may rage over Koussevitzky's status as a conductor (some musicians recite shortcomings technically) there is little doubt he will long be remembered for championing the cause of new music.

He was an angel of promise to the talented creator, as he was a holy terror to many of the players who came under him. Through the sheer force of his willpower, he became a great conductor, making the Boston Symphony in 25 years one of the greatest in the world.

Musicians were often over-tense under his direction and the "Koussevitzky sound," an extremely brilliant tone, became his hallmark.

Fleeing the tumult of his native Russia shortly after the Revolution, Koussevitzky began his spectacular climb to greatness in France.

In Paris his orchestra rule was absolute, his temper formidable and his concerts loudly praised — at the expense of exhausted musicians who criticised his beat and his lack of technical knowledge, but who had to admit he knew how to communicate his wishes.

Once, during a dress rehearsal of a Scriabin score in France, he was most particular about an entrance on the gong. The percussionist, frightened of Koussevitzky, had worked out an elaborate system of hand cues from a fellow musician who sat just in front of his instrument. Things worked out well until the moment came when the conductor glared directly at the gongster and made a dramatic hand motion.

The poor player, paralyzed with fear, made a giant swing of his mallet, but in his haste and confusion hit his associate on the head. In place of the gong sound came a loud shriek of anguish.

Early in his career in Boston, Koussevitzky insisted that a genuine cow-horn be used as the composer (Britten) directed. After a long search, the horn was found and an unemployed musician called in to play it.

He had never performed with the BSO and was terrified when his cue came from the podium.

A long, quavering bleat emerged, and Koussevitsky stopped the orchestra. Glaring at the hapless horn, he held his hands up for silence.

"Vot you doing?" he growled. "You are supposed to sound like cow! Ve try again."

The second time around it was worse and the orchestra players could hardly stifle their laughter. Koussevitzky was enraged, but time was short and he suddenly smiled broadly at the suffering musician.

"You still not sound like cow, but you trying be natural, no? Perhaps you have only heard cow with vibrato?"

These were lighter moments, the public loved the stories and his quaint English and willingness to tangle with critics made excellent press, but today few recall there was a time when Koussevitzky almost left the Boston Symphony for New York.

Lincoln '68 to Honor Serge Koussevitzky

By RAYMOND ERICSON

NEW YORK — The memory of an injustice had far-reaching effects in the life of Serge Koussevitzky — and beyond that life. One effect is with us today, the Koussevitzky Music Foundation with its offshoot, the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress. The foundation rounded out 25 years of service last year and is being honored in the next few weeks by Lincoln Center Festival '68 through the performance of works commissioned by the foundation.

The provocative injustice was the state of music publishing in Koussevitzky's native Russia. No copyright existed and composers were not paid for their works or given any royalties. Koussevitzky, with the help of his wife, Natalie, started his own publishing house in Berlin in 1909, and the Russian composers whose music it issued — Scriabin, Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Prokofiev — were compensated from the profits of the venture.

AFTER WORLD WAR I, Koussevitzky moved his by then famous Editions Russes to Paris. In 1942, when another World War had begun, Koussevitzky had turned the Boston Symphony into America's leading orchestra and the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was just getting under way, Natalie Koussevitzky died. As a "living memorial" to her, the conductor established the Koussevitzky Music Foundation with some money of his own, a sum later augmented by friends.

Its major purpose was the commissioning of scores, and the first offer went to Benjamin Britten, who was then going back to his embattled England. The results was the opera "Peter Grimes," which has proved as durable as any commission so far. It got the foundation's activities off to a healthy start.

In the 1947-48 season, the sale of Editions Russe to the English firm of Boosey and Hawkes was completed, and the money was used to set up the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress, which carried on the commissioning process. The autograph scores for all the commissioned works now rest there. In fact, until the library receives the score, the composer does not receive payment from the foundation.

The value of the Koussevitzky Foundations, aside from the creation of works that have earned a place in the regular repertory, has been in its continuity of service over a long period of time and in its disassociation from any performing organization.

Because of its permanence, the foundation makes no demands on the composer as to when his work should be completed.

(C) New York Times News Service

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JUN 23 1968 New England

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

JUL 14 1968 N Eng

INFURIATED WITH the trustees over the BSO's long unionization battle, he flirted with the Philharmonic and came very close to closing a contract. But the union fight was settled and he decided to stay on at Boston, largely I think because of Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center.

Koussevitzky was a man of strange contrasts, one who would go to great lenghts to help composers, who fought consistently for new music and who was capable of outrageous pettiness. What his foundation continues to do for new generations of composers remains as his greatest achievement.

If he was alive today and was able with his unusual faith and vision to assess and analyze the state of music, I feel sure he would do something about our odd situation.

Koussevitzky might well have evolved a plan for continous exposure of new works so that a young talent would have the chance of having his music played by a number of orchestras within a year or two of the premiere performance.

Since 1951 a great deal of worthwhile symphonic music has been written, but little has been given wide, intelligently planned exposure.

We live in a time when much importance is given to premieres but scant attention is paid to help the composer gain following performances.

If we had a group of dedicated symphony ensembles who would agree, through some kind of carefully worked out board of control, to perform a certain amount of new music every season and to guarantee a series of concerts of high quality scores, it would at least help to overcome a condition that has become so desperate that most new composers are simply not writing scores of symphonic proportion.

Leinsdorf Directs Bostonians Here

By ALLEN HUGHES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is certainly no stranger to New York, but since it is not in the habit of playing here in summer, its appearance at Philharmonic Hall last night was unusual.

It was fitting, however, that the Bostonians were here to participate in Lincoln Center's Festival '68. One of the festival's most interesting presentations has been a multiconcert tribute to Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and Serge Koussevitzky's American career was indissolubly linked with the Boston Symphony.

The program led last night by Erich Leinsdorf consisted of five works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation. They were (in the order played) Stravinsky's Ode (1943), Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana," Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra (1951), Ginastera's Piano Concerto (1961) and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra (1943).

Considerable Substance

The Boston Symphony gave the premieres of both the Stravinsky and Bartók works under Koussevitzky's direction in the nineteen-forties.

The Bartók became a 20th-century classic in the symphonic repertory during the brief quarter-century of its existence. Its musical substance is considerable, making it relatively easy listening for those whose taste for modern music is very advanced. And it provides a brilliant vehicle for orchestras and conductors. The work is, for instance, made to order for a virtuoso conductor such as Mr. Leinsdorf.

The Stravinsky is not a major or even an especially interesting composition, but it is music of quaity nonetheless and worth hearing on occasion.

Dallapiccola's work, based on excerpts from violin sonatas by Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770), presents a rather fascinating amalgam of 18th-century tunes and 20th-century musical treatments.

Silverstein Is Soloist

It pits the violin against a chamber orchestra dominated by winds and brass and is characterized by sophisticated contrapuntal variations and generally pungent sonorities. Joseph Silverstein was the excellent soloist.

The big hit of the evening with the audience was Ginastera's somewhat brash and altogether flashy Piano Concerto, which was played for all it was worth (and possibly a bit more) by João Carlos Martins, the Bazilian pianist. The composer was present to share the audience's rapturous applause.

Although Ginastera's compositional facility and instinct for writing to the popular taste are indisputable, one can wonder at times if there is much gold in all that glitter. But since the piece makes so many people so happy when they hear it, any doubts about its genuine worth are probably not worth raising at the present time.

UTICA OBSERVER DISPATCH
Sunday, August 4, 1968

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 510,495 SUN. 1,494,704

JUL 18 1968

Foundation Preserves Memory

By RAYMOND ERICSON
N. Y. Times News Service

NEW YORK—The memory of an injustice had far-reaching effects in the life of Serge Koussevitzky — and beyond that life. One effect is with us today the Koussevitzky Music Foundation with its offshoot, the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress. The Foundation rounded out 25 years of service last year and has been honored by Lincoln Center Festival '68 through the performance of works commissioned by the Foundation.

The provocative injustice was the state of music publishing in Koussevitzky's native Russia. No copyright existed and composers were not paid for their works or given any royalties. Koussevitzky, with the help of his wife, Natalie, started his own publishing house in Berlin in 1909, and the Russian composers whose music it issued — Scriabin, Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Prokofiev — were compensated from the profits of the venture.

• • •

AFTER WORLD WAR I, Koussevitzky moved his by then famous Editions Russes to Paris. In 1942, when another world war had begun, Koussevitzky had turned the Boston Symphony into America's leading orchestra and the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was just getting under way, Natalie Koussevizky died. As a "living memorial" to her, the conductor established the Koussevitzky Music Foundation with some money of its own, a sum later augmented by friends.

Its major purpose was the commissioning of scores, and the first offer went to Benjamin Britten, who was then going back to his embattled England. The result was the opera "Peter Grimes."

Boston Date at Philharmonic

NEW YORK—The Boston Symphony's program at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday (17) of commissions by the Koussevitzky Music Foundations will include the first work recorded by Erich. Leinsdorf as the orchestra's music director.

In addition to the piece, Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," released by RCA in January, 1963, the concert will include the current RCA chart performance of Ginestera's "Piano Concerto" with Joao Carlos Martins as soloist. The program also will contain Stravinsky's "Ode" and Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana for Violin and Orchestra" with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Both of these works were included in albums deleted from the Columbia catalog.

(Continued on page 33)

Boston Date

• Continued from page 31

Koussevitzky commissions also have been featured in Lincoln Center Festival '68 concerts by the New York Philharmonic under composers Leonard Bernstein, Gunther Schuller and Aaron Copland, the Pittsburgh Symphony under Andre Previn, and two chamber programs conducted by Richard Duffalo.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUL 20 1968

MUSIC AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 1968

Philharmonic Hall; July 17, 1968; Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's only concert in the Lincoln Center Festival consisted of four works commissioned by the Koussevitsky Foundation. Two of them, the Stravinsky Ode and the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra, had their premieres under Koussevitsky's direction in the nineteen forties. The Bartok Concerto has established itself in its short lifetime as a major contribution to twentieth-century music and is a work of considerable substance, vitality, and brilliance. It was given an authoritative and luminous performance by the orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf's skilled direction. The Dallapiccola work is based on four themes taken from the violin sonatas of Giuseppe Tartini (1692-1770). It is quite fantastic how these themes assert themselves in their twentieth-century guise. Joseph Silverstein was the able violin soloist pitted against a rather large cham-87.

SUNDAY CHAMBER CONCERTS

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., MONDAY, JULY 29, 1968

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Morning Chamber Music

The spirit of the 10.30 a. m. chamber-music concert in the Tanglewood theater was dampened by a grey overcast that produced three short showers which developed into a steady, warm drizzle by the end of the concert. (The afternoon was warm and sunny.)

But the grey atmosphere was oppropriate to most of the music. The Music Guild String Quartet played Bartok's Quartet No. 3 and Ravel's Quartet in F.

The players, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Max Winder, first violin; Gerald Gelbloom, second violin; Bernard Kadinoff, viola; Stephen Gerber, cello.

Benevolence Evident

Neither the weather nor the players seemed to be entirely in sympathy with the Haydn "Rider" quartet (Op. 74. No. 3), which opened the program, although no serious quibble is raised with the technical quality of the performance.

Aside from the tidy coordination displayed by the four players reflecting the talent for ensemble unanimity that infuses even the back-bench players of Boston's orchestra, the most evident characteristic of the quartet Sunday morning was benevolence.

It failed to show the aggression bordering on arrogance so often displayed by string quartets when essaying the dense textures, strong dynamics and variable rhythms of Ravel's only quartet and any of Bartok's quartets . . . in this case, the third.

Boston Sinfonietta

The result was supple music with a wry flavor — tasteful and satisfying.

Next Sunday morning the Boston Sinfonietta is scheduled to play music by Mozart, Bach and Dvorak.

Union 8-5-68

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Morning Chamber Music

Sunday morning George Zazofsky appeared at the 10.30 chamber music program in the Tanglewood theater with the Boston Sinfonietta, a string group made up of 12 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra plus a harpsichord player.

Hand Injured

Zazofsky has been missing all summer from his usual seat in the orchestra because of a serious cut on the third finger of his left (fingerboard) hand acquired while gardening.

But he is a concertmaster and driving force of the Sinfonietta and, well, the show must go on.

Sunday morning he played the solo part for Bach's A Minor Violin Concerto as well as issued the key signals for Mozart's K. 136 Divertimento and Benjamin Britten's "Variations on a theme of Frank Bridge."

Signals Start

The Sinfonietta plays without a conductor, but Zazofsky is obviously in charge. Like the first violinist in a string quartet, he signals from his chair to time the starts at crucial moments.

Otherwise the group played Sunday like an untended, well-oiled machine, smoothly and smartly.

More important, it played with taste and elegance, with musical expressiveness befitting a first-class chamber group.

Small Falters in Bach

The bandage on Zazofsky's finger kept reminding me of the painful hurdles he was leaping, but there was no evidence of strain (except, perhaps, to someone who is thoroughly aware of how he plays with 10 good fingers) until the third movement of the Bach concerto.

There was a small flurry of finger-falters at one point; it failed to erase the memory of the beauty of the sweet, singing tone with which he played the floating middle movement of Bach piece.

The Mozart which had started the program was exquisite and the Britten which ended it was notable, not only for its moments of beauty, but also for the technical unanimity of its 12 conductorless players while negotiating constantly-changing variations of dynamics and speeds.

Weekend's Best

Once again the Sunday morning program had produced some of the best sounds of the festival weekend.

The audience for the afternoon program was 7467, which, with the Saturday morning open rearsal, brought the week's total to 38,121.

* * *

Union 8-12-68

By R. C. HAMMERICH

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The Sunday Morning chamber-music session in the Tanglewood Theater (10.30) was presented as the seventh and last concert in this year's Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Basic Trends

Members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group which consists of first-desk players from the parent orchestra plus Richard Goode, pianist, presented four 20th century pieces requiring unusual combinations of instruments and which, in many ways, illustrate basic trends in contemporary American music.

The pieces were "Octandre" (1924) by Edgard Varese, "Due Concertante" (1966) by Ingolf Dahl, "Concerto for Nine Instruments " (1934) by Anton Webern and "Nonet" (1959) by Bohuslav Martinu.

The Varese piece was considerably more piquant and beguiling than many of its subsequent polytonal imitations; the Dahl piece was typical of the serialistic works involving disjunct techniques of harmony and time; the Webern piece, a modern classic, was surprisingly disappointing, as if the players were ill-rehearsed and out-of-phase with this sort of pointillistic delicacy; the Martinu was jazzy, haunting or dancing, depending upon which movement is referred to, and was closest of the four to the sort of music the retreating generation is accustomed to.

Once again I am induced to say that the high quality of music being presented at Tanglewood on Sunday mornings this summer is deserving of a far larger audience than that which seems to have the energy to appear . . . even with the free coffee being served as a courtesy by the society called 'The Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 27,[illegible]
AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Note of Glory Ends Chamber Concerts

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The Sunday morning chamber music series in the theater at Tanglewood ended in a blaze of glory with a superb performance of Brahm's trio for piano, violin and cello, Opus 8, which brought shouts from the audience, two-thirds of which stood up to express approval.

The players were Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello, both first-desk players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Richard Goode, pianist.

The trio is a big-time, heavyweight piece of great depth and it was played with a sensitivity and technical skill equal to its demands.

My reservations about the balance are probably a minority opinion. I felt that the weight of Goode's piano dominated the performance and frequently stole the attention when the score seemed to call for instrumental equality.

Overpowered by Piano

Silverstein's normally self-effacing violin tones, which blend so beautifully in small ensembles, were overpowered by the piano.

But there were, of course, many passages of supreme beauty and strength. It was a technical as well as esthetic victory because the very high humidity interfered with the stability of the strings.

Wind Quintet

The program opened with the cheerful allegro from Beethoven's "Duet in E Flat for Violin and Cello with Two Obligato Eyeglasses" played by Eskin and Burton Fine, viola. It is a lively piece full of give and take between the instruments and swapping of melodic line.

The middle work on the program was Irving Fine "Partita For Wind Quintet," played by the first-desk winds players of the Boston orchestra, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon and James Stagliano, horn.

It is a five-movement contemporary work chiefly characterized by a highly complex counterpoint and a sprightly, sometimes fussy, atmosphere.

All of the eight Sunday morning chamber concerts during this year's Berkshire Festival have been performed by varying combinations of members of the Boston orchestra, and all have been excellent.

I'm ready to defend the claim that some of the most satisfying music of the season has been heard here Sunday mornings.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Brahms also came in for a moment of particular glory at Sunday mornings chamber music concert, when violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode played the B major Trio with such a wealth of musical insight and feeling, nobility of taste, and instrumental resourcefullness as to make it one of the greatest chamber music performances I have ever heard.

Additional Chamber Concert reviews are included with reviews on pages 23, 30, 39 + 74.

SUNDAY CHAMBER CONCERTS

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., MONDAY, JULY 29, 1968

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Morning Chamber Music

The spirit of the 10.30 a. m. chamber-music concert in the Tanglewood theater was dampened by a grey overcast that produced three short showers which developed into a steady, warm drizzle by the end of the concert. (The afternoon was warm and sunny.)

But the grey atmosphere was oppropriate to most of the music. The Music Guild String Quartet played Bartok's Quartet No. 3 and Ravel's Quartet in F.

The players, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Max Winder, first violin; Gerald Gelbloom, second violin; Bernard Kadinoff, viola; Stephen Gerber, cello.

Benevolence Evident

Neither the weather nor the players seemed to be entirely in sympathy with the Haydn "Rider" quartet (Op. 74. No. 3), which opened the program, although no serious quibble is raised with the technical quality of the performance.

Aside from the tidy coordination displayed by the four players reflecting the talent for ensemble unanimity that infuses even the back-bench players of Boston's orchestra, the most evident characteristic of the quartet Sunday morning was benevolence.

It failed to show the aggression bordering on arrogance so often displayed by string quartets when essaying the dense textures, strong dynamics and variable rhythms of Ravel's only quartet and any of Bartok's quartets . . . in this case, the third.

Boston Sinfonietta

The result was supple music with a wry flavor —tasteful and satisfying.

Next Sunday morning the Boston Sinfonietta is scheduled to play music by Mozart, Bach and Dvorak.

Union 8-5-68

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Morning Chamber Music

Sunday morning George Zazofsky appeared at the 10.30 chamber music program in the Tanglewood theater with the Boston Sinfonietta, a string group made up of 12 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra plus a harpsichord player.

Hand Injured

Zazofsky has been missing all summer from his usual seat in the orchestra because of a serious cut on the third finger of his left (fingerboard) hand acquired while gardening.

But he is a concertmaster and driving force of the Sinfonietta and, well, the show must go on.

Sunday morning he played the solo part for Bach's A Minor Violin Concerto as well as issued the key signals for Mozart's K. 136 Divertimento and Benjamin Britten's "Variations on a theme of Frank Bridge."

Signals Start

The Sinfonietta plays without a conductor, but Zazofsky is obviously in charge. Like the first violinist in a string quartet, he signals from his chair to time the starts at crucial moments.

Otherwise the group played Sunday like an untended, well-oiled machine, smoothly and smartly.

More important, it played with taste and elegance, with musical expressiveness befitting a first-class chamber group.

Small Falters in Bach

The bandage on Zazofsky's finger kept reminding me of the painful hurdles he was leaping, but there was no evidence of strain (except, perhaps, to someone who is thoroughly aware of how he plays with 10 good fingers) until the third movement of the Bach concerto.

There was a small flurry of finger-falters at one point; it failed to erase the memory of the beauty of the sweet, singing tone with which he played the floating middle movement of Bach piece.

The Mozart which had started the program was exquisite and the Britten which ended it was notable, not only for its moments of beauty, but also for the technical unanimity of its 12 conductorless players while negotiating constantly-changing variations of dynamics and speeds.

Weekend's Best

Once again the Sunday morning program had produced some of the best sounds of the festival weekend.

The audience for the afternoon program was 7467, which, with the Saturday morning open rearsal, brought the week's total to 38,121.

* * *

Union 8-12-68

By R. C. HAMMERICH

* * *

Morning Chamber Music

The Sunday Morning chamber-music session in the Tanglewood Theater (10.30) was presented as the seventh and last concert in this year's Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Basic Trends

Members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group which consists of first-desk players from the parent orchestra plus Richard Goode, pianist, presented four 20th century pieces requiring unusual combinations of instruments and which, in many ways, illustrate basic trends in contemporary American music.

The pieces were "Octandre" (1924) by Edgard Varese, "Due Concertante" (1966) by Ingolf Dahl, "Concerto for Nine Instruments " (1934) by Anton Webern and "Nonet" (1959) by Bohuslav Martinu.

The Varese piece was considerably more piquant and beguiling than many of its subsequent polytonal imitations; the Dahl piece was typical of the serialistic works involving disjunct techniques of harmony and time; the Webern piece, a modern classic, was surprisingly disappointing, as if the players were ill-rehearsed and out-of-phase with this sort of pointillistic delicacy; the Martinu was jazzy, haunting or dancing, depending upon which movement is referred to, and was closest of the four to the sort of music the retreating generation is accustomed to.

Once again I am induced to say that the high quality of music being presented at Tanglewood on Sunday mornings this summer is deserving of a far larger audience than that which seems to have the energy to appear . . . even with the free coffee being served as a courtesy by the society called The Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

AUG 1968 New England Newsclip

Note of Glory Ends Chamber Concerts

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENO X — The Sunday morning chamber music series in the theater at Tanglewood ended in a blaze of glory with a superb performance of Brahm's trio for piano, violin and cello, Opus 8, which brought shouts from the audience, two-thirds of which stood up to express approval.

The players were Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello, both first desk players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Richard Goode, pianist.

The trio is a big-time, heavyweight piece of great depth and it was played with a sensitivity and technical skill equal to its demands.

My reservations about the balance are probably a minority opinion. I felt that the weight of Goode's piano dominated the performance and frequently stole the attention when the score seemed to call for instrumental equality.

Overpowered by Piano

Silverstein's normally self-effacing violin tones, which blend so beautifully in small ensembles, were overpowered by the piano.

But there were, of course, many passages of supreme beauty and strength. It was a technical as well as esthetic victory because the very high humidity interfered with the stability of the strings.

Wind Quintet

The program opened with the cheerful allegro from Beethoven's "Duet in E Flat for Violin and Cello with Two Obligato Eyeglasses" played by Eskin and Burton Fine, viola. It is a lively piece full of give and take between the instruments and swapping of melodic line.

The middle work on the program was Irving Fine "Partita For Wind Quintet," played by the first-desk wind players of the Boston orchestra: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon and James Stagliano, horn.

It is a five-movement contemporary work chiefly characterized by a highly complex counterpoint and a sprightly, sometimes fussy, atmosphere.

All of the eight Sunday morning chamber concerts during this year's Berkshire Festival have been performed by varying combinations of members of the Boston orchestra, and all have been excellent.

I'm ready to defend the claim that some of the most satisfying music of the season has been heard here Sunday mornings.

BOSTON GLOBE BOSTON, MASS. AUG 27 1968 Newsclip

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Brahms also came in for a moment of particular glory at Sunday mornings chamber music concert, when violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode played the B major Trio with such a wealth of musical insight and feeling, nobility of taste, and instrumental resourcefullness as to make it one of the greatest chamber music performances I have ever heard.

Additional Chamber Concert reviews are included with reviews on pages 23, 30, 39 & 74.

BLANK PAGE

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

1968

TANGLEWOOD

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

MAY 1968

The New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood will run from July 14 through August 25. The programs are designed to give music educators already active in the field, first-hand experience with aspects of twentieth century music.

Direct all inquiries to the Institute at Tanglewood, New England Conservatory of Music, 290 Huntington Avenue, Boston, Massachusetts 02115.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUL 16 1968 New England Newsclip

8.9.

Young Tanglewood Orchestra to Play at BU

047

The Tanglewood Young Artists Orchestra, comprised of mentalists from 22 states, will perform "Music for a Summer Evening" at the George Sherman Union of Boston p.m. Walter Eisenberg, asso- University on Thursday at 7 ciate professor of music at B.U., is the conductor.

Orchestra members are high school juniors and seniors selected to participate in the university's Tanglewood Institute, a cooperative effort by the university and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will be held in the courtyard of the union at 775 Commonwealth Ave. There will be no charge for admission.

The ARTS

Conducting fellows part of Berkshire success

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

LENOX — This Summer's conducting Fellows at the Berkshire Music Center, who shared a concert at the head of the BMC orchestra Thursday night, are part of a conspicuously successful program. The more celebrated alumni include Seiji Ozawa and Zuban Mehta.

Of the current crop, Michael Thomas, who posed the toughest challenge to himself and the orchestra with Schoenberg's Opus 16, seemed the most promising.

His reading of the "Five Pieces" was alert, incisive, and the playing he got from the orchestra, which so far this Summer is disappointing in comparison with past years, was extremely competent.

The second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite led by James Frazier, was held back and only slowly released, but the cumulative effect was intelligent and convincing.

Compared with Mozart's character or not, the vulgarity of Strauss' "Don Juan," is overwhelming, and it's hard to imagine his sexuality — the common denominator of all "Dóns" — ever cutting through the bombast and bluster.

Stefan Minde's performance gave a good account of the score, and would have been even better if transitional sections hadn't sagged so.

Ronald Stoffel, who led the "Siegfried Idyll," had firm control of the orchestra and no idea of what it might be made to do.

Wagner's opening phrases, for example, were played deadpan, uninflected and uninteresting, and far too much of the performance was the same.

Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass has much craft and makes a little go a long way, though as in so much Hindemith, the rhythmic element is painfully constipated.

It got a nice performance from Gerald Brown, with good brass playing and not-so-good string playing; though neither the work he chose nor any of the others (Schoenberg possibly excepted) answered questions that are vital, and that would have been asked beautifully by a Mozart symphony. This would have been a far tougher but more meaningful test.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUL 20 1968 New England Newsclip

Drumming Authority at Institute

LENOX — Desmund Tay, considered by critics as the world's foremost authority on African drumming, will make his first appearance in the United States as faculty member of the New England Conservatory's summer Tanglewood Institute this week, it is announced by the conservatory president, Gunther Schuller. Tay, who brings with him his own remarkable set of drums and rattles, will conduct a seminar in African music.

Featured on BBC

047

A native of the Volta Region of Ghana in West Africa, Tay is known throughout Africa nd Europe by the title of "Leading Master Drummer." He has been featured several times on stage and television, including a series on the London BBC's famed Third Programme.

He began his musical career while in the civil service in Accra, capital of Ghana, by teaching African music in his spare time in that city's British Council Center. A research scholarship brought him to the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London to study with the Rev. Fr. Jones. The result of this research was a two-volume study, African Music. Published in 1956, it is considered the definitive guide to the subject in the Western world.

The New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, a six-week course from July 14 to Aug. 25, is under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center and emphasizes trends in contemporary music for the benefit of music educators, composers, professional musicians and graduate students in music. Tay will join such distinguished colleagues as Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan; music educator Herbert Alper; jazz authorities David Baker and Gerald Coker; Robert Cogan, Harvey Phillips, John Heiss and Paul Zukofsky. The institute is under the direction of Donald Harris, assistant to Schuller for academic affairs.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 29 1968 New England Newsclip

FACULTY

*Victor Alpert, Librarian
Easley Blackwood, Composer, University of Chicago
†*Gino Cioffi, Principal clarinet
Aaron Copland, Conductor and Composer
Mario Davidovsky, Composer, Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center
†*Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal flute
†*Jules Eskin, Principal cello
†*Burton Fine, Principal viola
†*Everett Firth, Solo tympanist
Claude Frank, Concert pianist
†*Armando Ghitalla, Principal trumpet
†*William Gibson, Principal trombone
†*Ralph Gomberg, Principal oboe
Lillian Kallir, Concert pianist
Ernst Krenek, Composer
*Alfred Krips, Assistant Concertmaster
William Kroll, Head, Violin Department, Cleveland Institute
*Eugen Lehner, Violist
John Oliver, Conductor, Framingham Choral Society
†*Henry Portnoi, Principal bass
Gunther Schuller, Composer, Conductor, President of New England Conservatory
†*Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster
*Louis Speyer, English horn
†*James Stagliano, Principal French horn
*Roger Voisin, Principal trumpet, Boston Pops
†*Sherman Walt, Principal bassoon
James Whitaker, Registrar and Chief Coordinator, New England Conservatory
*Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra
*George Zazofsky, Violinist
*Alfred Zighera, Cellist
*Bernard Zighera, Principal harp
Paul Zukofsky, Violinist, and member of Contemporary Chamber Ensemble, Rutgers University

* Member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
† Member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

1968

TANGLEWOOD

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
MAY 1968

The New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood will run from July 14 through August 25. The programs are designed to give music educators already active in the field, first-hand experience with aspects of twentieth century music.

Direct all inquiries to the Institute at Tanglewood, New England Conservatory of Music, 290 Huntington Avenue, Boston, Massachusetts 02115.

8.9.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUL 16 1968 New England Newsclip

The ARTS

Conducting fellows part of Berkshire success

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

LENOX — This Summer's conducting Fellows at the Berkshire Music Center, who shared a concert at the head of the BMC orchestra Thursday night, are part of a conspicuously successful program. The more celebrated alumni include Seiji Ozawa and Zuban Mehta.

Of the current crop, Michael Thomas, who posed the toughest challenge to himself and the orchestra with Schoenberg's Opus 16, seemed the most promising.

His reading of the "Five Pieces" was alert, incisive, and the playing he got from the orchestra, which so far this Summer is disappointing in comparison with past years, was extremely competent.

The second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite led by James Frazier, was held back and only slowly released, but the cumulative effect was intelligent and convincing.

Compared with Mozart's character or not, the vulgarity of Strauss' "Don Juan," is overwhelming, and it's hard to imagine his sexuality — the common denominator of all "Dons" — ever cutting through the bombast and bluster.

Stefan Minde's performance gave a good account of the score, and would have been even better if transitional sections hadn't sagged so.

Ronald Stoffel, who led the "Siegfried Idyll," had firm control of the orchestra and no idea of what it might be made to do.

Wagner's opening phrases, for example, were played deadpan, uninflected and uninteresting, and far too much of the performance was the same.

Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass has much craft and makes a little go a long way, though as in so much Hindemith, the rhythmic element is painfully constipated.

It got a nice performance from Gerald Brown, with good brass playing and not-so-good string playing; though neither the work he chose nor any of the others (Schoenberg possibly excepted) answered questions that are vital, and that would have been asked beautifully by a Mozart symphony. This would have been a far tougher but more meaningful test

Young Tanglewood Orchestra to Play at BU

The Tanglewood Young Artists Orchestra, comprised of mentalists from 22 states, will perform "Music for a Summer Evening" at the George Sherman Union of Boston p.m. Walter Eisenberg, asso- University on Thursday at 7 ciate professor of music at B.U., is the conductor.

Orchestra members are high school juniors and seniors selected to participate in the university's Tanglewood Institute, a cooperative effort by the university and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will be held in the courtyard of the union at 775 Commonwealth Ave. There will be no charge for admission.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUL 20 1968 New England Newsclip

Drumming Authority at Institute

LENOX — Desmund Tay, considered by critics as the world's foremost authority on African drumming, will make his first appearance in the United States as faculty member of the New England Conservatory's summer Tanglewood Institute this week, it is announced by the conservatory president, Gunther Schuller. Tay, who brings with him his own remarkable set of drums and rattles, will conduct a seminar in African music.

Featured on BBC

A native of the Volta Region of Ghana in West Africa, Tay is known throughout Africa nd Europe by the title of "Leading Master Drummer." He has been featured several times on stage and television, including a series on the London BBC's famed Third Programme.

He began his musical career while in the civil service in Accra, capital of Ghana, by teaching African music in his spare time in that city's British Council Center. A research scholarship brought him to the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London to study with the Rev. Fr. Jones. The result of this research was a two-volume study, African Music. Published in 1956, it is considered the definitive guide to the subject in the Western world.

The New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, a six-week course from July 14 to Aug. 25, is under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center and emphasizes trends in contemporary music for the benefit of music educators, composers, professional musicians and graduate students in music. Tay will join such distinguished colleagues as Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan; music educator Herbert Alper; jazz authorities David Baker and Gerald Coker; Robert Cogan, Harvey Phillips, John Heiss and Paul Zukofsky. The institute is under the direction of Donald Harris, assistant to Schuller for academic affairs.

FACULTY

*Victor Alpert, Librarian
Easley Blackwood, Composer, University of Chicago
†*Gino Cioffi, Principal clarinet
Aaron Copland, Conductor and Composer
Mario Davidovsky, Composer, Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center
†*Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal flute
†*Jules Eskin, Principal cello
†*Burton Fine, Principal viola
†*Everett Firth, Solo tympanist
Claude Frank, Concert pianist
†*Armando Ghitalla, Principal trumpet
†*William Gibson, Principal trombone
†*Ralph Gomberg, Principal oboe
Lillian Kallir, Concert pianist
Ernst Krenek, Composer
*Alfred Krips, Assistant Concertmaster
William Kroll, Head, Violin Department, Cleveland Institute
*Eugen Lehner, Violist
John Oliver, Conductor, Framingham Choral Society
†*Henry Portnoi, Principal bass
Gunther Schuller, Composer, Conductor, President of New England Conservatory
†*Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster
*Louis Speyer, English horn
†*James Stagliano, Principal French horn
*Roger Voisin, Principal trumpet, Boston Pops
†*Sherman Walt, Principal bassoon
James Whitaker, Registrar and Chief Coordinator, New England Conservatory
*Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra
*George Zazofsky, Violinist
*Alfred Zighera, Cellist
*Bernard Zighera, Principal harp
Paul Zukofsky, Violinist, and member of Contemporary Chamber Ensemble, Rutgers University

* Member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
† Member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 29 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

GENERAL SEMINAR June 30–August 25
3 semester credits Cha
Peter Gram Swing,
Assisted by Stanley Sil
Open to performe
this seminar is inv number of meetir
topics as analysi music, selectio etc. Many music or cr
mentalists
Tuition
(May each

PI
6

...d others to be announced.
...dents, and amateurs. A
...sical horizons. A
... to discuss such
...standing of
... theory,
...ember

Silverstein conducts well

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

LENOX—Not many conducting careers have been launched from the concertmaster's desk, which is where Joseph Silverstein, who Thursday night led the first concert of this Summer's Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, usually sits. Most instrumentalists-turned conductors, rather, find their way to the podium from the keyboard (for example, Szell or Bernstein), though Silverstein's predecessor, Richard Burgin, was a skillful exception.

Silverstein's debut program, a no-nonsense affair that would have posted a real challenge to any full-time conductor, was well, if not ideally, served. He had the good sense to scrape some of the muck off Haydn's 96th Symphony, one more lavishly dirtied by 19th century editors and presented in Symphony Hall this past season in none-too-clean fashion. Not repeating the sins of his boss, Mr. Leinsdorf, silverstein kept the audience in suspense at the opening movements' false recapitulation for two silent measures rather than one, and in so doing didn't misrepresent one of Haydn's carefully planned harmonic puns. And in the trio there was, thank goodness, no trumpet stupidly doubling the oboe.

Though these details as well as ones of articulation were cleaned up, there was not much force of personality behind the performance. Matters of phrasing had obviously been taken care of in rehearsal, but anything going on beneath the surface was more or less unattended. This left not only accompanying voices unwatched, but didn't give much character to not-so obviously melodic lines, for example, the violin riffs in the finale that lead back to the opening theme.

Paganini, the story goes, was shown "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz and refused to play it, complaining that he wouldn't be active enough of the time. A more extended solo would have been welcome Thursday also, for Burton Fine, the BSO's principal violist, is a superb musician and an excellent violist. What he played, or rather what was heard, sounded first-rate. Balance with the soloist was a problem, for with all stops taken out the orchestra played with enormous, unneeded volume.

Balance within the group was problematic too; in the Serenade, for example, it was far too hard to pick out the blocks of woodwind articulation that break up the Pilgrim's Prayer. Again, too much attention seemed to be paid the obvious.

Stravinsky's revised "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" got a fine performance, though the closing pages were played at exactly half the indicated tempo. It was an idea that didn't work, and made lopsided a piece already teased with a quirky phrase structure. Aside from this, tempi were well-chosen, as in the other pieces, and the conducting was vigorous, if overly illustrative.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JUL 12 1968
New England Newsclip

CONTEMPORARY COMPOSITION
Exploratory compositions for various instruments and sonorities using 20th century techniques of pitch organization. Music written for class will be performed and evaluated by the class. Educational implications for all grade levels based on Bruner's "structure," post-holing, and other contemporary educational theories will be considered. The instructor will be Herbert Alper, Chairman of the Music Education Department.

SEMINAR RECENT IN THEORY
TECHN

ON-WESTERN MUSIC, JAZZ, ONS IN THE TEACHING OF DVANCED INSTRUMENTAL

African and Indian music with rmance techniques and their k of jazz improvisation and taining to jazz, one week s on the philosophical e and the performance
o weeks of advanced nt developments in s and their uses.
and performers ion of visiting

ART AND PAINTING
Eight Weeks: June 30–August 25
AWING AND PAINTING
Eight Weeks: June 30–August 25
drawing and painting will consist of study e, and landscape. The resident faculty will inguished artists Lennart Anderson, Herbert Morton Sacks. A series of visiting critics summer-school faculty in weekly lectures, group critiques. Among the participating will seminars, and guests will be the noted artists Leon Kroll and Vaclac Vytlacil.
Tuition — $480.00

ACTING WORKSHOP
...er credits Six Weeks: June 30–August 10
Selected student nonprofessional actors will have the opportunity of auditioning for the acting company that will rehearse and perform the new scripts submitted to the Symposium-Workshop for Playwrights. Advanced acting problems will be considered. The Workshop will be conducted by Theodore Kazanoff.
Tuition — $250.00

DANCE
Director: Joseph Gifford
Guest-Artist: Mary Anthony
Teaching Associate: Meli Davis
DANCE WORKSHOP
3 semester credits
This Work
imagina tech
...: Weeks: June 30–August 10
...es on the physical, ki-
the dancer, inc
...t studies
...ositi

THEATRE
SYMPOSIUM-WORKSHOP FOR PLAYWRIGHTS
Four writers with promising scripts will be in residence. Under the direction of a group of distinguished theatre artists, they will constitute a symposium concerned with effective writing for the stage. Portions of scripts will be placed in rehearsal with theatrical ... actors. Emphasis ... from the ...

YONKERS HERALD STATESMAN
Saturday, August 10, 1968

Two From Yonkers Accepted By Choir

ROBERT PUELO

Robert A. Lebhar of 908 N. Broadway, a tenor with the Grace Church Choir, New York City, and Robert Puelo of 412-13 N. Broadway, a chorister with the Church of the Transfiguration Choir, New York City, have been accepted as members of the Berkshire Boys Choir at Lenox, Mass., now in its second season.

The 1968 choir consists of 46 treble boys, chosen after highly competitive auditions, and 14 professional adult singers. They have been divided into two groups, the concert choir and the cathedral choir. Musical standards of both groups are identical, with membership in each group determined solely by the age of the boys.

Under the musical direction of Brian Runnet, one of England's foremost choirmasters, the Berkshire Boy Choir has already appeared this summer at the music festivals in Hartford, Conn, Castle Hill at Ipswich, Mass., Bydenwood at Reading, Pa., and at the universities of Rhode Island, Rutgers, Syracuse, and the State University of New York at Potsdam.

Performances are also scheduled at the Saratoga Festival, the National Cathedral in Washington, the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, and Lincoln Center in New York.

NE

...ing
...n regard
...s dance.
...elop a unified

VOICE SEMINAR
6 semester credits Eight Weeks: June 30–August 25
Mac Morgan, Chairman
Assisted by Mary Davenport, Chloe Owen, Wilma Thompson and Robert Gartside.
Vocal soloists appearing with the Symphony will be guests at the seminar.
A concentrated study and performance of recital repertoire, this seminar is open to students and teachers above intermediate level by audition only. The areas of specialized study will include songs and arias by Bach, Mozart, and Handel; German lieder; the French chanson; and contemporary English and American song literature.
Tuition — $480.00

ROBERT A. LEBHAR

Krenek: Two Wars And Two Continents

By MARTIN BERNHEIMER
The Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – In Vienna they awarded him just about every official honor a city can give a composer. In Minneapolis they organized a special music festival in his name. In Regensburg and Salzburg they recently revived an opera of his, following the example of Hamburg and Munich. In Prague they invited him, just last month, to conduct a program of his own works. In Tanglewood, this summer, they will call upon his services as composer-in-residence. At the forthcoming Ravinia Festival, they will present one of his major new works. At Dartmouth College's Webern Festival, they will unveil another new piece, plus an older chamber opera.

And in Southern California, where he has lived since 1947, Ernst Krenek continues to be ignored.

It hardly seems possible that a composer of Krenek's stature could live and work here for two decades without making his presence felt. But such would seem to be the case.

Some might argue that Krenek's neglect can be blamed on his own musical posture. He is, after all, an uncompromising modernist with little patience for easy effects of instant popularity. He does not write music designed primarily to entertain.

His creative course has been charted with regard neither for shocking fashion nor for fashionable shock.

In the final analysis, however, such arguments falter. Krenek has made too strong an impact on the rest of the musical world despite his complexity, to justify local dismissal on grounds of inaccessibility. In a day that permits and encourages electronic experimentation, chance composition, musical happenings, and psychedelic chaos, Krenek's intellectually-oriented language actually might be labeled old-fashioned.

The basically conservative Los Angeles Philharmonic has ventured some vehicles "further-out" than the average Krenek opus. Significantly, however, the L.A. orchestra has acknowledged Krenek's existence only once: when it scheduled the Cello Concerto, at the instigation of cellist Margaret Aue (to whom the work is dedicated) back in 1954.

Krenek's international career began when the Austrian-born composer and his century were both 27 years old. The work that marked his declaration of creative independence was a jazzy, satirical opera called "Jonny Spielt Auf," which enlivened 100 European stages and even made it to the Metropolitan Opera in 1929. At that time, the title role was played in blackface by Michael Bohnen and Lawrence Tibbett. When the work was revived this season in Salzburg, after decades of neglect, Jonny was played for the first time by a baritone (from Georgia) who needed no special makeup for the role. Reality had finally caught up with Krenek's imagination.

The peculiar language of "Jonny" turned out to be a good deal less than permanent. So, for that matter, did the post-romantic accent that had preceded it. The definitive Krenek idiom must be traced to (or associated with) Schoenberg, Berg and Webern in Austria; Hindemith in Germany. The bulk of Krenek's mature output involves various original applications of serial principles.

It was "Charles V," Krenek's first important 12-tone effort (1933), that aroused the first serious protests against his work. The Nazis branded Krenek as a "cultural bolshevik," and in 1938 drove him out of the country.

In America, the outcast concentrated at first on teaching – at Vassar, Michigan, Wisconsin, Hamline University in St. Paul, Minn., the University of New Mexico, Chicago Musical College, and, eventually, Los Angeles City and State Colleges. His educational activities here might have continued, had bureaucracy not demanded he go back to school to earn a "proper teaching credential."

Krenek is blessed with a fine, dry sense of humor, but, somehow, the comical aspects of this demand managed to escape his appreciation.

Academia's loss should have been the opus-catalogue's gain, but Krenek stopped using opus numbers after his 96th work. For those who are still counting, he has now produced well over 130 compositions, in just about every conceivable term.

Although whimsy is not the first quality one automatically associates with Krenek, it is worth noting that, in 1947, he concocted a setting of "The Santa Fe Timetable." In it, a chorus recites the names of all the railroad stations between Albuquerque and Los Angeles.

It is difficult to speak of a typical Krenek attitude because the composer has never been content to concentrate exclusively on a single manner of expression. Romantic traits may appear in the midst of what one would like to label the 12-tone period. Atonality may give way, temporarily, to distinct key orentation. Krenek is not a composer who settles for a single answer for all possible problems. He commands the sort of intellect that probes continually, and adapts resources to the needs of the problem at hand.

He disdains "the false simplicity now rampant in much of contemporary music," just as he disdains safe compositional cliches. Despite his popular "cerebral" image, he is very much a man of the theater, a musician who came to early prominence through staging and conducting experiences in opera.

He writes his own librettos, expresses a special fondness for combining comedy and tragedy in unexpected ratios, and injects traces of social and political conscience into much of his output. In "Der Goldene Bock" (1964), for instance, he retold the story of Jason and the Golden Fleece in a disarming, personalized manner that embraced mythology, 20th century satire, moral introspection, and lowbrow humor all at the same time. He did so, by the way, within a tight, subtly inflected, non-expansive but engrossing musical framework. The work, commissioned by the Hamburg Opera, deserves an American hearing.

Krenek cannot be overjoyed by the local reception of his muse, but he is remarkably philosophical about it. He has moved from Tujunga, on the northern rim of Los Angeles, to Palm Springs, where he thrives on "sun-worship, and the absence of water and trees." He enjoys occasional visits to Los Angeles, where he pays homage to doctors, dentists and movie houses. He enjoys living here, in other words, and long ago stopped regarding home as a place to hear his music.

It is somewhat difficult for us to be as even-tempered about the situation. Krenek is not the only resident of importance currently neglected by our musical establishment, but he is one of the most obvious ones. His importance and the degree of our self-imposed loss are nicely verbalized by the Austrian musicologist Hans Redlich.

Krenek's music, Redlich says, "reflects unmistakably all the different phases of European music between the two World Wars. In its best works it reflects the resilience, resourcefulness and elasticity of its age. In its weakest compositions, it forcibly indicates the wavering and undecided attitude of a period unable to correlate art and life. Taken as a whole, Krenek's music shows an almost encyclopedic cross-section through all the artistic aspirations of the century."

BLOOMINGTON, IND.
TRIBUNE AND STAR-COURIER
SUN.-CIRC N.AVAIL.
JUL 7 1968

MUSIC

GENERAL SEMINAR June 30–August 25
3 semester credits Cha
Peter Gram Swing,
Assisted by Stanley Sil
Open to perform
this seminar is int number of mecti
topics as analysi music, selectio
etc. Many music or cr mentalists
Tuition
(May each

PU
6

...d others to be announced.
...dents, and amateurs.
...sical horizons. A
... to discuss such
...standing of
... theory,
...ber

CONTEMPORARY COMPOSITION
Exploratory compositions for various instruments and sonorities using 20th century techniques of pitch organization. Music written for class will be performed and evaluated by the class. Educational implications for all grade levels based on Bruner's "structure," post-holing, and other contemporary educational theories will be considered. The instructor will be Herbert Alper, Chairman of the Music Education Department.

SEMINAR ... MUSIC, JAZZ, RECENT ... OF THEORY IN ... INSTRUMENTAL TECH... ADVANCED

African and Indian music with ...rmance techniques and their ...k of jazz improvisation and ...taining to jazz, one week ...s on the philosophical ... and the performance ...o weeks of advanced ...nt developments in ...s and their uses ...and performers ...tion of visiting

ART

...G AND PAINTING
Eight Weeks: June 30–August 25

...AWING AND PAINTING
Eight Weeks: June 30–August 25
... drawing and painting will consist of study ...e, and landscape. The resident faculty will ...inguished artists Lennart Anderson, Herbert ... Morton Sacks. A series of visiting critics ... summer-school faculty in weekly lectures, ... group critiques. Among the participating ... will be the noted artists Leon Kroll and Vaclac Vytlacil.
Tuition — $480.00

Silverstein conducts well

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

LENOX—Not many conducting careers have been launched from the concertmaster's desk, which is where Joseph Silverstein, who Thursday night led the first concert of this Summer's Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, usually sits. Most instrumentalists-turned conductors, rather, find their way to the podium from the keyboard (for example, Szell or Bernstein), though Silverstein's predecessor, Richard Burgin, was a skillful exception.

Silverstein's debut program, a no-nonsense affair that would have posted a real challenge to any full-time conductor, was well, if not ideally, served. He had the good sense to scrape some of the muck off Haydn's 96th Symphony, one more lavishly dirtied by 19th century editors and presented in Symphony Hall this past season in none-too-clean fashion. Not repeating the sins of his boss, Mr. Leinsdorf, silverstein kept the audience in suspense at the opening movements' false recapitulation for two silent measures rather than one, and in so doing didn't misrepresent one of Haydn's carefully planned harmonic puns. And in the trio there was, thank goodness, no trumpet stupidly doubling the oboe.

Though these details as well as ones of articulation were cleaned up, there was not much force of personality behind the performance. Matters of phrasing had obviously been taken care of in rehearsal, but anything going on beneath the surface was more or less unattended. This left not only accompanying voices unwatched, but didn't give much character to not-so obviously melodic lines, for example, the violin riffs in the finale that lead back to the opening theme.

Paganini, the story goes, was shown "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz and refused to play it, complaining that he wouldn't be active enough of the time. A more extended solo would have been welcome Thursday also, for Burton Fine, the BSO's principal violist, is a superb musician and an excellent violist. What he played, or rather what was heard, sounded first-rate. Balance with the soloist was a problem, for with all stops taken out the orchestra played with enormous, unneeded volume.

Balance within the group was problematic too; in the Serenade, for example, it was far too hard to pick out the blocks of woodwind articulation that break up the Pilgrim's Prayer. Again, too much attention seemed to be paid the obvious.

Stravinsky's revised "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" got a fine performance, though the closing pages were played at exactly half the indicated tempo. It was an idea that didn't work, and made lopsided a piece already teased with a quirky phrase structure. Aside from this, tempi were well-chosen, as in the other pieces, and the conducting was vigorous, if overly illustrative.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JUL 12 1968
New England Newsclip

ACTING WORKSHOP
...er credits Six Weeks: June 30–August 10
Selected student nonprofessional actors will have the opportunity of auditioning for the acting company that will rehearse and perform the new scripts submitted to the Symposium-Workshop for Playwrights. Advanced acting problems will be considered. The Workshop will be conducted by Theodore Kazanoff.
Tuition — $250.00

DANCE

Director: Joseph Gifford
Guest-Artist: Mary Anthony
Teaching Associate: Meli Davis

DANCE WORKSHOP
3 semester credits ... Weeks: June 30–August 10
This Workshop ... ses on the physical, ki... the dancer, inc... t studies ... osit...

THEATRE

SYMPOSIUM-WORKSHOP FOR PLAYWRIGHTS
Four writers with promising scripts will be in residence. Under the direction of a group of distinguished theatre artists, they will constitute a symposium concerned with effective writing for the stage. Portions of scripts representing a variety of theatrical ... will be placed in rehearsal ... actors. Emphasis ... from the ...

YONKERS HERALD STATESMAN
Saturday, August 10, 1968

Two From Yonkers Accepted By Choir

ROBERT PUELO

Robert A. Lebhar of 908 N. Broadway, a tenor with the Grace Church Choir, New York City, and Robert Puelo of 412-13 N. Broadway, a chorister with the Church of the Transfiguration Choir, New York City, have been accepted as members of the Berkshire Boys Choir at Lenox, Mass., now in its second season.

The 1968 choir consists of 46 treble boys, chosen after highly competitive auditions, and 14 professional adult singers. They have been divided into two groups, the concert choir and the cathedral choir. Musical standards of both groups are identical, with membership in each group determined solely by the age of the boys.

Under the musical direction of Brian Runnet, one of England's foremost choirmasters, the Berkshire Boy Choir has already appeared this summer at the music festivals in Hartford, Conn, Castle Hill at Ipswich, Mass., Bydenwood at Reading, Pa., and at the universities of Rhode Island, Rutgers, Syracuse, and the State University of New York at Potsdam.

Performances are also scheduled at the Saratoga Festival, the National Cathedral in Washington, the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, and Lincoln Center in New York.

NE

...ing
...ar regard
...lop a unified
... dance.

VOICE SEMINAR
6 semester credits Eight Weeks: June 30–August 25
Mac Morgan, Chairman
Assisted by Mary Davenport, Chloe Owen, Wilma Thompson and Robert Gartside.
Vocal soloists appearing with the Symphony will be guests at the seminar.
A concentrated study and performance of recital repertoire, this seminar is open to students and teachers above intermediate level by audition only. The areas of specialized study will include songs and arias by Bach, Mozart, and Handel; German lieder; the French chanson; and contemporary English and American song literature.
Tuition — $480.00

ROBERT A. LEBHAR

Krenek: Two Wars And Two Continents

By MARTIN BERNHEIMER
The Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – In Vienna they awarded him just about every official honor a city can give a composer. In Minneapolis they organized a special music festival in his name. In Regensburg and Salzburg they recently revived an opera of his, following the example of Hamburg and Munich. In Prague they invited him, just last month, to conduct a program of his own works. In Tanglewood, this summer, they will call upon his services as composer-in-residence. At the forthcoming Ravinia Festival, they will present one of his major new works. At Dartmouth College's Webern Festival, they will unveil another new piece, plus an older chamber opera.

And in Southern California, where he has lived since 1947, Ernst Krenek continues to be ignored.

It hardly seems possible that a composer of Krenek's stature could live and work here for two decades without making his presence felt. But such would seem to be the case.

Some might argue that Krenek's neglect can be blamed on his own musical posture. He is, after all, an uncompromising modernist with little patience for easy effects of instant popularity. He does not write music designed primarily to entertain.

His creative course has been charted with regard neither for shocking fashion nor for fashionable shock.

In the final analysis, however, such arguments falter. Krenek has made too strong an impact on the rest of the musical world despite his complexity, to justify local dismissal on grounds of inaccessibility. In a day that permits and encourages electronic experimentation, chance composition, musical happenings, and psychedelic chaos, Krenek's intellectually-oriented language actually might be labeled old-fashioned.

The basically conservative Los Angeles Philharmonic has ventured some vehicles "further-out" than the average Krenek opus. Significantly, however, the L.A. orchestra has acknowledged Krenek's existence only once: when it scheduled the Cello Concerto, at the instigation of cellist Margaret Aue (to whom the work is dedicated) back in 1954.

Krenek's international career began when the Austrian-born composer and his century were both 27 years old. The work that marked his declaration of creative independence was a jazzy, satirical opera called "Jonny Spielt Auf," which enlivened 100 European stages and even made it to the Metropolitan Opera in 1929. At that time, the title role was played in blackface by Michael Bohnen and Lawrence Tibbett. When the work was revived this season in Salzburg, after decades of neglect, Jonny was played for the first time by a baritone (from Georgia) who needed no special makeup for the role. Reality had finally caught up with Krenek's imagination.

The peculiar language of "Jonny" turned out to be a good deal less than permanent. So, for that matter, did the post-romantic accent that had preceded it. The definitive Krenek idiom must be traced to (or associated with) Schoenberg, Berg and Webern in Austria; Hindemith in Germany. The bulk of Krenek's mature output involves various original applications of serial principles.

It was "Charles V," Krenek's first important 12-tone effort (1933), that aroused the first serious protests against his work. The Nazis branded Krenek as a "cultural bolshevik," and in 1938 drove him out of the country.

In America, the outcast concentrated at first on teaching – at Vassar, Michigan, Wisconsin, Hamline University in St. Paul, Minn., the University of New Mexico, Chicago Musical College, and, eventually, Los Angeles City and State Colleges. His educational activities here might have continued, had bureaucracy not demanded he go back to school to earn a "proper teaching credential."

Krenek is blessed with a fine, dry sense of humor, but, somehow, the comical aspects of this demand managed to escape his appreciation.

Academia's loss should have been the opus-catalogue's gain, but Krenek stopped using opus numbers after his 96th work. For those who are still counting, he has now produced well over 130 compositions, in just about every conceivable term.

Although whimsy is not the first quality one automatically associates with Krenek, it is worth noting that, in 1947, he concocted a setting of "The Santa Fe Timetable." In it, a chorus recites the names of all the railroad stations between Albuquerque and Los Angeles.

It is difficult to speak of a typical Krenek attitude because the composer has never been content to concentrate exclusively on a single manner of expression. Romantic traits may appear in the midst of what one would like to label the 12-tone period. Atonality may give way, temporarily, to distinct key orentation. Krenek is not a composer who settles for a single answer for all possible problems. He commands the sort of intellect that probes continually, and adapts resources to the needs of the problem at hand.

He disdains "the false simplicity now rampant in much of contemporary music," just as he disdains safe compositional cliches. Despite his popular "cerebral" image, he is very much a man of the theater, a musician who came to early prominence through staging and conducting experiences in opera.

He writes his own librettos, expresses a special fondness for combining comedy and tragedy in unexpected ratios, and injects traces of social and political conscience into much of his output. In "Der Goldene Bock" (1964), for instance, he retold the story of Jason and the Golden Fleece in a disarming, personalized manner that embraced mythology, 20th century satire, moral introspection, and lowbrow humor all at the same time. He did so, by the way, within a tight, subtly inflected, non-expansive but engrossing musical framework. The work, commissioned by the Hamburg Opera, deserves an American hearing.

Krenek cannot be overjoyed by the local reception of his muse, but he is remarkably philosophical about it. He has moved from Tujunga, on the northern rim of Los Angeles, to Palm Springs, where he thrives on "sun-worship, and the absence of water and trees." He enjoys occasional visits to Los Angeles, where he pays homage to doctors, dentists and movie houses. He enjoys living here, in other words, and long ago stopped regarding home as a place to hear his music.

It is somewhat difficult for us to be as even-tempered about the situation. Krenek is not the only resident of importance currently neglected by our musical establishment, but he is one of the most obvious ones. His importance and the degree of our self-imposed loss are nicely verbalized by the Austrian musicologist Hans Redlich.

Krenek's music, Redlich says, "reflects unmistakably all the different phases of European music between the two World Wars. In its best works it reflects the resilience, resourcefulness and elasticity of its age. In its weakest compositions, it forcibly indicates the wavering and undecided attitude of a period unable to correlate art and life. Taken as a whole, Krenek's music shows an almost encyclopedic cross-section through all the artistic aspirations of the century."

BLOOMINGTON, IND.
TRIBUNE AND STAR-COURIER
SUN.-CIRC N.AVAIL.
JUL 7 1968

FADED TEXT

91.

JERZY SAPIEJEWSKI

Theater News and Views

Tanglewood Impresses Young Polish Composer

"Musical life in the United States is very exciting." That's the view of a young Polish composer who has just completed a Koussevitzky Memorial Fellowship in composition at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood.

The composer, Jerzy Sapiejewski, 23, has found particularly interesting the wide variety of music offered in this country. The U.S. is so large, he observed, that there's a public for just about every kind of music, and every major composer has a following. In a smaller country, like Poland, some composers do not have their works performed very often.

Professional Approach

Commenting on his experience at the Berkshire Music Center, Sapiejewski said:

"Things are done faster here than in Poland. The work is on a very high level and stresses the professional approach."

In Poland, he said, studies put more emphasis on enjoying music. He found a little trouble at first in adjusting to the fast pace of life, including musical education, in the U.S.

"The orchestral approach is different," he declared. "Here it's precise. Musicians work hard and fast to prepare a program."

More Time

In Poland the approach is less precise, less mechanical and with more time to prepare.

Because of greater competition, Sapiejewski felt that launching a musical career in the U.S. is more difficult than in Poland. And unless a person wins scholarships, the cost of education is high, while in Poland it is state - subsidized.

Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center are known to musicians in Poland for their high standards. Study at the center is considered an important plus in a musical career, Sapiejewski said.

In Poland Sapiejewski studied at the conservatory in Gdansk. He came to this country in 1967, was a student at the Berklee School of Music in Boston, and hopes to continue his education in this country.

Experimental Ensemble

For two years in Poland he led an experimental chamber ensemble that performed his music, and he won a first prize at the Wroclaw jazz festival in 1966 for a composition containing jazz elements.

Sapiejewski has had his works performed in major Polish cities, broadcast over Polish radio and television as well as other European networks, the Voice of America and radio stations in New York and Boston. He has also written music criticism.

His pianist wife, Nina, also studied at the Berkshire Music Center this summer under a full scholarship. Mrs. Sapiejewski has appeared with the Baltic Symphony in Gdansk, Poland, and has given solo recitals over the Polish radio, a New York station, and in Canada and the U.S. She holds a master's degree from the conservatory in Sopot, Poland.

The Sapiejewskis shared the honors of Polish husband - wife musical team at the Berkshire Music Center with Alexander Ciechanski and his wife, Maria. The former was a concert master with the Warsaw Philharmonic and was also a cellist with the Warsaw Quintet. His wife is a conductor.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,434

SEP 6 New England Newsclip

Kroll Concert At Tanglewood

William Kroll will present a violin concert Saturday afternoon at 2:30 in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall. Mr. Kroll will be accompanied by Arthur Balsam.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsclip

sight and sound

Mefano Talks on France, Music

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

LENOX—Paul Mefano is not typical of the young composers studying at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this year. He is 30, has a seven-year-old daughter, is constantly in motion and speaks at a speed nearly beyond comprehension.

He likes to talk about France as well as his music, and the other day, with the help of a friend, I tried to understand some of his high-speed, French-flavored English as he talked about the student-labor rebellion in his home country.

French Are Anarchist

Although he didn't say so specifically, his comments indicated that the French people may have an incurable source of rebellion.

"The French are anarchist," he said, suggesting that they tend to object to authoritative control whereever it may be.

"There is unrest against the old systems everywhere," he said, especially among the students who say the educational establishment is out of date and among labor which is asking for a 40-hour week and the reestablishment of social security.

The recent rebellion was "absolutely without organization," he said, which supports the claim that the student rebels dislike the Communists because they are too doctrinaire as well as the suggestion that the tendency toward anarachy may contribute to the situation which, in turn, creates anarchists.

Students' Complaints

The students complain, he said, because: 1, there are not enough teachers (college lectures have 200-300 students); 2, the pay for professionals (graduates) is low; 3, an arbitrary system of examination eliminates too many good students; 4, graduates grow old before they become eligible to become teachers; 5, the curriculum is not kept up to date (Mefano is a graduate of the Conservatory of Paris, but he had to go to Switzerland to study contemporary music).

Another indication of the academic anarchy of the French is that the student rebellion offered no solutions, Mefano, said. It merely pointed out the problems.

"Nobody blames DeGaulle," said Mefano, indicating, also, that no one knows who can take his place. It was no surprise in France, he said, that DeGaulle won the election held soon after the rebellion.

But now Mefano is surrounded by the peacefulness of Tanglewood as he prepares to present his composition, "Lingnes" (Lines), during a concert Thursday.

It is a piece for brass, percussion and voice, he said, without attempting to indicate what it sounds like.

Mefano is one of the current composers working in a style which has evolved from total-serialism.

He likes to begin with a "seed," he says, referring to a little package of musicial materials which he develops by a "more or less" predetermined plan into long pieces, preferrably for large orchestras.

His attempts to indicate the philosophical shape of his music resulted in the following phrases which I find in my notes: "Every cell is related to its structure" . . . "it's like James Joyce . . . 'Finnegan's Wake'" . . . "Rimbaud said, 'organize the chaos' " "to live in the eternity of a flash."

Sooner or later the problem of making the music gets down to the series of decisions on the ingredients of the "seed."

These decisions, Mefano said, involve such things as density, placement, time, dynamics, pitch, rhythms. That means, in turn, how many sounds are to occur simultaneously, where they are to be placed in time, how long they are to last in time, volume, fragmentation of pitches and rhythms and, of course, choices of timbres.

I haven't heard his music but, if it is similar to that of his sympathetic contemporaries, it is emotionally shallow and intellectually fascinating.

PAUL MEFANO

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
D. 18,000

JUN 15 1968

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,434

AUG 14 1968 New England Newsclip

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 137,093

SEP 10 1968

WE'VE GOT A WINNER! Young Nam Kim, violin student of Prof. Louis Krasner at Syracuse University, accepts the 1968 Joseph Silverstein Prize from, right, Louis Speyer, assistant director of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., and, left, Harry Krant, center administrator. The award was presented to the Korean-born musician for being the outstanding violinist this summer at the center where he has been studying on fellowships since 1966. He also served as concertmaster of the center's orchestra.

Tanglewood's Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bershire Music Center opens its 1968 session at Tanglewood on Sunday June 30 a few days prior to the Orchestra's first Berkshire Festival concert. The Music Center again will be under the direction of the Boston Symphony's Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, and it will continue this summer with two distinct programs formulated several years ago by Leinsdorf.

In the Fellowship Program are 150 pre-professional instrumentalists, singers, conductors, and composers studying and performing chamber and orchestra music. Each of the Fellows enrolled in this program receives a stipend for his summer's work at Tanglewood.

The Tanglewood Institute held under the auspices of the Music Center, given by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. The University offers music courses for advanced high school instrumentalists and other courses in drama, art, and the dance. The Conservatory gives two programs for music educators. All Tanglewood Institute courses will offer the option of college credit.

Louis Speyer serves as assistant director of the Berkshire Music Center with Joseph Silverstein as chairman of the faculty. Gunther Schuller is head of Contemporary Music Activities and Charles Wilson is head of the Vocal Department. Many of the faculty are principles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Members of the Fellowship Program will give 12 concerts of chamber music and there will be seven concerts by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra conducted by Leinsdorf, Aaron Copland, and Schuller, Silverstein, and Wilson. A huge number of chamber music and choral programs are also scheduled for performance by the Tanglewood Fellows.

The Festival of Contemporary American Music, held in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, will be held from August 4 through 10. A special feature of this summer's Contemporary Festival will be the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra's performance of Arnold Schoenberg's Die Gluckliche Hand conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Four composers, Mark Devoto, William McKinley, Stanley Silverman, and Richard Trythall, have been commissioned to write new music to be premiered during the Contemporary Festival. Schuller will direct two Composers Forums featuring works by the Music Center's composition Fellows.

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual benefit program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Music Center, is scheduled for August 21.

92.

15 Bay State Girls Get Music Scholarships

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Fifteen Massachusetts girls have received Young Artists Awards music scholarships for 1968-1969, totaling $4,800.

These include two $450 fellowships for study this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Currently studying at the center under Young Artists Awards grants are Jo Ann Lanier, soprano, and Martha Kolden, violinist, both of Cambridge.

Four young women are new recipients of regular $300 scholarships.

They are Sherryl Roy of 2 Highfield Drive, South Lancaster, a freshman at Pacific Union College, Angwin, Cal., Jane Gorden of Gould Road, Ware, a freshman at the University of Connecticut; Beverly Revzin of 10 Berkshire St., Worcester, a freshman at the New England Conservatory of Music; and Christine Kaloustian of Sterling St., Lancaster, a sophomore at Peabody Conservatory of Music, Baltimore, Md.

Renewal awards have been made to Maria Lehoux of Gardner, Nancy Lovell of Fitchburg, Elaine Freedman of 25 S. Lenox St., Elizabeth Lamson of 25 Wabash Ave., Georgeann Peterson of South Lancaster, Paula Christensen of Grafton, Margaret Lemoine of 8 Leon St., Marlene Dacri of W. Boylston, and Janet Thornton of Somerset.

This year's awards bring to $75,000 the value of scholarships given since the Young Artists Awards were established 16 years ago by an anonymous fund.

Auditions for new scholarships were held June 6 at 45 West Hill Drive. Judges were Abraham Kaminsky of the music department, State College at Worcester; J. Gerald Phillips, organist at St. Peter's Church; and Raymond Morin, chairman.

The last time we saw Ruth St. Denis dance was July 4, 1959. It was at Jacob's Pillow, the famed dance festival at Lee, founded by her husband Ted Shawn in 1931.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

During the previous 20 years, Miss St. Denis and Shawn traveled all over the world demonstrating the dance system that is now known as Denishawn.

It was the most vital force in dance development since the enormous influence exercized by the great Isadora Duncan.

They came to an amiable parting of the artistic ways. Miss St. Denis explored further the relation of religion and the dance. Shawn set out to establish dancing as an acceptable profession for a man in the United States.

Miss St. Denis soon founded a Society of the Spiritual Arts, membership of which was made up of people who were interested in dancing as an expression of religion.

At Riverside Church in New York City she gave her "Masque of Mary," the story of the Nativity. Two clergymen read the scriptures, Miss Denis and her group danced, and the choir sang.

There were many indignant letters that included the work "Blasphemy."

For his part, Shawn made history in 1933 at the old Repertory Theater on Huntington Ave. in Boston when he presented the first all-male dance group in the United States.

They barnstormed the country for the next seven years.

In 1959, Miss St. Denis gave seven performances during the week at Jacob's Pillow. She did the "Blue Madonna of St. Marks."

It didn't require much physical activity but for every second the audience was electrified with the greatness on stage.

Shortly before the great lady died a week ago, she had been working on 17 different projects!

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

AUG 4 1968 New England Newsclip

WULSIN FELLOWSHIP AWARDS . . . Two young pianists, students at the Berkshire Music Center, were the recipients of this year's Wulsin Fellowship Awards by the Baldwin Piano & Organ Co. . . . Shown at the Tanglewood main gate are: Miyoko Yamane; Baldwin president Lucien Wulsin; Nina Deutsch; and Jack Romann, Baldwin concert & artist manager.

Wulsin Fellowships Awarded At Tanglewood Festival

Nina Deutsch of New York City and Miyoko Yamane of Tokyo, Japan, were the recipients of the 1966 Wulsin Fellowships at the Berkshire Music Center, presented by Baldwin Piano & Organ Company.

The two scholarships of $500 each are awarded annually to piano students at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music. Baldwin initiated the awards last year in memory of Lucien Wulsin, Sr., Baldwin president from 1926 to 1962.

Miss Deutsch, currently an active performer of solo and chamber music, has attended Oberlin Conservatory, Columbia University, and was graduated from Juilliard School of Music. She is a student of Dorothy Taubman and was recently featured at the University of Pennsylvania Contemporary Music Series.

Miss Yamane has recently returned from a European concert tour which included performances with Robert Casadesus. She has studied piano in Japan and at the Paris Conservatoire and was a private pupil of Rudolf Serkin.

MUSIC TRADES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 5,500

OCT 1966

KATHLEEN TOOHEY

North Adams Girl Will Be Soloist In Lenox Friday

Miss Kathleen P. Toohey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William P. Toohey of 137 West Main St., will be featured as a soloist at the all Mendelssohn program Friday night at 9 at Tanglewood that opens the seventh weekend of the Berkshire Festival in Lenox.

She will be heard in the second half of the evening's program which will be given over entirely to a performance of the Incidental Music to Midsummer Night's Dream. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be joined in the presentation by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

Miss Toohey, 19, is a sophomore at Hartt School of Music, Hartford, Conn., and has been at Tanglewood this summer for eight weeks of study in music under an associate fellowship to the Berkshire Music Center granted her earlier in the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A talented vocalist, who has often been heard at local affairs, she was a member of the Berkshire Chorus last year. In 1967 she was selected to participate as Soprano I in the All-Eastern Division National Chorus at Boston, the first time that a Drury High School student was chosen for such an honor. Previously, she participated for three years in the Western Massachusetts District Concerts and performed with the state group in both 1965 and 1966. At Drury High School, where she was graduated in 1967, she was a member of the chorus and played clarinet in the Drury Band.

At Hartt College, she is a member of the Hartt Choral, Hartt Chamber Singers and Hartt Opera Chorus and department and participated in all productions at the college last year. She also appeared in the operas "Tales of Hoffman" and "The Abduction From the Seraglio".

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

AUG 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Waterbury (Conn) Republican 7/11/68 right

Tanglewood To Feature City Student

A Waterbury violinist, Alan Kosloff, Fern Street, will join the Tanglewood Festival Orchestra, tonight, at the Tanglewood, Mass., Summer Music Festival.

Kosloff will be in the string section for the performance of Haydn's Symphony 96, and Brelioz' Symphony, "Harold in Italy."

Saturday night he will sing baritone in the Boston Symphony Chorus, when it will present the "Lord Nelson Mass", under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Kosloff, who graduated in June from the University of Connecticut where he sang with the University Singers, was awarded a music fellowship to study at Tanglewood.

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

AUG 22 1968 New England Newsclip

Alan Kosloff

Tanglewood Described By City Music Student

(A young Waterbury musician studying on a fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., Alan Kosloff is a modest and extremely talented young man. In addition, he is a fine baritone.)

By ALAN KOSLOFF

TANGLEWOOD, MASS. — The combination of musical excellence and natural beauty that is Tanglewood nurtures behind the famed concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the glory of Erich Leinsdorf, a less spectacular but no less impressive spectrum of activities.

As a voice fellowship student and a violinist in the fellowship orchestra here, I have had a greater chance than most to participate in these varied programs on the grounds of Tanglewood.

Before one even has time to become thoroughly acclimated to the spacious surroundings, a full schedule of choral and orchestral rehearsals has begun. Within two weeks of opening day there are chamber music and orchestral concerts being performed and voice recitals in rehearsal.

I had the unique opportunity of singing in the Tanglewood Choir and also playing in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, the two major performing groups of the summer fellowship program. Each of these ensembles is composed of a highly select group of musicians from around the world.

Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the director of the Berkshire Music Center, works with the fellowship orchestra in rehearsal and with the choir in concert preparation and performance. And it is through direct and professional contact like this that much valuable experience is gained.

But the atmosphere of Tanglewood is a combination of so much more than just these concerts and rehearsals. All of us here are learning to put our musical talents to use in as many ways as we are able. To that end, I have taken part in yet another, and more unusual program.

Every weekday of this summer a different group of urban youngsters is bused up to Tanglewood for a day of relaxation, education, and even entertainment. This is the new "Day in The Arts" Project. It is in that last category that I have made my own contribution.

Having had a great deal of experience in singing and playing the guitar, I was asked to contribute my time to enrich the children's schedule. The initial performance was so great a success and so much appreciated by the children that I have continued to sing for these young visitors as often as my schedule permits.

The most climactic of these sessions was Aug. 7, when the performance was filmed by WBZ of Boston and televised the following day.

That kind of performing is, of course, as much fun as work. But it serves only as a change from the rigorous air of professionalism and musical discipline that pervades everything that is done here. So that, despite the inclusion of a Contemporary Music Series featuring the rock group "The Association" and folksinger Judy Collins, there is no wavering from the underlying purpose of the programs at Tanglewood. And that is to foster the highest level of musicianship in the highest level of young musicians.

Kosloff will participate in next week's Tanglewood program, singing in the choir and joining the chorus in an all-Brahms concert. This will be the final concert of the season, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra: "Gesang der Parzen" (Song of the Fates), Op. 89; "Schicksalslied" (Song of Destiny), Op. 54, and "Naenie" (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82.

92.

15 Bay State Girls Get Music Scholarships

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 101,650
AUG 4 1968
New England Newsclip

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Fifteen Massachusetts girls have received Young Artists Awards music scholarships for 1968-1969, totaling $4,800.

These include two $450 fellowships for study this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Currently studying at the center under Young Artists Awards grants are Jo Ann Lanier, soprano, and Martha Kolden, violinist, both of Cambridge.

Four young women are new recipients of regular $300 scholarships.

They are Sherryl Roy of 2 Highfield Drive, South Lancaster, a freshman at Pacific Union College, Angwin, Cal., Jane Gorden of Gould Road, Ware, a freshman at the University of Connecticut; Beverly Revzin of 10 Berkshire St., Worcester, a freshman at the New England Conservatory of Music; and Christine Kaloustian of Sterling St., Lancaster, a sophomore at Peabody Conservatory of Music, Baltimore, Md.

Renewal awards have been made to Maria Lehoux of Gardner, Nancy Lovell of Fitchburg, Elaine Freedman of 25 S. Lenox St., Elizabeth Lamson of 25 Wabash Ave., Georgeann Peterson of South Lancaster, Paula Christensen of Grafton, Margaret Lemoine of 8 Leon St., Marlene Dacri of W. Boylston, and Janet Thornton of Somerset.

This year's awards bring to $75,000 the value of scholarships given since the Young Artists Awards were established 16 years ago by an anonymous fund.

Auditions for new scholarships were held June 6 at 45 West Hill Drive. Judges were Abraham Kaminsky of the music department, State College at Worcester; J. Gerald Phillips, organist at St. Peter's Church; and Raymond Morin, chairman.

The last time we saw Ruth St. Denis dance was July 4, 1959. It was at Jacob's Pillow, the famed dance festival at Lee, founded by her husband Ted Shawn in 1931.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

During the previous 20 years, Miss St. Denis and Shawn traveled all over the world demonstrating the dance system that is now known as Denishawn.

It was the most vital force in dance development since the enormous influence exercized by the great Isadora Duncan.

They came to an amiable parting of the artistic ways. Miss St. Denis explored further the relation of religion and the dance. Shawn set out to establish dancing as an acceptable profession for a man in the United States.

Miss St. Denis soon founded a Society of the Spiritual Arts, membership of which was made up of people who were interested in dancing as an expression of religion.

At Riverside Church in New York City she gave her "Masque of Mary," the story of the Nativity. Two clergymen read the scriptures, Miss Denis and her group danced, and the choir sang.

There were many indignant letters that included the work "Blasphemy."

For his part, Shawn made history in 1933 at the old Repertory Theater on Huntington Ave. in Boston when he presented the first all-male dance group in the United States.

They barnstormed the country for the next seven years.

In 1959, Miss St. Denis gave seven performances during the week at Jacob's Pillow. She did the "Blue Madonna of St. Marks."

It didn't require much physical activity but for every second the audience was electrified with the greatness on stage.

Shortly before the great lady died a week ago, she had been working on 17 different projects!

WULSIN FELLOWSHIP AWARDS . . . Two young pianists, students at the Berkshire Music Center, were the recipients of this year's Wulsin Fellowship Awards by the Baldwin Piano & Organ Co. . . . Shown at the Tanglewood main gate are: Miyoko Yamane; Baldwin president Lucien Wulsin; Nina Deutsch; and Jack Romann, Baldwin concert & artist manager.

KATHLEEN TOOHEY

North Adams Girl Will Be Soloist In Lenox Friday

Miss Kathleen P. Toohey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William P. Toohey of 137 West Main St., will be featured as a soloist at the all Mendelssohn program Friday night at 9 at Tanglewood that opens the seventh weekend of the Berkshire Festival in Lenox.

She will be heard in the second half of the evening's program which will be given over entirely to a performance of the Incidental Music to Midsummer Night's Dream. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be joined in the presentation by the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

MUSIC TRADES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 5,500
OCT 1966

Miss Toohey, 19, is a sophomore at Hartt School of Music, Hartford, Conn., and has been at Tanglewood this summer for eight weeks of study in music under an associate fellowship to the Berkshire Music Center granted her earlier in the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A talented vocalist, who has often been heard at local affairs, she was a member of the Berkshire Chorus last year. In 1967 she was selected to participate as Soprano I in the All-Eastern Division National Chorus at Boston, the first time that a Drury High School student was chosen for such an honor. Previously, she participated for three years in the Western Massachusetts District Concerts and performed with the state group in both 1965 and 1966. At Drury High School, where she was graduated in 1967, she was a member of the chorus and played clarinet in the Drury Band.

At Hartt College, she is a member of the Hartt Choral, Hartt Chamber Singers and Hartt Opera Chorus and department and participated in all productions at the college last year. She also appeared in the operas "Tales of Hoffman" and "The Abduction From the Seraglio".

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,250
AUG 14 1968
New England Newsclip

Wulsin Fellowships Awarded At Tanglewood Festival

Nina Deutsch of New York City and Miyoko Yamane of Tokyo, Japan, were the recipients of the 1966 Wulsin Fellowships at the Berkshire Music Center, presented by Baldwin Piano & Organ Company.

The two scholarships of $500 each are awarded annually to piano students at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music. Baldwin initiated the awards last year in memory of Lucien Wulsin, Sr., Baldwin president from 1926 to 1962.

Miss Deutsch, currently an active performer of solo and chamber music, has attended Oberlin Conservatory, Columbia University, and was graduated from Juilliard School of Music. She is a student of Dorothy Taubman and was recently featured at the University of Pennsylvania Contemporary Music Series.

Miss Yamane has recently returned from a European concert tour which included performances with Robert Casadesus. She has studied piano in Japan and at the Paris Conservatoire and was a private pupil of Rudolf Serkin.

Waterbury (Conn) Republican 7/11/60 right

Tanglewood To Feature City Student

A Waterbury violinist, Alan Kosloff, Fern Street, will join the Tanglewood Festival Orchestra, tonight, at the Tanglewood, Mass., Summer Music Festival.

Kosloff will be in the string section for the performance of Haydn's Symphony 96, and Brelioz' Symphony, "Harold in Italy."

Saturday night he will sing baritone in the Boston Symphony Chorus, when it will present the "Lord Nelson Mass", under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Kosloff, who graduated in June from the University of Connecticut where he sang with the University Singers, was awarded a music fellowship to study at Tanglewood.

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850
AUG 22 1968
New England Newsclip

Alan Kosloff

Tanglewood Described By City Music Student

(A young Waterbury musician studying on a fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., Alan Kosloff is a modest and extremely talented young man. In addition, he is a fine baritone.)

By ALAN KOSLOFF

TANGLEWOOD, MASS. — The combination of musical excellence and natural beauty that is Tanglewood nurtures behind the famed concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the glory of Erich Leinsdorf, a less spectacular but no less impressive spectrum of activities.

As a voice fellowship student and a violinist in the fellowship orchestra here, I have had a greater chance than most to participate in these varied programs on the grounds of Tanglewood.

Before one even has time to become thoroughly acclimated to the spacious surroundings, a full schedule of choral and orchestral rehearsals has begun. Within two weeks of opening day there are chamber music and orchestral concerts being performed and voice recitals in rehearsal.

I had the unique opportunity of singing in the Tanglewood Choir and also playing in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, the two major performing groups of the summer fellowship program. Each of these ensembles is composed of a highly select group of musicians from around the world.

Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the director of the Berkshire Music Center, works with the fellowship orchestra in rehearsal and with the choir in concert preparation and performance. And it is through direct and professional contact like this that much valuable experience is gained.

But the atmosphere of Tanglewood is a combination of so much more than just these concerts and rehearsals. All of us here are learning to put our musical talents to use in as many ways as we are able. To that end, I have taken part in yet another, and more unusual program.

Every weekday of this summer a different group of urban youngsters is bused up to Tanglewood for a day of relaxation, education, and even entertainment. This is the new "Day in The Arts" Project. It is in that last category that I have made my own contribution.

Having had a great deal of experience in singing and playing the guitar, I was asked to contribute my time to enrich the children's schedule. The initial performance was so great a success and so much appreciated by the children that I have continued to sing for these young visitors as often as my schedule permits.

The most climactic of these sessions was Aug. 7, when the performance was filmed by WBZ of Boston and televised the following day.

That kind of performing is, of course, as much fun as work. But it serves only as a change from the rigorous air of professionalism and musical discipline that pervades everything that is done here. So that, despite the inclusion of a Contemporary Music Series featuring the rock group "The Association" and folksinger Judy Collins, there is no wavering from the underlying purpose of the programs at Tanglewood. And that is to foster the highest level of musicianship in the highest level of young musicians.

Kosloff will participate in next week's Tanglewood program, singing in the choir and joining the chorus in an all-Brahms concert. This will be the final concert of the season, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra: "Gesang der Parzen" (Song of the Fates), Op. 89; "Schicksalslied" (Song of Destiny), Op. 54, and "Naenie" (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82.

Music Institute Draws Teen Musicians Across Nation

Daily Practice

A Percussion Ensemble

Leisure Time

Practice, practice and more practice will eventually mold a serious young music student like Mark Lutton, left photo, into a highly skilled and polished musician. Mark, a Dalton, Mass., high school senior, is spending his summer vacation studying percussion and timpani under the Young Artists Program at the Boston University-Tanglewood Institute in Lenox. He meets daily with noted performers and instructors in an intense round of practice sessions, lessons, ensembles and more practice. Twice a week he joins center photo, from left, Mark Spotz of Houston, Tex., John Soroka of Philadelphia, Pa., (Mark) and Peter Carnevale of Providence, R. I., for a percussion session. Leisure time for Mark is divided between the practice shds and the Tanglewood Music Library, right photo, where he can listen to records or read about the various maestros whose works fill each day with challenge and beauty. (Photos by T-T photographer Brian Conway)

PORTRAIT OF A DALTON ARTIST, MARK LUTTON, AT TANGLEWOOD

The Holyoke Transcript-Telegram

The well manicured grounds of Tanglewood, shrouded by immense birches and threaded with twisting walkways, is a perfect setting for young musicians learning the discipline and beauty of classical music.

They have been brought together under the Young Artists Program by the Boston University-Tanglewood Institute for eight weeks of intensive music training. This summer there are 55 high school students enrolled in the program - only three of whom live in Massachusetts. They represent 41 states.

Mark Lutton, 17, a senior at Wahconah Regional High School was accepted for the Young Artists Program after an impressive audition in Boston. He came to learn to study and to grow.

Mark has studied piano for 10 years, and a variety of percussion instruments for the last four. "There's a scarcity of percussion teachers in the Pittsfield area" he explained, "so I keep up with the piano, too."

Mark is the son of Warren D. Lutton of 265 North Street. He has been a piano student at the Pittsfield Community Music School for eight years, and has been a pupil of Mrs. Jan Stocklinski for the past three years.

At school he plays the tuba in the marching band. And on Sundays he is the organist at St. Agnes' Church.

His schedule at the Berkshire Center allows plenty of time for individual practice. But Mark plays the bass drum, a rather cumbersome instrument to have to tote to the student dormitory a mile and half away from the center.

So Mark confines his percussion training to the daily youth orchestra practices, private lessons and timpani ensembles on Wednesdays and Fridays. The remainder of his time is devoted to the piano.

"I'm lucky" he says,. "Everyone except the percussion students have to supply their own instruments. We're all more or less B.U. students while we're here so it is nice to be able to use university instruments."

Three other teen-agers besides Mark participate in the Young Artists percussion ensembles.

The Youth Orchestra will present four concerts before the close of the program on Aug. 25.

For Mark Lutton the summer is speeding by. He hopes to return to Tanglewood again, possibly under the Tanglewood Fellowship program, or maybe as a member of the esteemed Boston Symphony.

"I really enjoy it here. It keeps me busy but the experience is good. Think now I might try conducting or maybe go into music theory in college."

If Mark decides to continue his music education at B.U., his summer at Tanglewood will provide him with a few ready made college credits. If not, the new knowledge he has gained of the bass drums, xylophone, cymbals, triangle, chinese blocks, and timpani and the world of classical music will prove invaluable in itself.

DALTON-HINSDALE NEWS
DALTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 1,700

AUG 22 1968 New England Newsclip

Long Road Ahead

A long, arduous period of training and discipline preludes the attainment of a career as a professional musician. It is a goal which demands sacrifice and devotion. Mark Lutton, 17, started his training at age seven. Today, he walks the beautiful grounds of Tanglewood looking forward to the time he shall perform with an orchestra like the Boston Symphony.

Portrait Of A Young Artist, Mark Lutton, At Tanglewood

The well manicured grounds of Tanglewood shrouded by immense birches and threaded with twisting walkways is a perfect setting for young musicians learning the discipline and beauty of classical music.

They have been brought together under the Young Artists Program by the Boston University-Tanglewood Institute for eight weeks of intensive music training. This summer there are 55 high school students enrolled in the program — only three of whom live in Massachusetts. They represent 41 states.

Mark Lutton, 17, a senior at Wahconah High School in Dalton, Mass., was accepted for the Young Artists Program after an impressive audition in Boston. He came to learn to study and to grow.

Mark has studied piano for 10 years, and a variety of percussion instruments for the last four. "There's a scarcity of percussion teachers in the Pittsfield area" he explained, "so I keep up with the piano, too."

At school he plays the tuba in the marching band. And on Sundays he is the organist at St. Agnes' Church in Dalton.

His schedule at the Berkshire Center allows plenty of time for individual practice. But Mark plays the bass drum, a rather cumbersome instrument to have to tote to the student dormitory a mile and half away from the center.

So Mark confines his percussion training to the daily youth orchestra practices, private lessons and timpani ensembles on Wednesdays and Fridays. The remainder of his time is devoted to the piano.

"I'm lucky" he says, "Everyone except the percussion students have to supply their own instruments. We're all more or less B.U. students while we're here so it is nice to be able to use university instruments."

Three other teen-agers besides Mark participate in the Young Artists percussion ensembles. Mark Spotz of Huston, Texas, John Soroka of Philadelphia, Pa., and Peter Carnevale of Providence, R.I., have all journeyed to Tanglewood to study under the B.U. faculty and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra like Thomas Gauger.

The Youth Orchestra will present four concerts before the close of the program on August 25. Their audiences consist mainly of youngsters from the many Berkshire summer camps.

For Mark Lutton the summer is speeding by. He hopes to return to Tanglewood again, possibly under the Tanglewood Fellowship program, or maybe as a member of the esteemed Boston Symphony.

"I really enjoy it here. It keeps me busy but the experience is good. Think now I might try conducting or maybe go into music theory in college."

If Mark decides to continue his music education at B.U., his summer at Tanglewood will provide him with a few ready made college credits. If not, the new knowledge he has gained of the bass drums, xylophone, cymbals, triangle, chinese blocks, and timpani and the world of classical music will prove invaluable in itself.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 6 1968 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JUL 27 1968

New England Newsclip

94

Berkshire Voices At Tanglewood

By David E. Pitt

047

INTERESTINGLY enough, there are 38 housewives, lawyers, doctors, school teachers, G.E. plant workers and various and sundry other people from various professions who are also musicians at the Berkshire Music Center.

None of them plays an instrument, however. Actually, all are members of the Berkshire Chorus, a strictly amateur organization sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and formed especially to do performances at Tanglewood. Many are from Berkshire County, but a sizable number commute regularly for rehearsals from Albany, Schenectady and Worcester.

This summer, the Berkshire Chorus is participating in three concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra: the Brahms Requiem on July 27, Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Incidental Music and a group of choral works by Brahms scheduled for Tanglewood's last concert of the summer on Aug. 25.

The chorus did not exist until the summer of 1966. Up to that time, the Boston Symphony relied upon a chorus made up of fellowship students in voice at the Berkshire Music Center and singers who came to Tanglewood as part of a cooperative summer arts institute operated with Boston University. Then Charles Wilson, who had come to the Boston Symphony after a stretch with the New York City Opera Company — where he was a conductor, vocal coach and "unbilled chorus master" — hatched the idea of bringing together a local group of skilled amateur singers to augment the music center's 40-voice student chorus, known as the Tanglewood Choir.

In February, 1966, Wilson and John Oliver, who became the assistant conductor of the Berkshire Chorus, began auditioning for singers in earnest. Candidates were asked to sing one or two pieces of their own choosing and demonstrate an ability to sight-read.

"We started with a group of about 90," said Wilson, "which was finally narrowed down the first year to about 35 singers." Rehearsals for the Berkshire chorus's premiere season at Tanglewood began shortly thereafter.

A policy was created that required all members to attend one rehearsal per week during the off-season if they expected to remain in good standing, and if anyone missed more than three sessions, they were automatically out. Wilson notes that hardly anyone was nearly that delinquent. He added that each member spends about 90 hours in rehearsal during the course of a season.

There is no marked difference between the Berkshire Chorus and any professional group because its members happen to be amateurs, Wilson says. The only real difference becomes apparent in rehearsals, "where we tend to talk quite a lot about voice production, whereas 99 per cent of the in-rehearsal discussion with professionals is about the music itself."

Asked about whether the Berkshire Chorus members displayed the kind of ebullience usually associated with amateurs, who are usually in a line of activity because they like it, and not partly because they need the money, Wilson thought a moment and then replied that he could only say that they were certainly enthusiastic, but in "a different way" from professionals. "After all, for many of them, this is their only chance to make live music — and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

* * *

Rather than arranging the chorus in separate sections, with basses and tenors on one side, sopranos and altos on the other, Wilson arranges the singers in quartets so that no one section is concentrated in one area. "It gives us a better balance from top to bottom," Wilson explains, "and it prevents the kind of crooked harmonies that develop when one section can't always hear another. If someone gets into trouble, there are always singers nearby carrying the three other parts."

Both Wilson and Oliver, who share about equal time in working with the chorus during the winter rehearsal period, ordinarily work with the chorus on all phases of a work to be performed, including interpretative shadings. Sometimes conductors who are charged with the task of preparing a chorus for a concert concentrate only on such things as bringing up the quality of the tone and balancing parts, so that when the maestro arrives to do his interpretive thing, the group will be malleable and at the top of its form. This is not the case with the Berkshire Chorus. "When we rehearse," says Wilson, "we go for broke." Often when Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony's conductor (who will direct all but one of the choral programs this season) steps in, the full rehearsal time with chorus and orchestra is remarkably short.

Wilson's plans for the future include expanding the chorus to 90 voices and doing some large scale contemporary works. The last major piece of contemporary choral music performed at Tanglewood was the world premiere of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" in 1964. However, Wilson said that there will probably be no such choral music until at least 1970, since next season is the Berlioz Centenary, and it is likely that Tanglewood's program emphasis will be on that composer. In former years, there have only been three to four choral concerts a year at the BSO's summer home.

Some 60 per cent of the chorus leaves each year, so places in the Berkshire Chorus are usually open at the end of the summer. Wilson said he hoped new people from the Berkshires and environs would audition for the 1969 summer season.

Photos by Whitestone

Berkshire Chorus, organized in 1966, is conducted in rehearsal by Charles Wilson, one of the originators of the group.

Segment of the chorus is pictured here during rehearsal of Brahms' Requiem.

FROMM WEEK

TANGLEWOOD

Festival of Contemporary Music

August 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 1968

Sponsored by the

Berkshire Music Center

In Cooperation with the

Fromm Music Foundation

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Wednesday, July 31, 1968

TURNTABLE and PODIUM

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Starting Sunday the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will present a week of contemporary American music. There will be an evening of electronic music, four concerts of chamber music, an orchestral program, and a night of opera.

* * *

Performances will be given of Leon Kirchner's Violin and Cello Concerto with 10 Winds and Percussion; Ives' Piano and Violin Sonatas, just to mention the more "popular" music; but virtually unknown works will also be heard, like Russell Harris' "Ludus" and Andrew Imbrie's Third String Quartet. Four premieres are to be offered through the week, including a sounds-interesting piece called "The Distinguished Thing" (Concerto No. 3 for Piano and 12 Instruments) by de Voto and "Elephant Steps," an opera my Stanley Silverman.

The companion piece to this opera interests me the most, though, for it is none other than Arnold Schoenberg's "Die Glueckliche Hand," ("The Golden Touch"), op. 18. Trouble is, the schedule says nothing about whether or not these operas will be staged . . . the only clues are "Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and vocal solos, Erich Leinsdorf, conducting."

So these may be only "concert performances" of opera. Too bad the publicity isn't more explicit; something of major interest comes along and it doesn't receive the coverage another upcoming performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth does. Don't mind that it's a student orchestra; in many ways such groups are more responsive to modern scores than even the professional ensembles.

This empathy with modern music would be especially welcome for Schoenberg's opera in five scenes. Because of its extreme difficulty, "Die Glueckliche Hand" is almost never performed. First of all, the score is immensely complicated and requires a brilliant orchestra capable of following Schoenberg's every demand. There are tempo changes and meter changes every few bars, ditto for sudden dynamic shifts, and quite often ritenuti and a accelerandi accompany all of these at once. For the twenty minutes it takes to perform the work, at least 10 times as much rehearsal is necessary. But this is just part of the story . . .

There is also the matter of lighting, no easy task in itself. Schoenberg's complex directions seek to fuse light and music together, making the score quite visual in nature. There is a "light crescendo," for example, that is synchronized with a crescendo in the music (and a wind machine also): beginning with dull red, the lights become brown and then dirty green, changing to dark blue-grey and then to violet, which becomes redder by degrees until blood-red, then more and more yellow is added so it goes from orange to a caustic glare. Needless to say, the realization of such instructions staggers the imagination.

And to top everything off there are some formidable stage directions, which call for an anvil to be split and a huge rock to fall upon the "hero" and bury him.

The plot for the opera is decidedly symbolic. The hero, an artist, is seen at the beginning lying prone, a huge cat-like animal gnawing at his neck while a chorus of six men and six women chant how he's a social misfit and should stop trying so hard to get ahead in this world. A fanfare you'll never forget sounds, and the artist gets up and tries to establish his bearings. Sooner or later he runs into the Bitch Goddess, Success. She toys with him, but is interested in another gentleman (the artist never sees her face, and this is dreadfully symbolic).

* * *

Towards the center of the work the artist chances upon workmen in a grotto making something and mutters how their work may be done more simply. He goes to their anvil while they make threatening gestures and with a mighty swing of the hammer, splits the anvil. He pulls a jewel out of the fissure, but of course, the anvil is ruined. Symbolically, this should be clear to anyone familiar with Schoenberg's tonal extensions at the time he wrote this opera: something new and beautiful can be made only if the existing tools charmony, etc., are destroyed in the new creative process (atonality).

As the work continues, the artist struggles to be recognized by the goddess, but he fails continually (not only does she spurn him, but he still hasn't seen her face yet). She climbs a ravine and kicks a man-size stone that resembles the cat-like animal seen early in the opera. It falls on the artist, burying him, and the work closes with the animal gnawing on the artist's neck as the "chorus" chants about his foolishness and failures.

Now I'm not saying an operatic performance will be given at Tanglewood. More than likely it will be a concert version. This means no staging and no lighting, but still, it means a live performance of a totally neglected masterpiece.

When you consider that "Die Glueckliche Hand" has had no more than 15 or 20 performances since its 1924 premiere, This coming event is an auspicious occasion indeed. Mark off the date, Wednesday, August 7 at 8 p.m., on your calendar and try to attend. By the way, if I can confirm that the opera will be staged, not only will I remind you in this column next week, but I'll make sure a press release goes out so you are aware of it beforehand.

Those of you interested in other aspects of the contemporary festival will have to write to the Tanglewood publicity office for a schedule or obtain one over the weekend while hearing the Boston Symphony.

Just to close this week's installment, in case any of you can't make a weekend appearance at the Music Shed for the three BSO concerts, it's been brought to my attention that WAMC-FM, at 90.3 mc carries the concerts live. It's the next best thing to being there if your car breaks down and you're assured of a comfortable seat. Don't forget the Schoenberg.

Paul Fromm

THE FROMM MUSIC FOUNDATION

The Fromm Music Foundation is dedicated to the furtherance of contemporary music. Wishing to bring the living flow of musical creation closer to the public, the Foundation aims to return the initiative to the composer and to strengthen the most vital source of a healthy musical culture: composition. To foster the realization of this aim, the Foundation commissions new works, awards prizes for existing works, and sponsors the study, performance, publication and recording of contemporary music. The Foundation is headed by Paul Fromm of Chicago, its founder and President, and Alexander Schneider, its Associate Director. The Fromm Music Foundation program at Tanglewood was begun in 1957.

Our Tanglewood

Paul Fromm Celebrates 10th Year at Tanglewood—Fromm Music Foundation Gives 48 Fellowships at Berkshire Music Center

By Janice Clarkson Cleworth

Today the Fromm Music Foundation is known throughout the world. Paul Fromm, the president, is from Chicago. Alexander Schneider is Associate Director. The aim of the Foundation is to commission new works and to sponsor the performance, study, publication and recording of contemporary music.

Photo by Arthur Siegel, Chicago
PAUL FROMM

Paul Fromm knows that one of the most difficult fields in which to become successful is that of contemporary music composition. Performers finding the compositions difficult, often hesitate playing this music. Contemporary music is frequently written in 12 tones, serial, electronic, sound effect, etc., etc.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Music Center, is determined to produce the best student orchestra players. Thus the Fromm Orchestra Fellowships are great assets for the Berkshire Music Center—the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Harry J. Kraut, administrator, Joseph Silverstein, chairman of Faculty and Gunther Schuller, head of the Fellowship program are at the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Schuller has just accepted the presidency of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, Mass.

Mr. Fromm does not seek glory. Mr. Leinsdorf had difficulty finding him the last night of the Festival. Imagine the noted philanthropist sitting near the back of the filled Theatre Hall in the middle row? It took time to bring him to the stage for an introduction to the audience.

Some of the best of contemporary music is performed in the Fromm Festival. At times, one might wish melody might come from this medium. Many of today's composers laugh at what they call "tunes."

A Fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center consists of a Basic Stipend. The minimum age is 21 years, the maximum 35 years. In lieu of an audition, the applicant must submit two letters of recommendation from teachers or conductors who know his proficiency and musicianship, and a tape recording covering orchestral excerpts and contemporary music. Auditions are held in Boston, New York City, Philadelphia and Washington D. C.

There are 27 other organizations and people who give Fellowships at Berkshire Music Center. These include the Koussevitzky Foundation, National Federation of Music Clubs, Jascha Heifetz, Bernstein and A.S.C.A.P.

The Festival within a Festival of the Fromm Foundation,

(Continued on page 5)

Our Tanglewood

(Continued from page 3)

sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center, was given in the Theatre at Tanglewood, August 14 through 18. Five concerts were given. One primarily devoted to choral and vocal music, three devoted to chamber music and one to orchestral music. All of the works performed during the Festival were prepared by Gunther Schuller. The works of 24 composers were performed.

Two former Chicagoans' works were outstanding. The late Ruth Crawford Seeger with Adolf Weidig at the American Conservatory composed a superb quartet in 1931.

Michael Colgrass was born in Chicago. His "As Quiet As" had the best audience reception of the Festival.

The four commissioned works by the Fromm Foundation at the 1966 Festival were by Michael Colgrass, Douglas Leedy, Roger Reynolds and Henry Weinberg. Each of these composers was also represented by a second work. The commissioned composers are invited by the Fromm Foundation to stay at the center for the two weeks preceding the Festival to work with the performers in preparing their own works. All of the works were under the supervision of Gunther Schuller.

We salute Paul Fromm—a great American.

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The Contemporary Music Program at the Berkshire Music Center comprises two kinds of activity: the study and performance of contemporary music, and instruction in composition for a limited number of composers whose previous studies and experiences have prepared them for work on an advanced level. The program is headed by Gunther Schuller, President of the New England Conservatory of Music. Student composers not only receive instruction from Mr. Schuller and this year's guest teacher, Ernst Krenek, but also participate in a series of seminars conducted by four visiting composers: Robert Cogan, Mario Davidovsky, Earle Brown, and Andrew Imbrie. In addition compositions by the student composers are performed at various Berkshire Music Center concerts, and prepared, as are the concerts of the Festival of Contemporary Music, under the supervision of Mr. Schuller.

Mr. Schuller replaces Aaron Copland who retired in 1965 after twenty-five years as head of the Composition Department at the Center.

Gunther Schuller

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1966

95.

FROMM WEEK

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Wednesday, July 31, 1968

TURNTABLE and PODIUM

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Starting Sunday the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will present a week of contemporary American music. There will be an evening of electronic music, four concerts of chamber music, an orchestral program, and a night of opera.

* * *

Performances will be given of Leon Kirchner's Violin and Cello Concerto with 10 Winds and Percussion; Ives' Piano and Violin Sonatas, just to mention the more "popular" music; but virtually unknown works will also be heard, like Russell Harris' "Ludus" and Andrew Imbrie's Third String Quartet. Four premieres are to be offered through the week, including a sounds-interesting piece called "The Distinguished Thing" (Concerto No. 3 for Piano and 12 Instruments) by de Voto and "Elephant Steps," an opera my Stanley Silverman.

The companion piece to this opera interests me the most, though, for it is none other than Arnold Schoenberg's "Die Glueckliche Hand," ("The Golden Touch"), op. 18. Trouble is, the schedule says nothing about whether or not these operas will be staged . . . the only clues are "Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and vocal solos, Erich Leinsdorf, conducting."

So these may be only "concert performances" of opera. Too bad the publicity isn't more explicit; something of major interest comes along and it doesn't receive the coverage another upcoming performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth does. Don't mind that it's a student orchestra; in many ways such groups are more responsive to modern scores than even the professional ensembles.

This empathy with modern music would be especially welcome for Schoenberg's opera in five scenes. Because of its extreme difficulty, "Die Glueckliche Hand" is almost never performed. First of all, the score is immensely complicated and requires a brilliant orchestra capable of following Schoenberg's every demand. There are tempo changes and meter changes every few bars, ditto for sudden dynamic shifts, and quite often ritenuti and a accelerandi accompany all of these at once. For the twenty minutes it takes to perform the work, at least 10 times as much rehearsal is necessary. But this is just part of the story . . .

There is also the matter of lighting, no easy task in itself. Schoenberg's complex directions seek to fuse light and music together, making the score quite visual in nature. There is a "light crescendo," for example, that is synchronized with a crescendo in the music (and a wind machine also): beginning with dull red, the lights become brown and then dirty green, changing to dark blue-grey and then to violet, which becomes redder by degrees until blood-red, then more and more yellow is added so it goes from orange to a caustic glare. Needless to say, the realization of such instructions staggers the imagination.

And to top everything off there are some formidable stage directions, which call for an anvil to be split and a huge rock to fall upon the "hero" and bury him.

The plot for the opera is decidedly symbolic. The hero, an artist, is seen at the beginning lying prone, a huge cat-like animal gnawing at his neck while a chorus of six men and six women chant how he's a social misfit and should stop trying so hard to get ahead in this world. A fanfare you'll never forget sounds, and the artist gets up and tries to establish his bearings. Sooner or later he runs into the Bitch Goddess, Success. She toys with him, but is interested in another gentleman (the artist never sees her face, and this is dreadfully symbolic).

* * *

Towards the center of the work the artist chances upon workmen in a grotto making something and mutters how their work may be done more simply. He goes to their anvil while they make threatening gestures and with a mighty swing of the hammer, splits the anvil. He pulls a jewel out of the fissure, but of course, the anvil is ruined. Symbolically, this should be clear to anyone familiar with Schoenberg's tonal extensions at the time he wrote this opera: something new and beautiful can be made only if the existing tools charmony, etc., are destroyed in the new creative process (atonality).

As the work continues, the artist struggles to be recognized by the goddess, but he fails continually (not only does she spurn him, but he still hasn't seen her face yet). She climbs a ravine and kicks a man-size stone that resembles the cat-like animal seen early in the opera. It falls on the artist, burying him, and the work closes with the animal gnawing on the artist's neck as the "chorus" chants about his foolishness and failures.

Now I'm not saying an operatic performance will be given at Tanglewood. More than likely it will be a concert version. This means no staging and no lighting, but still, it means a live performance of a totally neglected masterpiece.

When you consider that "Die Glueckliche Hand" has had no more than 15 or 20 performances since its 1924 premiere, This coming event is an auspicious occasion indeed. Mark off the date, Wednesday, August 7 at 8 p.m., on your calendar and try to attend. By the way, if I can confirm that the opera will be staged, not only will I remind you in this column next week, but I'll make sure a press release goes out so you are aware of it beforehand.

Those of you interested in other aspects of the contemporary festival will have to write to the Tanglewood publicity office for a schedule or obtain one over the weekend while hearing the Boston Symphony.

Just to close this week's installment, in case any of you can't make a weekend appearance at the Music Shed for the three BSO concerts, it's been brought to my attention that WAMC-FM, at 90.3 mc carries the concerts live. It's the next best thing to being there if your car breaks down and you're assured of a comfortable seat. Don't forget the Schoenberg.

Paul Fromm

THE FROMM MUSIC FOUNDATION

The Fromm Music Foundation is dedicated to the furtherance of contemporary music. Wishing to bring the living flow of musical creation closer to the public, the Foundation aims to return the initiative to the composer and to strengthen the most vital source of a healthy musical culture: composition. To foster the realization of this aim, the Foundation commissions new works, awards prizes for existing works, and sponsors the study, performance, publication and recording of contemporary music. The Foundation is headed by Paul Fromm of Chicago, its founder and President, and Alexander Schneider, its Associate Director. The Fromm Music Foundation program at Tanglewood was begun in 1957.

Our Tanglewood

Paul Fromm Celebrates 10th Year at Tanglewood—Fromm Music Foundation Gives 48 Fellowships at Berkshire Music Center

By Janice Clarkson Cleworth

Today the Fromm Music Foundation is known throughout the world. Paul Fromm, the president, is from Chicago. Alexander Schneider is Associate Director. The aim of the Foundation is to commission new works and to sponsor the performance, study, publication and recording of contemporary music.

Photo by Arthur Siegel, Chicago
PAUL FROMM

Paul Fromm knows that one of the most difficult fields in which to become successful is that of contemporary music composition. Performers finding the compositions difficult, often hesitate playing this music. Contemporary music is frequently written in 12 tones, serial, electronic, sound effect, etc., etc.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Music Center, is determined to produce the best student orchestra players. Thus the Fromm Orchestra Fellowships are great assets for the Berkshire Music Center—the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Harry J. Kraut, administrator, Joseph Silverstein, chairman of Faculty and Gunther Schuller, head of the Fellowship program are at the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Schuller has just accepted the presidency of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, Mass.

Mr. Fromm does not seek glory. Mr. Leinsdorf had difficulty finding him the last night of the Festival. Imagine the noted philanthropist sitting near the back of the filled Theatre Hall in the middle row? It took time to bring him to the stage for an introduction to the audience.

Some of the best of contemporary music is performed in the Fromm Festival. At times, one might wish melody might come from this medium. Many of today's composers laugh at what they call "tunes."

A Fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center consists of a Basic Stipend. The minimum age is 21 years, the maximum 35 years. In lieu of an audition, the applicant must submit two letters of recommendation from teachers or conductors who know his proficiency and musicianship, and a tape recording covering orchestral excerpts and contemporary music. Auditions are held in Boston, New York City, Philadelphia and Washington D. C.

There are 27 other organizations and people who give Fellowships at Berkshire Music Center. These include the Koussevitzky Foundation, National Federation of Music Clubs, Jascha Heifetz, Bernstein and A.S.C.A.P.

The Festival within a Festival of the Fromm Foundation,

(Continued on page 5)

Our Tanglewood

(Continued from page 3)

sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center, was given in the Theatre at Tanglewood, August 14 through 18. Five concerts were given. One primarily devoted to choral and vocal music, three devoted to chamber music and one to orchestral music. All of the works performed during the Festival were prepared by Gunther Schuller. The works of 24 composers were performed.

Two former Chicagoans' works were outstanding. The late Ruth Crawford Seeger with Adolf Weidig at the American Conservatory composed a superb quartet in 1931.

Michael Colgrass was born in Chicago. His "As Quiet As" had the best audience reception of the Festival.

The four commissioned works by the Fromm Foundation at the 1966 Festival were by Michael Colgrass, Douglas Leedy, Roger Reynolds and Henry Weinberg. Each of these composers was also represented by a second work. The commissioned composers are invited by the Fromm Foundation to stay at the center for the two weeks preceding the Festival to work with the performers in preparing their own works. All of the works were under the supervision of Gunther Schuller.

We salute Paul Fromm—a great American.

TANGLEWOOD

Festival of Contemporary Music

August 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 1968

Sponsored by the

Berkshire Music Center

In Cooperation with the

Fromm Music Foundation

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The Contemporary Music Program at the Berkshire Music Center comprises two kinds of activity: the study and performance of contemporary music, and instruction in composition for a limited number of composers whose previous studies and experiences have prepared them for work on an advanced level. The program is headed by Gunther Schuller, President of the New England Conservatory of Music. Student composers not only receive instruction from Mr. Schuller and this year's guest teacher, Ernst Krenek, but also participate in a series of seminars conducted by four visiting composers: Robert Cogan, Mario Davidovsky, Earle Brown, and Andrew Imbrie. In addition compositions by the student composers are performed at various Berkshire Music Center concerts, and prepared, as are the concerts of the Festival of Contemporary Music, under the supervision of Mr. Schuller.

Mr. Schuller replaces Aaron Copland who retired in 1965 after twenty-five years as head of the Composition Department at the Center.

Gunther Schuller

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1966

FROMM WEEK

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Wednesday, July 31, 1968

TURNTABLE and PODIUM

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Starting Sunday the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will present a week of contemporary American music. There will be an evening of electronic music, four concerts of chamber music, an orchestral program, and a night of opera.

* * *

Performances will be given of Leon Kirchner's Violin and Cello Concerto with 10 Winds and Percussion; Ives' Piano and Violin Sonatas, just to mention the more "popular" music; but virtually unknown works will also be heard, like Russell Harris' "Ludus" and Andrew Imbrie's Third String Quartet. Four premieres are to be offered through the week, including a sounds-interesting piece called "The Distinguished Thing" (Concerto No. 3 for Piano and 12 Instruments) by de Voto and "Elephant Steps," an opera my Stanley Silverman.

The companion piece to this opera interests me the most, though, for it is none other than Arnold Schoenberg's "Die Glueckliche Hand," ("The Golden Touch"), op. 18. Trouble is, the schedule says nothing about whether or not these operas will be staged . . . the only clues are "Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and vocal solos, Erich Leinsdorf, conducting."

So these may be only "concert performances" of opera. Too bad the publicity isn't more explicit; something of major interest comes along and it doesn't receive the coverage another upcoming performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth does. Don't mind that it's a student orchestra; in many ways such groups are more responsive to modern scores than even the professional ensembles.

This empathy with modern music would be especially welcome for Schoenberg's opera in five scenes. Because of its extreme difficulty, "Die Glueckliche Hand" is almost never performed. First of all, the score is immensely complicated and requires a brilliant orchestra capable of following Schoenberg's every demand. There are tempo changes and meter changes every few bars, ditto for sudden dynamic shifts, and quite often ritenuti and accelerandi accompany all of these at once. For the twenty minutes it takes to perform the work, at least 10 times as much rehearsal is necessary. But this is just part of the story . . .

There is also the matter of lighting, no easy task in itself. Schoenberg's complex directions seek to fuse light and music together, making the score quite visual in nature. There is a "light crescendo," for example, that is synchronized with a crescendo in the music (and a wind machine also): beginning with dull red, the lights become brown and then dirty green, changing to dark blue-grey and then to violet, which becomes redder by degrees until blood-red, then more and more yellow is added so it goes from orange to a caustic glare. Needless to say, the realization of such instructions staggers the imagination.

And to top everything off there are some formidable stage directions, which call for an anvil to be split and a huge rock to fall upon the "hero" and bury him.

The plot for the opera is decidedly symbolic. The hero, an artist, is seen at the beginning lying prone, a huge cat-like animal gnawing at his neck while a chorus of six men and six women chant how he's a social misfit and should stop trying so hard to get ahead in this world. A fanfare you'll never forget sounds, and the artist gets up and tries to establish his bearings. Sooner or later he runs into the Bitch Goddess, Success. She toys with him, but is interested in another gentleman (the artist never sees her face, and this is dreadfully symbolic).

* * *

Towards the center of the work the artist chances upon workmen in a grotto making something and mutters how their work may be done more simply. He goes to their anvil while they make threatening gestures and with a mighty swing of the hammer, splits the anvil. He pulls a jewel out of the fissure, but of course, the anvil is ruined. Symbolically, this should be clear to anyone familiar with Schoenberg's tonal extensions at the time he wrote this opera: something new and beautiful can be made only if the existing tools charmony, etc., are destroyed in the new creative process (atonality).

As the work continues, the artist struggles to be recognized by the goddess, but he fails continually (not only does she spurn him, but he still hasn't seen her face yet). She climbs a ravine and kicks a man-size stone that resembles the cat-like animal seen early in the opera. It falls on the artist, burying him, and the work closes with the animal gnawing on the artist's neck as the "chorus" chants about his foolishness and failures.

Now I'm not saying an operatic performance will be given at Tanglewood. More than likely it will be a concert version. This means no staging and no lighting, but still, it means a live performance of a totally neglected masterpiece.

When you consider that "Die Glueckliche Hand" has had no more than 15 or 20 performances since its 1924 premiere. This coming event is an auspicious occasion indeed. Mark off the date, Wednesday, August 7 at 8 p.m., on your calendar and try to attend. By the way, if I can confirm that the opera will be staged, not only will I remind you in this column next week, but I'll make sure a press release goes out so you are aware of it beforehand.

Those of you interested in other aspects of the contemporary festival will have to write to the Tanglewood publicity office for a schedule or obtain one over the weekend while hearing the Boston Symphony.

Just to close this week's installment, in case any of you can't make a weekend appearance at the Music Shed for the three BSO concerts, it's been brought to my attention that WAMC-FM, at 90.3 mc carries the concerts live. It's the next best thing to being there if your car breaks down and you're assured of a comfortable seat. Don't forget the Schoenberg.

Paul Fromm

THE FROMM MUSIC FOUNDATION

The Fromm Music Foundation is dedicated to the furtherance of contemporary music. Wishing to bring the living flow of musical creation closer to the public, the Foundation aims to return the initiative to the composer and to strengthen the most vital source of a healthy musical culture: composition. To foster the realization of this aim, the Foundation commissions new works, awards prizes for existing works, and sponsors the study, performance, publication and recording of contemporary music. The Foundation is headed by Paul Fromm of Chicago, its founder and President, and Alexander Schneider, its Associate Director. The Fromm Music Foundation program at Tanglewood was begun in 1957.

Our Tanglewood

Paul Fromm Celebrates 10th Year at Tanglewood—Fromm Music Foundation Gives 48 Fellowships at Berkshire Music Center

By Janice Clarkson Cleworth

Today the Fromm Music Foundation is known throughout the world. Paul Fromm, the president, is from Chicago. Alexander Schneider is Associate Director. The aim of the Foundation is to commission new works and to sponsor the performance, study, publication and recording of contemporary music.

Photo by Arthur Siegel, Chicago
PAUL FROMM

Paul Fromm knows that one of the most difficult fields in which to become successful is that of contemporary music composition. Performers finding the compositions difficult, often hesitate playing this music. Contemporary music is frequently written in 12 tones, serial, electronic, sound effect, etc., etc.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Music Center, is determined to produce the best student orchestra players. Thus the Fromm Orchestra Fellowships are great assets for the Berkshire Music Center—the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Harry J. Kraut, administrator, Joseph Silverstein, chairman of Faculty and Gunther Schuller, head of the Fellowship program are at the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Schuller has just accepted the presidency of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, Mass.

Mr. Fromm does not seek glory. Mr. Leinsdorf had difficulty finding him the last night of the Festival. Imagine the noted philanthropist sitting near the back of the filled Theatre Hall in the middle row? It took time to bring him to the stage for an introduction to the audience.

Some of the best of contemporary music is performed in the Fromm Festival. At times, one might wish melody might come from this medium. Many of today's composers laugh at what they call "tunes."

A Fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center consists of a Basic Stipend. The minimum age is 21 years, the maximum 35 years. In lieu of an audition, the applicant must submit two letters of recommendation from teachers or conductors who know his proficiency and musicianship, and a tape recording covering orchestral excerpts and contemporary music. Auditions are held in Boston, New York City, Philadelphia and Washington D. C.

There are 27 other organizations and people who give Fellowships at Berkshire Music Center. These include the Koussevitzky Foundation, National Federation of Music Clubs, Jascha Heifetz, Bernstein and A.S.C.A.P.

The Festival within a Festival of the Fromm Foundation,

(Continued on page 5)

Our Tanglewood

(Continued from page 3)

sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center, was given in the Theatre at Tanglewood, August 14 through 18. Five concerts were given. One primarily devoted to choral and vocal music, three devoted to chamber music and one to orchestral music. All of the works performed during the Festival were prepared by Gunther Schuller. The works of 24 composers were performed.

Two former Chicagoans' works were outstanding. The late Ruth Crawford Seeger with Adolf Weidig at the American Conservatory composed a superb quartet in 1931.

Michael Colgrass was born in Chicago. His "As Quiet As" had the best audience reception of the Festival.

The four commissioned works by the Fromm Foundation at the 1966 Festival were by Michael Colgrass, Douglas Leedy, Roger Reynolds and Henry Weinberg. Each of these composers was also represented by a second work. The commissioned composers are invited by the Fromm Foundation to stay at the center for the two weeks preceding the Festival to work with the performers in preparing their own works. All of the works were under the supervision of Gunther Schuller.

We salute Paul Fromm—a great American.

TANGLEWOOD

Festival of Contemporary Music

August 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 1968

Sponsored by the

Berkshire Music Center

In Cooperation with the

Fromm Music Foundation

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The Contemporary Music Program at the Berkshire Music Center comprises two kinds of activity: the study and performance of contemporary music, and instruction in composition for a limited number of composers whose previous studies and experiences have prepared them for work on an advanced level. The program is headed by Gunther Schuller, President of the New England Conservatory of Music. Student composers not only receive instruction from Mr. Schuller and this year's guest teacher, Ernst Krenek, but also participate in a series of seminars conducted by four visiting composers: Robert Cogan, Mario Davidovsky, Earle Brown, and Andrew Imbrie. In addition compositions by the student composers are performed at various Berkshire Music Center concerts, and prepared, as are the concerts of the Festival of Contemporary Music, under the supervision of Mr. Schuller.

Mr. Schuller replaces Aaron Copland who retired in 1965 after twenty-five years as head of the Composition Department at the Center.

Gunther Schuller

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1966

96.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Contemporary Music Festival At Tanglewood Begins Sunday

The 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the fifth year by the Berkshire Music Center with the Fromm Music Foundation, begins Sunday, and runs through Sunday, Aug. 11, at Tanglewood. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, and opera will be presented.

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct a performance of Schoenberg's "Die Glueckliche Hand" on Aug. 7 at 8 p.m., preceding the premiere of a new opera by Stanley Silverman and Richard Foreman, the composer and lyricist respectively.

Called "Elephant Steps," it is the first stage work to be commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, and includes pop elements and filmed segments. The performance will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, one of the BMC Conducting Fellows.

Three other works are also BMC-Fromm commissions to be premiered. On Monday, Richard Trythall's "Continuum" will be heard on a BMC orchestra program, conducted by Gunther Schuller, Head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center. On Tuesday, Aug. 6. Mark DeVoto's "The Distinguished Thing" will be heard on a chamber music program which will also include William T. McKinley's "Premises and Expositions."

Johns Gets Cabot Award At Tanglewood Concert

Michael P. Johns of 250 Greenwood Dr. received the Henry B. Cabot award from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night at the final concert at the Berkshire Music Festival.

The award of $100 and a citation is given annually to a summer music student at Tanglewood on the basis of musical ability and citizenship. Johns attended Tanglewood this summer on an associate fellowship from the Fromm Foundation. While there, he played the French horn in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and with chamber groups. He also performed with the Boston Pops Orchestra and the Boston Symphony.

The young musician's father, Robert M. Johns, is a teacher of music in the Manchester Public School System, and also plays the string bass with the Hartford Symphony.

A 1967 graduate of Manchester High School, Michael was the 1967 recipient of the David Manchuck Memorial Scholarship. During his senior year, he was a member of the Hartford Symphony, and for several years a member of the Manchester Civic Orchestra. He is now a member of the Springfield (Mass.) Symphony Orchestra.

He is entering his sophomore year at the New England Conservatory, Boston. James Stagliano, first horn player with the Boston Symphony, is his teacher.

Michael Johns

HERALD (e)
MANCHESTER, CONN.
CIRC. 14,150

AUG 29 1968 New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

'Neue Bahnen'

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

ON SEPTEMBER 30, 1853, Robert Schumann met Johannes Brahms for the first time. Brahms made a profound impression on Schumann, who, already as a boy, had shown literary ability almost equal to his piano playing. Schumann promptly expressed his enthusiasm for his new 20-year-old friend by writing an article entitled "Neue Bahnen" (New Paths) in the "Neue Zeitschrift fur Musik" (New Journal of Music).

Every composer we now include among the immortals met opposition in his own day. Schumann's championship of Brahms was a great lift for the young man. It also raised Schumann to a permanent niche in music history for his discernment, altruism and lack of jealousy, fairly rare ingredients in music circles.

* * * *

FRANZ LISZT went to bat for Wagner, who expressed his gratitude by stealing Liszt's daughter (although he did marry her later). We all resist change, whether it be our mother's cooking or the way the news of the day is conveyed to us. But the world marches on and leaves the resistants behind.

Anyone with vision and courage in most fields encountered incredulity, even hindrance. The stories of the efforts of pioneers in music to overcome reaction make wonderful yarns. Fortunately for history, much of the opposition is in print, being the autos-da-fe of no less distinguished a profession than that of music critics. It is the perpetual delight of students to lay bare the bad judgment of the most eminent practitioners of that rare art of music reviewing.

* * * *

BUT THE opposition has not come solely from critics. Not all composers were so unselfish and generous and clear-visioned as Schumann. Plenty of composers have disdained and ridiculed the work of their peers. The wife of Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the first performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris in 1913, related how Saint-Saens, sitting beside her in her box in the theatre des Champs Elysees that evening, kept turning to her and asking her, more rhetorically than not, "Vous aimez ca?" (You like that?).

The mocking disdain and discourteous ridicule endured by such men as Mahler, Debussy, Richard Strauss, in particular, and Bartok of but recent generations make jolly reading. The discomfiture of those who couldn't see the light at the time has not been allowed to fade and disappear.

* * * *

WITH THESE examples in mind, men who see neither aim nor validity in current painting, sculpture and music are sometimes prompted to withhold expressions of disapproval for fear of being exposed at some future date. Poor Arnold Schoenberg was the butt of the most savage barbs for his new 12-note system but he didn't take it sitting down. He hurled back as much as was aimed at him. There is never any verdict in this kind of vicious exchange and time is unkind to the explorer even if not to his discoveries. Stravinsky is no shrinking violet either in this kind of discussion.

Pierre Boulez in France and Karlheinz Stockhausen in Germany are two 40-year-olds who are today the forerunners of current music thinking. Stockhausen, at Williams College a year ago, played tapes of his music and defended, nay, slayed, half-hearted or indifferent listeners with a brand of verbal brilliance which must have converted and convinced anyone previously suspicious of the truth and power of his musicianship.

* * * *

AND NOW this week at Tanglewood we have had the most direct contact with the latest musical thinking of the day. Anyone whose musical training was based on books and methods taught in conservatories a generation or two ago has difficulty because he must unlearn the rules which prevailed in his day. The sounds, the methods of producing them, the types and styles are completely foreign to anyone whose learning has not kept pace.

Music is using raw materials and components analogous to those used by contemporary painters and sculptors. Some of it is chance music, as is a segment of the allied arts, but the practitioners know why they do what they do much better than Mr. Bach, Mr. Mozart and Mr. Beethoven knew of their own reasoning.

It might even be said that composers of today are the best informed and best trained of any generation of men ever engaged in the profession. With less conviction it might further be said, but this would apply in any area, that there is a faction whose creative resources do not justify the superstructures they impose on inadequate foundations.

* * * *

THE CONSISTENCY with which the Fromm Music Foundation has aided the Berkshire Music Center for 12 years to give opportunity to composers is one of the most potent and admirable forces in music today. Never has such a purpose been supported and guided by more intelligence and imagination. It is doubly significant that such energy is applied here where exactly 50 years ago, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge inaugurated a movement concentrating on chamber music which later expanded to include the good offices of the music department of the Library of Congress in Washington, and also where Serge Koussevitzsky, in 1940, put into effect and expanded his plans to aid students and composers up to and including the field of publishing new music.

"Neue Bahnen" have led to our neighborhood for 50 years. They have proved to have served traffic in both directions with achievements of lasting international importance.

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, August 7, 1968

ATHENS HERALD
Thursday, August 8, 1968

This Week At At Tanglewood

Tuesday, Aug. 6: Festival of Contemporary Music chamber music, 8 p. m., Theatre Concert Hall . . . Wednesday, Aug. 7: Festival of Contemporary Music concert, Music Center orchestra, 8 p. m., Theatre Concert Hall . . . Thursday, Aug. 8: Festival of Contempoaary Music chamber music, 8 p. m., Theatre Concert Hall. Friday, Aug. 9: BSO conducted by Charles Wilson in Glinka's Ruslan and Ludmila, Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 (Gina Bachauer), 8 p. m. Shed . . Weekend prelude, 7 p. m., Berkshire Boy Choir . . . Saturday, Aug. 10: Leinsdorf conducting BSO in Bizet's Excerpts from L'Ariesienne, Strauss' also sprach Zarathustra and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 (Bachauer) 8 p. m., Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 11: Leinsdorf conducting BSO in Brahms' Tragic Overture, Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Piano Concerto No. 2 (Bachauer), 2:30 p. m. Shed.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

AUG 2 1968

Music Festival at Tanglewood

The fifth annual Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center with the Fromm Music Foundation, begins Sunday and runs through Aug. 11 at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, and opera will be performed.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Modern Music Series To Start on Sunday

The Berkshire Music Center, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will open its Festival of Contemporary Music on Sunday evening at 8 with a concert of electronic music in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood.

Other concerts in the series include a performance by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra on Monday at 8 p.m. Gunther Schuller, director of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood, will conduct. On Tuesday, there will be a program of chamber music, at 8 p.m.; on Wednesday, Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a contemporary program featuring the Berkshire Music Center orchestra and opera company at 8.

On Aug. 8, there will be another chamber music recital at 8. The contemporary series will end with a faculty recital on Aug. 10 at 2:30 p.m. All events will be in the threatre-concert hall.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 10 1968 New England Newsclip

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

CONCERT OF ELECTRONIC MUSIC

Sunday, August 4, at 9:00 p.m.
Main Lawn, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

PRISCILLA SMILEY	Eclipse
KENNETH GABURO	Lemon Drops For Harry
J. K. RANDALL	Lyric Variations for Violin & Computer — Variations I-XIV only
	INTERMISSION
MARIO DAVIDOVSKY	Synchronisms No. 3
GYÖRGY LIGETI	Articulations
EARLE BROWN	Times Five

"This program was arranged with the intention of including a rather broad representation of electronic music from the now large repertoire of compositions realized in this media. We hope that this program also exemplifies the ability of the electronic medium to adjust itself with great flexibility to the stylistic and aesthetic compositional requirements of each composer.

"Mr. Gaburo's, Mr. Ligeti's, and Miss Smiley's pieces are purely electronic pieces. In other words, all their sounds were generated and modulated through electronic devices. Mr. Brown's piece uses the tape recorder as an extension of the instrumental ensemble. Mr. Davidovsky's piece for pre-recorded cello (Robert Martin) and electronic sounds belongs to a series of short pieces in which he intends to combine conventional instruments with electronic sounds, looking for a coherent musical result out of the conjunction of the two media. Mr. Randall's piece does use a pre-recorded violin part (Paul Zukofsky) with electronic sounds which were computer-generated.

"With the exception of this last piece, the rest of the program was produced in standard tape studios."

— MARIO DAVIDOVSKY

Contemporary Festival

The opening concert of the series of seven in the Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, began about 9 Sunday night for about 300 patient listeners on the damp grass.

It was a concert of electronic music dispensed from four giant speakers (two stereo pairs) on the roof of the back of the shed directed toward the lawn. The activating tape player was backstage out of sight.

There were five works on the program, three of them consisting entirely of sounds generated by electronic devices, one involving pre-recorded cello plus electronic sounds, and another beginning with unaccompanied violin and evolving into 19 variations of electronic sound composed by a computer.

Like most electronic music produced during recent years, it appeared to be the result of surrealistic techniques producing sounds in an infinite range of speeds, durations, volumes, pitches, sequences and combinations.

There were, as expected, a bewildering array of ticks, tocks, moans, crashes, (wind in the trees), pings, roars, shudders, (a truck on Hawthrone St. behind the high hedge), booms, whistles and wheezes.

It was interesting, of course, but as inhuman as a witch's wish.

Springfield Union
8-5-68

MUSIC PLUGGED IN AT TANGLEWOOD

Electronic Concert Scores Despite Some Distortion

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5 — Gunther Schuller said it was in the speakers. Richard Kaye said it was on the tape. But everyone agreed the distortion was there in the electronic concert at Tanglewood last night.

Mr. Schuller, head of contemporary programs at the Berkshire Music Center, objected, and the volume was lowered. Mr. Kaye, the center's electronic technician, still insisted the distortion was recorded.

Nonetheless, the concert, the first of seven in this year's Festival of Contemporary Music here, turned out to be a delightful way to spend a hot summer evening.

The lights were out in the shed, and the music crackled out of the dark. The audience wandered about, chatting freely. And an erratic floodlight that was supposed to have signaled the end of each piece, went on and off at will, it seemed.

And the music, even with distortions, was far from a total loss. It seemed to gain stature as it traveled across the vast lawn.

But from the standpoint of pure sound, the music did suffer in specific ways. Mario Davidovsky's concentrated subtlety in "Synchonronisms No. 3" was diluted. And the cello in his work, as well as the violin in J. K. Randall's "Lyric Variations for Violin and Computer," did not bear the same relationship to the surrounding electronic sounds as those instruments do live.

Also, some of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Articulation" was dull. Priscilla Smiley's "Eclipse," too, depends upon clear differentiation of its elements and is cogently planned. But on two tracks instead of the four for which it was intended, it seemed oversimplified. It did not engage the senses as thoroughly as it would have had the sound been from four places.

Kenneth Gaburo's amiable, jazzy "Lemon Drops" and his "For Harry"—both pleasant enough if far from consistently engrossing—probably lost least in translation.

But in a way, this is quibbling. The outdoor concert worked. As one listener said, "I haven't heard much of this kind of music, but if I had to listen to it trapped in a seat in a hall, I'd go through the ceiling."

New York Times 8-5-68

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250

AUG 7 1968

New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

AUG 6 1968

New England Newsclip

97.

Music Review

Contemporary Music

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE 12TH Festival of Contemporary Music, which the Berkshire Music Center has been able to present with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation, gave the second in its week-long series of concerts at Tanglewood last night in the Theater-Concert Hall. Gunther Schuller conducted the Center orchestra in five contemporary works.

Paul Fromm, the president of the foundation bearing his name, could not have found a more fecund terrain in which to cultivate his worthy aims than on the site where Serge Koussevitzky had established the school, which was to make musical history by furthering the careers of talented performers and inspired composers.

* * *

EXCEPT FOR Boris Blacher's "Orchestra Ornament," written "way back" in 1954, the year before the German composer spent the summer as visiting composer at the Berkshire Music Center, all the other compositions dated from 1960 on and their composers were in the audience.

The sounds they make are the result in most cases of unconventional uses of conventional instruments. The most appealing and freshest morsel of the evening was one which employed a tape. This was Mel Powell's "Immobiles." In certain sections, it was aleatory music, where the performers indulge in whimsical fancies or doodle. For this, Conductor Schuller stood immobile for stated periods. His function, for the whole evening, was to maintain precision and order. But he was so engrossed in his task and undoubtedly so permeated with its spirit, that he unfailingly indulged in body English as if to convey grace and shape to details in which there was little more than musical calculus. Some of the sounds were reminiscent of Boulez but in the permissive sections they recalled "Le Marteau sans meter."

* * *

"CONTINUUMS," by Richard Trythall had its first performance. It is a commission work by the Berkshire Center and the Fromm Foundation. A viola solo plays an introduction which is in the nature of an alto yodel, after which in selected sequences the orchestral sections enter until the whole ensemble is engaged in producing sounds of the marketplace or the factory.

* * *

NOT ONLY have the modes and means of expression been transferred but the core of the music is quite removed from previously accepted paths. There were occasional gleams of serenity in parts of Ernst Krenek's "Horizon Circled." Leon Kirchner's concerto for violin, cello, 10 winds and percussion retains the same genuine effusiveness his music of previous periods demonstrated but the language of the evening, in general terms, was billingsgate. Fascination there well could be but charm was noneexistent. This, however, may be the wrong elevation from which to evaluate the product.

PROGRAM VARIED AT TANGLEWOOD

Reminiscent Music Played With Up-to-Date Works

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6 — "Continuums," "Horizons Circled," "Immobiles." Titles such as those attest the up-to-the-minute viewpoint of the Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood this week.

In the same way, at last night's concert in the Theater-Concert Hall, titles like Concerto for Violin, Cello, Ten Winds and Percussion (by Leon Kirchner) and "Orchester Ornament" (by Boris Blacher) showed that the festival is aware of what Mr. Kirchner, in the program notes, called "historical connectedness." The festival spectrum is not exclusive.

Last night's concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, ranged from the blatantly old-fashioned "Orchester Ornament" (1954) in which the scoring, if not the structure, recalls Tchaikovsky, to Richard Trythall's "Continuums" (1968), in which the orchestral sheen is very much as of right now.

Work Has Its Premiere

"Continuums," commissioned by the center and the Fromm Music Foundation, the festival's sponsors, was heard in its first performance. It begins simply, with a solo viola stating and restating the basic material of the piece, punctuated by irregular wind interjections. Mr. Trythall stays very close to this basic scheme throughout, although he carries it through many changes. He establishes it so thoroughly that even when the orchestra creates a solid screen of close dissonance, the original material keeps its sense and personality.

Mr. Trythall's music is not at all the alienated, multimedia, campy type current today. A long, sustained, shifting, overlapping section, about two-thirds of the way through, is overtly moving, and it strongly involves the emotions. "Continuums" perhaps does not need its full 17 minutes to get across. It could have done the same thing in less time.

Mel Powell's "Immobiles I, II, III, IV" (1967) for tape and orchestra does not suffer from length. Remarkably compact, it presents four short universes of brilliant sound, one after the other. Each seems like a snip out of an infinitely continuous band. None has the formal sense of beginning, middle and end that is an earmark of the more conventional Kirchner Concerto (1960). The concerto goes its talkative, busy, sometimes engaging way without much chance to relax in between.

Ernst Krenek's "Horizon Circled" (1967), although its dissonant orchestral fabric is closer to Mr. Powell's than to Mr. Kirchner's, also has a sense of movement and direction (in this case circular, since it returns to the beginning) in contrast to Mr. Powell's cuts out of continuous time.

Gunther Schuller conducted all of the works with the perceptiveness and precision he always brings to build music. The same qualities were shown by the two soloists in the Kirchner, Paul Zukovsky, violinist, and Maria Kyprie, cellist.

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA
Gunther Schuller, Conductor

Monday, August 5, at 8:00 p.m.
Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

LEON KIRCHNER	Concerto for Violin, Cello, Ten Winds and Percussion (1960) (in two movements)
PAUL ZUKOFSKY, solo violin	MARIA KYPRIE, solo cello
ERNST KRENEK	Horizon Circled (1967) 1. Azimuth 4. Inner Circle 2. Elevation 5. Parabola 3. Meridian 6. Zenith
RICHARD TRYTHALL	Continuums (1968) Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation First Performance
	INTERMISSION
MEL POWELL	Immobiles I, II, III, IV For Tape and/or Orchestra (1967)
BORIS BLACHER	Orchester Ornament (1954)

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

CONCERT OF ELECTRONIC MUSIC

Sunday, August 4, at 9:00 p.m.

Main Lawn, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

PRISCILLA SMILEY	Eclipse
KENNETH GABURO	Lemon Drops For Harry
J. K. RANDALL	Lyric Variations for Violin & Computer — Variations I-XIV only

INTERMISSION

MARIO DAVIDOVSKY	Synchronisms No. 3
GYÖRGY LIGETI	Articulations
EARLE BROWN	Times Five

"This program was arranged with the intention of including a rather broad representation of electronic music from the now large repertoire of compositions realized in this media. We hope that this program also exemplifies the ability of the electronic medium to adjust itself with great flexibility to the stylistic and aesthetic compositional requirements of each composer.

"Mr. Gaburo's, Mr. Ligeti's, and Miss Smiley's pieces are purely electronic pieces. In other words, all their sounds were generated and modulated through electronic devices. Mr. Brown's piece uses the tape recorder as an extension of the instrumental ensemble. Mr. Davidovsky's piece for pre-recorded cello (Robert Martin) and electronic sounds belongs to a series of short pieces in which he intends to combine conventional instruments with electronic sounds, looking for a coherent musical result out of the conjunction of the two media. Mr. Randall's piece does use a pre-recorded violin part (Paul Zukofsky) with electronic sounds which were computer-generated.

"With the exception of this last piece, the rest of the program was produced in standard tape studios."

— MARIO DAVIDOVSKY

Contemporary Festival

The opening concert of the series of seven in the Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, began about 9 Sunday night for about 300 patient listeners on the damp grass.

It was a concert of electronic music dispensed from four giant speakers (two stereo pairs) on the roof of the back of the shed directed toward the lawn. The activating tape player was backstage out of sight.

There were five works on the program, three of them consisting entirely of sounds generated by electronic devices, one involving pre-recorded cello plus electronic sounds, and another beginning with unaccompanied violin and evolving into 19 variations of electronic sound composed by a computer.

Like most electronic music produced during recent years, it appeared to be the result of surrealistic techniques producing sounds in an infinite range of speeds, durations, volumes, pitches, sequences and combinations.

There were, as expected, a bewildering array of ticks, tocks, moans, crashes, (wind in the trees), pings, roars, shudders, (a truck on Hawthrone St. behind the high hedge), booms, whistles and wheezes.

It was interesting, of course, but as inhuman as a witch's wish.

Springfield Union
8-5-'68

MUSIC PLUGGED IN AT TANGLEWOOD

Electronic Concert Scores Despite Some Distortion

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5 — Gunther Schuller said it was in the speakers. Richard Kaye said it was on the tape. But everyone agreed the distortion was there in the electronic concert at Tanglewood last night.

Mr. Schuller, head of contemporary programs at the Berkshire Music Center, objected, and the volume was lowered. Mr. Kaye, the center's electronic technician, still insisted the distortion was recorded.

Nonetheless, the concert, the first of seven in this year's Festival of Contemporary Music here, turned out to be a delightful way to spend a hot summer evening.

The lights were out in the shed, and the music crackled out of the dark. The audience wandered about, chatting freely. And an erratic floodlight that was supposed to have signaled the end of each piece, went on and off at will, it seemed.

And the music, even with distortions, was far from a total loss. It seemed to gain stature as it traveled across the vast lawn.

But from the standpoint of pure sound, the music did suffer, in specific ways. Mario Davidovsky's concentrated subtlety in "Synchonronisms No. 3" was diluted. And the cello in his work, as well as the violin in J. K. Randall's "Lyric Variations for Violin and Computer," did not bear the same relationship to the surrounding electronic sounds as those instruments do live.

Also, some of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Articulation" was dull. Priscilla Smiley's "Eclipse," too, depends upon clear differentiation of its elements and is cogently planned. But on two tracks instead of the four for which it was intended, it seemed oversimplified. It did not engage the senses as thoroughly as it would have had the sound been from four places.

Kenneth Gaburo's amiable, jazzy "Lemon Drops" and his "For Harry"—both pleasant enough if far from consistently engrossing—probably lost least in translation.

But in a way, this is quibbling. The outdoor concert worked. As one listener said, "I haven't heard much of this kind of music, but if I had to listen to it trapped in a seat in a hall, I'd go through the ceiling."

New York Times 8-5-68

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250

AUG 7 1968

New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

AUG 6 1968

New England Newsclip

97.

PROGRAM VARIED AT TANGLEWOOD

Reminiscent Music Played With Up-to-Date Works

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6 — "Continuums," "Horizons Circled," "Immobiles" Titles such as those attest the up-to-the-minute viewpoint of the Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood this week.

In the same way, at last night's concert in the Theater-Concert Hall, titles like Concerto for Violin, Cello, Ten Winds and Percussion (by Leon Kirchner) and "Orchester Ornament" (by Boris Blacher) showed that the festival is aware of what Mr. Kirchner, in the program notes, called "historical connectedness." The festival spectrum is not exclusive.

Last night's concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, ranged from the blatantly old-fashioned "Orchester Ornament" (1954) in which the scoring, if not the structure, recalls Tchaikovsky, to Richard Trythall's "Continuums" (1968), in which the orchestral sheen is very much as of right now.

Work Has Its Premiere

"Continuums," commissioned by the center and the Fromm Music Foundation, the festival's sponsors, was heard in its first performance. It begins simply, with a solo viola stating and restating the basic material of the piece, punctuated by irregular wind interjections. Mr. Trythall stays very close to this basic scheme throughout, although he carries it through many changes. He establishes it so thoroughly that even when the orchestra creates a solid screen of close dissonance, the original material keeps its sense and personality.

Mr. Trythall's music is not at all the alienated, multimedia, campy type current today. A long, sustained, shifting, overlapping section, about two-thirds of the way through, is overtly moving, and it strongly involves the emotions. "Continuums" perhaps does not need its full 17 minutes to get across. It could have done the same thing in less time.

Mel Powell's "Immobiles I, II, III, IV" (1967) for tape and orchestra does not suffer from length. Remarkably compact, it presents four short universes of brilliant sound, one after the other. Each seems like a snip out of an infinitely continuous band. None has the formal sense of beginning, middle and end that is an earmark of the more conventional Kirchner Concerto (1960). The concerto goes its talkative, busy, sometimes engaging way without much chance to relax in between.

Ernst Krenek's "Horizon Circled" (1967), although its dissonant orchestral fabric is closer to Mr. Powell's than to Mr. Kirchner's, also has a sense of movement and direction (in this case circular, since it returns to the beginning) in contrast to Mr. Powell's cuts out of continuous time.

Gunther Schuller conducted all of the works with the perceptiveness and precision he always brings to build music. The same qualities were shown by the two soloists in the Kirchner, Paul Zukovsky, violinist, and Maria Kyprie, cellist.

Music Review

Contemporary Music

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE 12TH Festival of Contemporary Music, which the Berkshire Music Center has been able to present with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation, gave the second in its week-long series of concerts at Tanglewood last night in the Theater-Concert Hall. Gunther Schuller conducted the Center orchestra in five contemporary works.

Paul Fromm, the president of the foundation bearing his name, could not have found a more fecund terrain in which to cultivate his worthy aims than on the site where Serge Koussevitzky had established the school, which was to make musical history by furthering the careers of talented performers and inspired composers.

* * *

EXCEPT FOR Boris Blacher's "Orchestra Ornament," written "way back" in 1954, the year before the German composer spent the summer as visiting composer at the Berkshire Music Center, all the other compositions dated from 1960 on and their composers were in the audience.

The sounds they make are the result in most cases of unconventional uses of conventional instruments. The most appealing and freshest morsel of the evening was one which employed a tape. This was Mel Powell's "Immobiles." In certain sections, it was aleatory music, where the performers indulge in whimsical fancies or doodle. For this, Conductor Schuller stood immobile for stated periods. His function, for the whole evening, was to maintain precision and order. But he was so engrossed in his task and undoubtedly so permeated with its spirit, that he unfailingly indulged in body English as if to convey grace and shape to details in which there was little more than musical calculus. Some of the sounds were reminiscent of Boulez but in the permissive sections they recalled "Le Marteau sans meter."

* * *

"CONTINUUMS," by Richard Trythall had its first performance. It is a commission work by the Berkshire Center and the Fromm Foundation. A viola solo plays an introduction which is in the nature of an alto yodel, after which in selected sequences the orchestral sections enter until the whole ensemble is engaged in producing sounds of the marketplaee or the factory.

* * *

NOT ONLY have the modes and means of expression been transferred but the core of the music is quite removed from previously accepted paths. There were occasional gleams of serenity in parts of Ernst Krenek's "Horizon Circled." Leon Kirchner's concerto for violin, cello, 10 winds and percussion retains the same genuine effusiveness his music of previous periods demonstrated but the language of the evening, in general terms, was billingsgate. Fascination there well could be but charm was nonexistent. This, however, may be the wrong elevation from which to evaluate the product.

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA

Gunther Schuller, Conductor

Monday, August 5, at 8:00 p.m.

Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

LEON KIRCHNER — Concerto for Violin, Cello, Ten Winds and Percussion (1960) (in two movements)

PAUL ZUKOFSKY, solo violin — MARIA KYPRIE, solo cello

ERNST KRENEK — Horizon Circled (1967)

1. Azimuth
2. Elevation
3. Meridian
4. Inner Circle
5. Parabola
6. Zenith

RICHARD TRYTHALL — Continuums (1968)

Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation

First Performance

INTERMISSION

MEL POWELL — Immobiles I, II, III, IV For Tape and/or Orchestra (1967)

BORIS BLACHER — Orchester Ornament (1954)

98.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
AUG 7 1968
New England Newsclip

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

Tuesday, August 6, at 8:00 p.m.

Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

JOSEPH MANERI — Chamber Piece for Woodwinds, Brass and Percussion (1968)

Members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program
STEFAN MINDE, Conductor

DONALD HARRIS — Ludus (1966)

Violin — PAUL ZUKOFSKY
Viola — ROBERT JONES
Bass — LAURENCE EPSTEIN
Oboe — TIMOTHY VALENTINE
Bassoon — CEDRIC COLEMAN
Violin — EDITH HALADJOFF
Cello — SOICHI KATSUTA
Flute — SUSAN GREENBERG
Clarinet — PAUL GALLO
Horn — SUSAN GOVIER
Conductor — JULIO MEDAGLIA

MARK DEVOTO — The Distinguished Thing (1968)
(Concerto No. 3 for Piano and Twelve Instruments)

Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation
First Performance

CRAIG SHEPPARD — Solo Piano

Violin — YOUNG NAM KIM
Viola — DAVID GEORGE
Flute — JONATHON LANDELL
Bassoon — MATTHEW SHUBIN
Trumpet — EDWARD HOFFMAN
Tuba — DONALD TIDWELL
Violin — EUGENE DRUCKER
Cello — MARIA KYPRIE
Clarinet — PAUL GALLO
Horn — MICHAEL JOHNS
Trombone — JOHN KITZMAN
Percussion — PAUL BERNS
Conductor — MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

INTERMISSION

WILLIAM T. MCKINLEY — Premises and Expositions

Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation
First Performance

Violin — PAUL ZUKOFSKY
Viola — JULIO MEDAGLIA
Flute — MICHAEL FINEGOLD
Clarinet — PAUL ZONN
Violin — NINA FALK
Cello — NEAL LAMONACO
Oboe — WILMA ZONN
Bassoon — KAZUYOSHI ASANO
Conductor — RONALD STOFFEL

EDWIN LONDON — Portraits of Three Ladies (American) (1967)

POCAHONTAS — DOLLY MADISON — NANCY HANKS

Violin — MARTHA KOLDEN
Flute — MICHAEL FINEGOLD
Clarinet — PAUL ZONN
Horn — VICTOR VENER
Trumpet — DENNIS NAJOOM
Tuba — DONALD TIDWELL
Percussion — ANTHONY ORLANDO
Narrator — RICHARD SHAPP
Bass — LAURENCE WOLFE
Oboe — WILMA ZONN
Bass Clarinet — DON STEWART
Trumpet — EDWARD HOFFMAN
Trombone — FRANCIS HUNT
Percussion — PETER MAGADINI
Alto — JACQUELINE PIERCE
Conductor — JAMES FRAZIER

Music Review

Fromm Chamber Music

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FESTIVAL OF Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, the happy result of the Fromm Music Foundation's support of the Berkshire Music Center, consists of a week-long series of concerts which is proving to be a museum of modern musical art. The programs have been deftly divided as galleries devoted to one type of composition. Last night there were five works for small chamber orchestra.

* * *

IN THE NATURE of music, an exhibit must consist of performances and thus one's impressions must be fleeting, being denied the leisure for longer and closer inspection which painting, for example, permits.

Last night Joseph Maneri's chamber piece for 15 wind instruments and three percussion was first on the program. His writing engages his ensemble in labyrinths produced, as he explains, by "transposition and inversion," and then receding to allow only the tuba and contrabassoon to maintain contact with the piccolo at the limits of the compass.

* * *

THERE WERE first performances of two commissions assigned by the Berkshire Center and Fromm Foundation. "Premises and Expositions" by William T. McKinley consists of five pieces for woodwind and string quartets. The first played was a Klangfarbe, a color sound, in which immobile tones and timbres are the desired aim. Each piece last night was coordinated by a conductor but in such a fragment as this last one mentioned he is quite redundant, obviously, as nothing happens, motor-wise.

* * *

THE OTHER four episodes are also experimental from a scientific approach. The musicians have special stands on which rests their music on sheets very much like a roll of wallpaper. The conductor indicates, in the exact manner we used to tell our teacher we wanted to leave the room, that this performer should read and play, No. 2, that one No. 1, another, No. 3, and so on. This method assures that, at the whim of the conductor, the piece will never be played in the exact combination of sounds obtained before.

The other commission was "The Distinguished Thing" by Mark De Voto. This was for solo piano and 12 instruments. The title derives from Henry James and is a one-movement "concerto of unassociated ideas drawn from my impressions of complex tonalistic harmony."

Donald Harris' "Ludus" for five each of strings and winds is the only one which attempts to include references to feelings and moods, in this case, to those expressed by games in the domain of childhood.

* * *

THE MOST exhilarating piece of the evening was the final one, "Portraits of Three Ladies" by Edwin London. This was a musical-visual setting of selections from Rosemary and Steven Vincent Benet's "A Book of Americans." The ladies were Pocahontas, Dolly Madison and Nancy Hanks. The performance required 16 musicians, a narrator, a mezzo-soprano, a male dancer (if circumstances permit) and slide projections.

This was pure fun, as the composer projects his material with irreverent wit. Three screens depended from the stage ceiling show stills and messages at the same time. As an example of the spirit of the act, one slide consisted solely, in relation to President Madison's wife, of a pithy "Hello Dolly."

NOVELTIES HEARD AT TANGLEWOOD

Contemporaries' Program Presents 5 Composers

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7—To some degree, at least, the music of each of the five composers on last night's Festival of Contemporary Music concert in the Theater Concert Hall at Tanglewood had a personal touch. With all except one, that touch was diluted, sketchy or dampened by derivativeness.

Oddly, the one work that stood out as best organized to these ears — William T. McKinley's "Premises and Expositions" for four strings and four winds—was alatoric. So there can be argument as to whether the performers or the composer were responsible for the results. But Mr. McKinley chose strong and clear guidelines for four of his five "Premises, etc." so that, in performance, they came out fresh and shining.

Sounds are Fascinating

Sometimes Mr. McKinley called for extravagant, chaotic noodling punctuated by silences sometimes he set up a sustained sound, around which the other players pranced. In all cases except the one he describes as a tribute to Schoenberg, he created fascinating areas of sound with a minimum of musical means.

"Premises and Expositions," heard in its first performance, was one of two works on the program jointly commissioned by the festival's sponsors, the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Foundation. The other, also heard for the first time, was Mark de Voto's "The Distinguished Thing," subtitled Concerto No. 3 for Piano and Tswelve Instruments.

Older Composers Quoted

"The Distinguished Thing" (the title is a quotation from Henry James) is an attempt to make something new out of the memory of old associations, in this case, the composer says, mainly Debussy, Alban Berg and ancient jazz.

But the solo piano (excellently played by Craig Sheppard) sounded isolated from the rest of the group. The music never quite became an entity, and in general the work was sketchy and not fleshed out.

As to the rest of the program, Edwin London's multimedia "Portrait of Three Ladies (American)," uses offbeat slide projections, an alto soloist, Jacqueline Pierce, and a narrator reciting poems by Rosemary and Stephen Vincent Benet about Pocahontas, Dolly Madison and Nancy Hanks.

Idea Poorly Realized

Mr. London's attempt at campiness is occasionally funny, but his music is chaotic and the effect of the art work is static. As a whole, the idea is brighter than his realization of it.

Also heard were Joseph Maneri's muscular but sometimes indistinct 12-tone Chamber Piece for Woodwinds, Brass and Percussion, and Donald Harris's rhapsodic "Ludus," nicely written to give the performers a chance to shine as individuals, but very much familiar territory.

Members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program were the performers and conductors for the evening.

N.Y. Times
8-8-'68

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

Wednesday, August 7, at 8:00 p.m.

Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

ARNOLD SCHOENBERG — Die Glückliche Hand Op. 18 (1910–13)

Libretto by the composer

Sopranos — EMILY DERR, BONITA GLENN, DONNA PRECHT
Altos — FRANCES PAVLIDES, PHYLLIS ELHADY, JACQUELINE PIERCE
Tenors — ROGER LUCAS, ARTHUR SJOGREN, GENE FORD
Basses — RICHARD SHAPP, LEE EVANS, FRANCIS HESTER
Der Mann — LESLIE GUINN

Berkshire Music Center Orchestra
Conducted by ERICH LEINSDORF
Musical Assistant — STEFAN MINDE

30-MINUTE INTERMISSION

STANLEY SILVERMAN — Elephant Steps (1968)

Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation
First Performance

Libretto by RICHARD FOREMAN
Theatrical Production by RICHARD FOREMAN
Production supervised by STANLEY SILVERMAN
Art by POWER BOOTHE — Films by ERNIE GEHR
CLAUDE LEE, Production Assistant
DOUGLAS BLACK, Stage Manager

* * * *

CAST

Hartman — STENCE JACKSON
Max — LUTHER ENSTAD
Hannah — SUSAN HOAGLAND
Otto — JAMES JONES
Doctor — PHILIP ERIKSON
Lady — LINDEN MAXWELL
Scrubwoman — DONNA NEWMAN
Violinist — PAUL ZUKOFSKY

Angels — LAURY CHRISTIE, LOIS NORDLING

Six Ladies — KATHLEEN TOOHEY, CHRISTY RIO, JOELYN MCGOWAN, DORIS HOLLENBACH, M. LOUINE NOBLE, CONSTANCE POTTLE

Members of the Berkshire Center Orchestra
Conducted by MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Neglected Schoenberg appeals

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The ARTS

LENOX — Wednesday's was one of a tiny number of performances Schoenberg's "Die Glueckliche Hand" has had here or in Europe. The recording in the first volume of Columbia's Schoenberg series has done something to make the work known, but its neglect is odd because the music is strong and appealing to the point even of having had success at the premiere in 1924.

"Die Glueckliche Hand," begun in 1910, was finished in 1913. The title has been translated as "The Lucky Touch" or "The Golden Touch," and it is an allergory, on a text of Schoenberg's own, about the artist who is repeatedly humiliated in his wooing of the bitch goddess Success, and unaware of the true sources where he should seek happiness. The only vocal parts are those of The Man, a bass-baritone, and of a singing and speaking ensemble of 12 solo voices. The other roles are performed in pantomime, and Schoenberg's scenario provides detailed information about that as well as giving an intricate scheme for stage lighting.

Schoenberg began the score shortly after his move into the world of free dissonance, and finished it at a time when he was well settled in his new language. It was in "Die Glueckliche Hand" that he developed the "Sprechstimme" technique of "Pierrot lunaire" and "Moses und Aron."

It is a dense and active music that packs enormous force into its less than 20 minutes duration. The virtuosity and fantasy of the orchestral writing are remarkable, and the sound itself plays an important part in establishing the particular dramatic atmosphere: the characteristic sonority of "Die Glueckliche Hand" differs from the crazily enchanted one of the contemporary "Erwartung" as much as the "Meistersinger" sound differs from that of "Tristan."

Leslie Guinn, though serious and thoroughly prepared, lacked something in personal force as The Man, though in this part, which requires much more of the actor than of the singer, a performer in severely handicapped in concert presentation because the vocal interventions are brief and scattered. The 12 singers of the chorus did their job excellently. Erich Leinsdorf, who had been assisted in rehearsals by Stefan Minde, one of the B.M.C. conducting fellows, conducted with superb results interpretively and technically, getting extraordinarily effective work from the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. They had been intensively, extensively, and effectively rehearsed, and they played beautifully, with exciting assurance and involvement.

To be sure, vintage Schoenberg is a hard act to follow, but Stanley Silverman's "Elephant Steps," a B.M.C. Fromm Foundation commission that came after two runthroughs of "Die Glueckliche Hand," struck me as a bore produced by a man who is in many ways gifted and skilled, but uncritical, self-indulgent, and simple-minded.

"Elephant Steps," whose text is by Richard Foreman, is a plotless fantasy about the dying of a man called Hartman who imagines he hears elephants stomping about the roof. Silverman describes the work as "theater using opera singers." It lasts about an hour and a quarter; it works a bit like an opera that is constantly intruded upon by pop, rock, film, and other sorts of musical, non-musical, and anti-musical interference; and it requires, along with an ensemble of about 18 conventional instruments, acting singers of diverse styles, films, still projections, electronic music, and other taped material.

The visual side of the production was primitive and generally dismal. The musical side was excellent, and at its best, as in some of the playing by members of the B.M.C. Orchestra, Thomas's conducting, Zukofsky's bit, the performances of Donna Newman (scrubwoman) and James Jones (Otto), brilliant.

Boston Globe 8-9-'68

98.

Music Review

Fromm Chamber Music

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FESTIVAL OF Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, the happy result of the Fromm Music Foundation's support of the Berkshire Music Center, consists of a week-long series of concerts which is proving to be a museum of modern musical art. The programs have been deftly divided as galleries devoted to one type of composition. Last night there were five works for small chamber orchestra.

* * *

IN THE NATURE of music, an exhibit must consist of performances and thus one's impressions must be fleeting, being denied the leisure for longer and closer inspection which painting, for example, permits.

Last night Joseph Maneri's chamber piece for 15 wind instruments and three percussion was first on the program. His writing engages his ensemble in labyrinths produced, as he explains, by "transposition and inversion," and then receding to allow only the tuba and contrabassoon to maintain contact with the piccolo at the limits of the compass.

* * *

THERE WERE first performances of two commissions assigned by the Berkshire Center and Fromm Foundation. "Premises and Expositions" by William T. McKinley consists of five pieces for woodwind and string quartets. The first played was a Klangfarbe, a color sound, in which immobile tones and timbres are the desired aim. Each piece last night was coordinated by a conductor but in such a fragment as this last one mentioned he is quite redundant, obviously, as nothing happens, motor-wise.

* * *

THE OTHER four episodes are also experimental from a scientific approach. The musicians have special stands on which rests their music on sheets very much like a roll of wallpaper. The conductor indicates, in the exact manner we used to tell our teacher we wanted to leave the room, that this performer should read ,and play, No. 2, that one No. 1, another, No. 3, and so on. This method assures that, at the whim of the conductor, the piece will never be played in the exact combination of sounds obtained before.

The other commission was "The Distinguished Thing" by Mark De Voto. This was for solo piano and 12 instruments. The title derives from Henry James and is a one-movement "concerto of unassociated ideas drawn from my impressions of complex tonalistic harmony."

Donald Harris' "Ludus" for five each of strings and winds is the only one which attempts to include references to feelings and moods, in this case, to those expressed by games in the domain of childhood.

* * *

THE MOST exhilarating piece of the evening was the final one, "Portraits of Three Ladies" by Edwin London. This was a musical-visual setting of selections from Rosemary and Steven Vincent Benet's "A Book of Americans." The ladies were Pocahontas, Dolly Madison and Nancy Hanks. The performance required 16 musicians, a narrator, a mezzo-soprano, a male dancer (if circumstances permit) and slide projections.

This was pure fun, as the composer projects his material with irreverent wit. Three screens depended from the stage ceiling show stills and messages at the same time. As an example of the spirit of the act, one slide consisted solely, in relation to President Madison's wife, of a pithy "Hello Dolly."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 25,900
AUG 7 1968 New England Newsclip

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

Tuesday, August 6, at 8:00 p.m.

Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

JOSEPH MANERI — Chamber Piece for Woodwinds, Brass and Percussion (1968)

Members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program
STEFAN MINDE, Conductor

DONALD HARRIS — Ludus (1966)

Violin — PAUL ZUKOFSKY
Viola — ROBERT JONES
Bass — LAURENCE EPSTEIN
Oboe — TIMOTHY VALENTINE
Bassoon — CEDRIC COLEMAN
Violin — EDITH HALADJOFF
Cello — SOICHI KATSUTA
Flute — SUSAN GREENBERG
Clarinet — PAUL GALLO
Horn — SUSAN GOVIER
Conductor — JULIO MEDAGLIA

MARK DEVOTO — The Distinguished Thing (1968)
(Concerto No. 3 for Piano and Twelve Instruments)

Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation
First Performance
CRAIG SHEPPARD — Solo Piano

Violin — YOUNG NAM KIM
Viola — DAVID GEORGE
Flute — JONATHON LANDELL
Bassoon — MATTHEW SHUBIN
Trumpet — EDWARD HOFFMAN
Tuba — DONALD TIDWELL
Violin — EUGENE DRUCKER
Cello — MARIA KYPRIE
Clarinet — PAUL GALLO
Horn — MICHAEL JOHNS
Trombone — JOHN KITZMAN
Percussion — PAUL BERNS
Conductor — MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

INTERMISSION

WILLIAM T. MCKINLEY — Premises and Expositions

Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation
First Performance

Violin — PAUL ZUKOFSKY
Viola — JULIO MEDAGLIA
Flute — MICHAEL FINEGOLD
Clarinet — PAUL ZONN
Violin — NINA FALK
Cello — NEAL LAMONACO
Oboe — WILMA ZONN
Bassoon — KAZUYOSHI ASANO
Conductor — RONALD STOFFEL

EDWIN LONDON — Portraits of Three Ladies (American) (1967)

POCAHONTAS — DOLLY MADISON — NANCY HANKS

Violin — MARTHA KOLDEN
Flute — MICHAEL FINEGOLD
Clarinet — PAUL ZONN
Horn — VICTOR VENER
Trumpet — DENNIS NAJOOM
Tuba — DONALD TIDWELL
Percussion — ANTHONY ORLANDO
Narrator — RICHARD SHAPP
Bass — LAURENCE WOLFE
Oboe — WILMA ZONN
Bass Clarinet — DON STEWART
Trumpet — EDWARD HOFFMAN
Trombone — FRANCIS HUNT
Percussion — PETER MAGADINI
Alto — JACQUELINE PIERCE
Conductor — JAMES FRAZIER

N.Y. Times
8-8-'68

NOVELTIES HEARD AT TANGLEWOOD

Contemporaries' Program Presents 5 Composers

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7—To some degree, at least, the music of each of the five composers on last night's Festival of Contemporary Music concert in the Theater Concert Hall at Tanglewood had a personal touch. With all except one, that touch was diluted, sketchy or dampened by derivativeness.

Oddly, the one work that stood out as best organized to these ears — William T. McKinley's "Premises and Expositions" for four strings and four winds—was alatoric. So there can be argument as to whether the performers or the composer were responsible for the results. But Mr. McKinley chose strong and clear guidelines for four of his five "Premises, etc." so that, in performance, they came out fresh and shining.

Sounds are Fascinating

Sometimes Mr. McKinley called for extravagant, chaotic noodling punctuated by silences sometimes he set up a sustained sound, around which the other players pranced. In all cases except the one he describes as a tribute to Schoenberg, he created fascinating areas of sound with a minimum of musical means.

"Premises and Expositions," heard in its first performance, was one of two works on the program jointly commissioned by the festival's sponsors, the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Foundation. The other, also heard for the first time, was Mark de Voto's "The Distinguished Thing," subtitled Concerto No. 3 for Piano and Tswelve Instruments.

Older Composers Quoted

"The Distinguished Thing" (the title is a quotation from Henry James) is an attempt to make something new out of the memory of old associations, in this case, the composer says, mainly Debussy, Alban Berg and ancient jazz.

But the solo piano (excellently played by Craig Sheppard) sounded isolated from the rest of the group. The music never quite became an entity, and in general the work was sketchy and not fleshed out.

As to the rest of the program, Edwin London's multimedia "Portrait of Three Ladies (American)," uses offbeat slide projections, an alto soloist, Jacqueline Pierce, and a narrator reciting poems by Rosemary and Stephen Vincent Benét about Pocahontas, Dolly Madison and Nancy Hanks.

Idea Poorly Realized

Mr. London's attempt at campiness is occasionally funny, but his music is chaotic and the effect of the art work is static. As a whole, the idea is brighter than his realization of it.

Also heard were Joseph Maneri's muscular but sometimes indistinct 12-tone Chamber Piece for Woodwinds, Brass and Percussion, and Donald Harris's rhapsodic "Ludus," nicely written to give the performers a chance to shine as individuals, but very much familiar territory.

Members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program were the performers and conductors for the evening.

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

Wednesday, August 7, at 8:00 p.m.

Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

ARNOLD SCHOENBERG — Die Glückliche Hand Op. 18 (1910 13)

Libretto by the composer

Sopranos — EMILY DERR, BONITA GLENN, DONNA PRECHT
Altos — FRANCES PAVLIDES, PHYLLIS ELHADY, JACQUELINE PIERCE
Tenors — ROGER LUCAS, ARTHUR SJOGREN, GENE FORD
Basses — RICHARD SHAPP, LEE EVANS, FRANCIS HESTER
Der Mann — LESLIE GUINN

Berkshire Music Center Orchestra
Conducted by ERICH LEINSDORF
Musical Assistant — STEFAN MINDE

30-MINUTE INTERMISSION

STANLEY SILVERMAN — Elephant Steps (1968)

Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation
First Performance

Libretto by RICHARD FOREMAN
Theatrical Production by RICHARD FOREMAN
Production supervised by STANLEY SILVERMAN
Art by POWER BOOTHE — Films by ERNIE GEHR
CLAUDE LEE, Production Assistant
DOUGLAS BLACK, Stage Manager

* * * *

CAST

Hartman — STENCE JACKSON
Max — LUTHER ENSTAD
Hannah — SUSAN HOAGLAND
Otto — JAMES JONES
Doctor — PHILIP ERIKSON
Lady — LINDEN MAXWELL
Scrubwoman — DONNA NEWMAN
Violinist — PAUL ZUKOFSKY

Angels — LAURY CHRISTIE, LOIS NORDLING

Six Ladies — KATHLEEN TOOHEY, CHRISTY RIO, JOELYN MCGOWAN, DORIS HOLLENBACH, M. LOUINE NOBLE, CONSTANCE POTTLE

Members of the Berkshire Center Orchestra
Conducted by MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Neglected Schoenberg appeals

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The ARTS

LENOX — Wednesday's was one of a tiny number of performances Schoenberg's "Die Glueckliche Hand" has had here or in Europe. The recording in the first volume of Columbia's Schoenberg series has done something to make the work known, but its neglect is odd because the music is strong and appealing to the point even of having had success at the premiere in 1924.

"Die Glueckliche Hand," begun in 1910, was finished in 1913. The title has been translated as "The Lucky Touch" or "The Golden Touch," and it is an allergory, on a text of Schoenberg's own, about the artist who is repeatedly humiliated in his wooing of the bitch goddess Success, and unaware of the true sources where he should seek happiness. The only vocal parts are those of The Man, a bass-baritone, and of a singing and speaking ensemble of 12 solo voices. The other roles are performed in pantomime, and Schoenberg's scenario provides detailed information about that as well as giving an intricate scheme for stage lighting.

Schoenberg began the score shortly after his move into the world of free dissonance, and finished it at a time when he was well settled in his new language. It was in "Die Glueckliche Hand" that he developed the "Sprechstimme" technique of "Pierrot lunaire" and "Moses und Aron."

It is a dense and active music that packs enormous force into its less than 20 minutes duration. The virtuosity and fantasy of the orchestral writing are remarkable, and the sound itself plays an important part in establishing the particular dramatic atmosphere: the characteristic sonority of "Die Glueckliche Hand" differs from the crazily enchanted one of the contemporary "Erwartung" as much as the "Meistersinger" sound differs from that of "Tristan."

Leslie Guinn, though serious and thoroughly prepared, lacked something in personal force as The Man, though in this part, which requires much more of the actor than of the singer, a performer in severely handicapped in concert presentation because the vocal interventions are brief and scattered. The 12 singers of the chorus did their job excellently. Erich Leinsdorf, who had been assisted in rehearsals by Stefan Minde, one of the B.M.C. conducting fellows, conducted with superb results interpretively and technically, getting extraordinarily effective work from the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. They had been intensively, extensively, and effectively rehearsed, and they played beautifully, with exciting assurance and involvement.

To be sure, vintage Schoenberg is a hard act to follow, but Stanley Silverman's "Elephant Steps," a B.M.C. Fromm Foundation commission that came after two runthroughs of "Die Glueckliche Hand," struck me as a bore produced by a man who is in many ways gifted and skilled, but uncritical, self-indulgent, and simple-minded.

"Elephant Steps," whose text is by Richard Foreman, is a plotless fantasy about the dying of a man called Hartman who imagines he hears elephants stomping about the roof. Silverman describes the work as "theater using opera singers." It lasts about an hour and a quarter; it works a bit like an opera that is constantly intruded upon by pop, rock, film, and other sorts of musical, non-musical, and anti-musical interference; and it requires, along with an ensemble of about 18 conventional instruments, acting singers of diverse styles, films, still projections, electronic music, and other taped material.

The visual side of the production was primitive and generally dismal. The musical side was excellent, and at its best, as in some of the playing by members of the B.M.C. Orchestra, Thomas's conducting, Zukofsky's bit, the performances of Donna Newman (scrubwoman) and James Jones (Otto), brilliant.

Boston Globe 8-9-'68

MUSIC: The Latest—and the Not-Latest—At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD SEES AN 'OCCULT OPERA'

Silverman's 'Elephant Steps' Raises Some Questions

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8 — "Elephant Steps," Stanley Silverman's hour-long "occult opera," seen and heard in its premiere at Tanglewood last night, has scarcely a single unfamiliar element.

That doesn't mean that its bits of jazz, rock 'n' roll, Renaissance madrigal, torch song, tape music, straight opera and whatever else for one moment add up to anything safe, sane and recognizable.

First of all, is it an opera or a planned happening? It has the proper trimmings for opera: singers, arias, ensembles, a conductor, orchestra, chorus, scenery and so on. But it also has spoken episodes, film clips, slide projections and many other trappings of present-day happenings.

Next, does it have a plot? Well, there's this character, Reinheart . . . or are there two Reinhearts? And who is Hartman? Reinheart is in bed as the "opera" begins. He falls out of bed several times. There's a doctor in the room. A man (Hartman?) comes in the room. He goes out and is trapped in a wall with his head showing in the room. He has two large, shaggy, white hands. Everyone is prooccupied with hands.

Then there's a radio station. Does Hartman get on the air or doesn't he? It's not clear. And so on until the end when Reinheart (or was it Hartman?) climbs up a ladder and stays there.

All Senses of Equal Value

This is just a little bit of the "plot," and if it's confusing, it was not. Mr. Silverman and his colleague, Richard Foreman, who wrote the libretto for "Elephant Steps" and staged it, are courageous men.

What they have done is taken all the senses, not just hearing, and given them equal value. They have stretched the awareness. Reinheart's falling out of bed, for instance, has the same function as a musical note or accent. So does a green light bulb that keeps going on and off, irregularly but often, and a silent film loop in which a man takes gloves out of his pocket and puts them on over and over again. In a stream of consciousness way, "Elephant Steps" has form.

If it seemed uneventful at times, it was partly for mechanical reasons. Two of six loud speakers did not function. A projector failed to operate during one scene. There were human difficulties, too.

The actor-singers were sometimes slow in their responses. And one suspects that Mr. Silverman and Mr. Foreman need to add more unexpected events to occupy the fringe of the senses. "Elephant Steps" needs more "notes," musical and otherwise, to keep the pace from flagging.

But dead spots or not, the two men have entered a challenging realm and are successful enough on first try to make "Elephant Steps" very beguiling. Just don't try to understand it.

The spirited participants, all members of the Berkshire Music Center, were Spence Jackson, Luther Enstad, Susan Hoagland, James Jones, Philip Erikson, Linden Maxwell, Donna Newman, Paul Zukofsky, Michael Tilson Thomas, who conducted, and members of the Berkshire Center Orchestra and Chorus.

"Elephant Steps" was commissioned by the center and the Fromm Foundation, sponsors of the Festival of Contemporary Music, of which the concert was a part.

Earlier in the program, Erich Leinsdorf conducted the center's orchestra in superheated performances of Schoenberg's "Die Glückliche Hand."

By IRVING LOWENS
Music Critic of The Star

TANGLEWOOD, Near Lenox, Mass. — What with so many spectacular new summer homes for orchestras popping up all over the country like mushrooms after a spring rain, it is easy to forget that the oldest of these installations is, in many ways, still the best.

Tanglewood means much more than weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The place is really the center of that orchestra's educational activities, and Erich Leinsdorf and his colleagues take education seriously.

Surely, one of the most important educational activities at Tanglewood, for composer, performer and listener alike, is the annual Festival of Contemporary American Music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. The fifth such festival took place here from Aug. 4 through 11; as usual, it was sornething of a mind-stretcher.

Performed during the course of seven concerts were 31 compositons by 28 composers, including premieres of four works commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center. The Fromm commissions went to Richard Trythall (for his "Continuums" for orchestra), Mark DeVoto (for his "The Distinguished Thing," subtitled Concerto No. 3 for Piano and 12 Instruments), William T. McKinley (for his "Premises and Expositions" for eight instruments) and Stanley Silverman (for his stage piece, "Elephant Steps").

Other composers represented on the programs were, in order of their appearance, Priscilla Smiley, Kenneth Gaburo, J. K. Randall, Mario Davidovsky, Gyorgy Ligeti, Earle Brown, Leon Kirchner, Ernst Krenek, Mel Powell, Boris Blacher, Joseph Maneri, Donald Harris, Edwin London, Arnold Schoenberg, Andrew Imbrie, Joseph Schwantner, Lawrence Moss, Yannis Xenakis, Robert Cogan, Charles Ives, Edgard Varese, Ingolf Dahl, Anton Webern and Bohuslav Martinu.

Emphasis during the 1968 Fromm week was less insistently on the latest thing — something of a healthy development, I should say. The avant-garde was on hand and was treated with courtesy and respect, but the general feeling-tone of the festival was somewhat retrospective. Indeed, a special point was made of this development.

"Tonight's performance of Arnold Schoenberg's Op. 18," wrote Daniel Hathaway in his program notes for the Aug. 7 performances of "Die Glueckliche Hand," "is the direct result of a conversation between Paul Fromm and Erich Leinsdorf. Mr. Fromm suggested that the Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood might well include not only examples of music being written in the present decade, but also representative works already in the repertoire from earlier in the century — pieces which have had a profound influence on later composition and which serve as a background to compositional activities in our own time. Mr. Leinsdorf responded enthusiastically to this suggestion, and has chosen 'Die Glueckliche Hand' for inclusion in the present contemporary music series."

Additional evidences of an attempt to give the festival an added dimension in time were the presentation (on the afternoon of Aug. 10) of all four Charles Ives violin sonatas, and (on the final day of the festival) of music by such comparative fuddy-duddies as Varese, Dahl, Webern and Martinu.

This was all to the good, but I have to confess that of all the music I heard, the most fascinating (if not the most successful) was a wild, way-out "occult opera upon perception and upon accomplishment" by Stanley Silverman entitled "Elephant Steps," which occupied the second half of the Aug. 7 bill. It is to be repeated on Aug. 22.

Silverman, who studied with Kirchner and Milhaud, is music director for the Repertory Theater at the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts in New York City. He is a knowledgeable theater man, with an uncanny knack for mimicking the styles of other men. Among his works is some incidental music for Bertolt Brecht's "Galileo," which I saw and heard in the Williamstown (Mass.) Theater a few days after the premiere of "Elephant Steps."

I cannot refrain from quoting the entire program note on Silverman's librettist.

"Richard Foreman," it goes, "reports that very little is known about Mr. Foreman."

For that matter, very little is known about Richard Foreman's libretto, even after the opera has been experienced. A translation into recognizable English of a few sentences from the synopsis goes like this:

"Scene I: Hartman in bed, the doctor and Hannah in attendance. Max comes in and says, 'Stop seeing Reinheart.'

"Scene II: Outside Reinheart's home: Max tries to scare everyone. Hartman faints as the doctor magically passes through the door.

You get the picture — don't worry about the plot. What takes place on stage for more than an hour is a continual circus, quite irrational but nevertheless imbued with some sort of wild logic. To the orthodox singers, arias, ensembles, orchestra, chorus, scenery and conductor, Silverman has added everything (including the kitchen sink) — film clips, slides, spoken episodes, electronically generated sounds, flashing lights, a conductor who participates in the general pandemonium on stage, a concertmaster who takes stage center and does the most hilarious off-pitch take-off on gypsy cafe fiddlers I have ever experienced.

The music? A collage which utilizes jazz, rock, folk, torch song, tape, Renaissance madrigal (in a screamingly funny burlesque of the New York Pro Musica), and what have you.

If it sounds odd, it is. Yet for a good part of the 70 minutes or so that the piece lasts, it grips the attention and engages the imagination. I do think that it would improve with a little editorial discipline. Half the length would have been twice as good. But there is no gainsaying the hypnotic effect of "Elephant Steps."

One of the most extraordinary things about this extraordinary piece is that Michael Tilson Thomas and not the composer conducted. And the other participants in the action, all of whom did splendidly by Silverman, deserve at least mention by name. They were Spence Jackson, Luther Enstad, Susan Hoagland, James Jones, Philip Erikson, Linden Maxwell, Donna Newman, and Paul Zukovsky.

Is this really necessary, some outraged and enraged Beethoven-lover might well inquire? It is, I am afraid, and I can find no words more cogent to explain why than those of Erich Leinsdorf:

"The Festival of Contemporary American Music is a necessity, and as director of the Berkshire Music Center and as music director of the Boston Symphony I feel profound gratitude toward the Fromm Foundation, which has for years supported this venture. My own feelings about the necessity of such a festival are mixed. If the public were receptive to the various trends of the present day contemporary musical creative efforts, we could more easily, more frequently, more lightheartedly, and more confidently schedule as part of our regular programs the works of the gifted younger generation, even the frankly experimental pieces. This is the only correct position of contemporary music.

"Approximately 20 years ago the late Wilhelm Furtwaengler said that the contemporary composer must be able to face the confrontation with his colleagues of the past, and if he cannot stand being performed between Mozart and Brahms or between Bach and Tchaikovsky then we have something very seriously wrong in our music world. There is no service to either the composer or the public if one places indiscriminate blame rather than face the mood as it exists in the ever-broadening audience today. There is a gulf that separates the contemporary composer from the majority of the music attending public. To deny this is to deny a simple fact of our life. Whether it be in Vienna or Berlin, Paris or Milan, London or Boston, San Francisco or New York the problem still exists, and it is distressing that we do not know exactly how to solve it. No amount of talk or written admonition can mask this simple and appalling state.

"It is the task of a music center (which can rely on specialized groups — both performing and listening, which can count on a special mood of relaxed concentration during the summer months, which can play for groups of people who do not come to us tired from a working day) to present all schools of contemporary music — experimental, improvisational, electronic, for example. We hope that over the years this service will help to clarify the central issue — how to get the public at large to be as curious, as expectant as eager for a new opus from a living composer as were our grandfathers when a new work by Brahms was announced for performance."

A footnote. It is self-evident that music critics too are deeply concerned about what Leinsdorf terms "the central issue." To the end that critics may be better able to clarify it for their readers, and as the result of friendly discussions over the past year, the national Music Critics Association will be presenting professional workshops centered around the Festival of Contemporary American Music beginning in 1969 at Tanglewood, with the complete cooperation of both the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Who knows? A decade from now there might be hundreds of music critics who really dig it.

---

ttheevidencetothecontrary-onemustknowthatherthere einheart#1norReinheart#2isacharleton.SceneI:Hartm aninbed,thedoctorandHannahinattendence.Maxcomesin andsays"StopseeingReinheart."SceneII:OutsideReinh eart'shome:Maxtriestoscareeveryone.Hartmanfaintsa sthedoctormagicallypassesthroughthedoor.SceneIII: Theradiostation.WillHartmanbeputontheairbyMaxandO tto?Whatwillhehavetoaccountfor?Interlude(Recapitu lation)SceneIV:Acozykitchen,dancingaroundthetable asMaxandOttohideunderneathinhopesofcatching...Har tmanremembershisexperienceoutsideReinheart'shome, andfeelsverystrangeandchanges.Note:descendingligh tbulbinsceneIinhomagetoKenJacobsNote:thetheatrica laspectsofthisproductionrepresentsopus#2inaseries of12ontological-hystericproductionsbyMrForemanNot e:ontheoppositesideofthispagethenameMichaelThomas shouldread"MichaelTilsonThomas"Note:duringintermi ssionafulllengthfilmwillbeshownonthetheaterNote:e lectronicmusicrealizedattheColumbia-PrincetonElec tronicMusicCenter,assistant,PrilSmiley.Informatio nlOrulesl,UnderstandingReinheartmeansunderstandin goneself2,Itisdesirabletoapproach Reinheart'spersc n3,Itisnotdesirabletocall Reinheart'sattentiontoon

SYNOPSIS? LIBRETTO?

Whatever it may be called, it is Richard Foreman's words for "Elephant Steps" by Stanley Silverman. It may not have a label, but it exists. And understanding comes before labeling, anyway.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,499 SUN. 1,494,704
AUG 9 1968

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
CIRC. 358,738
AUG 18 1968

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,300
AUG 9 1968

Première of 'Elephant Steps': omni-opera?

By Craig Stinson

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

There were two extraordinary pieces of theatrical entertainment on the program at Tanglewood Wednesday night. The concert, fourth in the current Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored jointly by the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center, included two performances of Schoenberg's "Die Glückliche Hand" as well as the world première of a work by Stanley Silverman entitled "Elephant Steps, an occult opera upon perception and upon accomplishment."

"Die Glückliche Hand" is, of course, not contemporary. It dates from the years 1910-1913, long before Schoenberg had developed his 12-tone system of composition.

In fact, however, the piece has almost never been performed. Its première in Vienna in 1924 was one of the few public successes during the early part of Schoenberg's career. Yet few conductors have ventured to try it since.

Schoenberg monodrama

There was ample reason therefore for Erich Leinsdorf to program it alongside the more recent works. What was disappointing in the extreme was that Mr. Leinsdorf chose to do a concert version—without costumes, sets, lights, or action.

The Tanglewood Theater is not a large place, and there is no pit; but even if the music had had to be canned and played back over a loudspeaker in order to permit action on the stage, the effect would have been far more meaningful.

"Die Glückliche Hand" is a symbolic, presumably autobiographical monodrama for baritone, chorus, and orchestra, in which the visual elements—especially the lighting—are almost as closely regulated as the music. Schoenberg the visual artist is involved in this piece as well as Schoenberg the musician. Doing the work without those visual components is a bit like doing "Aïda" without the music. The listener can get almost as much by putting on a record—which he has been able to do for a number of years now.

As for "Elephant Steps," it too was frustrating, but only so long as one occupied himself with such useless questions as "What is it all about?"

Operatic dada?

The work may indeed have been about something (there were one or two short threads of continuity), but for the most part the stage action—in rapidly changing settings from a hospital to a radio studio—seemed bizarre and unrelated. Comprehensibility was further reduced by poor diction on the part of several of the singers.

The only sensible approach, from the listener's point of view, was to enjoy it as a piece of operatic dada (there were in fact a number of clear references to the styles and aesthetics of the '20's). As such it was most entertaining.

It also proved that Mr. Silverman is versatile in a number of different media. Electronic tape loops, film loops, still projections, "serious" (mostly atonal) music, pop music, rock, jazz, you-name-it—it was all there in a kind of omni-opera, and all handled with impressive dexterity.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the current Koussevitzky Fellow at the Berkshire Music Center—displayed a commensurate level of dexterity in coordinating the piece from the podium.

100.

Art

Music Review

Opera Comes to Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

LAST NIGHT'S program at Tanglewood overpowered and dazed its audience to a greater degree than any other event in the week-long Festival of Contemporary Music being sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

* * *

THERE WERE but two works — the first was Arnold Schoenberg's 20-minute operetta "Die Gluckliche Hand" (The Lucky Touch), which dates from 1913. For this, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came over to the student orchestra and small chorus of the Center and conducted an extremely well-prepared and tightly-knit performance. Furthermore, with great consideration and courtesy, he repeated the entire drama. It cannot easily be grasped at one hearing.

The other part of the evening was a commission of the Center and the foundation to Stanley Silverman, music director for the Repertory Theatre at Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts. This single act is painfully long, mainly incomprehensible and a gigantic spoof which is entitled "Elephant Steps."

* * *

SCHOENBERG'S DRAMA had definite influence on the direction of a trend in the music which was to follow. The libretto is his own, as is the musical language. The play is deeply involved in symbolism of a man's quest for earthly happiness. The means of expression are cogent and compelling and, while not easily intelligible, the impact is undeniable.

I remember hearing Euripides' "Medea" performed in period after World War I in the Olympic Stadium at Athens. The language was completely beyond me. The chorus used a directly here effective as its classic predecessor. The single vocal soloist, distinctly qualified, in the character of "Der Mann" (the Man) was baritone Leslie Guinn.

The play is in four episodes or scenes played without interruption. The stage directions if utilized, would require the activation of fantastic devices, but it is the music which expresses the surging emotions of the intense short tragedy in a language as Greek to me as was "Medea," but equally impressive.

* * *

SILVERMAN'S WORK defies classification. It contains fragments of every possible derivation, some decidedly unpleasant others light and diverting. It was staged by a cast which may have sensed its meaning, which was bewildering to a part, at least, of the audience. There were obvious hallucinations proceeding from considerable impedimenta on stage. Strangely costumed characters moved, or rested, in ticket booths, a dirty bed, mobile instant outhouses; there were unshaded light bulbs, grotesque still pictures projected on the wall to the rear high behind the music action and orchestra and a company of six vocalists seated to the right on stage. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted with conspicuous control of the many impossibly-related components.

* * *

THE MUSIC was reminiscent of current popular styles and in that sense was ingratiating, but it reminded me of the Brecht

Berkshire Eagle 8-8-'68

THE BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
DAILY CIRC. 175,118
SUN. CIRC. 185,317

8-18-68

The World Of Music

A Festival Within A Festival

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

Tanglewood, of course, doesn't only mean the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert. Ever since 1940, when the Berkshire Music Center was established at Tanglewood by Serge Koussevitzky, the center has been developed to provide professional training and artistic experience to young musicians. The Tanglewood Institute is now operated by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music, under the aegis of the Berkshire Music Center, and offers in addition to music, courses in the related arts.

One of the outstanding features of these activities is the annual Festival of Contemporary American Music, a festival within a festival, which was initiated in 1963, with the generous support of the Fromm Music Foundation — dedicated to the furtherance of contemporary music — began its general program at Tanglewood in 1957.

The festival is part of the contemporary music program at the Berkshire Center, which includes instruction on composition for a limited number of composers as well as the study and performance of contemporary music. This program is headed by Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory in Music, a composer in his own right, who replaced Aaron Copland, who retired in 1965 after 25 years as head of the center's composition department.

The Contemporary Music Festival provides a week-long confrontation with the new ideas and directions in music. "The Festival," Schuller assures us, "does not claim to be comprehensive or all-permissive," but it has given opportunity to the contemporary musical creator and given the contemporary creations well-prepared performances.

A special stimulus has been provided by Paul Fromm and the center by annually commissioning a number of works by young composers, many of whom are in attendance, helping to prepare the performances and meeting with the students and critics as well. Many now-recognized compositions failed at premiere performances simply because they were poorly performed.

Here at Tanglewood, Gunther Schuller sees to it that this does not happen. With deep understanding and loving devotion he prepares and often conducts these works, no matter how far out, how complex. It is a challenge to him as well as to the fellows of the institute who play with professional aplomb and dedication.

Whether the music always succeeds, I am not sure, but it does provide another channel of communication between composer and public, without which all music would die of attrition. After having listened to rehearsals and several concerts of this "new" music, however, I am no longer certain if this is the ideal way of presenting such individual creations which tax both ear and mind.

A two-hour concentrated dose of unfamiliar idioms saturated at least this listener — a fact which was brought home beautifully when a different frame was established in the midweek program when Schoenberg's "Die Gluckliche Hand," anno 1910-13, was first presented in concert form (twice in fact — it is only some 20 minutes long) and was then followed by a commissioned opera, "Elephant Steps," by Stanley Silverman.

All of a sudden, the developmental lines become clearer, and perhaps herein lies the solution, or at least one of them: the juxtapositioning of the old, the recent, and the very new. It permits for sequence analysis, for the time-clock within us does compel us to sequential reasoning.

Schoenberg's music — and remember when it was composed — is not at all forbidding, with its romantic undertow and its thick orchestration. Leinsdorf conducted, the singers did well, especially Leslie Guinn in a difficult role. It does not contain one iota of traditional melody or aria, and even the orchestration is different, and yet it is accessible. And it was an inspiration to give it an immediate second reading.

Silverman's theatrical production on the other hand is of our time, very much so, and even in its limited stage presentation, it carried. It is a spoof in that it is a written-out happening with a tremendous scope of imagination. The libretto, by Richard Foreman, is formless, there is no plot except for a preoccupation with hands and other bits of symbolism — Freudian and otherwise — but Silverman handled the music like a cartoonist. He caught the salient characteristics of many styles: rock 'n roll, early jazz, torch-song, legitimate opera, Renaissance madrigal, lied, and even a gypsy fiddler and early radio, and laughs with them all a la Moliere.

The whole thing is just a bit out of focus. He is looking over his glasses, out of the corner of a gimlet eye with tongue in cheek and — doesn't grin once. It's a lark and great fun, but opera it is not — and perhaps not even very original, except that young Silverman proved that he knows styles and can write in all of them. The participants were better singers than actors, naturally, and the orchestra on the side of the stage under the vigorous and propulsive conducting by Michael Tilson Thomas did very well in support.

Perhaps one salient feature emerged: Silverman's pre-occupation with rhythmic devices — falling out of bed at regular intervals, a green light that goes on and off with perplexing irregularity, sheer noise, a conductor using a wooden stomper (a new musical instrument?) to bang on the podium, etc. — were all used as integrated rhythmic elements. The staging was Kafka-esque, or at least so intended. And for awhile, the theater-concert hall rocked to shake its very foundations. Not that the audience minded and that audience included Paul Fromm, William Kroll, the eminent violinist; author William Shirer; composer Ernest Krenek; Mme. Koussevitzky; composer Leon Kirchner; pianist Gina Bachauer, and ever so many other prominent musicians.

Schoenberg emerged here as the "grand old master of contemporary music," as Leinsdorf pegged him, and gave up an idea, why we are today where we are in musical composition. Of course Silverson also used electronic music, film and slides, but Schoenberg would have, too, were he living now.

As to some of the other music heard on other programs, much of it had some personal touch, but not much of that. The eerie wisps of sound alternating with the battery breaking forth into eruptions of furor are becoming derivative, thinned out, repetitious and for that matter, redundantly boring.

Whatever the overall reactions to these and other compositions, it all proved fascinating, delightful, exciting and stimulating.

It was delightful to see the State of Ohio so well represented in the institute's fellows, 10 or more, and Toledo has two representatives: Mary Durell, of 1415 Kenyon Dr., who was graduated last June from BGSU where she studied cello with Peter Howard, and for five years played with the Toledo Youth Orchestra, where she occupied first chair and was soloist, also with the Toledo Orchestra. She also had studied two years at Juilliard with Leonard Rose, spent summers at Meadowmount School and Brevard Music Center. This fall she will play with the St. Louis Symphony.

The other Toledoan is violinist J. Patrick Rafferty, of 2427 Parkwod Ave., who is a student at BGSU, where he studies with Paul Malara. He too has studied at Brevard (N.C.) Music Center and at Interlochen (Mich.) and has played with the Toledo Youth Orchestra, occupying the concertmaster's chair. Both were in high praise of the Tanglewood program but complained that there never was enough time to do everything. And we were glad to greet Cecile Vashaw, supervisor of music for Toledo's Public Schools, as well as Charles Pease, oboist of the Toledo Orchestra.

SCARSDALE INQUIRER
Thursday, August 15, 1968

Richard Foreman Writes 'Elephant Steps' Libretto

Richard Foreman, playwright son of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Foreman of 14 Murray Hill Road, wrote the libretto for "Elephant Steps," a experimental "pop opera," which had its premiere at Tanglewood, Mass. on August 7, and was so well received that it is scheduled to be repeated twice — on August 13 and on August 22.

The composer of the opera is Stanley Silverman, Music Director of Manhattan's Lincoln Center Repertory Theatre. The opera was commissioned and produced for the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival. The opera, or "happening," as some reviewers have called it, consists of bits of jazz, rock'n roll, Renaissance madrigal, Hemmerley, torch song, tape music, and straight opera. The work also includes spoken episodes, film clips and slide projections.

Richard Foreman is a member of the Board of New Dramatists and works closely with Jonas Mekas for the Film-Maker's Cinematheque in New York City.

Mr. Foreman was graduated from Scarsdale High School in 1955. He studied creative writing at Brown University and graduated Phi Beta Kappa in 1959. He then attended Yale Drama School.

Mr. Foreman was formerly the Assistant Director of Summer Theatre in Scarsdale, working with John Whitestone

Music Theatre

CREATORS of "Elephant Steps," the opera which received its world premiere on Aug. 7 at Tanglewood, pose on stage during rehearsal. Richard Foreman, left, is the librettist; music was written by Stanley Silverman on commission from the Berkshire Music Center. "Elephant Steps" will be repeated at Tanglewood Aug. 22.

Berkshire Eagle 8-13-'68

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Monday, August 5, 1968

Opera to debut

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. — The 1968 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the fifth year by the Berkshire Music Center with the Fromm Music Foundation, began yesterday and runs through Sunday here. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, and opera are being presented.

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct a performance of Schoenberg's Die Glueckliche Hand on Wednesday at 8 p.m., preceding the premiere of a new opera by Stanley Siverman (music) and Richard Foreman (words).

Called "Elephant Steps," it is the first stage work to be commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, and includes pop elements and filmed segments. The performance will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, one of the BMC conducting fellows.

Three other works are also BMC-Fromm commissions to be premiered. Tonight, Richard Trythall's Continuums will be heard on a BMC orchestra program to be conducted by Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center.

Tomorrow, Mark DeVoto's "The Distinguished Thing" (Concerto No. 3 for piano and 12 instruments) will be heard on a chamber music program which will also include William T. McKinley's "Premises and Expositions."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
AUG 13 1968
New England Newsclip

Whitestone Photo

CREATORS of "Elephant Steps," the opera which received its world premiere on Aug. 7 at Tanglewood, pose on stage during rehearsal. Richard Foreman, left, is the librettist; music was written by Stanley Silverman on commission from the Berkshire Music Center. "Elephant Steps" will be repeated at Tanglewood Aug. 22.

STEPS"—Stence Jackson as Hartman in Stanley Silverman's "occu ng planned happening which had its premiere at the Berkshire Festiv

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
AUG 16 1968

gypsy air. A rock beat crashed into Renaissance madrigals. Ragtime, ragas, taped noises and electronic bleeps tumbled together in a swirl of sound that satirized serious music as much as schmalz. Silverman says it was all meant to be "fun, like raping the styles."

The libretto by Playwright-Film Maker Richard Foreman bristled with the same anarchic spirit. Against a background of film strips and flashing lights, it unfolded a plotless jumble of scenes that might have resulted from a collaboration by Brecht, Beckett and Buster Keaton. "Nobody looks at me," sang one character in a typically enigmatic line, "therefore I retrace my steps." In another episode, a scruffy charwoman

DAVID GAHR

"ELEPHANT STEPS" AT TANGLEWOOD
Switch of life.

incongruously trilled out an aria while brandishing a three-foot wooden spoon at the other characters.

Although the work baffled some and bemused others, it had a cohesive rhythm of its own, and it succeeded in gripping the attention of the Tanglewood audience through its sheer theatrical flair. Silverman, 30, is music director of Manhattan's Lincoln Center Repertory Theater and an evangelist for a new form of music-theater. As a former student of Leon Kirchner and Darius Milhaud, he has a solid background in "pure" classical composition. But, he says, "I wanted to get into pop music and rock. I can do this much better than the other stuff. Musical comedy is the great American sound, but most of its composers haven't had the technique to carry it further. They write as if Mozart and Weill had never lived. Only Gershwin and Bernstein have gone on to higher musical theater." Elephant Steps indicates that Silverman hopes someday to add his name to that list.

TIME, AUGUST 16, 1968

Silverman's 'Elephant Steps': 'occult . . . fascinating'

Whitestone Photo

Elephant Steps," music critic Irving Lowens of The Sunday Star (Washington, D.C.) declared, following his stay at Tanglewood, where he attended the Festival of Contemporary American Music. The event took place from August 4-11 at the Massachusetts music gathering.

The opera, with libretto by Richard Foreman, was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, which sponsored the festival. It was performed for the first time, August 7. The work was given a repeat performance, August 22.

". . . it sounded—well, like a giant radio with its dials spinning crazily," Time said. "Dissonant 12-tone textures melted into a gypsy air. A rock beat crashed into Renaissance madrigals. Ragtime, ragas, taped noises and electronic bleeps tumbled together in a swirl of sound that satirized serious music as much as schmalz. Silverman says it was all meant to be 'fun, like raping the styles.'"

Its libretto is open to several interpretations. "It deals with an old problem, man's inability to communicate with man," George Gelles declared in the Boston Record-American. Critic Lowens felt one should not worry about the plot. "What takes place on stage . . . is a continual circus, quite irrational but nevertheless imbued with some sort of wild logic."

What Silverman and his collaborator did was barrage the senses, using all the musical forms of opera, live and taped, plus speech, films, slide projections and other apparatus brought into play in mixed-media happenings.

Silverman and Foreman "are courageous men," The New York Times's Theodore Strongin declared. "What they have done is taken all the senses, not just hearing, and given them equal value. . . . the two men have entered a challenging realm and are successful enough on the first try to make Elephant Steps very beguiling."

Those who participated in the presentation of this "occult opera" included Spence Jackson, Luther Enstad, Susan Hoagland, James Jones, Philip Erikson, Linden Maxwell, Donna Newman, Paul Zukofsky, and Michael Tilson Thomas, who conducted, and members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Chorus.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,851 SUN. 1,124,946
AUG 9 1968

Opera at Tanglewood Emerges Cool, Kooky

BY THOMAS WILLIS

Lenox, Mass.

CONSIDERING the put-on state of a quantity of modern art, it would be hard to say whether "Elephant Steps," which had its first performance at the Boston Symphony orchestra's Tanglewood Wednesday night, was planned to tie in the G. O. P. hoopla at Miami Beach. One certainty, tho, is that the new opera by Stanley Silverman, is concerned with conventions only to the extent that one must know them to disregard them.

For this is a cool, kooky work, the individuality of which depends on ambivalence, ambiguity, and deft manipulation of a collage of people and sounds. There is no immediately discernible plot. The settting is unspecified, the time immaterial.

The singers, tape recorder operators, and onstage orchestra are surrounded by slide projections and motion picture loops. The audience in turn is buffeted by sounds, for much of the score comes from the rear of the house. The conductor, in this case, Michael Tilson Thomas, is himself an actor, standing beneath a lighted canopy, pounding on the floor with a giant wooden tamper, occasionally giving spoken cues, and so on.

The composer shifts style channels as easily as one turns a dial, flicking from a taxi dance hall to a Rudy Vallee ballad in a part-nostalgic, part-satiric panorama of the days of radio.

Corn and cliche from the bygone period of Hollywood pop are accurately sketched for an aural silver screen. At one point, an uglified coloratura sings beautifully of her beauty. In other places, a rasping electronic ostinato, reminiscent of the score to Merce Cunningham's "Winterbranch," scrapes out the passing of time.

At least one part of the title's multi-media symbolism has to do with an elephant's big ears. Mr. Silverman and his librettist, Richard Foreman, just possibly are suggesting that these ears were distended in a frantic, losing effort at sound discrimination.

Like so many modern theater pieces, "Elephant Steps" rides piggy-back on history wherever it finds it, multiplying associative references with each quick change. With only one exposure, an astonishing number of antecedents communicate. For starters, the doctor in the first scene could have been Wozzeck's, just as the scrubwoman coloratura could have been Mozart's Papagena. The central figure is never seen, but apparently is a sort of schizophrenic Godot.

Music

Even tho it is not long [90 minutes or so], the new work cannot quite go the distance. It should be tightened even more. With all the time spent guessing riddles and speculating on possible psychological groundings, several ho-hum moments remained.

At best, these eclectic, enigmatic works are great fun, especially if you are convinced that their creators are playing at music and not just playing around. There is little question that everyone concerned with "Elephant Steps" knew what he was doing and how to do it, including the cast and orchestra of students from the Berkshire music-center.

Another enigma, this one from an earlier period, opened the evening. It was a concert version of Arnold Schoenberg's 20-minute music drama, "Die Glueckliche Hand," dating from the birth years of the tone row, 1910 to 1913. Rarely performed, and perhaps never before an American audience, it is as pure a musical example of expressionism as one is likely to find.

The single character, identified only as "The Man," is first seen as prostrated victim; the devourer is described as a fantastic vampire with a hyena's laugh and a bat's wings.

The score is complex, inventive, and compelling in its descriptions of the distorted realm of innermost dreams. Both Erich Leindorf, who was conducting, and the student orchestra and chorus, were impressively aware of the intentions of each moment. The excellent soloist, who has comparatively little to sing, was Leslie Guinn, on loan from the nearby Marlboro Music center.

This was the fourth event in Tanglewood's annual week of contemporary programs, sponsored here by Paul Fromm, the Chicago wine importer and an enthusiastic patron of today's music. Once again, he has every reason to be pleased.

OPERA

Spinning the Dial

As a youngster in The Bronx, Composer Stanley Silverman was fascinated by the blur of sounds he got from spinning a radio dial. Pop tunes, speeches, symphonies, soap operas—all jostled with each other in a way that struck Silverman as symbolic. "I decided," he says, "that life itself is like switching the dial of a radio."

Last week Silverman's experimental "pop opera," Elephant Steps, had its premiere at Tanglewood in Massachusetts, and it sounded—well, like a giant radio with its dials spinning crazily. Dissonant 12-tone textures melted into a

* Oddly, composers as a group seem to be unusually prone to bizarre deaths. Among others: Jean-Baptiste Lully (1632-1687) died of gangrene after smashing his foot with a heavy, canelike conductor's baton while leading an orchestra; Charles Valentin-Alkan (1813-1888) toppled a bookcase over on himself while reaching for a copy of the Talmud; Tchaikovsky (1840-1893) came down with cholera after drinking a glass of tap water; and Wallingford Riegger (1885-1961) suffered fatal brain damage when he became entangled in the leashes of two fighting dogs and fell on a sidewalk.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16,000
OCT 1968

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,851 SUN. 1,124,946
AUG 10 1968

Enigmas Are for Listening

BY THOMAS WILLIS

[Reprinted from yesterday's late editions]

Lenox, Mass.

CONSIDERING the put-on state of a quantity of modern art, it would be hard to say wooden tamper, occasionally giving spoken cues, and so on.

The composer shifts style channels as just as the scrubwoman coloratura could have

'WILD, WAY-OUT OPERA'

". . . of all the music I heard, the most fascinating . . . was a wild, way-out 'occult opera upon perception and upon accomplishment' by Stanley Silverman entitled

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,230
AUG 13 1968
New England Newspapers

Whitestone Photo

CREATORS of "Elephant Steps," the opera which received its world premiere on Aug. 7 at Tanglewood, posed on stage during rehearsal. Richard Foreman, left, is the librettist; music was written by Stanley Silverman on commission from the Berkshire Music Center. "Elephant Steps" will be repeated at Tanglewood Aug. 22.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,851 SUN. 1,124,946
AUG 9 1968

Opera at Tanglewood Emerges Cool, Kooky

BY THOMAS WILLIS

Lenox, Mass.

CONSIDERING the put-on state of a quantity of modern art, it would be hard to say whether "Elephant Steps," which had its first performance at the Boston Symphony orchestra's Tanglewood Wednesday night, was planned to tie in the G. O. P. hoopla at Miami Beach. One certainty, tho, is that the new opera by Stanley Silverman, is concerned with conventions only to the extent that one must know them to disregard them.

For this is a cool, kooky work, the individuality of which depends on ambivalence, ambiguity, and deft manipulation of a collage of people and sounds. There is no immediately discernible plot. The settting is unspecified, the time immaterial.

The singers, tape recorder operators, and onstage orchestra are surrounded by slide projections and motion picture loops. The audience in turn is buffeted by sounds, for much of the score comes from the rear of the house. The conductor, in this case, Michael Tilson Thomas, is himself an actor, standing beneath a lighted canopy, pounding on the floor with a giant wooden tamper, occasionally giving spoken cues, and so on.

The composer shifts style channels as easily as one turns a dial, flicking from a taxi dance hall to a Rudy Vallee ballad in a part-nostalgic, part-satiric panorama of the days of radio.

Corn and cliche from the bygone period of Hollywood pop are accurately sketched for an aural silver screen. At one point, an uglified coloratura sings beautifully of her beauty. In other places, a rasping electronic ostinato, reminiscent of the score to Merce Cunningham's "Winterbranch," scrapes out the passing of time.

At least one part of the title's multi-media symbolism has to do with an elephant's big ears. Mr. Silverman and his librettist, Richard Foreman, just possibly are suggesting that these ears were distended in a frantic, losing effort at sound discrimination.

Like so many modern theater pieces, "Elephant Steps" rides piggy-back on history wherever it finds it, multiplying associative references with each quick change. With only one exposure, an astonishing number of antecedents communicate. For starters, the doctor in the first scene could have been Wozzeck's, just as the scrubwoman coloratura could have been Mozart's Papagena. The central figure is never seen, but apparently is a sort of schizophrenic Godot.

Music

Even tho it is not long [90 minutes or so], the new work cannot quite go the distance. It should be tightened even more. With all the time spent guessing riddles and speculating on possible psychological groundings, several ho-hum moments remained.

At best, these eclectic, enigmatic works are great fun, especially if you are convinced that their creators are playing at music and not just playing around. There is little question that everyone concerned with "Elephant Steps" knew what he was doing and how to do it, including the cast and orchestra of students from the Berkshire music center.

Another enigma, this one from an earlier period, opened the evening. It was a concert version of Arnold Schoenberg's 20-minute music drama, "Die Glueckliche Hand," dating from the birth years of the tone row, 1910 to 1913. Rarely performed, and perhaps never before an American audience, it is as pure a musical example of expressionism as one is likely to find.

The single character, identified only as "The Man," is first seen as prostrated victim; the devourer is described as a fantastic vampire with a hyena's laugh and a bat's wings.

The score is complex, inventive, and compelling in its descriptions of the distorted realm of innermost dreams. Both Erich Leindorf, who was conducting, and the student orchestra and chorus, were impressively aware of the intentions of each moment. The excellent soloist, who has comparatively little to sing, was Leslie Guinn, on loan from the nearby Marlboro Music center.

This was the fourth event in Tanglewood's annual week of contemporary programs, sponsored here by Paul Fromm, the Chicago wine importer and an enthusiastic patron of today's music. Once again, he has every reason to be pleased.

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000
AUG 16 1968

Silverman's 'Elephant Steps': 'occult . . . fascinating'

Whitestone Photo

"STEPS"—Stence Jackson as Hartman in Stanley Silverman's "occult . . . fascinating" planned happening which had its premiere at the Berkshire Festival.

OPERA

Spinning the Dial

As a youngster in The Bronx, Composer Stanley Silverman was fascinated by the blur of sounds he got from spinning a radio dial. Pop tunes, speeches, symphonies, soap operas—all jostled with each other in a way that struck Silverman as symbolic. "I decided," he says, "that life itself is like switching the dial of a radio."

Last week Silverman's experimental "pop opera," Elephant Steps, had its premiere at Tanglewood in Massachusetts, and it sounded—well, like a giant radio with its dials spinning crazily. Dissonant 12-tone textures melted into a gypsy air. A rock beat crashed into Renaissance madrigals. Ragtime, ragas, taped noises and electronic bleeps tumbled together in a swirl of sound that satirized serious music as much as schmalz. Silverman says it was all meant to be "fun, like raping the styles."

The libretto by Playwright-Film Maker Richard Foreman bristled with the same anarchic spirit. Against a background of film strips and flashing lights, it unfolded a plotless jumble of scenes that might have resulted from a collaboration by Brecht, Beckett and Buster Keaton. "Nobody looks at me," sang one character in a typically enigmatic line, "therefore I retrace my steps." In another episode, a scruffy charwoman incongruously trilled out an aria while brandishing a three-foot wooden spoon at the other characters.

Although the work baffled some and bemused others, it had a cohesive rhythm of its own, and it succeeded in gripping the attention of the Tanglewood audience through its sheer theatrical flair. Silverman, 30, is music director of Manhattan's Lincoln Center Repertory Theater and an evangelist for a new form of music-theater. As a former student of Leon Kirchner and Darius Milhaud, he has a solid background in "pure" classical composition. But, he says, "I wanted to get into pop music and rock. I can do this much better than the other stuff. Musical comedy is the great American sound, but most of its composers haven't had the technique to carry it further. They write as if Mozart and Weill had never lived. Only Gershwin and Bernstein have gone on to higher musical theater." Elephant Steps indicates that Silverman hopes someday to add his name to that list.

TIME, AUGUST 16, 1968

* Oddly, composers as a group seem to be unusually prone to bizarre deaths. Among others: Jean-Baptiste Lully (1632-1687) died of gangrene after smashing his foot with a heavy, canelike conductor's baton while leading an orchestra; Charles Valentin-Alkan (1813-1888) toppled a bookcase over on himself while reaching for a copy of the Talmud; Tchaikovsky (1840-1893) came down with cholera after drinking a glass of tap water; and Wallingford Riegger (1885-1961) suffered fatal brain damage when he became entangled in the leashes of two fighting dogs and fell on a sidewalk.

DAVID GAHR

"ELEPHANT STEPS" AT TANGLEWOOD
Switch of life.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,
OCT 1968

Whitestone Photo

Elephant Steps," music critic Irving Lowens of The Sunday Star (Washington, D.C.) declared, following his stay at Tanglewood, where he attended the Festival of Contemporary American Music. The event took place from August 4-11 at the Massachusetts music gathering.

The opera, with libretto by Richard Foreman, was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, which sponsored the festival. It was performed for the first time, August 7. The work was given a repeat performance, August 22.

". . . it sounded—well, like a giant radio with its dials spinning crazily," Time said. "Dissonant 12-tone textures melted into a gypsy air. A rock beat crashed into Renaissance madrigals. Ragtime, ragas, taped noises and electronic bleeps tumbled together in a swirl of sound that satirized serious music as much as schmalz. Silverman says it was all meant to be 'fun, like raping the styles.'"

Its libretto is open to several interpretations. "It deals with an old problem, man's inability to communicate with man," George Gelles declared in the Boston Record-American. Critic Lowens felt one should not worry about the plot. "What takes place on stage . . . is a continual circus, quite irrational but nevertheless imbued with some sort of wild logic."

What Silverman and his collaborator did was barrage the senses, using all the musical forms of opera, live and taped, plus speech, films, slide projections and other apparatus brought into play in mixed-media happenings.

Silverman and Foreman "are courageous men," The New York Times's Theodore Strongin declared. "What they have done is taken all the senses, not just hearing, and given them equal value. . . . the two men have entered a challenging realm and are successful enough on the first try to make Elephant Steps very beguiling."

Those who participated in the presentation of this "occult opera" included Spence Jackson, Luther Enstad, Susan Hoagland, James Jones, Philip Erikson, Linden Maxwell, Donna Newman, Paul Zukofsky, and Michael Tilson Thomas, who conducted, and members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Chorus.

'WILD, WAY-OUT OPERA'

". . . of all the music I heard, the most fascinating . . . was a wild, way-out 'occult' opera upon perception and upon accomplishment' by Stanley Silverman entitled

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,851 SUN. 1,124,946
AUG 10 1968

Enigmas Are for Listening

BY THOMAS WILLIS

[Reprinted from yesterday's late editions]

Lenox, Mass.

CONSIDERING the put-on state of a quantity of modern art, it would hard to wooden tamper, occasionally giving spoken cues, and so on.

The composer shifts style channels as just as the scrubwoman colo- ratura could have 102.

sight and sound

Occult Opera Has a Message

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The flurry of interest aroused by Stanley Silverman's occult opera, "Elephant Steps," probably can be best explained by the current impatience with the past, the almost universal hankering for change.

Written this spring to fulfill a commission from the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center for premiere performance at Tanglewood, "Elephant Steps" has been reported by such eminent journals as the New York Times and Time Magazine and has attracted the attention of upper foundations (i.e., Rockefeller) and educational institutions as a possible subject for promotion.

I saw the second performance Sunday night (the first was Aug. 7, the third, Thursday) and it forced me to believe that its only real interest is in its structure; most of the materials were boring.

Strangely, the composer has indicated that boredom is his major target for destruction. But he may be at least partly forgiven because most of the boredom came from the libretto and staging of Richard Foreman.

"Elephant Steps" is not an opera in the usual, narrative, melodic sense. Nor is it an ad lib, psychedelic "happening." Every note is composed (except for excerpts from old Bing Crosby and Django Reinhardt recordings), and every stage move is plotted and planned.

The casual observer, like me, can believe that this planning took place because the composer said so, not because of what he, the observer, sees or hears. Most of what he sees is unintelligible; the words are not understandable and, of course, the music is abstract.

Generalized Quotes

But first let us indicate what the "opera" is "about" by reporting some generalized quotes from the composer.

"It is a way of organizing the eclectic."

"It is deliberately trying to break up single style."

"The manner of doing it is what is the key."

"Everything you see and hear is what it is about."

Second let us indicate the scene by reporting the solid materials involved: two tape players, three movie projectors, four slide projectors, several speakers placed above the stage and around the hall, eight principal actors (the orchestra conductor is one of the minor actors), six girls in the chorus, 19 musicians in the orchestra occupying one end of the stage.

Principal props on stage are a couple of large boxes painted dull black with windows like huts which people enter and exit without apparent reason and a bed from which one of the characters frequently falls, apparently only because the thud makes a satisfying percussive sound in the musical sequence.

Like many other irrational incidents in the libretto, the unexplained fall-out-of-bed can be interpreted as symbolizing any "significance" the observer fancies.

As a matter of fact, this idea that "it is what you care to think it is," is exactly what the creators wish to communicate along with the deliberate destruction of continuity . . . see above, "break up single style."

The action consists mostly of bizarre poses held by the actor-singers until interest strays and sudden flurries of movement which rivet attention and destroy whatever sequence of sense that had become established.

One of the composer's strongest youthful musical influences (he is 30) was the irrational sequence of sounds one hears while slowly turning a radio dial.

He reproduces in this "opera," not only that sort of irrational "sequence," but also some of the actual sounds . . . ragtime, fugues, rock-n-roll, shouting, madrigals, orchestras . . . all interrupting each other suddenly, starting and stopping with nonbeginnings and nonendings.

All the while, there are images benig flashed by the movie and slide projectors on the walls, ceilings and shack doors.

It is a mixed-media fantasy, says Silverman, while being much more articulate about the opera's purpose than the opera is in delivering its message that this is a mixed-up world (interrupted sequence) and that we are afflicted by a lot of serious nonsense.

That the opera is nonsense is freely admitted by Silverman, but he means lack of sense, not foolishness. Unfortunately, the viewer is likely to be so befuddled by the confusion on stage and so frustrated by his inability to understand either the actor-singers' behavior or their dialogue, that he is very likely to miss the point.

"This is not a put-on," says Silverman, in reply to those who are incredulous over the absurdity of his "opera." "We are dead serious about this."

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 23 1968 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

AUG 10 1968 New England Newsclip

'Steps' Looks Too Long for Man's Failure

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

LENOX — Stanley Silverman's opera "Elephant Steps," commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and premiered Wednesday night at Tanglewood, is a brilliant failure. It deals with an old problem, man's inability to communicate with man, and as one of the characters said, "some of the forces ruling our lives in secret," but is up to the minute in its formal structure, which breaks out of the traditional bounds at both beginning and end, in its suggestions of psychedelia and often Beatle-inspired lyrics by librettist Richard Foreman, in its use of films, slides, and taped sounds.

Elephant-hood, symbolically complete freedom, is the condition towards which the players aspire, and the guiding spirit of their search is Reinheart, a magician whom Silverman seems to have fashioned from Django Reinhardt, the late jazz guitarist, whose recordings were now and then heard in the background and whose work is certainly known to Silverman, himself somewhat of a virtuoso on the instrument.

At first we were willing witnesses as Hartman, Max, and Hannah in a Beckett-like atmosphere, tried to break through to meaningfulness, but by the end we were prisoners, the searching overextended, the energy and good effect of the start vitiated, the theatrical punch lost.

Silverman is a master of musical parody and his score is a patchwork, though none too logically put together, of most every popular style since the 20s. Most of the tunes added just the right flavor, the ricky-tick ones to which Otto carried out his extended sexual fantasy and those so superbly hammed-up by the cafe violinist, for example, but others strayed dangerously close to the line dividing parody and plagerism, especially one which echoed the Beatles' "When I'm 64" and another, a warmed-over 'Jets' song, from "West Side Story."

The production, also by Foreman, is first-rate. Lighting is used effectively and good use is made of the spacial set-up with regard to the films and tapes. The singing of the Doctor by Philip Erikson was excellent, that of Hannah by Susan Hoagland excessively shrill, that of the other principles between these two and mostly very good.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Opera Goes 'Occult' at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND ERICSON

OPERA has had a fitful existence at the Berkshire Music Festival, and in recent years only concert performances have taken this musical form into account. Eleven days ago, however, it came back with a vengeance. The premiere of Stanley Silverman's "Elephant Steps," commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center—the educational counterpart to the festival—and the Fromm Foundation, provoked strongly opposing reactions in the audience and critics. It is being repeated tonight and next Thursday night at Tanglewood.

Silverman and his librettist, Richard Foreman, have created what they call an "occult opera." During its hour's length, it follows two parallel areas: the protagonist's real experiences and his hallucinations as to what might happen to him. It was the simultaneity of these "stories" that presumably perplexed some of the audience.

The work uses all the musical forms of opera, live and taped, plus speech, films, slide projections and other apparatus becoming familiar through mixed-media happenings. Silverman points ont, though, that nothing is left to chance in his work. Its visual and aural elements are completely worked out, as carefully structured as any musical score. It needs a lot of rehearsing to produce a satisfactory performance.

The composer believes that some people were put off the work because of its opening, in which by the intentional use of boring, droning sounds, which drown out the singing onstage, is a statement about the opening of many conventional operas — there's all that deadly recitative.

A 30-year-old New Yorker who has studied at Columbia University and at Mills in California, where Milhaud and Kirchner were among his teachers, Silverman is teaching at Tanglewood this summer. He is music director of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, and he hopes that "Elephant Steps" can be staged at the small Forum Theater at the center. The opera would have to be rescored for smaller forces, but he said that in rehearsal the music seemed to work quite well with just piano accompaniment. For the Forum he would like to score the live music for the old-fashioned radio band of the thirties.

ADDENDA

When the New York Philharmonic takes off for its European tour on Thursday, it will have three more than its regular quota of 106 members. That is because of the repertory that Leonard Bernstein has decided to program in the 24 concerts that he will conduct. This includes Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, both of which require extra instrumentalists. Also in the repertory will be William Schuman's Third Symphony, Roy Harris's Third Symphony, a Rossini overture, a Haydn symphony. If anything should keep Bernstein from conducting, Alain Lombard will be along as associate tour conductor to take over.

The Bernstein semicentennial (see above) in Brussels next Sunday will be celebrated with a party at the Hilton (it should make the orchestra feel at home) given by (Continued on Page 18)

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

AUG 18 1968

Continued from Page 15

Trans World Airlines and the Festival of Flanders. TWA is one underwriter of the tour ($150,000), the other being the United States Department of State ($100,000), and TWA will be a major s porter of the orchestra ing the tour.

The Philharmonic point out that its tou bring an inflow of $150,000 to the United S since the fees abroad w paid in United States dol and the salaries and m transportation costs will payable in this country.

The tour will take the o chestra to 10 cities it has no played in before: Jerusalem, Caesarea, Ghent, Lucerne, Monte Carlo, Montreux, Bonn, Hoechst (outside Frankfurt), Amsterdam and Copenhagen. Also to be visited are Brussels, Florence, Vienna, Venice, Milan, Munich, Berlin and London.

FIGHTER

Although he has lived in this country off and on since 1938 and is an American citizen, Eric Werner nowadays sometimes seems like a visitor here. That is because a few years ago he went to Tel Aviv to set up a musicology department at the university there and he spends a good part of each year in Israel. Here he teaches at the Hebrew Union School of Sacred Music, whose graduate department he has headed since 1955.

The Viennese-born musicologist turned 67 on Aug. 1. Short and stocky, soft-spoken, he describes himself as a "fighter." This is believable, listening to him describe his opposition to music policy in Israel. "The Israel Philharmonic could become a first-rate orchestra," he says, "if they would take on a permanent conductor. But they won't do it because they know what it means. Any permanent conductor would force them to go beyond their current repertory of 80 or 90 standard works, which they repeat and repeat."

Werner has ... Israel ... terrelationship, Werner ... just completed ... on the ...

"ELEPHANT STEPS"—Stence Jackson as Hartman in Stanley Silverman's "occult" opera, an hour-long planned happening which had its premiere at the Berkshire Festival of Contemporary Music Aug. 7. It will be repeated this evening and on Thursday.

... Orchestra, ... formed through ... grant from the Rockefeller Foundation to the North Carolina School of the Arts. The ensemble will tour states in the Southeastern area.

Fifteen major libraries have ... ated organizations. . . . ... ow one of its ... They are ... of the best in the world, and they are bolder in their programming than the Philharmonic is."

Of his students: "There are three kinds—those from the city, who have developed a wholesome laziness (they used to be too eager and industrious), the élite young people from the kibbutzim, and the Rousseauan peasants. The last develop an interest in music from hearing and then learning to play the guitar. They are slow, solid, robust, not very intelligent but very musical. They have deep feelings, and I think one day they will produce another Bruckner."

Author of "The Sacred Bridge," the standard text on Jewish and early Christian liturgical music and their in-

...are and import... a current "Mu... s" exhibition at ...enter Library ...s the 33 items ...'Auctores de ...11th-century ...by the East... ...sic. Among ...ssy's auto... ...Pelléas et ... The Los ...nic has ... a three... ...in Sep... ...Zubin... ...Appli... ...mitri ...Mu... ...duc... ...the ...ra... ...s, ...w

Theatre and Dance.

"Elephant Steps," an opera by Stanley Silverm... chard Foreman gets its second hearing of the ... The...

"Elephant Steps," an opera by Stanley Silverman (right) with libretto by Richard Foreman gets its second hearing of the summer at 8 p.m. Aug. 22 in the Theatre Concert Hall at Tanglewood.

102.

sight and sound

Occult Opera Has a Message

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The flurry of interest aroused by Stanley Silverman's occult opera, "Elephant Steps," probably can be best explained by the current impatience with the past, the almost universal hankering for change.

Written this spring to fulfill a commission from the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center for premiere performance at Tanglewood, "Elephant Steps" has been reported by such eminent journals as the New York Times and Time Magazine and has attracted the attention of upper foundations (i.e., Rockefeller) and educational institutions as a possible subject for promotion.

I saw the second performance Sunday night (the first was Aug. 7, the third, Thursday) and it forced me to believe that its only real interest is in its structure; most of the materials were boring.

Strangely, the composer has indicated that boredom is his major target for destruction. But he may be at least partly forgiven because most of the boredom came from the libretto and staging of Richard Foreman.

"Elephant Steps" is not an opera in the usual, narrative, melodic sense. Nor is it an ad lib, psychedelic "happening." Every note is composed (except for excerpts from old Bing Crosby and Django Reinhardt recordings), and every stage move is plotted and planned.

The casual observer, like me, can believe that this planning took place because the composer said so, not because of what he, the observer, sees or hears. Most of what he sees is unintelligible; the words are not understandable and, of course, the music is abstract.

Generalized Quotes

But first let us indicate what the "opera" is "about" by reporting some generalized quotes from the composer.

"It is a way of organizing the eclectic."

"It is deliberately trying to break up single style."

"The manner of doing it is what is the key."

"Everything you see and hear is what it is about."

Second let us indicate the scene by reporting the solid materials involved: two tape players, three movie projectors, four slide projectors, several speakers placed above the stage and around the hall, eight principal actors (the orchestra conductor is one of the minor actors), six girls in the chorus, 19 musicians in the orchestra occupying one end of the stage.

Principal props on stage are a couple of large boxes painted dull black with windows like huts which people enter and exit without apparent reason and a bed from which one of the characters frequently falls, apparently only because the thud makes a satisfying percussive sound in the musical sequence.

Like many other irrational incidents in the libretto, the unexplained falling-out-of-bed can be interpreted as symbolizing any "significance" the observer fancies.

As a matter of fact, this idea that "it is what you care to think it is," is exactly what the creators wish to communicate along with the deliberate destruction of continuity . . . see above, "break up single style."

The action consists mostly of bizarre poses held by the actor-singers until interest strays and sudden flurries of movement which rivet attention and destroy whatever sequence of sense that had become established.

One of the composer's strongest youthful musical influences (he is 30) was the irrational sequence of sounds one hears while slowly turning a radio dial.

He reproduces in this "opera," not only that sort of irrational "sequence," but also some of the actual sounds . . . ragtime, fugues, rock-n-roll, madrigals, orchestras . . . all interrupting each other suddenly, starting and stopping with nonbeginnings and nonendings.

All the while, there are images benig flashed by the movie and slide projectors on the walls, ceilings and shack doors.

It is a mixed-media fantasy, says Silverman, while being much more articulate about the opera's purpose than the opera is in delivering its message that this is a mixed-up world (interrupted sequence) and that we are afflicted by a lot of serious nonsense.

That the opera is nonsense is freely admitted by Silverman, but he means lack of sense, not foolishness. Unfortunately, the viewer is likely to be so befuddled by the confusion on stage and so frustrated by his inability to understand either the actor-singers' behavior or their dialogue, that he is very likely to miss the point.

"This is not a put-on," says Silverman, in reply to those who are incredulous over the absurdity of his "opera." "We are dead serious about this."

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,421

AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

AUG 10 1968 New England Newsclip

'Steps' Looks Too Long for Man's Failure

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

LENOX — Stanley Silverman's opera "Elephant Steps," commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and premiered Wednesday night at Tanglewood, is a brilliant failure. It deals with an old problem, man's inability to communicate with man, and as one of the characters said, "some of the forces ruling our lives in secret," but is up to the minute in its formal structure, which breaks out of the traditional bounds at both beginning and end, in its suggestions of psychedelia and often Beatle-inspired lyrics by librettist Richard Foreman, in its use of films, slides, and taped sounds.

Elephant-hood, symbolically complete freedom, is the condition towards which the players aspire, and the guiding spirit of their search is Reinheart, a magician whom Silverman seems to have fashioned from Django Reinhardt, the late jazz guitarist, whose recordings were now and then heard in the background and whose work is certainly known to Silverman, himself somewhat of a virtuoso on the instrument.

At first we were willing witnesses as Hartman, Max, and Hannah in a Beckett-like atmosphere, tried to break through to meaningfulness, but by the end we were prisoners, the searching overextended, the energy and good effect of the start vitiated, the theatrical punch lost.

Silverman is a master of musical parody and his score is a patchwork, though none too logically put together, of most every popular style since the 20s. Most of the tunes added just the right flavor, the ricky-tick ones to which Otto carried out his extended sexual fantasy and those so superbly hammed-up by the cafe violinist, for example, but others strayed dangerously close to the line dividing parody and plagerism, especially one which echoed the Beatles' "When I'm 64" and another, a warmed-over 'Jets' song, from "West Side Story."

The production, also by Foreman, is first-rate. Lighting is used effectively and good use is made of the spacial set-up with regard to the films and tapes. The singing of the Doctor by Philip Erikson was excellent, that of Hannah by Susan Hoagland excessively shrill, that of the other principles between these two and mostly very good.

Theatre and Dance.

Whitestone

"Elephant Steps," an opera by Stanley Silverman (right) with libretto by Richard Foreman gets its second hearing of the summer at 8 p.m. Aug. 22 in the Theatre Concert Hall at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Opera Goes 'Occult' at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND ERICSON

OPERA has had a fitful existence at the Berkshire Music Festival, and in recent years only concert performances have taken this musical form into account. Eleven days ago, however, it came back with a vengeance. The premiere of Stanley Silverman's "Elephant Steps," commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center—the educational counterpart to the festival—and the Fromm Foundation, provoked strongly opposing reactions in the audience and critics. It is being repeated tonight and next Thursday night at Tanglewood.

Silverman and his librettist, Richard Foreman, have created what they call an "occult opera." During its hour's length, it follows two parallel areas: the protagonist's real experiences and his hallucinations as to what might happen to him. It was the simultaneity of these "stories" that presumably perplexed some of the audience.

The work uses all the musical forms of opera, live and taped, plus speech, films, slide projections and other apparatus becoming familiar through mixed-media happenings. Silverman points ont, though, that nothing is left to chance in his work. Its visual and aural elements are completely worked out, as carefully structured as any musical score. It needs a lot of rehearsing to produce a satisfactory performance.

The composer believes that some people were put off the work because of its opening, in which by the intentional use of boring, droning sounds, which drown out the singing onstage, is a statement about the opening of many conventional operas — there's all that deadly recitative.

A 30-year-old New Yorker who has studied at Columbia University and at Mills in California, where Milhaud and Kirchner were among his teachers, Silverman is teaching at Tanglewood this summer. He is music director of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, and he hopes that "Elephant Steps" can be staged at the small Forum Theater at the center. The opera would have to be rescored for smaller forces, but he said that in rehearsal the music seemed to work quite well with just piano accompaniment. For the Forum he would like to score the live music for the old-fashioned radio band of the thirties.

ADDENDA

When the New York Philharmonic takes off for its European tour on Thursday, it will have three more than its regular quota of 106 members. That is because of the repertory that Leonard Bernstein has decided to program in the 24 concerts that he will conduct. This includes Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, both of which require extra instrumentalists. Also in the repertory will be William Schuman's Third Symphony, Roy Harris's Third Symphony, a Rossini overture, a Haydn symphony. If anything should keep Bernstein from conducting, Alain Lombard will be along as associate tour conductor to take over.

The Bernstein semicentennial (see above) in Brussels next Sunday will be celebrated with a party at the Hilton (it should make the orchestra feel at home) given by (Continued on Page 18)

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 510,495 SUN. 1,494,704

AUG 18 1968

Continued from Page 15

Trans World Airlines and the Festival of Flanders. TWA is one underwriter of the tour ($150,000), the other being the United States Department of State ($100,000), and TWA will be a major supporter of the orchestra during the tour.

The Philharmonic is point out that its tour will bring an inflow of $150,000 to the United States since the fees abroad will be paid in United States dollars and the salaries and many transportation costs will be payable in this country.

The tour will take the orchestra to 10 cities it has not played in before: Jerusalem, Caesarea, Ghent, Lucerne, Monte Carlo, Montreux, Bonn, Hoechst (outside Frankfurt), Amsterdam and Copenhagen. Also to be visited are Brussels, Florence, Vienna, Venice, Milan, Munich, Berlin and London.

FIGHTER

Although he has lived in this country off and on since 1938 and is an American citizen, Eric Werner nowadays sometimes seems like a visitor here. That is because a few years ago he went to Tel Aviv to set up a musicology department at the university there and he spends a good part of each year in Israel. Here he teaches at the Hebrew Union School of Sacred Music, whose graduate department he has headed since 1955.

The Viennese-born musicologist turned 67 on Aug. 1. Short and stocky, soft-spoken, he describes himself as a "fighter." This is believable, listening to him describe his opposition to music policy in Israel. "The Israel Philharmonic could become a first-rate orchestra," he says, "if they would take on a permanent conductor. But they won't do it because they know what it means. Any permanent conductor would force them to go beyond their current repertory of 80 or 90 standard works, which they repeat and repeat."

Werner has ... Israeli ... terrelationship. Werner ... just completed ... on the ...

"ELEPHANT STEPS"—Stence Jackson as Hartman in Stanley Silverman's "occult" opera, an hour-long planned happening which had its premiere at the Berkshire Festival of Contemporary Music Aug. 7. It will be repeated this evening and on Thursday.

Fifteen major libraries have ... Orchestra, ... formed through ... grant from the Rockefeller Foundation to the North Carolina School of the Arts. The ensemble will tour states in the Southeastern area.

Whitestone

"are and import- a current "Mu- s" exhibition at enter Library- g the 33 items "Auctores de 11th-century by the East- sic. Among ssy's auto- Pelléas et The Los nic has a three in Sep- Zubin Appli- imitri Mu- duc- the ra- es,

SD

INFORMATION OBSCURED

102.

sight and sound

Occult Opera Has a Message

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The flurry of interest aroused by Stanley Silverman's occult opera, "Elephant Steps," probably can be best explained by the current impatience with the past, the almost universal hankering for change.

Written this spring to fulfill a commission from the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center for premiere performance at Tanglewood, "Elephant Steps" has been reported by such eminent journals as the New York Times and Time Magazine and has attracted the attention of upper foundations (i.e., Rockefeller) and educational institutions as a possible subject for promotion.

I saw the second performance Sunday night (the first was Aug. 7, the third, Thursday) and it forced me to believe that its only real interest is in its structure; most of the materials were boring.

Strangely, the composer has indicated that boredom is his major target for destruction. But he may be at least partly forgiven because most of the boredom came from the libretto and staging of Richard Foreman.

"Elephant Steps" is not an opera in the usual, narrative, melodic sense. Nor is it an ad lib, psychedelic "happening." Every note is composed (except for excerpts from old Bing Crosby and Django Reinhardt recordings), and every stage move is plotted and planned.

The casual observer, like me, can believe that this planning took place because the composer said so, not because of what he, the observer, sees or hears. Most of what he sees is unintelligible; the words are not understandable and, of course, the music is abstract.

Generalized Quotes

But first let us indicate what the "opera" is "about" by reporting some generalized quotes from the composer.

"It is a way of organizing the eclectic."

"It is deliberately trying to break up single style."

"The manner of doing it is what is the key."

"Everything you see and hear is what it is about."

Second let us indicate the scene by reporting the solid materials involved: two tape players, three movie projectors, four slide projectors, several speakers placed above the stage and around the hall, eight principal actors (the orchestra conductor is one of the minor actors), six girls in the chorus, 19 musicians in the orchestra occupying one end of the stage.

Principal props on stage are a couple of large boxes painted dull black with windows like huts which people enter and exit without apparent reason and a bed from which one of the characters frequently falls, apparently only because the thud makes a satisfying percussive sound in the musical sequence.

Like many other irrational incidents in the libretto, the unexplained falling-out-of-bed can be interpreted as symbolizing any "significance" the observer fancies.

As a matter of fact, this idea that "it is what you care to think it is," is exactly what the creators wish to communicate along with the deliberate destruction of continuity . . . see above, "break up single style."

The action consists mostly of bizarre poses held by the actor-singers until interest strays and sudden flurries of movement which rivet attention and destroy whatever sequence of sense that had become established.

One of the composer's strongest youthful musical influences (he is 30) was the irrational sequence of sounds one hears while slowly turning a radio dial.

He reproduces in this "opera," not only that sort of irrational "sequence," but also some of the actual sounds . . . ragtime, fugues, rock-n-roll, shouting, madrigals, orchestras . . . all interrupting each other suddenly, starting and stopping with nonbeginnings and nonendings.

All the while, there are images benig flashed by the movie and slide projectors on the walls, ceilings and shack doors.

It is a mixed-media fantasy, says Silverman, while being much more articulate about the opera's purpose than the opera is in delivering its message that this is a mixed-up world (interrupted sequence) and that we are afflicted by a lot of serious nonsense.

That the opera is nonsense is freely admitted by Silverman, but he means lack of foolishness. Unfortunately, the viewer is likely to be so befuddled by the confusion on stage and so frustrated by his inability to understand either the actor-singers' behavior or their dialogue, that he is very likely to miss the point.

"This is not a put-on," says Silverman, in reply to those who are incredulous over the absurdity of his "opera.", "We are dead serious about this."

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 2 2 1968

New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

AUG 10 1968

New England Newsclip

Opera Goes 'Occult' at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND ERICSON

OPERA has had a fitful existence at the Berkshire Music Festival, and in recent years only concert performances have taken this musical form into account. Eleven days ago, however, it came back with a vengeance. The premiere of Stanley Silverman's "Elephant Steps," commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center—the educational counterpart to the festival—and the Fromm Foundation, provoked strongly opposing reactions in the audience and critics. It is being repeated tonight and next Thursday night at Tanglewood.

Silverman and his librettist, Richard Foreman, have created what they call an "occult opera." During its hour's length, it follows two parallel areas: the protagonist's real experiences and his hallucinations as to what might happen to him. It was the simultaneity of these "stories" that presumably perplexed some of the audience.

The work uses all the musical forms of opera, live and taped, plus speech, films, slide projections and other apparatus becoming familiar through mixed-media happenings. Silverman points ont, though, that nothing is left to chance in his work. Its visual and aural elements are completely worked out, as carefully structured as any musical score. It needs a lot of rehearsing to produce a satisfactory performance.

The composer believes that some people were put off the work because of its opening, in which by the intentional use of boring, droning sounds, which drown out the singing onstage, is a statement about the opening of many conventional operas — there's all that deadly recitative.

A 30-year-old New Yorker who has studied at Columbia University and at Mills in California, where Milhaud and Kirchner were among his teachers, Silverman is teaching at Tanglewood this summer. He is music director of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, and he hopes that "Elephant Steps" can be staged at the small Forum Theater at the center. The opera would have to be rescored for smaller forces, but he said that in rehearsal the music seemed to work quite well with just piano accompaniment. For the Forum he would like to score the live music for the old-fashioned radio band of the thirties.

ADDENDA

When the New York Philharmonic takes off for its European tour on Thursday, it will have three more than its regular quota of 106 members. That is because of the repertory that Leonard Bernstein has decided to program in the 24 concerts that he will conduct. This includes Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, both of which require extra instrumentalists. Also in the repertory will be William Schuman's Third Symphony, Roy Harris's Third Symphony, a Rossini overture, a Haydn symphony. If anything should keep Bernstein from conducting, Alain Lombard will be along as associate tour conductor to take over.

The Bernstein semicentennial (see above) in Brussels next Sunday will be celebrated with a party at the Hilton (it should make the orchestra feel at home) given by

(Continued on Page 18)

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 870,405 SUN. 1,494,704

AUG 1 8 1968

'Steps' Looks Too Long for Man's Failure

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

LENOX — Stanley Silverman's opera "Elephant Steps," commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and premiered Wednesday night at Tanglewood, is a brilliant failure. It deals with an old problem, man's inability to communicate with man, and as one of the characters said, "some of the forces ruling our lives in secret," but is up to the minute in its formal structure, which breaks out of the traditional bounds at both beginning and end, in its suggestions of psychedelia and often Beatle-inspired lyrics by librettist Richard Foreman, in its use of films, slides, and taped sounds.

Elephant-hood, symbolically complete freedom, is the condition towards which the players aspire, and the guiding spirit of their search is Reinheart, a magician whom Silverman seems to have fashioned from Django Reinhardt, the late jazz guitarist, whose recordings were now and then heard in the background and whose work is certainly known to Silverman, himself somewhat of a virtuoso on the instrument.

At first we were willing witnesses as Hartman, Max, and Hannah in a Beckett-like atmosphere, tried to break through to meaningfulness, but by the end we were prisoners, the searching overextended, the energy and good effect of the start vitiated, the theatrical punch lost.

Silverman is a master of musical parody and his score is a patchwork, though none too logically put together, of most every popular style since the 20s. Most of the tunes added just the right flavor, the ricky-tick ones to which Otto carried out his extended sexual fantasy and those so superbly hammed-up by the cafe violinist, for example, but others strayed dangerously close to the line dividing parody and plagerism, especially one which echoed the Beatles' "When I'm 64" and another, a warmed-over 'Jets' song, from "West Side Story."

The production, also by Foreman, is first-rate. Lighting is used effectively and good use is made of the spacial set-up with regard to the films and tapes. The singing of the Doctor by Philip Erikson was excellent, that of Hannah by Susan Hoagland excessively shrill, that of the other principles between these two and mostly very good.

Continued from Page 15

Trans World Airlines and the Festival of Flanders. TWA is one underwriter of the tour ($150,000), the other being the United States Department of State ($100,000), and TWA will be a major [illegible] porter of the orche[illegible] ing the tour.

The Philharmonic [illegible] point out that its to[illegible] bring an inflow of [illegible] $150,000 to the United S[illegible] since the fees abroad w[illegible] paid in United States do[illegible] and the salaries and m[illegible] transportation costs will payable in this country.

The tour will take the o[illegible] chestra to 10 cities it has no[illegible] played in before: Jerusalem, Caesarea, Ghent, Lucerne, Monte Carlo, Montreux, Bonn, Hoechst (outside Frankfurt), Amsterdam and Copenhagen. Also to be visited are Brussels, Florence, Vienna, Venice, Milan, Munich, Berlin and London.

FIGHTER

Although he has lived in this country off and on since 1938 and is an American citizen, Eric Werner nowadays sometimes seems like a visitor here. That is because [illegible] years ago he went [illegible] to set up a [illegible] ment [illegible] be the ma[illegible] population, [illegible] ffferent from conductor would force them to go beyond their current repertory of 80 or 90 standard works, which they repeat and repeat."

Werner has [illegible] Israeli [illegible] terrelationship, Werner [illegible] just completed [illegible] on the [illegible]

[illegible] are and import[illegible] a current "Mu[illegible]s" exhibition at [illegible] enter Library [illegible] g the 33 items [illegible] "Auctores de [illegible] 11th-century [illegible] by the East[illegible] sic. Among [illegible] ssy's auto[illegible] Pelléas et [illegible] The Los [illegible] nic has [illegible] a three[illegible] in Sep[illegible] Zubin [illegible] Appli[illegible] imitri [illegible] Mu[illegible] duc[illegible] the [illegible] ra[illegible]s, [illegible]

"ELEPHANT STEPS"—Stence Jackson as Hartman in Stanley Silverman's "occult" [illegible] hour-long planned happening which had its premiere at the Berkshire Festival [illegible] porary Music Aug. 7. It will be repeated this evening and on Thursday. [illegible] Orchestra, [illegible] ong formed through [illegible] grant from the Rockefeller Foundation to the North Carolina School of the Arts. The ensemble will tour states in the Southeastern area.

Theatre and Dance.

"Elephant Steps," an opera by Stanley Silverm[illegible] chard Foreman gets its second hearing of the The[illegible]

"Elephant Steps," an opera by Stanley Silverman (right) with libretto by Richard Foreman gets its second hearing of the summer at 8 p.m. Aug. 22 in the Theatre Concert Hall at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 34,239

AUG 17 1968

New England Newsclip

INFORMATION OBSCURED

102.

sight and sound

Occult Opera Has a Message

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The flurry of interest aroused by Stanley Silverman's occult opera, "Elephant Steps," probably can be best explained by the current impatience with the past, the almost universal hankering for change.

Written this spring to fulfill a commission from the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center for premiere performance at Tanglewood, "Elephant Steps" has been reported by such eminent journals as the New York Times and Time Magazine and has attracted the attention of upper foundations (i.e., Rockefeller) and educational institutions as a possible subject for promotion.

I saw the second performance Sunday night (the first was Aug. 7, the third, Thursday) and it forced me to believe that its only real interest is in its structure; most of the materials were boring.

Strangely, the composer has indicated that boredom is his major target for destruction. But he may be at least partly forgiven because most of the boredom came from the libretto and staging of Richard Foreman.

"Elephant Steps" is not an opera in the usual, narrative, melodic sense. Nor is it an ad lib, psychedelic "happening." Every note is composed (except for excerpts from old Bing Crosby and Django Reinhardt recordings), and every stage move is plotted and planned.

The casual observer, like me, can believe that this planning took place because the composer said so, not because of what he, the observer, sees or hears. Most of what he sees is unintelligible; the words are not understandable and, of course, the music is abstract.

Generalized Quotes

But first let us indicate what the "opera" is "about" by reporting some generalized quotes from the composer.

"It is a way of organizing the eclectic."

"It is deliberately trying to break up single style."

"The manner of doing it is what is the key."

"Everything you see and hear is what it is about."

Second let us indicate the scene by reporting the solid materials involved: two tape players, three movie projectors, four slide projectors, several speakers placed above the stage and around the hall, eight principal actors (the orchestra conductor is one of the minor actors), six girls in the chorus, 19 musicians in the orchestra occupying one end of the stage.

Principal props on stage are a couple of large boxes painted dull black with windows like huts which people enter and exit without apparent reason and a bed from which one of the characters frequently falls, apparently only because the thud makes a satisfying percussive sound in the musical sequence.

Like many other irrational incidents in the libretto, the unexplained falling-out-of-bed can be interpreted as symbolizing any "significance" the observer fancies.

As a matter of fact, this idea that "it is what you care to think it is," is exactly what the creators wish to communicate along with the deliberate destruction of continuity . . . see above, "break up single style."

The action consists mostly of bizarre poses held by the actor-singers until interest strays and sudden flurries of movement which rivet attention and destroy whatever sequence of sense that had become established.

One of the composer's strongest youthful musical influences (he is 30) was the irrational sequence of sounds one hears while slowly turning a radio dial.

He reproduces in this "opera," not only that sort of irrational "sequence," but also some of the actual sounds . . . ragtime, fugues, rock-n-roll, shouting, madrigals, orchestras . . . all interrupting each other suddenly, starting and stopping with nonbeginnings and nonendings.

All the while, there are images benig flashed by the movie and slide projectors on the walls, ceilings and shack doors.

It is a mixed-media fantasy, says Silverman, while being much more articulate about the opera's purpose than the opera is in delivering its message that this is a mixed-up world (interrupted sequence) and that we are afflicted by a lot of serious nonsense.

That the opera is nonsense is freely admitted by Silverman, but he means lack of sense, not foolishness. Unfortunately, the viewer is likely to be so befuddled by the confusion on stage and so frustrated by his inability to understand either the actor-singers' behavior or their dialogue, that he is very likely to miss the point.

"This is not a put-on," says Silverman, in reply to those who are incredulous over the absurdity of his "opera." "We are dead serious about this."

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 2 9 1968

New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

AUG 10 1968

New England Newsclip

'Steps' Looks Too Long for Man's Failure

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

LENOX — Stanley Silverman's opera "Elephant Steps," commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and premiered Wednesday night at Tanglewood, is a brilliant failure. It deals with an old problem, man's inability to communicate with man, and as one of the characters said, "some of the forces ruling our lives in secret," but is up to the minute in its formal structure, which breaks out of the traditional bounds at both beginning and end, in its suggestions of psychedelia and often Beatle-inspired lyrics by librettist Richard Foreman, in its use of films, slides, and taped sounds.

Elephant-hood, symbolically complete freedom, is the condition towards which the players aspire, and the guiding spirit of their search is Reinheart, a magician whom Silverman seems to have fashioned from Django Reinhardt, the late jazz guitarist, whose recordings were now and then heard in the background and whose work is certainly known to Silverman, himself somewhat of a virtuoso on the instrument.

At first we were willing witnesses as Hartman, Max, and Hannah in a Beckett-like atmosphere, tried to break through to meaningfulness, but by the end we were prisoners, the searching overextended, the energy and good effect of the start vitiated, the theatrical punch lost.

Silverman is a master of musical parody and his score is a patchwork, though none too logically put together, of most every popular style since the 20s. Most of the tunes added just the right flavor, the ricky-tick ones to which Otto carried out his extended sexual fantasy and those so superbly hammed-up by the cafe violinist, for example, but others strayed dangerously close to the line dividing parody and plagerism, especially one which echoed the Beatles' "When I'm 64" and another, a warmed-over 'Jets' song, from "West Side Story."

The production, also by Foreman, is first-rate. Lighting is used effectively and good use is made of the spacial set-up with regard to the films and tapes. The singing of the Doctor by Philip Erikson was excellent, that of Hannah by Susan Hoagland excessively shrill, that of the other principles between these two and mostly very good.

Theatre and Dance.

"Elephant Steps," an opera by Stanley Silverman (right) with libretto by Richard Foreman gets its second hearing of the summer at 8 p.m. Aug. 22 in the Theatre Concert Hall at Tanglewood.

Whitestone

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 17 1968

New England Newsclip

Opera Goes 'Occult' at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND ERICSON

OPERA has had a fitful existence at the Berkshire Music Festival, and in recent years only concert performances have taken this musical form into account. Eleven days ago, however, it came back with a vengeance. The premiere of Stanley Silverman's "Elephant Steps," commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center—the educational counterpart to the festival—and the Fromm Foundation, provoked strongly opposing reactions in the audience and critics. It is being repeated tonight and next Thursday night at Tanglewood.

Silverman and his librettist, Richard Foreman, have created what they call an "occult opera." During its hour's length, it follows two parallel areas: the protagonist's real experiences and his hallucinations as to what might happen to him. It was the simultaneity of these "stories" that presumably perplexed some of the audience.

The work uses all the musical forms of opera, live and taped, plus speech, films, slide projections and other apparatus becoming familiar through mixed-media happenings. Silverman points ont, though, that nothing is left to chance in his work. Its visual and aural elements are completely worked out, as carefully structured as any musical score. It needs a lot of rehearsing to produce a satisfactory performance.

The composer believes that some people were put off the work because of its opening, in which by the intentional use of boring, droning sounds, which drown out the singing onstage, is a statement about the opening of many conventional operas — there's all that deadly recitative.

A 30-year-old New Yorker who has studied at Columbia University and at Mills in California, where Milhaud and Kirchner were among his teachers, Silverman is teaching at Tanglewood this summer. He is music director of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, and he hopes that "Elephant Steps" can be staged at the small Forum Theater at the center. The opera would have to be rescored for smaller forces, but he said that in rehearsal the music seemed to work quite well with just piano accompaniment. For the Forum he would like to score the live music for the old-fashioned radio band of the thirties.

ADDENDA

When the New York Philharmonic takes off for its European tour on Thursday, it will have three more than its regular quota of 106 members. That is because of the repertory that Leonard Bernstein has decided to program in the 24 concerts that he will conduct. This includes Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, both of which require extra instrumentalists. Also in the repertory will be William Schuman's Third Symphony, Roy Harris's Third Symphony, a Rossini overture, a Haydn symphony. If anything should keep Bernstein from conducting, Alain Lombard will be along as associate tour conductor to take over.

The Bernstein semicentennial (see above) in Brussels next Sunday will be celebrated with a party at the Hilton (it should make the orchestra feel at home) given by (Continued on Page 18)

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 819,495 SUN. 1,494,704

AUG 18 1968

Continued from Page 15

Trans World Airlines and the Festival of Flanders. TWA is one underwriter of the tour ($150,000), the other being the United States Department of State ($100,000), and TWA will be a major [illegible] porter of the orche[illegible] ing the tour.

The Philharmonic [illegible] point out that its to[illegible] bring an inflow of [illegible] $150,000 to the United S[illegible] since the fees abroad w[illegible] paid in United States do[illegible] and the salaries and m[illegible] transportation costs will payable in this country.

The tour will take the o[illegible] chestra to 10 cities it has no[illegible] played in before: Jerusalem, Caesarea, Ghent, Lucerne, Monte Carlo, Montreux, Bonn, Hoechst (outside Frankfurt), Amsterdam and Copenhagen. Also to be visited are Brussels, Florence, Vienna, Venice, Milan, Munich, Berlin and London.

FIGHTER

Although he has lived in this country off and on since 1938 and is an American citizen, Eric Werner nowadays sometimes seems like a visitor [illegible] here. That is because [illegible] years ago he went [illegible] to set up a [illegible] ment [illegible] be the na[illegible] population [illegible] ffer[illegible] ree of repre[illegible] ffer[illegible] from [illegible] conductor would force them to go beyond their current repertory of 80 or 90 standard works, which they repeat and repeat."

Werner has [illegible] Israeli [illegible] terrelationship, Werner [illegible] just completed [illegible] on the [illegible]

[illegible] are and import[illegible] a current "Mu[illegible] s" exhibition at [illegible] enter Library [illegible] g the 33 items [illegible] "Auctores de [illegible] 11th-century [illegible] by the East[illegible] usic. Among [illegible] ssy's auto[illegible] Pelléas et [illegible] The Los[illegible] nic has [illegible] a three[illegible] in Sep[illegible] Zubin [illegible] Appli[illegible] imitri [illegible] Mu[illegible] duc[illegible] the [illegible] ra[illegible] s, [illegible]

"ELEPHANT STEPS"—Stence Jackson as Hartman in Stanley Silverman's "occult" [illegible] are not [illegible] hour-long planned happening which had its premiere at the Berkshire Festival [illegible] res. If crie[illegible] persistent [illegible] porary Music Aug. 7. It will be repeated this evening and on Thursday. [illegible] ney are [illegible] now one of its [illegible] in the [illegible] ated organizations. . . . Fifteen major libraries have [illegible] Orchestra, [illegible] long formed through [illegible] grant from the Rockefeller Foundation to the North Carolina School of the Arts. The ensemble will tour states in the Southeastern area.

Whitestone

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

Thursday, August 8, at 8:00 p.m.

Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

ANDREW IMBRIE — String Quartet No. 3 (1957)

Allegretto — Scherzo-Presto — Poco Adagio

Violin — PAUL ZUKOFSKY — Violin — ARTHUR CULVER

Viola — GERALDINE LAMBOLEY — Cello — ALEKSANDER CIECHANSKI

JOSEPH SCHWANTNER — Chronicon for Bassoon and Piano (1967)

Bassoon — KAZUYOSHI ASANO — Piano — YUJI TAKAHASHI

LAWRENCE MOSS — Exchanges (1968)

Flute — JONATHON LANDELL — Flute — EIKO ITO

Oboe — TIMOTHY VALENTINE — Trumpet — BERNHARD JOBSKI

Trumpet — DENNIS NAJOOM — Trombone — MILTON STEVENS

Percussion — HOWARD LEAVITT

Conductor — GERALD BROWN

YANNIS XENAKIS — Eonta (1964)

YUJI TAKAHASHI — Piano Solo

Trumpet — EDWARD HOFFMAN — Trombone — FRANCIS HUNT

Trombone — JOHN KITZMAN — Trombone — MILTON STEVENS

Conductor — GUNTHER SCHULLER

INTERMISSION

ROBERT COGAN — Whirl . . . ds (I) (1967)

EMILY DERR — Soprano

JAMES JONES — Baritone

Members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program

GUNTHER SCHULLER, Conductor

PAUL CHIHARA — Special Assistant

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250
AUG 10 1968
New England Newsclip

AMPLIFIED SOUND PERVADES LENOX

Xenakis and Cogan Heard in Tanglewood Program

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—The first half of last night's concert of new music at Tanglewood was, for the most part, gentle. Not so the second half. Although entirely different in nature, Yannis Xenakis's "Eonta" (1964) and Robert Cogan's "Whirl . . . DS (I)" (1967) are both powerful, elemental ear-clearers.

"Eonta" is scored for piano solo and brass choir. The pianist, Yuji Takahashi, was as much a part of the show as the music he played. Tiny, slim, with long black hair tossing, he thundered up and down the keyboard with the energy of four virtuosos.

Mr. Takahashi's role is very much of the "mad pianist" variety, but Mr. Xenakis brings him down to earth with trim, gleaming massed brass sonorities. The brass choir sounds as if it were an amplification of the echo created by Mr. Takahashi's wild passage work. The piano provides the motor energy, the brass harness it. The result is a handsome, muscular, no-nonsense piece of music.

It was beautifully played by Mr. Takahashi and fellow members of the Berkshire Music Center. Gunther Schuller, who is in charge of the Festival of Contemporary Music, of which the concert was a part, conducted with relish.

"Whirl . . . DS (I)" called for an ensemble of 44 instruments as well as two amplified voices. Part of that ensemble is offstage. The work is monumental in scale, a brain-joggling investigation into the sound of language, an amplified Tower of Babel but with coherence imposed.

Mr. Cogan compiled the text from all sorts of sources in several languages. The principal singer does far more than sing. He shouts, hisses and breaks language apart into the sounds that make up vowels and consonants. James Jones, baritone, was masterful in the role.

Supporting him, each instrument varies its timber in dozens of ways in an attempt to penetrate the singer's language complexity. The total result is raw power and tremendous variety in texture. "Whirl . . . DS (1)" is a piece unto itself, very personal and original, aleatoric but with ground rules carefully imposed. Mr. Schuller, who conducted, did a striking job of carrying them out.

Also heard were Andrew Imbrie's unassuming, highly poetic String Quartet No. 3 (1957); Lawrence Moss's "Exchanges" (1968) for three woodwinds and three brass, which bubbled and flowed along full of wit, and Joseph Schwantner's "Chronicon" for bassoon and piano (1967), which is virtuoso in aspect but doesn't go anywhere. The players here were Kazuyoshi Asano and Mr. Takahashi. All performances were impeccable.

Music Review

Fifth Fromm Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FIFTH consecutive program in the Festival of Contemporary music in the ~~Theatre-~~ Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night with the Fromm Music Foundation posed a problem more directly than had been the case in any of the preceding concerts. The evening was dominated by music where the performers make their own choice of expression in contrast to playing printed notes. In the case of a sole performer this kind of improvisation, guided or not, is one thing; when it involves a number of performers the game is quite something else.

* * *

IT BECOMES a question of coherence, and an audience cannot sit back as in a concert of Mozart symphonies and inhale delightful and sensitive wisps of sound. This new music is an intense listening exercise and the plasticity of the receptive apparatus of the individual determines his understanding and pleasure.

Lawrence Moss's "Exchanges" for three reeds, three brass and percussion was one of the more unified and effective examples of this type of music. When the percussionist, scurrying among his diverse battery, tapped the Chinese cymbal gently while his colleagues blew softly, there was a lambent effect of gong with the wind.

* * *

ANDREW IMBRIE'S String Quartet No. 3, dates from 1957. When the four performers appeared, in conventional concert attire, they were accompanied by four others, in proper street clothes, who might have been guards or pall-bearers. Their function proved that individual page-turners were required because of the complexity of the score. This writing is comparatively lucid although extremely intricate and is patently motivated by a desire to express personal invention.

Joseph Schwanter's "Chronicon" for bassoon and piano strives to extend tonal qualities in the respective instruments. It had a stimulating nature but was somewhat unavailing.

* * *

THE EXCITEMENT of the evening came after the intermission. Yannis Xenakis' "Enota" is for piano, two trumpets and three trombones. Yuji Takahashi was the extraordinary pianist. It is not quite clear what part an IBM machine contributed to the work. Xenakis has been accused of writing mathematical music. When he was last at Tanglewood, he explained how his training as an architect influenced the construction of his music. He used charts and graphs. Takahashi went into a phenomenal frenzy at the keyboard. His five brass partners moved like the Packers' backfield—from the extreme rear of the stage, where they blew sustained sirens, to the propinquity of the piano, where they appeared to blow directly into the sounding board, and subsequently moved to various tees where they had a choice of drives, accompanying them with snorts or unisons which they alternated with the fantastically equipped Takahashi.

* * *

ROBERT COGAN'S "Whirl . . . ds (I)" is for solo voice, microphonist and 44 instruments. It is easy to dismiss what one does not understand by thoughtless ridicule but Cogan obviously is serious and deserves respect. Gunther Schuller conducted, although he required a special assistant. Paul Chihard, who held a stop-watch and exposed charts to the musicians, which the audience could not see, indicating general directions and, no doubt, detours. A large clock, with a second hand easily visible to the musicians, was also part of the equipment.

* * *

THE SOUNDS were pretty raucous and violent. James Jones as the microphonist repeated the smashing success he had achieved on the previous night in Silvermans opera "Elephant Steps." Everyone in the orchestra was at keen alert but the complexity of Cogan's intentions, concerned with quibbling distinctions of the analysis of sounds, prompts one to ask whether this leads to Valhalla or Gehenna.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
AUG 9 1968
New England Newsclip

Modern Music Is in Grim State, To Judge by Tanglewood Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — If Thursday night's concert at Tanglewood was a sample, the state of contemporary music in this country is far more grim than hopeful.

A festival of contemporary music started last Sunday and will end tomorrow. The seven concerts are sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

Five works were played Thursday night. Without exception they were exceedingly well-performed by students at the center.

To that extent, participants receive credit for the results and remain blameless for the product.

Far more culpable are members of the irresponsible audience who loudly applauded such rubbish.

Trash and Treasure

One has to remember that only 10 per cent of music survives its own era. Granted that the other 90 per cent must be heard to separate trash from treasure.

The five works in question may have sounded like a competition in cacophony, lack of symmetry or organization, and startling sound effect.

Each had its distinctive identification, personality and impression.

Laboratory explanations, as found in program notes, do not provide first aid to understanding. It's like telling how a strange new implement is constructed without revealing its use.

Digression from tradition leads to progress. But time and again, audiences are subjected to such enigmas and the composer expects understanding from less than superficial explanation.

Elaborate Scoring

For example, Robert Cogan's "Whirl ... DS(1)," whatever that means. It is scored for soprano, baritone, 43 instrumentalists, tape recorder, and off-stage ensemble.

Conductor Gunther Schuller stood before four huge music stands on which were yards of instruction.

Baritone James Jones shouted, yammered and screamed falsetto. Soprano Emily Derr joined in the screaming, sneezed and gasped into a microphone. Instruments kept pace with these onslaughts of noise. A young oriental gentleman occasionally changed cards on an elevated music stand. The strings of two pianos were struck with drum sticks and soft hammers. The name boards were slammed.

Strings seemed to be playing something totally unrelated, and a tape recorder blared occasionally.

Quoting from the "program notes" ... "Giving off a miasma Hiroshima flash whiter than JYOTHI VELLAI ..."

Simple question ... what was it all about?

What was Yannis Xenakis "Eonta" all about?

Tirade and Protest

Pianist Yuji Takahashi pummeled the piano keyboard viciously and passionately for quiet a spell. Then came the brass (two trumpets and three trombones) to scold, abet, condone and reproach him for his tirade.

The brass players approached the topless concert grand and directed their protest to its interior. That apparently did no good. They returned to other seats to complain with sputtering chords. As the goal-post loomed, the din increased to a shattering roar.

It was possible to expose the funny bone to Lawrence Moss "exchanges" that started off like an accident in a crockery factory.

Joseph Schwantner's "Chronicon" would make excellent background music for a "mad scientist" movie. Excellent playing was detected from pianist Takahashi and bassonist Kazuyoshi Asano through the droning, groaning, labyrinthian trials of sound particles.

Andrew Imbrie's String Quartet No. 3 was far less offensive. It was merely dull.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350
AUG 10 1968
New England Newsclip

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

* * *

Thursday, August 8, at 8:00 p.m.
Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

* * *

Program

ANDREW IMBRIE — String Quartet No. 3 (1957)
Allegretto — Scherzo-Presto — Poco Adagio
Violin — PAUL ZUKOFSKY — Violin — ARTHUR CULVER
Viola — GERALDINE LAMBOLEY — Cello — ALEKSANDER CIECHANSKI

JOSEPH SCHWANTNER — Chronicon for Bassoon and Piano (1967)
Bassoon — KAZUYOSHI ASANO — Piano — YUJI TAKAHASHI

LAWRENCE MOSS — Exchanges (1968)
Flute — JONATHON LANDELL — Flute — EIKO ITO
Oboe — TIMOTHY VALENTINE — Trumpet — BERNHARD JOBSKI
Trumpet — DENNIS NAJOOM — Trombone — MILTON STEVENS
Percussion — HOWARD LEAVITT
Conductor — GERALD BROWN

YANNIS XENAKIS — Eonta (1964)
YUJI TAKAHASHI — Piano Solo
Trumpet — EDWARD HOFFMAN — Trombone — FRANCIS HUNT
Trombone — JOHN KITZMAN — Trombone — MILTON STEVENS
Conductor — GUNTHER SCHULLER

INTERMISSION

ROBERT COGAN — Whirl . . . ds (I) (1967)
EMILY DERR — Soprano
JAMES JONES — Baritone
Members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program
GUNTHER SCHULLER, Conductor
PAUL CHIHARA — Special Assistant

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250
AUG 10 1968
New England Newsclip

AMPLIFIED SOUND PERVADES LENOX

Xenakis and Cogan Heard in Tanglewood Program

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—The first half of last night's concert of new music at Tanglewood was, for the most part, gentle. Not so the second half. Although entirely different in nature, Yannis Xenakis's "Eonta" (1964) and Robert Cogan's "Whirl . . . DS (I)" (1967) are both powerful, elemental ear-clearers.

"Eonta" is scored for piano solo and brass choir. The pianist, Yuji Takahashi, was as much a part of the show as the music he played. Tiny, slim, with long black hair tossing, he thundered up and down the keyboard with the energy of four virtuosos.

Mr. Takahashi's role is very much of the "mad pianist" variety, but Mr. Xenakis brings him down to earth with trim, gleaming massed brass sonorities. The brass choir sounds as if it were an amplification of the echo created by Mr. Takahashi's wild passage work. The piano provides the motor energy, the brass harness it. The result is a handsome, muscular, no-nonsense piece of music.

It was beautifully played by Mr. Takahashi and fellow members of the Berkshire Music Center. Gunther Schuller, who is in charge of the Festival of Contemporary Music, of which the concert was a part, conducted with relish.

"Whirl . . . DS (I)" called for an ensemble of 44 instruments as well as two amplified voices. Part of that ensemble is offstage. The work is monumental in scale, a brain-joggling investigation into the sound of language, an amplified Tower of Babel but with coherence imposed.

Mr. Cogan compiled the text from all sorts of sources in several languages. The principal singer does far more than sing. He shouts, hisses and breaks language apart into the sounds that make up vowels and consonants. James Jones, baritone, was masterful in the role.

Supporting him, each instrument varies its timber in dozens of ways in an attempt to penetrate the singer's language complexity. The total result is raw power and tremendous variety in texture. "Whirl . . . DS (I)" is a piece unto itself, very personal and original, aleatoric but with ground rules carefully imposed. Mr. Schuller, who conducted, did a striking job of carrying them out.

Also heard were Andrew Imbrie's unassuming, highly poetic String Quartet No. 3 (1957); Lawrence Moss's "Exchanges" (1968) for three woodwinds and three brass, which bubbled and flowed along full of wit, and Joseph Schwantner's "Chronicon" for bassoon and piano (1967), which is virtuoso in aspect but doesn't go anywhere. The players here were Kazuyoshi Asano and Mr. Takahashi. All performances were impeccable.

Music Review

Fifth Fromm Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FIFTH consecutive program in the Festival of Contemporary music in the ~~Theatre-~~ Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night with the Fromm Music Foundation posed a problem more directly than had been the case in any of the preceding concerts. The evening was dominated by music where the performers make their own choice of expression in contrast to playing printed notes. In the case of a sole performer this kind of improvisation, guided or not, is one thing; when it involves a number of performers the game is quite something else.

* * *

IT BECOMES a question of coherence, and an audience cannot sit back as in a concert of Mozart symphonies and inhale delightful and sensitive wisps of sound. This new music is an intense listening exercise and the plasticity of the receptive apparatus of the individual determines his understanding and pleasure.

Lawrence Moss's "Exchanges" for three reeds, three brass and percussion was one of the more unified and effective examples of this type of music. When the percussionist, scurrying among his diverse battery, tapped the Chinese cymbal gently while his colleagues blew softly, there was a lambent effect of gong with the wind.

* * *

ANDREW IMBRIE'S String Quartet No. 3, dates from 1957. When the four performers appeared, in conventional concert attire, they were accompanied by four others, in proper street clothes, who might have been guards or pall-bearers. Their function proved that individual page-turners were required because of the complexity of the score. This writing is comparatively lucid although extremely intricate and is patently motivated by a desire to express personal invention.

Joseph Schwanter's "Chronicon" for bassoon and piano strives to extend tonal qualities in the respective instruments. It had a stimulating nature but was somewhat unavailing.

* * *

THE EXCITEMENT of the evening came after the intermission. Yannis Xenakis' "Enota" is for piano, two trumpets and three trombones. Yuji Takahashi was the extraordinary pianist. It is not quite clear what part an IBM machine contributed to the work. Xenakis has been accused of writing mathematical music. When he was last at Tanglewood, he explained how his training as an architect influenced the construction of his music. He used charts and graphs. Takahashi went into a phenomenal frenzy at the keyboard. His five brass partners moved like the Packers' backfield—from the extreme rear of the stage, where they blew sustained sirens, to the propinquity of the piano, where they appeared to blow directly into the sounding board, and subsequently moved to various tees where they had a choice of drives, accompanying them with snorts or unisons which they alternated with the fantastically equipped Takahashi.

* * *

ROBERT COGAN'S "Whirl . . . ds (I)" is for solo voice, microphonist and 44 instruments. It is easy to dismiss what one does not understand by thoughtless ridicule but Cogan obviously is serious and deserves respect. Gunther Schuller conducted, although he required a special assistant. Paul Chihard, who held a stop-watch and exposed charts to the musicians, which the audience could not see, indicating general directions and, no doubt, detours. A large clock, with a second hand easily visible to the musicians, was also part of the equipment.

* * *

THE SOUNDS were pretty raucous and violent. James Jones as the microphonist repeated the smashing success he had achieved on the previous night in Silvermans opera "Elephant Steps." Everyone in the orchestra was at keen alert but the complexity of Cogan's intentions, concerned with quibbling distinctions of the analysis of sounds, prompts one to ask whether this leads to Valhalla or Gehenna.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
AUG 9 1968
New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350
AUG 10 1968
New England Newsclip

Modern Music Is in Grim State, To Judge by Tanglewood Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — If Thursday night's concert at Tanglewood was a sample, the state of contemporary music in this country is far more grim than hopeful.

A festival of contemporary music started last Sunday and will end tomorrow. The seven concerts are sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

Five works were played Thursday night. Without exception they were exceedingly well-performed by students at the center.

To that extent, participants receive credit for the results and remain blameless for the product.

Far more culpable are members of the irresponsible audience who loudly applauded such rubbish.

Trash and Treasure

One has to remember that only 10 per cent of music survives its own era. Granted that the other 90 per cent must be heard to separate trash from treasure.

The five works in question may have sounded like a competition in cacophony, lack of symmetry or organization, and startling sound effect.

Each had its distinctive identification, personality and impression.

Laboratory explanations, as found in program notes, do not provide first aid to understanding. It's like telling how a strange new implement is constructed without revealing its use.

Digression from tradition leads to progress. But time and again, audiences are subjected to such enigmas and the composer expects understanding from less than superficial explanation.

Elaborate Scoring

For example, Robert Cogan's "Whirl ... DS(1)," whatever that means. It is scored for soprano, baritone, 43 instrumentalists, tape recorder, and off-stage ensemble.

Conductor Gunther Schuller stood before four huge music stands on which were yards of instruction.

Baritone James Jones shouted, yammered and screamed falsetto. Soprano Emily Derr joined in the screaming, sneezed and gasped into a microphone. Instruments kept pace with these onslaughts of noise. A young oriental gentleman occasionally changed cards on an elevated music stand. The strings of two pianos were struck with drum sticks and soft hammers. The name boards were slammed.

Strings seemed to be playing something totally unrelated, and a tape recorder blared occasionally.

Quoting from the "program notes" ... "Giving off a miasma Hiroshima flash whiter than any JYOTHI VELLAI ..."

Simple question ... what was it all about?

What was Yannis Xenakis "Eonta" all about?

Tirade and Protest

Pianist Yuji Takahashi pummeled the piano keyboard viciously and passionately for quite a spell. Then came the brass (two trumpets and three trombones) to scold, abet, condone and reproach him for his tirade.

The brass players approached the topless concert grand and directed their protest to its interior. That apparently did no good. They returned to other seats to complain with sputtering chords. As the goal-post loomed, the din increased to a shattering roar.

It was possible to expose the funny bone to Lawrence Moss "exchanges" that started off like an accident in a crockery factory.

Joseph Schwantner's "Chronicon" would make excellent background music for a "mad scientist" movie. Excellent playing was detected from pianist Takahashi and bassonist Kazuyoshi Asano through the droning, groaning, labyrinthian trials of sound particles.

Andrew Imbrie's String Quartet No. 3 was far less offensive. It was merely dull.

104.

Elephant Steps To Be Performed At Tanglewood

LENOX – This evening there will be the third performance of Stanley Silverman's theater piece, Elephant Steps, which was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in Cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation and had its premiere during the recent Festival of Contemporary Music. Theodore Strongin, reviewing the work for the New York Times, wrote, "Mr. Silverman and his colleague, Richard Foreman, who wrote the libretto for Elephant Steps and staged it, are courageous men. What they have done is taken all the senses, not just hearing, and given them equal value. They have stretched the awareness... and are successful enough on first try to make Elephant Steps very beguiling."

The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open tomorrow evening with a concert at 9 by composer-conductor Aaron Copland. Mr. Copland founded the Composition Department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and headed it for twenty-five years, retiring two seasons ago. For his program, he has chosen Elliot Carter's Holiday Overture, Faure's Pelleas and Melisande Suite, Chavez's Sinfonia India, Stravinsky's Ode, and two of his own compositions, the recently-composed Inscape, and the popular ballet classic, Billy The Kid.

Saturday's concert at 8 PM under the direction of the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act I of Die Walkuere. Singers in both are Hanne - Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, and Dayid Ward. Also singing in the Rheingold Finale are three members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady.

On Sunday afternoon the concluding concert of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will again be conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the Gesang der Parzen (Song of the Fates), Op. 89, Schicksalslied (Song of Destiny), Op. 54, and Naenie (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82. Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of his day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. Mr. Leinsdorf noted that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The Gesang der Parzen and Naenie will be performed by the Orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the First Symphony of Brahms.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GT. BARRINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,400

AUG 22 1968 New England Newsclip

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER FACULTY RECITAL

PAUL ZUKOFSKY, Violin
GILBERT KALISH, Piano

Saturday, August 10, at 2:30
Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

THE SONATAS FOR VIOLIN AND PIANO
By CHARLES IVES*

First Sonata (1903–1908)
Andante — Allegro Vivace
Largo Cantabile
Allegro

Second Sonata (1903–1910)
Autumn: Adagio Maestoso — Allegro Moderato
In the Barn: Presto — Allegro Moderato
The Revival: Largo — Allegretto

INTERMISSION

Third Sonata (1902–1914)
Adagio, Verse 1 — Andante, Verse 2 —
Allegretto, Verse 3 — Adagio, last verse
Allegro
Adagio Cantabile — Andante con spirito

Fourth Sonata (1905–1914) ("Children's Day at the Camp Meeting")
Allegro
Largo — Allegro (con slugarocko)
Allegro

* Recorded by Mr. Zukofsky and Mr. Kalish for Folkways Records

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 143,350

AUG 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Violin, Piano Program Is Original

TANGLEWOOD—The four sonatas for violin and piano by the Connecticut composer Charles Ives were presented Saturday afternoon at Tanglewood.

This concert was one in a week-long festival of contemporary music sponsored by the Bershire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

The story of Ives is one of the most fascinating in the recent history of music. Though his primary goal throughout life was to be a composer, he decided upon graduation from Yale that given the type of music he wished to create he could not exist in the music business. Instead he chose the insurance business, at which, incidentally, he was highly successful.

Original, Advanced Music

But it is for his music, original and much in advance of his time and for which he had no recognition during his lifetime, that we shall remember Ives.

The four sonatas for violin and piano for those who may not know his music are an excellent introduction to his style. One might suspect that a whole program of the works of one composer in the same medium might be a bit wearisome. But because of the varied quality of the music, the freshness of ideas, and due to the superlative performance by Paul Zukofsky, violin, and Gilbert Kalish, piano, there was not one note of tedium throughout the program.

The sonatas were all sketched in his earlier years at "Poverty Flats" in New York from 1902 to 1904 and the last was completed in 1914. In a sense they are all one piece and even from the first sonata we can determine the qualities of his style.

He literally uses folk material —pop tunes of the day, civil war songs—but in a highly individual way. There are times when in the romantic fashion he will quote for realistic purposes, but at other times he will quote, sometimes misquote, for humorous, even sardonic purposes.

A Major Influence

In technical terms Ives presaged much of what went on later in European circles—polytonality, the use of microtones, and a highly evolved rhythmic and metric sense. And in recent years Ives has become one of major influences upon many of the younger American composers.

And all this is done with daring . . . In the second sonata, the movement called "In The Barn," he directs the page turner to bang on the keys with his fists—a startling effect even now.

But this example should not give the impression of freakishness to the music. The main fabric is one of lyricism as well as a strong rhythmic and harmonic sense.

The two artists Zukofsky and Kalish performed in what was clearly a labor of love. Zukofsky has magnificent control of his instrument and Kalish performed with sensitivity and verve. It would require another review to comment adequately upon their performance. They have often performed, as well as recorded, this music.

The final concert of the festival, featuring the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be Monday.

—THOMAS PUTSCHE

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Sunday, August 11, at 10:30 a.m.
Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

Program

EDGARD VARESE — Octandre (1924)
Assez lent — Tres vif et nerveux — Grave

INGOLF DAHL — Duo Concertante for Flute and Percussion
Alla Marcia — Fughetta
Arioso accompagnato — Finale

INTERMISSION

ANTON WEBERN — Concerto for Nine Instruments op. 24
Etwas lebhaft — Sehr langsam — Sehr Rasch

BOHUSLAV MARTINU — Nonet
Poco allegro — Andante — Allegretto

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BURTON FINE viola
JULES ESKIN cello
HENRY PORTNOI bass
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
GINO CIOFFI clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JAMES STAGLIANO horn
ARMANDO GHITALLA trumpet
WILLIAM GIBSON trombone
EVERETT FIRTH timpani
RICHARD GOODE piano

Review of this concert is on p. 87

104.

Elephant Steps To Be Performed At Tanglewood

LENOX – This evening there will be the third performance of Stanley Silverman's theater piece, Elephant Steps, which was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in Cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation and had its premiere during the recent Festival of Contemporary Music. Theodore Strongin, reviewing the work for the New York Times, wrote, "Mr. Silverman and his colleague, Richard Foreman, who wrote the libretto for Elephant Steps and staged it, are courageous men. What they have done is taken all the senses, not just hearing, and given them equal value. They have stretched the awareness... and are successful enough on first try to make Elephant Steps very beguiling."

The eighth and final weekend of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open tomorrow evening with a concert at 9 by composer-conductor Aaron Copland. Mr. Copland founded the Composition Department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center and headed it for twenty-five years, retiring two seasons ago. For his program, he has chosen Elliot Carter's Holiday Overture, Faure's Pelleas and Melisande Suite, Chavez's Sinfonia India, Stravinsky's Ode, and two of his own compositions, the recently-composed Inscape, and the popular ballet classic, Billy The Kid.

Saturday's concert at 8 PM under the direction of the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will be an all-Wagner program, opening with the Prelude to Tristan and Isolde. Two important operatic excerpts occupy the balance of the program, the Finale of Das Rheingold, and Act I of Die Walkuere. Singers in both are Hanne - Lore Kuhse, Jess Thomas, and David Ward. Also singing in the Rheingold Finale are three members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program, Emily Derr, Frances Pavlides, and Phyllis Elhady.

On Sunday afternoon the concluding concert of the 1968 Berkshire Festival will again be conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, who has chosen an all-Brahms program. Three unusual and rarely-heard works for chorus and orchestra open the program. They are the Gesang der Parzen (Song of the Fates), Op. 89, Schicksalslied (Song of Destiny), Op. 54, and Naenie (Goddess of Funerals), Op. 82. Composed for the large choral societies which flourished in the Vienna of his day, the three works have texts by Goethe, Hoelderlin, and Schiller, respectively, and deal with the relation of man and the gods. Mr. Leinsdorf noted that each of these works has in common with Brahms' other choral pieces a text of great beauty and literary value. The Gesang der Parzen and Naenie will be performed by the Orchestra for the first time at this concert. The program will conclude with the First Symphony of Brahms.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GT. BARRINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,400

AUG 22 1968 New England Newsclip

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER FACULTY RECITAL

PAUL ZUKOFSKY, Violin
GILBERT KALISH, Piano

Saturday, August 10, at 2:30
Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

THE SONATAS FOR VIOLIN AND PIANO
By CHARLES IVES*

First Sonata (1903–1908)
Andante — Allegro Vivace
Largo Cantabile
Allegro

Second Sonata (1903–1910)
Autumn: Adagio Maestoso — Allegro Moderato
In the Barn: Presto — Allegro Moderato
The Revival: Largo — Allegretto

INTERMISSION

Third Sonata (1902–1914)
Adagio, Verse 1 — Andante, Verse 2 —
Allegretto, Verse 3 — Adagio, last verse
Allegro
Adagio Cantabile — Andante con spirito

Fourth Sonata (1905–1914) ("Children's Day at the Camp Meeting")
Allegro
Largo — Allegro (con slugarocko)
Allegro

* Recorded by Mr. Zukofsky and Mr. Kalish for Folkways Records

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 143,350

AUG 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Violin, Piano Program Is Original

TANGLEWOOD—The four sonatas for violin and piano by the Connecticut composer Charles Ives were presented Saturday afternoon at Tanglewood.

This concert was one in a week-long festival of contemporary music sponsored by the Bershire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

The story of Ives is one of the most fascinating in the recent history of music. Though his primary goal throughout life was to be a composer, he decided upon graduation from Yale that given the type of music he wished to create he could not exist in the music business. Instead he chose the insurance business, at which, incidentally, he was highly successful.

Original, Advanced Music

But it is for his music, original and much in advance of his time and for which he had no recognition during his lifetime, that we shall remember Ives.

The four sonatas for violin and piano for those who may not know his music are an excellent introduction to his style. One might suspect that a whole program of the works of one composer in the same medium might be a bit wearisome. But because of the varied quality of the music, the freshness of ideas, and due to the superlative performance by Paul Zukofsky, violin, and Gilbert Kalish, piano, there was not one note of tedium throughout the program.

The sonatas were all sketched in his earlier years at "Poverty Flats" in New York from 1902 to 1904 and the last was completed in 1914. In a sense they are all one piece and even from the first sonata we can determine the qualities of his style.

He literally uses folk material —pop tunes of the day, civil war songs—but in a highly individual way. There are times when in the romantic fashion he will quote for realistic purposes, but at other times he will quote, sometimes misquote, for humorous, even sardonic purposes.

A Major Influence

In technical terms Ives presaged much of what went on later in European circles—polytonality, the use of microtones, and a highly evolved rhythmic and metric sense. And in recent years Ives has become one of major influences upon many of the younger American composers.

And all this is done with daring . . . In the second sonata, the movement called "In The Barn," he directs the page turner to bang on the keys with his fists—a startling effect even now.

But this example should not give the impression of freakishness to the music. The main fabric is one of lyricism as well as a strong rhythmic and harmonic sense.

The two artists Zukofsky and Kalish performed in what was clearly a labor of love. Zukofsky has magnificent control of his instrument and Kalish performed with sensitivity and verve. It would require another review to comment adequately upon their performance. They have often performed, as well as recorded, this music.

The final concert of the festival, featuring the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be Monday.

—THOMAS PUTSCHE

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Sunday, August 11, at 10:30 a.m.
Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood

Program

EDGARD VARESE — Octandre (1924)
Assez lent — Tres vif et nerveux — Grave

INGOLF DAHL — Duo Concertante for Flute and Percussion
Alla Marcia — Fughetta
Arioso accompagnato — Finale

INTERMISSION

ANTON WEBERN — Concerto for Nine Instruments op. 24
Etwas lebhaft — Sehr langsam — Sehr Rasch

BOHUSLAV MARTINU — Nonet
Poco allegro — Andante — Allegretto

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BURTON FINE viola
JULES ESKIN cello
HENRY PORTNOI bass
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
GINO CIOFFI clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JAMES STAGLIANO horn
ARMANDO GHITALLA trumpet
WILLIAM GIBSON trombone
EVERETT FIRTH timpani
RICHARD GOODE piano

Review of the concert is on p. 87

105.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
AUG 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Audiences Are Small for New Works

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

It is becoming increasingly obvious that the rebellious contemporary composer has to write for asmall, select audience, and must run his own show.

Evidence was shown at the festival of contemporary music at Tanglewood, Aug. 4-11.

The festival was sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

The center is the educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This summer, about 450 "students" have been engaged in studies.

Separated by Years

A few hundred yards separate the Tanglewood Music Shed, where the Boston Symphony performs 24 major concerts during eight weekends, ending this afternoon, and the Theater Concert Hall that houses many of the Center's principal events.

The public attends the 24 concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival. Center performances are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center who have contributed financially towards its support.

Music by 28 composers was heard at the center's contemporary festival. Not one of these composers was represented in the Berkshire Festival concerts.

In the past, the works of some composers have been heard on both sides of the Tanglewood "campus." For example, Copland, Bartok, Stravinsky, Carter, Colgrass, Fine, Foss, Webern, Schoenberg, Martinu, etc.

The conspicuous fact about the recent contemporary festival is that the large majority of works were for small ensembles. The exceptions were short operas by Schoenberg and Stanley Silverman, and an extensive instrumental work with two solo voices by Robert Cogan.

It is stretching a point to include music by Ravel, Debussy, early Stravinsky (including "Firebird" and "Petrouchka"), and Richard Strauss among "contemporary" works.

Of the 34 composers whose works were heard in the 24 Berkshire Festival concerts, six were definitely within the contemporary classification — Lutoslawski, Bartok, Kraft, Carter, Chavez, and Copland.

For Full Symphony

All were compositions for full symphony orchestra.

Five contemporary composers were represented on the 16 programs by the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center. That orchestra's summer season only ends this afternoon.

The five wre Shostakovich, Prokofieff, Gerhswin, Richard Rodgers, and Carter. All of them were for full orchestra.

The contemporary composer loudly protests that the symphony orchestra is dead. That is an ostrich view of the situation.

A survey was taken last year by Broadcast Music Inc. Orchestral Program Survey, taken in collaboration with the American Symphony Orchestra League.

5,600 Concerts Covered

It covered 557 American and Canadian orchestras performing 23,126 works at 5,684 concerts, during 1966-67.

The five standard composers most performed were Beethoven, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Brahms and Bach. From the period after 1940 the most performed were Prokofieff, Stravinsky, Ravel, Copland, Batok, with Rodgers running a close sixth.

Major symphony orchestras support themselves mainly through the sale of tickets. Most of them are willing to risk the inclusion of contemporary music up to 40 per cent. To go beyond is to invite the death knell at the box-office.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

The public has the right to pay only for what it wants to hear.

As Harold Schoenberg, New York Times music critic, recently wrote:

"The public continues to reject the new music, and in particular the new music of the serial school. That includes Stravinsky. The bigger men of the most conservative school, Britten and Shostakovich above all, hold their own, but nobody seems to be coming up to replace them."

Experimenting With Few

Contemporary composers will have to be content with experimenting on themselves and a few hundred listeners in Tanglewood's Theater Concert Hall until they write something that a few thousand will want to hear in the Music Shed.

This is pin-pointing it to a few acres of musical terrain, but the situation is universal.

It's a pretty silly supposition that any symphony orchestra would withhold such lucrative and musically superior gems from its large audience.

Perhaps the audience is large enough because it does.

STAR (E)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 306,200
AUG 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Avant Garde

This week, the center of avant garde music in the United States has migrated to an unlikely place: Lenox, Mass. The Festival of Contemporary Music began at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's summer home there, last Sunday and will end this Sunday with a retrospective concert of music by Webern, Dahl, Varese and Martinu.

In general, however, the festival is anything but retrospective, for part of its purpose is to exhibit the very latest in new directions to composers as well as to interested members of the public.

In addition, the Music Critics Association is meeting at Tanglewood during this week with the express purpose of learning something about what is happening right now.

— D. M.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
SEP 8 1968

...uth... ...g of each ...son would sorb the council's ...ance for the project.

TALK AND LISTEN

Five continents and 46 countries are being represented by more than 400 delegates to the International Music Congress being held in New York City and Washington, D. C. this week. Besides all of the daily discussions, which may or may not develop political animosity since Czechoslovakia and several Eastern European countries are involved, special concerts are being presented for the delegates, concerts financed in part by grants from foundations. Tonight's will be devoted to the music of Harry Partch (see below), tomorrow night's to "Music from Tanglewood," which has been described as "the cream of Fromm," meaning the best works that have turned up in the recent series of contemporary-music concerts sponsored at Tanglewood by the Fromm Foundation.

On Wednesday night, Lukas Foss will lead the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in a concert arranged with Carnegie Hal... Inc. There w... ...miere of ...respo...

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357
SEP 12 1968

...e delegat... ...th... Congress of th... ...onal Music Council ...as for the assembled ...s of the Music Critic... ...ssociation, meeting jointl... ...New York this week. T... unfortunate part of it was that the manifold sound, color and light resources of the Circus were hardly used.

EARLIER THE same evening, the IMC and MCA confreres listened to a concert of "Music from Tanglewood" presented at the Metropolitan Museum's Grace Rainey Rogers Auditorium. This was a program of works commissioned by the Chicago-based Fromm Foundation, which sponsors a yearly contemporary music festival at Tanglewood, and which, in general, has done as much to foster the creation and performance of new music in this country as any existing organization.

The concert was a typical vanguard phenomenon. One approaches such an event fired with interest, for one is expecting to hear a sample of the latest, most sophisticated musical sounds of the day. As piece after piece goes by, however, enthusiasm ebbs at an ever-increasing rate, eventually drained to nothingness by a succession of dreary, static, processed ideas.

The performances, in this instance as in most, were excellent. A group of young, crackerjack instrumentalists played everything with zealous and brilliant discipline.

ONE WORK, Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 2" for flute, clarinet, violin, viola and tape recorder, stood out as music of genu... e craft and imagination, r... g in its own prolific ...ies, yet never losir... organic aims. Th... ...nhill. Henry ...ntus Comr... ...get awa... ...s, r...

Fromm commissions

Five works commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center were heard in what seemed to be excellent performances at Grace Rainey Rogers Auditorium on September 9. The concert was directed by Gunther Schuller, assisted by Paul Zukofsky, and was held in honor of the delegates of the International Music Congress, which was meeting in New York that week. Schuller is director of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood, where he is assisted, again, by Zukofsky, who also teaches violin and chamber music there. Almost all the performers at this concert, which was sponsored by the Fromm Foundation, were Fromm Fellow Players, a group that meets at Tanglewood each summer to perform contemporary music. The event was, in short, a bit—or a lot—of Tanglewood in New York.

Surprisingly enough, the newest piece—Easley Blackwood's 1968 Trio for Piano, Violin, and Cello, which received its premiere—was the most conventional, or at least the work which kept closest to older conventions. The language is lyrical and Viennesey, Bergian but cooler, and Blackwood is not afraid to develop an idea or to remain at a textural level for more than an instant. The composer was the pianist, Zukofsky the violinist, and Michael Rudiakov the cellist.

The most successful work was perhaps the most modest—Mario Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2 (1964), for flute, clarinet, violin, viola, and tape recorder, in which the composer, with a delicate but sure hand and a fine ear, combines the live and the electronic into a satisfying entity. And stops when he has made his point. The players were Harvey Sollberger (flute), Paul Zonn (clarinet), Zukofsky, and Rudiakov.

Henry Weinberg's Cantus Commemorabilis (1966) is austere in its avoidance of sound for its own sake, except for a piano passage of wildly flung clusters and the suddenly very personal flute cadenza that ends the work. Schuller conducted the twelve performers.

The long Chamber Concerto for Flute and Ten Players (1964) by Charles Wuorinen contains enough engaging sonorities and pregnant ideas for several good pieces. But the implications of all those drum rolls, trills, tremolos, and expectant pauses are unfulfilled, as if Wuorinen were trying to divest those techniques of their usual dramatic content. The solo part is an exemplar of the valid expressive extremes to which even the formerly innocent flute has been taken by our more imaginative composers and by such infinitely skillful performers as Sollberger. Zukofsky was the conductor.

In David Reck's 1965 Number Two (the scatological pun is probably intentional), a speaker (Barbara Smith-Conrad) hurls unrelated words and sentences ("It is most mad and moonly, unicorn" and "You fart out crazy daisies," for examples of the latter), first just to the audience, then including the conductor (Schuller) and the players (flute, bass clarinet, vibraphone, guitar, violin, and bass). The performers eventually answer her in kind, and the piece blows up. So might the audience.

M. B.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
DEC 1968

105

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
AUG 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Audiences Are Small for New Works

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

It is becoming increasingly obvious that the rebellious contemporary composer has to write for asmall, select audience, and must run his own show.

Evidence was shown at the festival of contemporary music at Tanglewood, Aug. 4-11.

The festival was sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

The center is the educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This summer, about 450 "students" have been engaged in studies.

Separated by Years

A few hundred yards separate the Tanglewood Music Shed, where the Boston Symphony performs 24 major concerts during eight weekends, ending this afternoon, and the Theater Concert Hall that houses many of the Center's principal events.

The public attends the 24 concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival. Center performances are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center who have contributed financially towards its support.

Music by 28 composers was heard at the center's contemporary festival. Not one of these composers was represented in the Berkshire Festival concerts.

In the past, the works of some composers have been heard on both sides of the Tanglewood "campus." For example, Copland, Bartok, Stravinsky, Carter, Colgrass, Fine, Foss, Webern, Schoenberg, Martinu, etc.

The conspicuous fact about the recent contemporary festival is that the large majority of works were for small ensembles. The exceptions were short operas by Schoenberg and Stanley Silverman, and an extensive instrumental work with two solo voices by Robert Cogan.

It is stretching a point to include music by Ravel, Debussy, early Stravinsky (including "Firebird" and "Petrouchka"), and Richard Strauss among "contemporary" works.

Of the 34 composers whose works were heard in the 24 Berkshire Festival concerts, six were definitely within the contemporary classification — Lutoslawski, Bartok, Kraft, Carter, Chavez, and Copland.

For Full Symphony

All were compositions for full symphony orchestra.

Five contemporary composers were represented on the 16 programs by the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center. That orchestra's summer season only ends this afternoon.

The five wre Shostakovich, Prokofieff, Gerhswin, Richard Rodgers, and Carter. All of them were for full orchestra.

The contemporary composer loudly protests that the symphony orchestra is dead. That is an ostrich view of the situation.

A survey was taken last year by Broadcast Music Inc. Orchestral Program Survey, taken in collaboration with the American Symphony Orchestra League.

5,600 Concerts Covered

It covered 557 American and Canadian orchestras performing 23,126 works at 5,684 concerts, during 1966-67.

The five standard composers most performed were Beethoven, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Brahms and Bach. From the period after 1940 the most performed were Prokofieff, Stravinsky, Ravel, Copland, Batok, with Rodgers running a close sixth.

Major symphony orchestras support themselves mainly through the sale of tickets. Most of them are willing to risk the inclusion of contemporary music up to 40 per cent. To go beyond is to invite the death knell at the box-office.

The public has the right to pay only for what it wants to hear.

As Harold Schoenberg, New York Times music critic, recently wrote:

"The public continues to reject the new music, and in particular the new music of the serial school. That includes Stravinsky. The bigger men of the most conservative school, Britten and Shostakovich above all, hold their own, but nobody seems to be coming up to replace them."

Experimenting With Few

Contemporary composers will have to be content with experimenting on themselves and a few hundred listeners in Tanglewood's Theater Concert Hall until they write something that a few thousand will want to hear in the Music Shed.

This is pin-pointing it to a few acres of musical terrain, but the situation is universal.

It's a pretty silly supposition that any symphony orchestra would withhold such lucrative and musically superior gems from its large audience.

Perhaps the audience is large enough because it does.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

STAR (E)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 366,200
AUG 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Avant Garde

This week, the center of avant garde music in the United States has migrated to an unlikely place: Lenox, Mass. The Festival of Contemporary Music began at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's summer home there, last Sunday and will end this Sunday with a retrospective concert of music by Webern, Dahl, Varese and Martinu.

In general, however, the festival is anything but retrospective, for part of its purpose is to exhibit the very latest in new directions to composers as well as to interested members of the public.

In addition, the Music Critics Association is meeting at Tanglewood during this week with the express purpose of learning something about what is happening right now.

— D. M.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357
SEP 12 1968

...e delegat... ...th Congress of th... ...onal Music Council ...as for the assembled ...s of the Music Critic ...ssociation, meeting jointl... ...a New York this week. T... unfortunate part of it was that the manifold sound, color and light resources of the Circus were hardly used.

EARLIER THE same evening, the IMC and MCA confreres listened to a concert of "Music from Tanglewood" presented at the Metropolitan Museum's Grace Rainey Rogers Auditorium. This was a program of works commissioned by the Chicago-based Fromm Foundation, which sponsors a yearly contemporary music festival at Tanglewood, and which, in general, has done as much to foster the creation and performance of new music in this country as any existing organization.

The concert was a typical vanguard phenomenon. One approaches such an event fired with interest, for one is expecting to hear a sample of the latest, most sophisticated musical sounds of the day. As piece after piece goes by, however, enthusiasm ebbs at an ever-increasing rate, eventually drained to nothingness by a succession of dreary, static, processed ideas.

The performances, in this instance as in most, were excellent. A group of young, crackerjack instrumentalists played everything with zealous and brilliant discipline.

ONE WORK, Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 2" for flute, clarinet, violin, viola and tape recorder, stood out as music of genu... e craft and imagination, r... g in its own prolific ...ies, yet never losir ...rganic aims. Th... ...nhill. Henry ...ntus Comr ...get aw... ...s, r...

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
SEP ...es ...uth 8 1968 ...g of each ...son would ...sorb the council's ...ance for the project.

TALK AND LISTEN

Five continents and 46 countries are being represented by more than 400 delegates to the International Music Congress being held in New York City and Washington, D. C. this week. Besides all of the daily discussions, which may or may not develop political animosity since Czechoslovakia and several Eastern European countries are involved, special concerts are being presented for the delegates, concerts financed in part by grants from foundations. Tonight's will be devoted to the music of Harry Partch (see below), tomorrow night's to "Music from Tanglewood," which has been described as "the cream of Fromm," meaning the best works that have turned up in the recent series of contemporary-music concerts sponsored at Tanglewood by the Fromm Foundation.

On Wednesday night, Lukas Foss will lead the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in a concert ...rranged ...ith Carnegie Hal... ...rna... Inc. There ... ...miere of ...respo...

Fromm commissions

Five works commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center were heard in what seemed to be excellent performances at Grace Rainey Rogers Auditorium on September 9. The concert was directed by Gunther Schuller, assisted by Paul Zukofsky, and was held in honor of the delegates of the International Music Congress, which was meeting in New York that week. Schuller is director of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood, where he is assisted, again, by Zukofsky, who also teaches violin and chamber music there. Almost all the performers at this concert, which was sponsored by the Fromm Foundation, were Fromm Fellow Players, a group that meets at Tanglewood each summer to perform contemporary music. The event was, in short, a bit—or a lot—of Tanglewood in New York.

Surprisingly enough, the newest piece—Easley Blackwood's 1968 Trio for Piano, Violin, and Cello, which received its premiere—was the most conventional, or at least the work which kept closest to older conventions. The language is lyrical and Viennesey, Bergian but cooler, and Blackwood is not afraid to develop an idea or to remain at a textural level for more than an instant. The composer was the pianist, Zukofsky the violinist, and Michael Rudiakov the cellist.

The most successful work was perhaps the most modest—Mario Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2 (1964), for flute, clarinet, violin, viola, and tape recorder, in which the composer, with a delicate but sure hand and a fine ear, combines the live and the electronic into a satisfying entity. And stops when he has made his point. The players were Harvey Sollberger (flute), Paul Zonn (clarinet), Zukofsky, and Rudiakov.

Henry Weinberg's Cantus Commemorabilis (1966) is austere in its avoidance of sound for its own sake, except for a piano passage of wildly flung clusters and the suddenly very personal flute cadenza that ends the work. Schuller conducted the twelve performers.

The long Chamber Concerto for Flute and Ten Players (1964) by Charles Wuorinen contains enough engaging sonorities and pregnant ideas for several good pieces. But the implications of all those drum rolls, trills, tremolos, and expectant pauses are unfulfilled, as if Wuorinen were trying to divest those techniques of their usual dramatic content. The solo part is an exemplar of the valid expressive extremes to which even the formerly innocent flute has been taken by our more imaginative composers and by such infinitely skillful performers as Sollberger. Zukofsky was the conductor.

In David Reck's 1965 Number Two (the scatological pun is probably intentional), a speaker (Barbara Smith-Conrad) hurls unrelated words and sentences ("It is most mad and moonly, unicorn" and "You fart out crazy daisies," for examples of the latter), first just to the audience, then including the conductor (Schuller) and the players (flute, bass clarinet, vibraphone, guitar, violin, and bass). The performers eventually answer her in kind, and the piece blows up. So might the audience.

M. B.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
DEC 1968

Music Critics on the Record

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The annual conference of the Music Critics Association will be held in New York City, Sept. 8-11, in conjunction with the Congress of the International Music Council, sponsored by the U. S. National Commission for UNESCO.

General theme of the congress is music and communication. The critics will be represented in several important panel discussions.

Until now, the voice of the Music Critics Association has been heard almost exclusively by its own membership.

In about a year's time, the genral public, musicians, and managers are going to hear that voice, loud and clear.

A year ago, the Music Critics Association was awarded a technical assistance grant of $67,200 by the National Endowment for the Arts with which to publish a new magazine called American Musical Digest.

A circulation figure of 25,000 is projected within five years after publication begins in September, 1969.

No original articles will appear in the Digest. It will reprint, digest and abstract reviews and articles about music with particular emphasis on the works and careers of American composers and performers. Material will come from the general and musical press of the world.

It will counteract misleading information from managements who have heretofore quoted only that which was favorable to its clients.

Important Matters

Several important matters apart from Musical Digest are on the critics' agenda for their forthcoming conference, which will be felt by the general public.

Among these are (1) an exchange of music critics between newspapers, (2) an approved list of standard musical terms, (3) the creation of an annual music critics' institute at Tanglewood in association with the Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Fromm Foundation, and (4) the expansion of to include critics from South and Central America.

The Music Critics Associ- the association's membership members in this country and Canada. This leaves about 600 nonmember critics in the United States.

WOODSTOCK FESTIVAL

Two talented young pianists will make appearances in August at the music festival at Woodstock (Conn.) Academy.

Robert Guralnik will be heard on Wednesday evening, Aug. 7. He gave a successful Carnegie Hall recital last October. His Woodstock program is three pieces from "Iberia" by Albeniz; Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor; Sonata in C major, K.330 by Mozart: Six Grand Etudes after Paganini by Liszt.

Joseph Kalichstein, 21-year-old pianist from Israel, will be heard Aug. 14. In January he appeared with the New York Philharmonic and Leonard Bernstein in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto.

Kalichstein will play Schubert's Sonata in A major; Rhapsody in E flat, Opus 119 by Brahms; Sonata in E, Opus 90 by Beethoven; and three movements from Stravinsky's ballet music, "Petrouchka."

FREE LANCING

Most music festivals stress the necessity for purchasing tickets early in order to "avoid disappointment." The gigantic new festival at Blossom Music Center, Cleveland, gives no such advice.

Blossom manager Marshall W. Turkin states that the Cleveland Orchestra will have no use for "sold out" signs until the festival ends on Sept. 2.

"A complete sellout is virtually an impossibility," he writes, "due to the tremendous capacity, 4,600 seats in the pavilion and room for up to 15,000 on the spacious lawn."

The Paul Winter Contemporary Consort, which made a highly successful appearance last February on Clark University's Fine Arts series, will be in Israel as of Tuesday.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
JUL 28 1968
New England Newsclip

U.S. Music Critics to Publish Magazine

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

NEW YORK, N.Y. — Several major projects having a direct effect on the public were formally launched by the Music Critics Association in a four-day convention that ended last night in New York City.

Critics from throughout the United States and Canada conducted their conferences in conjunction with the Sixth Congress of the International Music Council, held for the first time in the United States.

Sponsor was the United States National Commission for UNESCO.

Congress members numbered 600 from the United States and 4 foreign countries. The Music Critics Association has 121 members.

Most significant undertaking of the critics is the founding of a new magazine, American Musical Digest, with funds provided by the National Endowment of the Arts, Washington, D.C. It will become available to the public in the fall of 1969.

U.S. Composers

The magazine will reprint, digest, abstract and translate reviews and articles about music with emphasis on the works and careers of American composers.

Contributors will be members of the critics association and the general worldwide press.

To guarantee objectivity and complete candor, the magazine will carry no advertising.

The association has several purposes in establishing its own magazine. It wishes to raise musical standards by bringing recognition to legitimate developments and harpooning deception.

This compilation of international comment will be available to those who have had to rely almost entirely on opinion dispensed within their own communities or from misleading quotations of business-minded managements.

Senior Critic

Beginning with the summer of 1969, a senior music critic will be on duty for three weeks at Tanglewood to supervise a number of apprentice critics whose expenses will be paid by the Fromm Foundation of Chicago.

Their studies will be involved with the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony and Festival of Contemporary Music by the Berkshire Music Center.

The Music Critics Association has also received a grant of nearly $7,000 from the National Endowment to help implement a one-year experimeental program of exchanges between professional critics from cities of various sizes.

Panel discussions by critics and famed composers at the convention were hue-and-cry sessions over the direction taken in some present-day music.

Among the composers present were Copland, Babbitt, Carter, Sessions, Schuller and Krenek.

Filthy Thing

Opinions were hotly contradictory. One segment of the composers' own ranks described electronic music as "a mechanical media which makes a filthy thing out of art."

In rebuttal it was stated that "the development of new music will not wait for the critics to catch up."

The critics were given the opportunity to board the bandwagon of dissonance and some electronic mumo-jumbo.

At the Metropolitan Art Museum, Schuller led the Fromm Fellow players in a program of works premiered at Tanglewood.

Critics reactions to a Blackwood Trio and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 2" were reserved. Less enthusiasm was aroused by cacaphonous brainstorms by Weinberg, Wuorinen and Reck.

The convention's most unusual experience was highly unconventional. Critics sat on the stone floor of the sumptuously equipped Whitney Museum on Madison Avenue to hear one of Harry Partch's rare concerts on a batch of bolky instruments of his own making.

Sixty-seven year old, white maned Partch was assisted by 14 young performers of the long-haired, bearded variety.

Among the paraphenalia were glasses, bowls, light bulbs, a zither-liker instrument called a harmonic canon, gourds, cone gongs, and a zymo-zyl.

The program reached its zenith with "And on the Seventh Day Petals Fell in Petaluma."

There were other droppings as well, like exotic rhythms, sound mixtures similar to a Balinese gamelan orchestra, all offered with fierce sobriety.

As Partch says, "The prime obligation of the artist is to transcend his age, therefore show it in terms of the eternal mysteries."

To soothe ruffled nerves, the critics were also invited to hear Ravi Shankar at Philharmonic Hall on Tuesday night, and the Buffalo Philharmonic at Carnegie Hall last night.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350
SEP 12 1968
New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center

Fellowship Program • 1968

VIOLIN

Patricio Cobos (Chile) — Koussevitzky Music Foundation Fellow
Joseph Conte (Providence, Rhode Island) — Roy Lemson Fellow
Arthur Culver (East Rochester, New York) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Mary Culver (East Rochester, New York) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Eugene Drucker (New York, New York) — Jascha Heifetz Fellow
Nina Falk (New York, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Michael Faulkner (Ridgewood, New Jersey) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Emily Faxon (Brookline, Massachusetts) — N.F.M.C., Ada Holding Miller Fellow
Edith Haladjeff (Detroit, Michigan) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Anita Halverson (Minneapolis, Minnesota)
Mieko Horie (Japan)
Laura Jeppesen (Brunswick, Maine)
Young Nam Kim (Korea) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Martha Kolden (Cambridge, Massachusetts) — Young Artist Award
Jin Kyung Koo (Korea)
Rhoda Lederman (Franklin Square, New York)
J. Patrick Rafferty (Toledo, Ohio)
Juan Ramirez Hernandez (Mexico) — C. D. Jackson Master Award
Sylvia Rosenzweig (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania) — Carlotta M. Dreyfus Fellow
Ralph Rubenstein (Brooklyn, New York) — Selby A. Eisemann Memorial Fellow
Marjorie Rupp (North Wales, Pennsylvania)
Jorge Salim (Brazil)
Hazel Sandow (Elmhurst, New York)
Gary Sliauzis (Miami, Florida)
Ellen Wagner (Schenectady, New York)
Stephanie Woolf (Medford, Massachusetts) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

VIOLA

Heidrun Behncke (Germany) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Judy Checkovich (South Norwalk, Connecticut)
David George (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)
Francis Grimes (Cumberland, Rhode Island)
Enid Jones (Cincinnati, Ohio) — Stanley Chapple Fellow
Robert Jones (Cincinnati, Ohio) — Stanley Chapple Fellow
Geraldine Lamboley (Tampa, Florida) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Barry Lehr (New York, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Mark Perlman (New York, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Patricia Snowdon (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)

CELLO

Thirzah Bendokas (Union City, Connecticut) — WCRB (Boston) Fellow
Terry Braverman (Brooklyn, New York)
Aleksander Ciechanski (Poland) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Mary Durell (Toledo, Ohio)
Masayoshi Kataoka (Japan) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Soichi Katsuta (Japan) — Koussevitsky Music Foundation Fellow
Maria Kyprie (Ann Arbor, Michigan)
Neal LaMonaco (Bayside, New York) — Samuel C. Endicott Fellow
Richard Mickey (Cincinnati, Ohio) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Charlotte Moulyn (Stamford, Connecticut) — Arthur M. Abell Fellow
Elizabeth Pearson (Newbury, Massachusetts)

BASS

Steven Edwards (West Collingswood, New Jersey)
Laurence Epstein (Miami, Florida) — Leo Wasserman Foundation Fellow
Louis Kosma (Warminster, Pennsylvania)
Michele Saxon (Roslyn Heights, New York) — C. D. Jackson Master Award
Laurence Wolfe (Stoneham, Massachusetts) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

HARP

Marjorie Hartzell (Albany, New York)

FLUTE

Michael Finegold (New Haven, Connecticut) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Susan Greenberg (Castro Valley, California) — N.F.M.C., Ada Holding Miller Fellow
Eiko Ito (Japan) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Jonathon Landell (Acton, Massachusetts)

OBOE

Donald Bender (Danbury, Connecticut)
Marion Gibson (Denton, Texas) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Timothy Valentine (Boston, Massachusetts) — Augustus Thorndike Fellow
Wilma Zonn (Grinnell, Iowa) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

CLARINET

David Breeden (Denton, Texas) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Paul Gallo (Brooklyn, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Donald Stewart (New York, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Paul Zonn (Grinnell, Iowa) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

BASSOON

Kazuyoshi Asano (Japan) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Cedric Coleman (Hempstead, New York) — WCRB (Boston) Fellow
Kirkland Ferris (Concord, New Hampshire)
Matthew Shubin (New York, New York)

FRENCH HORN

Joy Durschnitt (New York, New York)
Edwin Goble (Sheffield, Massachusetts) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Suzanne Govier (Mountain Lakes, New Jersey)
Michael Johns (Manchester, Connecticut) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Robert Routch (Allentown, Pennsylvania) — Samuel C. Endicott Fellow
Victor Vener (Pasadena, California) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow

TRUMPET

Edward Hoffman (Park Ridge, Illinois)
Bernhard Jobski (Germany) — Koussevitzky Music Foundation Fellow
Dennis Najoom (Pittsfield, Massachusetts) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
James Simpson (Amherst, Massachusetts) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

TROMBONE

Francis Hunt (Sandusky, Ohio)
John Kitzman (Garden City, Michigan)
Milton Stevens (Great Barrington, Massachusetts) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow

TUBA

Donald Tidwell (New Orleans, Louisiana)
Ellis Wean (Holbrook, Massachusetts)

PERCUSSION

Paul Berns (Fairview Park, Ohio) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Garry Kvistad (Franklin Park, Illinois)
Howard Leavitt (Silver Spring, Maryland) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Peter Magadini (San Francisco, California) — Lenox School of Jazz Fund Fellow
Anthony Orlando (Reading, Pennsylvania)
Linda Raymond (Salem, Massachusetts)

PIANO

Diana Duffin (Morrisville, Pennsylvania)
Rosemary Hyler (Danville, Virginia)
Cecilia Ignatieff (Canada)
Kimberly Kabala (Huntington Woods, Michigan) — Lucien Wulsin Memorial Fellow
Roselyne Masset-Lecocq (France) — Lucien Wulsin Memorial Fellow
Michael Root (Cleveland Heights, Ohio)
Nina Sapiejewski (New York, New York) — Asher J. Schuffer Memorial Fellow
Craig Sheppard (Jenkintown, Pennsylvania) — Lucien Wulsin Memorial Fellow
Elizabeth Stevens (Great Barrington, Massachusetts) — Lucien Wulsin Memorial Fellow
Yuji Takahashi (Japan)

HARPSICHORD

William Sano (Youngstown, Ohio) — William Schwann Fellow

VOICE

Mary Christie (Evanston, Illinois)
Osceola Davis (New York, New York) — Beranek Fellow
Emily Derr (New York, New York)
Bonita Glenn (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania) — Adah Mase Curran Fellow
Susan Hoagland (Arlington, Virginia)
Doris Hollenbach (Uniondale, New York)
Jo Ann Lanier (Youngstown, Ohio) — Young Artist Award
Donna Newman (Pigeon, Michigan)
Louine Noble (Glendale, Missouri)
Donna Precht (Brooklyn, New York) — Adah Mase Curran Fellow
Christy Rio (Cambridge, Massachusetts)
Kathleen Toohey (North Adams, Massachusetts)
Carol Cannon (Baltimore, Maryland)
Margery Clifford (Chevy Chase, Maryland)
Phyllis Elhady (Manchester, New Hampshire)
Linden Maxwell (Mt. Rainier, Maryland)
JoElyn McGowan (Omaha, Nebraska)
Lois Nordling (Westwood, New Jersey)
Frances Pavlides (Astoria, New York)
Jacqueline Pierce (New York, New York)
Cathleen Porter (North Olmsted, Ohio)
Constance Pottle (Lexington, Massachusetts)
Kenneth Clinton (Watertown, Connecticut)
Luther Enstad (Williamsburg, Iowa)
Gene Ford (Baltimore, Maryland)
Roger Lucas (Charleston, West Virginia) — C. D. Jackson Master Award
Roy Perdue (Salisbury, Maryland)
Arthur Sjogren (Peekskill, New York)
Richard Cassell (Hewlett, New York)
Lee Evans (Boston, Massachusetts)
Francis Hester (Dorchester, Massachusetts)
Stence Jackson (Walled Lake, Michigan)
James Jones (St. Louis, Missouri) — High Fidelity Magazine Fellow
Alan Kosloff (Waterbury, Connecticut)
Leopold Napotnik (Chicago, Illinois)
Richard Shapp (Merion Station, Pennsylvania)
Charles White (Charlotte, North Carolina)
Philip Erikson (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)
Thomas Ross (Fairmont, Minnesota)

COMPOSER

Paul Chihara (Santa Monica, California) — ASCAP Fellow
Marc-Antonio Consoli (Bellerose, New York) — Margaret Lee Crofts Fellow
Stephen Dickman (Glencoe, Illinois)
Jere Hutcheson (East Lansing, Michigan)
Barbara Kolb (New York, New York)
Vincent Luti (New Haven, Connecticut)
Paul Mefano (France) — Margaret Lee Crofts Fellow
Harold Oliver (Princeton, New Jersey)
Jerzy Sapiejewski (Poland) — Koussevitzky Music Foundation Fellow
Robert Selig (Evanston, Illinois)

CONDUCTOR

Gerald Brown (Bolivia) — Gertrude Robinson Smith Associate Fellow in Conducting
James Frazier (Detroit, Michigan) — Edgar Stern Memorial Associate Fellow in Conducting
Julio Medaglia (Brazil) — Leonard Bernstein Fellow in Conducting and Violin
Stefan Minde (West Germany) — Erich Leinsdorf Fellow in Conducting and Vocal Coaching
Ronald Stoffel (Buffalo, New York) — Samuel Antek Fellow in Violin and Conducting
Michael Tilson Thomas (Los Angeles, California) — Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Fellow

Music Critics on the Record

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The annual conference of the Music Critics Association will be held in New York City, Sept. 8-11, in conjunction with the Congress of the International Music Council, sponsored by the U. S. National Commission for UNESCO.

General theme of the congress is music and communication. The critics will be represented in several important panel discussions.

Until now, the voice of the Music Critics Association has been heard almost exclusively by its own membership.

In about a year's time, the genral public, musicians, and managers are going to hear that voice, loud and clear.

A year ago, the Music Critics Association was awarded a technical assistance grant of $67,200 by the National Endowment for the Arts with which to publish a new magazine called American Musical Digest.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

A circulation figure of 25,000 is projected within five years after publication begins in September, 1969.

No original articles will appear in the Digest. It will reprint, digest and abstract reviews and articles about music with particular emphasis on the works and careers of American composers and performers. Material will come from the general and musical press of the world.

It will counteract misleading information from managements who have heretofore quoted only that which was favorable to its clients.

Important Matters

Several important matters apart from Musical Digest are on the critics' agenda for their forthcoming conference, which will be felt by the general public.

Among these are (1) an exchange of music critics between newspapers, (2) an approved list of standard musical terms, (3) the creation of an annual music critics' institute at Tanglewood in association with the Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Fromm Foundation, and (4) the expansion of to include critics from South and Central America.

The Music Critics Associ- the association's membership members in this country and Canada. This leaves about 600 nonmember critics in the United States.

WOODSTOCK FESTIVAL

Two talented young pianists will make appearances in August at the music festival at Woodstock (Conn.) Academy.

Robert Guralnik will be heard on Wednesday evening, Aug. 7. He gave a successful Carnegie Hall recital last October. His Woodstock program is three pieces from "Iberia" by Albeniz; Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor; Sonata in C major, K.330 by Mozart: Six Grand Etudes after Paganini by Liszt.

Joseph Kalichstein, 21-year-old pianist from Israel, will be heard Aug. 14. In January he appeared with the New York Philharmonic and Leonard Bernstein in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto.

Kalichstein will play Schubert's Sonata in A major; Rhapsody in E flat, Opus 119 by Brahms; Sonata in E, Opus 90 by Beethoven; and three movements from Stravinsky's ballet music, "Petrouchka."

FREE LANCING

Most music festivals stress the necessity for purchasing tickets early in order to "avoid disappointment." The gigantic new festival at Blossom Music Center, Cleveland, gives no such advice.

Blossom manager Marshall W. Turkin states that the Cleveland Orchestra will have no use for "sold out" signs until the festival ends on Sept. 2.

"A complete sellout is virtually an impossibility," he writes, "due to the tremendous capacity, 4,600 seats in the pavilion and room for up to 15,000 on the spacious lawn."

The Paul Winter Contemporary Consort, which made a highly successful appearance last February on Clark University's Fine Arts series, will be in Israel as of Tuesday.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

JUL 28 1968 New England Newsclip

U.S. Music Critics to Publish Magazine

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

NEW YORK, N.Y. — Several major projects having a direct effect on the public were formally launched by the Music Critics Association in a four-day convention that ended last night in New York City.

Critics from throughout the United States and Canada conducted their conferences in conjunction with the Sixth Congress of the International Music Council, held for the first time in the United States.

Sponsor was the United States National Commission for UNESCO.

Congress members numbered 600 from the United States and 4 foreign countries. The Music Critics Association has 121 members.

Most significant undertaking of the critics is the founding of a new magazine, American Musical Digest, with funds provided by the National Endowment of the Arts, Washington, D.C. It will become available to the public in the fall of 1969.

U.S. Composers

The magazine will reprint, digest, abstract and translate reviews and articles about music with emphasis on the works and careers of American composers.

Contributors will be members of the critics association and the general worldwide press.

To guarantee objectivity and complete candor, the magazine will carry no advertising.

The association has several purposes in establishing its own magazine. It wishes to raise musical standards by bringing recognition to legitimate developments and harpooning deception.

This compilation of international comment will be available to those who have had to rely almost entirely on opinion dispensed within their own communities or from misleading quotations of business-minded managements.

Senior Critic

Beginning with the summer of 1969, a senior music critic will be on duty for three weeks at Tanglewood to supervise a number of apprentice critics whose expenses will be paid by the Fromm Foundation of Chicago.

Their studies will be involved with the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony and Festival of Contemporary Music by the Berkshire Music Center.

The Music Critics Association has also received a grant of nearly $7,000 from the National Endowment to help implement a one-year experimeental program of exchanges between professional critics from cities of various sizes.

Panel discussions by critics and famed composers at the convention were hue-and-cry sessions over the direction taken in some present-day music.

Among the composers present were Copland, Babbitt, Carter, Sessions, Schuller and Krenek.

Filthy Thing

Opinions were hotly contradictory. One segment of the composers' own ranks described electronic music as "a mechanical media which makes a filthy thing out of art."

In rebuttal it was stated that "the development of new music will not wait for the critics to catch up."

The critics were given the opportunity to board the bandwagon of dissonance and some electronic mumo-jumbo.

At the Metropolitan Art Museum, Schuller led the Fromm Fellow players in a program of works premiered at Tanglewood.

Critics reactions to a Blackwood Trio and Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 2" were reserved. Less enthusiasm was aroused by cacaphonous brainstorms by Weinberg, Wuorinen and Reck.

The convention's most unusual experience was highly unconventional. Critics sat on the stone floor of the sumptuously equipped Whitney Museum on Madison Avenue to hear one of Harry Partch's rare concerts on a batch of bolky instruments of his own making.

Sixty-seven year old, white maned Partch was assisted by 14 young performers of the long-haired, bearded variety.

Among the paraphenalia were glasses, bowls, light bulbs, a zither-liker instrument called a harmonic canon, gourds, cone gongs, and a zymo-zyl.

The program reached its zenith with "And on the Seventh Day Petals Fell in Petaluma."

There were other droppings as well, like exotic rhythms, sound mixtures similar to a Balinese gamelan orchestra, all offered with fierce sobriety.

As Partch says, "The prime obligation of the artist is to transcend his age, therefore show it in terms of the eternal mysteries."

To soothe ruffled nerves, the critics were also invited to hear Ravi Shankar at Philharmonic Hall on Tuesday night, and the Buffalo Philharmonic at Carnegie Hall last night.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS
CIRC. 61,350

SEP 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center

Fellowship Program • 1968

VIOLIN

Patricio Cobos (Chile) — Koussevitzky Music Foundation Fellow
Joseph Conte (Providence, Rhode Island) — Roy Lowson Fellow
Arthur Culver (East Rochester, New York) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Mary Culver (East Rochester, New York) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Eugene Drucker (New York, New York) — Jascha Heifetz Fellow
Nina Falk (New York, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Michael Faulkner (Ridgewood, New Jersey) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Emily Faxon (Brookline, Massachusetts) — N.F.M.C., Ada Holding Miller Fellow
Edith Haladjoff (Detroit, Michigan) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Anita Halverson (Minneapolis, Minnesota)
Mieko Horie (Japan)
Laura Jeppesen (Brunswick, Maine)
Young Nam Kim (Korea) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Martha Kolden (Cambridge, Massachusetts) — Young Artist Award
Jin Kyung Koo (Korea)
Rhoda Lederman (Franklin Square, New York)
J. Patrick Rafferty (Toledo, Ohio)
Juan Ramirez Hernandez (Mexico) — C. D. Jackson Master Award
Sylvia Rosenzweig (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania) — Carlotta M. Dreyfus Fellow
Ralph Rubenstein (Brooklyn, New York) — Sally A. Eisemann Memorial Fellow
Marjorie Rupp (North Wales, Pennsylvania)
Jorge Salim (Brazil)
Hazel Sandow (Elmhurst, New York)
Gary Sliauzis (Miami, Florida)
Ellen Wagner (Schenectady, New York)
Stephanie Woolf (Medford, Massachusetts) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

VIOLA

Heidrun Behncke (Germany) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Judy Checkovich (South Norwalk, Connecticut
David George (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)
Francis Grimes (Cumberland, Rhode Island)
Enid Jones (Cincinnati, Ohio) — Stanley Chapple Fellow
Robert Jones (Cincinnati, Ohio) — Stanley Chapple Fellow
Geraldine Lamboley (Tampa, Florida) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Barry Lehr (New York, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Mark Perlman (New York, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Patricia Snowdon (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)

CELLO

Thirzah Bendokas (Union City, Connecticut) — WCRB (Boston) Fellow
Terry Braverman (Brooklyn, New York)
Aleksander Ciechanski (Poland) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Mary Durell (Toledo, Ohio)
Masayoshi Kataoka (Japan) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Soichi Katsuta (Japan) — Koussevitsky Music Foundation Fellow
Maria Kyprie (Ann Arbor, Michigan)
Neal LaMonaco (Bayside, New York) — Samuel C. Endicott Fellow
Richard Mickey (Cincinnati, Ohio) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Charlotte Moulyn (Stamford, Connecticut) — Arthur M. Abell Fellow
Elizabeth Pearson (Newbury, Massachusetts)

BASS

Steven Edwards (West Collingswood, New Jersey)
Laurence Epstein (Miami, Florida) — Leo Wasserman Foundation Fellow
Louis Kosma (Warminster, Pennsylvania)
Michele Saxon (Roslyn Heights, New York) — C. D. Jackson Master Award
Laurence Wolfe (Stoneham, Massachusetts) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

HARP

Marjorie Hartzell (Albany, New York)

FLUTE

Michael Finegold (New Haven, Connecticut) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Susan Greenberg (Castro Valley, California) — N.F.M.C., Ada Holding Miller Fellow
Eiko Ito (Japan) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Jonathon Landell (Acton, Massachusetts)

OBOE

Donald Bender (Danbury, Connecticut)
Marion Gibson (Denton, Texas) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Timothy Valentine (Boston, Massachusetts) — Augustus Thorndike Fellow
Wilma Zonn (Grinnell, Iowa) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

CLARINET

David Breeden (Denton, Texas) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Paul Gallo (Brooklyn, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Donald Stewart (New York, New York) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Paul Zonn (Grinnell, Iowa) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

BASSOON

Kazuyoshi Asano (Japan) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Cedric Coleman (Hempstead, New York) — WCRB (Boston) Fellow
Kirkland Ferris (Concord, New Hampshire)
Matthew Shubin (New York, New York)

FRENCH HORN

Joy Durschnitt (New York, New York)
Edwin Goble (Sheffield, Massachusetts) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow
Suzanne Govier (Mountain Lakes, New Jersey)
Michael Johns (Manchester, Connecticut) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Robert Routch (Allentown, Pennsylvania) — Samuel C. Endicott Fellow
Victor Vener (Pasadena, California) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow

TRUMPET

Edward Hoffman (Park Ridge, Illinois)
Bernhard Jobski (Germany) — Koussevitzky Music Foundation Fellow
Dennis Najoom (Pittsfield, Massachusetts) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
James Simpson (Amherst, Massachusetts) — 1967 Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Fellow

TROMBONE

Francis Hunt (Sandusky, Ohio)
John Kitzman (Garden City, Michigan)
Milton Stevens (Great Barrington, Massachusetts) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow

TUBA

Donald Tidwell (New Orleans, Louisiana)
Ellis Wean (Holbrook, Massachusetts)

PERCUSSION

Paul Berns (Fairview Park, Ohio) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Garry Kvistad (Franklin Park, Illinois)
Howard Leavitt (Silver Spring, Maryland) — Fromm Music Foundation Fellow
Peter Magadini (San Francisco, California) — Lenox School of Jazz Fund Fellow
Anthony Orlando (Reading, Pennsylvania)
Linda Raymond (Salem, Massachusetts)

PIANO

Diana Duffin (Morrisville, Pennsylvania)
Rosemary Hyler (Danville, Virginia)
Cecilia Ignatieff (Canada)
Kimberly Kabala (Huntington Woods, Michigan) — Lucien Wulsin Memorial Fellow
Roselyne Masset-Lecocq (France) — Lucien Wulsin Memorial Fellow
Michaël Root (Cleveland Heights, Ohio)
Nina Sapiejewski (New York, New York) — Asher J. Schaffer Memorial Fellow
Craig Sheppard (Jenkintown, Pennsylvania) — Lucien Wulsin Memorial Fellow
Elizabeth Stevens (Great Barrington, Massachusetts) — Lucien Wulsin Memorial Fellow
Yuji Takahashi (Japan)

HARPSICHORD

William Sano (Youngstown, Ohio) — William Schwann Fellow

VOICE

Mary Christie (Evanston, Illinois)
Osceola Davis (New York, New York) — Beranek Fellow
Emily Derr (New York, New York)
Bonita Glenn (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania) — Adah Mase Curran Fellow
Susan Hoagland (Arlington, Virginia)
Doris Hollenbach (Uniondale, New York)
Jo Ann Lanier (Youngstown, Ohio) — Young Artist Award
Donna Newman (Pigeon, Michigan)
Louine Noble (Glendale, Missouri)
Donna Precht (Brooklyn, New York) — Adah Mase Curran Fellow
Christy Rio (Cambridge, Massachusetts)
Kathleen Toohey (North Adams, Massachusetts)
Carol Cannon (Baltimore, Maryland)
Margery Clifford (Chevy Chase, Maryland)
Phyllis Elhady (Manchester, New Hampshire)
Linden Maxwell (Mt. Rainier, Maryland)
JoElyn McGowan (Omaha, Nebraska)
Lois Nordling (Westwood, New Jersey)
Frances Pavlides (Astoria, New York)
Jacqueline Pierce (New York, New York)
Cathleen Porter (North Olmsted, Ohio)
Constance Pottle (Lexington, Massachusetts)
Kenneth Clinton (Watertown, Connecticut)
Luther Enstad (Williamsburg, Iowa)
Gene Ford (Baltimore, Maryland)
Roger Lucas (Charleston, West Virginia) — C. D. Jackson Master Award
Roy Perdue (Salisbury, Maryland)
Arthur Sjogren (Peekskill, New York)
Richard Cassell (Hewlett, New York)
Lee Evans (Boston, Massachusetts)
Francis Hester (Dorchester, Massachusetts)
Stence Jackson (Walled Lake, Michigan)
James Jones (St. Louis, Missouri) — High Fidelity Magazine Fellow
Alan Kosloff (Waterbury, Connecticut)
Leopold Napotnik (Chicago, Illinois)
Richard Shapp (Merion Station, Pennsylvania)
Charles White (Charlotte, North Carolina)
Philip Erikson (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)
Thomas Ross (Fairmont, Minnesota)

COMPOSER

Paul Chihara (Santa Monica, California) — ASCAP Fellow
Marc-Antonio Consoli (Bellerose, New York) — Margaret Lee Crofts Fellow
Stephen Dickman (Glencoe, Illinois)
Jere Hutcheson (East Lansing, Michigan)
Barbara Kolb (New York, New York)
Vincent Luti (New Haven, Connecticut)
Paul Mefano (France) — Margaret Lee Crofts Fellow
Harold Oliver (Princeton, New Jersey)
Jerzy Sapiejewski (Poland) — Koussevitzky Music Foundation Fellow
Robert Selig (Evanston, Illinois)

CONDUCTOR

Gerald Brown (Bolivia) — Gertrude Robinson Smith Associate Fellow in Conducting
James Frazier (Detroit, Michigan) — Edgar Stern Memorial Associate Fellow in Conducting
Julio Medaglia (Brazil) — Leonard Bernstein Fellow in Conducting and Violin
Stefan Minde (West Germany) — Erich Leinsdorf Fellow in Conducting and Vocal Coaching
Ronald Stoffel (Buffalo, New York) — Samuel Antek Fellow in Violin and Conducting
Michael Tilson Thomas (Los Angeles, California) — Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Fellow

107.

Music Educators National Conference

THE FACTORS WHICH PRODUCE THE SERIOUS MUSIC STUDENT

John Christie, Editor

A Survey of the Tanglewood Student Orchestra Yields Some Expected Results—and Some Surprises

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra is composed of about 100 young people, mostly college students and graduate students, who assemble for eight weeks in the summer at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These young musicians are selected by means of auditions held throughout the United States, and are at Tanglewood on fellowships; that is, they receive their board and room, a travel allowance, and pay no tuition for their summer of study. They work with the members of the Boston Symphony and play concerts under many conductors, including, during the past summer, Erich Leinsdorf and Aaron Copland. The Fellowship Orchestra, as it is sometimes called, consists of some of the finest serious orchestral students in this country. Most of them will pursue a career in some phase of music; many of them have aspirations for a professional performing career. Many of today's major symphony musicians were students at Tanglewood during their younger days.

Those who are interested in music education should be concerned with the various factors which caused these particular young people to become seriously interested in music and to become extraordinarily proficient on their instruments. Just what home environment factors and what school conditions produced such outstanding results? It was with these questions in mind that The Instrumentalist surveyed the Fellowship Orchestra at Tanglewood this past summer.

The Questionnaire

The form to be completed was short and could be filled out in less than five minutes (during a rehearsal). Besides names, address, age, instrument, and occupation (student in most cases), the questions were grouped in three categories:

1. General instrumental music background—In what cities did you receive your public school instrumental music instruction (through high school)? What orchestral instrument did you start on? If different than your present instrument, when did you switch? Did you study privately before entering high school? If yes, was this private teacher a specialist on your instrument? Did you study privately during high school? If yes, was this private teacher a specialist on your instrument? Was there a string program in the public schools you attended? Did you play in an orchestra (school, civic, youth, etc.) before entering college?

2. Home and environmental background: Did at least one of your parents know music well enough to be of real help to you—musically if not technically—in your home practice? Were you strongly encouraged in your music by your family? Was classical music (radio, records, live) heard regularly in your home? How would you estimate your parents income during your public school years? Was any type of music appreciation program included as an integral part of your general music classes (if any) in high school, or in your performing groups? Did you attend a summer music camp before high school? During high school? Have you ever been to Europe? If yes, did you study there?

3. Evaluation of the public school instrumental music instruction received. The students were asked to rate their teachers on the elementary, junior high, and senior high levels, both musically (inspiring, unimaginative, detrimental) and technically (excellent, competent, incompetent). A chance was also given to indicate where no public school music instruction had been received on a certain level.

The Results—Expected and Unexpected

Obviously, with a select group of this type, most of us could have predicted a good many of the results beforehand. At least, on the basis of past experience. However, as educational philosophies change, and opportunities for music instruction increase, it is always possible that some new factors will enter the picture.

In analyzing the results, two questions were uppermost: (1) what kind of situation produces the serious student? and (2) what in particular is needed to produce the serious string player, who is in such short supply currently? We must look for every possible clue in the strings, and hope to increase their numbers by finding out what makes a favorable situation and then trying to create these conditions in as many areas as possible.

Place of Residence

The string players, without exception, came from three types of communities: (1) large cities; (2) the environs of large cities, at least within 50 miles; (3) university towns. The winds came from these areas, but also from smaller communities. Hence it would seem that a metropolitan environment, or at least a sophisticated, intellectual environment is needed to produce serious string players. The young string player must be close to specialist teachers, and possibly also close to opportunities to hear live string performances. Also, there must be an ensemble outlet for his playing, in the form of some type of orchestra. It was interesting to note, though, that this orchestra did not have to be a school orchestra. The wind players did equally well in smaller communities, and in less sophisticated areas, where the band programs apparently provided them with a sufficient musical cultural outlet until they reached college.

Family Financial Background

Six choices of income level were provided: very low, low, lower middle, upper middle, high, and very high. Although these were obviously arbitrary groupings, the answers nevertheless reflected what most music educators would have predicted. From very high, one person, from high, also one person. All the remaining students listed their family financial status as either lower middle or upper middle, almost exactly evenly divided. It is of significance that not a single person came from a low or very low background. Perhaps it is still too early for the results of the various anti-poverty campaigns to be seen. Perhaps too, it is too soon to see any significant results from the colleges' increased attempts to attract capable students from low income families, through full scholarships, if necessary. At any rate, quality music education seems still to be limited to the affluent classes.

Home Background

In answer to whether at least one parent knew enough music to be of real help in practicing at home, the result was a little surprising. Of the total group, 53% indicated someone at home who could help; broken down by groups, though, the strings indicated only 45% had this background, while the winds showed 71% with home help. As far as strong family encouragement is concerned, this would seem to be an invariable factor, necessary for success on any instrument. The total result was 75% with strong encouragement, going up to 77% in the strings, and down to 71% in the winds. On the question of classical music being heard in the home, regularly, 66% of the total said yes, while this rose to 71% among the string players, and fell to 59% among the winds. Hence here the difference is perhaps worthy of mention. A classical music home background would seem to be more favorable for string players, while not quite so essential for the winds.

Other Environmental Factors

In answer to whether there was a string program in the public schools, the string players responded "yes", 5 to 1. It is significant, though, that a school string program is not essential to the serious string student. What is essential is an orchestral outlet for his playing. With only one exception, all the strings participated in some kind of orchestra before college. In many cases, this orchestra was a youth, civic, or other community group—not a school orchestra. More than half of the wind players came from public school systems where there was no string program, but the winds indicated, more than 3 to 1, that they participated in orchestras before college.

The inclusion of some type of music appreciation program in the public schools also seemed to be an unimportant determinant. More than half again as many answered "no" as answered "yes," to this question, with the proportion the same among strings and winds.

Summer music camp experience appeared to be more important to the strings than to the winds. The winds answered, 7 to 1, that they had had no summer camp before high school, and 3 to 1 no camp during high school. The strings, however, indicated only 3 to 1 no camp before high school, and this changed significantly to more than half having summer music camp experience during high school. Perhaps this indicates that if we want more string players, we should see to it that interested and capable string players have summer camp opportunities, whether they can afford it or not, by providing full scholarships as frequently as possible.

Travel to Europe and study there was not a factor at all, with less than 10% indicating any study in Europe.

Beginning Instruments

Here a rather consistent pattern was followed in the strings, with no evident pattern in the winds. All the violinists and violists had started on violin, with some violists indicating an early beginning of "doubling" on both instruments. All the cellists started on cello, but none of the bass players transferred from cello to bass. More than half started directly on bass, with a few switching from violin, and one from a wind instrument. Among the winds, there was no clear pattern, with some transfer players on all instruments, (except clarinet), even on instruments usually thought of as starting instruments, i.e., flute. Hence, with virtually no exceptions, fine string players are started on strings—a conclusion which most of us would have expected.

The Importance of Private Study with a Specialist

The results of the questions concerning private lessons should provide ammunition for many directors to prod their students into beginning private instruction. Of the total group, 73% indicated private study before high school. This rose to 90% in the strings and fell to only 35% in the winds. Of the strings who studied before high school, all but one had studied with a specialist on their instrument, while in the winds, the ratio of specialists to non-specialists was only 2 to 1. During high school, however, the picture changed: 95% showed private study, and this percentage was identical in both strings and winds. During high school, all the players taking private lessons had studied with specialists on their instrument, with only one single exception—the tuba player. Hence private study with a specialist, both before and during high school, would seem to be imperative for aspiring string players. For the winds, private study with a specialist is helpful, but not essential before high school, but is as important as it is for the strings during high school. Again, specialist teachers are needed for the winds during high school.

Public School Music Instruction

When asked to evaluate their public school instrumental teachers, on all three levels—elementary, junior high, over

INSTRUMENTALIST
EVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 16,000
NOV 1968

Music Educators National Conference

and senior high—and when asked to evaluate these people technically and musically, with a three point scale for each, the results were interesting, with one startling conclusion. In elementary school, the majority rated their teachers in the middle category, both musically and technically: competent, unimaginative. In junior high school, exactly the same breakdown; for most of the students, their teachers had done a competent job, but were not inspiring. In high school, the rating for technical competence remained the same.

The Surprise

In the category of "musically," though, a major shift took place in high school. The majority now indicated that their high school instrumental teacher had been "inspiring."

It must be remembered that these answers were given by college students and graduate students, many of whom have professional aspirations, and many of whom are going through an anti-music education period; hence they are very critical, perhaps overly so, of their public school teachers. They take an unrealistically dim view of music education and place their hopes in the professional performing realm, again perhaps unrealistically. Hence the public school teachers would probably do better in an evaluation by the majority of their students. However, when the Tanglewood Fellowship Orchestra members rated the majority of their high school instrumental teachers as "inspiring" musically, this is high praise indeed. It also points up a motivating factor which is seldom mentioned.

At some point during their high school careers, most of these students came in contact with an instrumental teacher who really "turned them on," someone who caused them to be more seriously interested in music, to consider music for a career. It is also interesting to note that this person did not have to be outstanding in his technical capacities. The ratings in this division remained the same, "competent."

Hence even for players coming from an encouraging and affluent home background, who are studying privately with a specialist on their instruments, it is still important to have the influence of an inspiring public school teacher in high school to complete the motivation of the student to become really serious about music study.

In Summation

Some of the conclusions reached in this report are the ones we would have expected. Some are not. Some generalities may perhaps be validly drawn from the results.

First, in terms of the strings, and what might be done to encourage them and to increase both their numbers and their quality, it would seem that there would be at least four factors which should be considered essential: (1) a strong home background of encouragement, including classical music; (2) private study with a specialist, as early as possible; (3) an orchestral outlet for young players, though this does not have to be a school orchestra; (4) summer camp experience of some kind, preferably before high school, and most certainly during high school.

The school orchestra director can take some of the initiative here, in carefully selecting prospective string students from families with favorable conditions at home and by encouraging private lessons as strongly as possible. He can try to find summer camp opportunities for his students, and scholarship money for them when there is insufficient money at home. He can also see to it that they take part in some kind of orchestra, encouraging them to join community or all-city groups when they are good enough, especially if the school orchestra is not too challenging to these better string players.

For wind players, about the same conditions would be considered favorable, but the intensive, specialized training does not have to start at such an early age. Also, it would seem that the band program provides sufficient motivation for many wind players, without orchestra participation, private lessons before high school, or as strong a classical music background in the home.

It would seem that there are three separate, but interrelated influences which affect the success of the young instrumental student:

1. Home. The home must be affluent, at least lower middle class. There must be at least some interest in classical music, and strong encouragement for the music study of the youngster.
2. Private teacher. This person must come into the picture at least by high school, and must be a specialist in the particular instrument involved. The earlier the private teacher becomes a part of the child's music study, the better.
3. School. The public schools provide most of the beginning programs, most of the large ensemble experiences, and at least competent training. At the high school level, a really inspiring music teacher often motivates the student to choose music as a career.

It is hoped that the conclusions reached here will help some directors improve their approach, that some directors will be encouraged by knowing that what they are currently doing is indeed the way to develop successful students. It is further hoped that this report can serve as substantiation of the director's assertions to parents and students alike that encouragement from home, private lessons, and summer music camp experiences do produce superior results. ■

Note: Mr. Christie visited Tanglewood this past summer; in future issues he will report on the impressions of some of the conductors, concerning the playing of the Fellowship Orchestra.

INSTRUMENTALIST
EVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 16,000
NOV 1968

108.

SOUTHWESTERN MUSICIAN
AND TEXAS MUSIC EDUCATOR
LUBBOCK, TEXAS
MONTHLY 4,600

MAY 1968

multiple ... is understandable.

The elementary sessions in brief:

Lectures, Panels and Discussions

Sunday noon, MENC members gathered for a General Session on "The Meaning of Tanglewood". Dr. Louis G. Wersen, MENC president, who visited TMEA Clinic-Convention in 1967 in Houston, discussed "The Importance to Today's Profession". The film on the Tanglewood Symposium supplied a you-are-there glimpse of personalities and issues. Father Norman O'Conner captivated the audience with his treatment of "The Dynamics of Tanglewood". Ole Sand, with NEA, talked on "Tanglewood in Today's Educational Scene". Delmas F. Miller, president of National Association of Secondary School Prnicipals, spoke on "Tanglewood and the Humanities". Dr. Robert A. Choate, director of the Tanglewood Project, talked on "Implications for the Future". Dr. Choate was keynote speaker at TMEA in Austin and spoke at the Elementary Division luncheon. Wiley L. Housewright, MENC president-elect, ended the speaking portion of the session with "Next Steps for the Conference". Dr. Housewright will take office as MENC president on July 1, 1968. This extensive introduction of the Tanglewood Symposium was followed by 38 discussion groups meeting in the next two and a half days to further explore the philosophies, concepts and implications of Tanglewood.

"Foundations in Aesthetic Education" was a lecture-demonstration by Gerard Knieter of Temple University, Philadelphia, concerning instructional techniques and curricula concepts useful in the development of elementary and secondary school programs.

Frances M. Andrews, ... sylvania State University, who is ... presi ident-elect for 1972, pre... pape ...elopment of ... ue fo ...Children's ... Co ... ser ... ear ...nt

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

SEP 1968

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
6 Tl. a YR. 41,600

NOV 1966

A MUSIC TEACHERS' SEMINAR was again conducted last summer at the Tanglewood Institute, a part of the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts. Teachers who enrolled were expected, where possible, to perform on their instruments and participate in the various ensembles of the Institute. The wind and brass seminars were conducted by Armando Ghitalla and Roger Voisin. The String Instrument and Chamber Music ensembles were led by Joseph Silverstein, Louis Krasner, Szymon Goldberg, William Kroll, and Roman Totenberg. Discussions by Gerald Gelbloom, Stanford Reunig, and Herbert Gardner were part of a historical survey of violin schools and teaching techniques. Various other seminars were conducted by Sir Adrian Boult, Roger Sessions, Gunther Schuller, Igor Kipnis, Peter Gramm Swing, and others.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200

JAN 24 1967

New England Newsclip

Housing Sought For Conferees On Music

The Berkshire Hills Conference is asking its commercial members to provide housing at minimal costs this summer to 50 persons who will attend a Music Educators National Conference (MENC) symposium July 23 to Aug. 5 at Tanglewood.

John V. Geary, executive director of the county tourist agency, said he is cooperating with Dr. Robert A. Choate of Boston, director of the MENC symposium, in trying to secure lodgings for the participants. Dr. Choate is with Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts.

Participation in the symposium will be from the arts and professions. In addition to the MENC, a department of the National Education Association, it will be sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the Theodore Presser Foundation and the BU School of Fine and Applied Arts.

tables for changes in music education. Catching the image of our whole society, the huge mirror has dramatically reflected the broad picture of what we can become.

Thus, we must be the ones to work toward the truly difficult answers. With the statements made at Tanglewood as our cue, we and only we can fill in the parts that Tanglewood did not tell us. Assuming then, as Dorothy Maynor said, we need to help deprived youth to "see the makings of a real human being," how is music education going to apply itself better to meet the realities of the inner-city situation?

If, as Chancellor Samuel Gould said, there is a "hunger within all people for things of the spirit," just how are we, as music educators, to reach more effectively all children with musical experiences?

If, as Homer Turner of the United States Steel Foundation said, "arts, science, humanities, and business are sitting around the same table and enjoying the experience," what leadership will music educators bring to this in every community?

If, as Max Lerner said, the "leisure revolution" is to be a major challenge for our whole society in the coming years, how will music education move into a more significant role in contributing to that challenge?

And if, as the Tanglewood Declaration stated, music is to be placed "in the core of the curriculum," how is this to be brought about and what are we, as individuals and as a national conference, going to do in reaching for this goal?

How can we best put Tanglewood in perspective? The task ahead may seem overwhelming. The messages of Tanglewood may seem too numerous and too diffuse to be grasped. The obstacles to change—the routines of the day, the apparent indifference of the "establishment," the whole direction in which our society appears to be going at this moment—may make the whole task seem hopeless. At this point I think that all of us are in need of some perspective on the meaning of Tanglewood.

The cause of the arts and humanities in our society is in the ascendancy. Leadership in education is moving in the direction of what Ole Sand calls "freedom of mind, a way out of the slavery of mere conformism to society," or what Abraham Maslow calls "learning your identity." And, as Maslow says, music and art are far closer to that kind of "intrinsic education" than other parts of education.

The "culture boom" is not really the issue at all. We are riding on a wave that goes far deeper. It is the issue of the individual human being and his fulfillment that concerns the top thinkers in American life today—the human being to whom we, as few others, have access and to whom we can contribute from early childhood into his whole growing-up period. As music educators, we have a wide-open opportunity to innovate and to improve in depth and in quality so that each boy and girl will experience music in more meaningful ways. Our country is ready for this. The question is, are we ready to face the need for change and to act upon it?

Tanglewood, in perspective, may be viewed as one gesture made by one professional group in a society that has many layers of high-priority problems and concerns. But I see us as a dedicated profession climbing hand-over-hand up the rope of our own progress and growth. Tanglewood has taken us one notch higher. We travel precariously, but I am confident that we shall continue to move higher and higher toward our goals.—Louis G. Wersen, President, Music Educators National Conference, 1966-1968.

108

SOUTHWESTERN MUSICIAN
AND TEXAS MUSIC EDUCATOR
LUBBOCK, TEXAS
MONTHLY

MAY 1968

multiple ... is understandable.

The elementary sessions in brief:

Lectures, Panels and Discussions

Sunday noon, MENC members gathered for a General Session on "The Meaning of Tanglewood". Dr. Louis G. Wersen, MENC president, who visited TMEA Clinic-Convention in 1967 in Houston, discussed "The Importance to Today's Profession". The film on the Tanglewood Symposium supplied a you-are-there glimpse of personalities and issues. Father Norman O'Conner captivated the audience with his treatment of "The Dynamics of Tanglewood". Ole Sand, with NEA, talked on "Tanglewood in Today's Educational Scene". Delmas F. Miller, president of National Association of Secondary School Prnicipals, spoke on "Tanglewood and the Humanities". Dr. Robert A. Choate, director of the Tanglewood Project, talked on "Implications for the Future". Dr. Choate was keynote speaker at TMEA in Austin and spoke at the Elementary Division luncheon. Wiley L. Housewright, MENC president-elect, ended the speaking portion of the session with "Next Steps for the Conference". Dr. Housewright will take office as MENC president on July 1, 1968. This extensive introduction of the Tanglewood Symposium was followed by 38 discussion groups meeting in the next two and a half days to further explore the philosophies, concepts and implications of Tanglewood.

"Foundations in Aesthetic Education" was a lecture-demonstration by Gerard Knieter of Temple University, Philadelphia, concerning instructional techniques and curricula concepts useful in the development of elementary and secondary school programs.

Frances M. Andrews, ... sylvania State University, who is ... presi-ident-elect for 1972, pre... pape... ...elopment of ...ue fo... ...Children's ... Co... ... ser... ...ear... ...nt

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

SEP 1968

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
6 TI. a YR. 41,600

NOV 1966

A MUSIC TEACHERS' SEMINAR was again conducted last summer at the Tanglewood Institute, a part of the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts. Teachers who enrolled were expected, where possible, to perform on their instruments and participate in the various ensembles of the Institute. The wind and brass seminars were conducted by Armando Ghitalla and Roger Voisin. The String Instrument and Chamber Music ensembles were led by Joseph Silverstein, Louis Krasner, Szymon Goldberg, William Kroll, and Roman Totenberg. Discussions by Gerald Gelbloom, Stanford Reunig, and Herbert Gardner were part of a historical survey of violin schools and teaching techniques. Various other seminars were conducted by Sir Adrian Boult, Roger Sessions, Gunther Schuller, Igor Kipnis, Peter Gramm Swing, and others.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200

JAN 24 1967

New England Newsclip

Housing Sought For Conferees On Music

The Berkshire Hills Conference is asking its commercial members to provide housing at minimal costs this summer to 50 persons who will attend a Music Educators National Conference (MENC) symposium July 23 to Aug. 5 at Tanglewood.

John V. Geary, executive director of the county tourist agency, said he is cooperating with Dr. Robert A. Choate of Boston, director of the MENC symposium, in trying to secure lodgings for the participants. Dr. Choate is with Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts.

Participation in the symposium will be from the arts and professions. In addition to the MENC, a department of the National Education Association, it will be sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the Theodore Presser Foundation and the BU School of Fine and Applied Arts.

tables for changes in music education. Catching the image of our whole society, the huge mirror has dramatically reflected the broad picture of what we can become.

Thus, we must be the ones to work toward the truly difficult answers. With the statements made at Tanglewood as our cue, we and only we can fill in the parts that Tanglewood did not tell us. Assuming then, as Dorothy Maynor said, we need to help deprived youth to "see the makings of a real human being," how is music education going to apply itself better to meet the realities of the inner-city situation?

If, as Chancellor Samuel Gould said, there is a "hunger within all people for things of the spirit," just how are we, as music educators, to reach more effectively all children with musical experiences?

If, as Homer Turner of the United States Steel Foundation said, "arts, science, humanities, and business are sitting around the same table and enjoying the experience," what leadership will music educators bring to this in every community?

If, as Max Lerner said, the "leisure revolution" is to be a major challenge for our whole society in the coming years, how will music education move into a more significant role in contributing to that challenge?

And if, as the Tanglewood Declaration stated, music is to be placed "in the core of the curriculum," how is this to be brought about and what are we, as individuals and as a national conference, going to do in reaching for this goal?

How can we best put Tanglewood in perspective? The task ahead may seem overwhelming. The messages of Tanglewood may seem too numerous and too diffuse to be grasped. The obstacles to change—the routines of the day, the apparent indifference of the "establishment," the whole direction in which our society appears to be going at this moment—may make the whole task seem hopeless. At this point I think that all of us are in need of some perspective on the meaning of Tanglewood.

The cause of the arts and humanities in our society is in the ascendancy. Leadership in education is moving in the direction of what Ole Sand calls "freedom of mind, a way out of the slavery of mere conformism to society," or what Abraham Maslow calls "learning your identity." And, as Maslow says, music and art are far closer to that kind of "intrinsic education" than other parts of education.

The "culture boom" is not really the issue at all. We are riding on a wave that goes far deeper. It is the issue of the individual human being and his fulfillment that concerns the top thinkers in American life today—the human being to whom we, as few others, have access and to whom we can contribute from early childhood into his whole growing-up period. As music educators, we have a wide-open opportunity to innovate and to improve in depth and in quality so that each boy and girl will experience music in more meaningful ways. Our country is ready for this. The question is, are we ready to face the need for change and to act upon it?

Tanglewood, in perspective, may be viewed as one gesture made by one professional group in a society that has many layers of high-priority problems and concerns. But I see us as a dedicated profession climbing hand-over-hand up the rope of our own progress and growth. Tanglewood has taken us one notch higher. We travel precariously, but I am confident that we shall continue to move higher and higher toward our goals.—Louis G. Wersen, President, Music Educators National Conference, 1966-1968.

108a

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR.-1.700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Continuing Music Education

TANGLEWOOD AT SEATTLE

WHAT IS TANGLEWOOD?

Many conceptions, many ideas exist about Tanglewood—its purpose, its meaning. The thousands of people who have been involved since the Project began two years ago have attempted to evaluate and appraise music and music education in America, not only in the 1960's, but also for the 1970's and 1980's.

Tanglewood has developed an awareness of just what is happening today and where we are headed. Each music educator has a perspective. We exert an influence on those with whom we work within our communities and states. Obviously, these perspectives vary greatly in different parts of the country. Incisive communication between these inner forces in the profession can establish new values, goals, and perspectives. The vitality and the thrust of the profession are in this way enlightened and enlivened.

Tanglewood has involved people—MENC members, superintendents, members of arts councils, other musicians, leaders of business, and many others. It has created a concern and an intellectual stimulation that will hopefully lead to commitment. The focus is the power structure—those who make the decisions in the school committees, the state legislatures, the Federal Government, as well as our own professional organization. These are the people who must be shown what changes need to be made.

There are no pat answers. People have said, "Tell us what to do from now on out." We cannot. Each music educator must make his own decisions about the issues and the choices before us.—Robert A. Choate, Director of the Tanglewood Symposium Project and Professor of Music, School of Fine and Applied Arts, Boston University, Boston, Massachusetts.

Scrapbook #20
May 68 - Aug. 68
table of contents
p. 1 - 150
Tanglewood 1968

grams with meaningful goals is presently being undertaken by both adult education and music education. What is the music teacher's responsibility toward the education of adults?

Tanglewood Symposium Report. Basic Issues. "Music in the Emerging American Society." and "Values: Music as Means and Ends." Unpublished, Boston, 1968.

■ Lothar Klein's article on "Brahms, Boulez, and the Beatles" [April 1968, p. 55] demands a comment, if only to lament its disappointing comparison with other essays in this series.

With the publication of summary reports on the Tanglewood Symposium, and the regular appearance of articles exhorting the educator to make a positive commitment to the teaching and performance of twentieth-century music, it remained only a matter of time before the anguished groans of the far-right, rear guard would rise through the din. But what a desperate, unsophisticated, sophomoric attempt! Drawing an analogy between serialist thinking and Marxist [illegible] is as frightful a bore today as [illegible]hen heard over thirty years [illegible]azi Germany. True, Mr. Klein [illegible]quating Marxist thought with [illegible]omposition, since he had al[illegible]ade it clear that, via Camus' [illegible] Sisyphus, serial composition [illegible] with the existential philoso[illegible]he absurd. However, this ob[illegible]n hardly saves his article from [illegible]gmire of half-truths and gen[illegible]ons that glare contemptibly [illegible] printed page.

[illegible] example: "The compositional [illegible] serial composers consists of [illegible]ng series of pitches, durations, [illegible]ing their possibilities on a [illegible] . ." This generalization is ab[illegible] utter nonsense. Klein groups [illegible]ial composers" together and [illegible]pplies an incidental fact that [illegible]ely applies to a few composi[illegible] a few "serial composers" to [illegible]ately lead the uninitiated reader [illegible]mpletely false conclusion. In[illegible]lly, the "inspiration" expressed [illegible]h paper is intrinsically as valid [illegible]e "inspirations" of the "pre[illegible]omposers." Furthermore, ends [illegible]ifused with means. Unconven[illegible]otation does not automatically [illegible]bad, "uninspired" music. Of [illegible] Mr. Klein knows that; what I [illegible]o is the inference that hokus[illegible] notation equals hokus-pokus music. Thus, the argument goes, guilty by association.

"One wonders if," comments Mr. Klein, "in the quest for new music, serialists have ever asked themselves whether a composer shackled with the ball and chain of serial method can run faster than the composer employing traditional techniques." It obviously has never occurred to Mr. Klein that any composer worth at least his weight in ragweed grapples with this question every time he begins a new composition. The conclusion by an overwhelming majority of composers today is that one does not only "run faster" but is able to jump higher when "shackled to the ball and chain of serial method" than when shackled to the ball and chain of traditional techniques.

Unquestionably, the most appalling comment in this article is that the "composer . . . must become a prophet of the past." What kind of teacher would be so professionally irresponsible as to advise his student composers to walk into the future backwards with their eyes on the past? Were I to adopt this attitude with my students, I would, fortunately, be laughed right out of the classroom.—ROBERT J. STEWART, Assistant Professor of Theory and Composition, Concord College, Athens, West Virginia 24712.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

DEC 1968

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JAN 17 1969

C NOTES

azz Combo Needs Some 'Bread'

ARY NIC SHENK
nes Music Writer

[illegible]ersburg will be the [illegible]ida city represented [illegible]dent jazz combo at [illegible] 7-14 Institute for [illegible]ucators and guidance [illegible]s at the University [illegible]sin in Madison.

[illegible]s, if the Northeast [illegible]ool Jazz Combo can [illegible] for the trip.

[illegible]onse to the 1968 Tan[illegible] Symposium of the [illegible] Educators National [illegible]ce (MENC), North[illegible]gh School formed a [illegible] jazz group under the [illegible] of choral music di[illegible]rs. Jack Rowe.

[illegible]roup formed the mid[illegible]pril as an accompa[illegible]roup for my mixed [illegible] Mrs. Rowe said. [illegible]ey were so good I [illegible]hem to play some [illegible] alone on our May [illegible] of the Arts con[illegible]

WERE GOOD. I [illegible]em at the festival and [illegible]pressed with their ver[illegible] and ease of perfor[illegible] both as accompanists [illegible]blo group. Members of the group are Paul Rowe, guitar; Don Leighton, piano; Rich Giannico, drums; and Danny Giannico, bass.

Mrs. Rowe is dedicated to the MENC program to bring students and teachers together through their own music — not only the formalized programs of chorus, band and orchestra in the school curriculum. And she encouraged the group to tape one of their sessions. She sent the tape to the institute director, hopeful that the boys might qualify to perform at the July conference.

Not only was the combo accepted, but it is the only Florida group which will perform and is one of only 22 from the entire country.

The conference will be the first national institute to followup the Tanglewood Symposium with actual youth group performances. Involvement of music educators in jazz has been underway for the past year. The Jazz Music Association is now a branch of the MENC. Music educators want to reach students through their own interests as well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause aid.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

The Lively Arts

ON EXHIBIT ON SCREEN
ON RECORD ON STAGE

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 Tl. a YR.-1,700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Continuing Music Education

TANGLEWOOD AT SEATTLE

WHAT IS TANGLEWOOD?

Many conceptions, many ideas exist about Tanglewood—its purpose, its meaning. The thousands of people who have been involved since the Project began two years ago have attempted to evaluate and appraise music and music education in America, not only in the 1960's, but also for the 1970's and 1980's.

Tanglewood has developed an awareness of just what is happening today and where we are headed. Each music educator has a perspective. We exert an influence on those with whom we work within our communities and states. Obviously, these perspectives vary greatly in different parts of the country. Incisive communication between these inner forces in the profession can establish new values, goals, and perspectives. The vitality and the thrust of the profession are in this way enlightened and enlivened.

Tanglewood has involved people—MENC members, superintendents, members of arts councils, other musicians, leaders of business, and many others. It has created a concern and an intellectual stimulation that will hopefully lead to commitment. The focus is the power structure—those who make the decisions in the school committees, the state legislatures, the Federal Government, as well as our own professional organization. These are the people who must be shown what changes need to be made.

There are no pat answers. People have said, "Tell us what to do from now on out." We cannot. Each music educator must make his own decisions about the issues and the choices before us.—Robert A. Choate, Director of the Tanglewood Symposium Project and Professor of Music, School of Fine and Applied Arts, Boston University, Boston, Massachusetts.

Sample book #20
May 68 - Aug. 68
table of contents
p. 1 - 150
Tanglewood 1968

grams with meaningful goals is presently being undertaken by both adult education and music education. What is the music teacher's responsibility toward the education of adults?

Tanglewood Symposium Report. Basic Issues. "Music in the Emerging American Society." and "Values: Music as Means and Ends." Unpublished, Boston, 1968.

108a

■ Lothar Klein's article on "Brahms, Boulez, and the Beatles" [April 1968, p. 55] demands a comment, if only to lament its disappointing comparison with other essays in this series.

With the publication of summary reports on the Tanglewood Symposium, and the regular appearance of articles exhorting the educator to make a positive commitment to the teaching and performance of twentieth-century music, it remained only a matter of time before the anguished groans of the far-right, rear guard would rise through the din. But what a desperate, unsophisticated, sophomoric attempt! Drawing an analogy between serialist thinking and Marxist is as frightful a bore today as when heard over thirty years azi Germany. True, Mr. Klein quating Marxist thought with omposition, since he had alade it clear that, via Camus' Sisyphus, serial composition with the existential philosothe absurd. However, this obn hardly saves his article from gmire of half-truths and genions that glare contemptibly printed page.

example: "The compositional serial composers consists of ng series of pitches, durations, ing their possibilities on a . ." This generalization is ab- utter nonsense. Klein groups ial composers" together and pplies an incidental fact that ely applies to a few composi- y a few "serial composers" to ately lead the uninitiated reader ompletely false conclusion. Inlly, the "inspiration" expressed h paper is intrinsically as valid e "inspirations" of the "preomposers." Furthermore, ends fused with means. Unconvenotation does not automatically bad, "uninspired" music. Of Mr. Klein knows that; what I to is the inference that hokus- notation equals hokus-pokus music. Thus, the argument goes, guilty by association.

"One wonders if," comments Mr. Klein, "in the quest for new music, serialists have ever asked themselves whether a composer shackled with the ball and chain of serial method can run faster than the composer employing traditional techniques." It obviously has never occurred to Mr. Klein that any composer worth at least his weight in ragweed grapples with this question every time he begins a new composition. The conclusion by an overwhelming majority of composers today is that one does not only "run faster" but is able to jump higher when "shackled to the ball and chain of serial method" than when shackled to the ball and chain of traditional techniques.

Unquestionably, the most appalling comment in this article is that the "composer . . . must become a prophet of the past." What kind of teacher would be so professionally irresponsible as to advise his student composers to walk into the future backwards with their eyes on the past? Were I to adopt this attitude with my students, I would, fortunately, be laughed right out of the classroom.—ROBERT J. STEWART, Assistant Professor of Theory and Composition, Concord College, Athens, West Virginia 24712.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

DEC 1968

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included: Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

J 17 1969

C NOTES

azz Combo Needs Some 'Bread'

ARY NIC SHENK
nes Music Writer

ersburg will be the ida city represented dent jazz combo at 7-14 Institute for ucators and guidance s at the University sin in Madison.

s, if the Northeast hool Jazz Combo can 0 for the trip.

onse to the 1968 Tan- Symposium of the Educators National ce (MENC), Northgh School formed a jazz group under the of choral music dirs. Jack Rowe.

group formed the midpril as an accomparoup for my mixed Mrs. Rowe said. ey were so good I them to play some alone on our May of the Arts con-

WERE GOOD. I em at the festival and pressed with their verand ease of perforboth as accompanists olo group. Members of the group are Paul Rowe, guitar; Don Leighton, piano; Rich Giannico, drums; and Danny Giannico, bass.

Mrs. Rowe is dedicated to the MENC program to bring students and teachers together through their own music — not only the formalized programs of chorus, band and orchestra in the school curriculum. And she encouraged the group to tape one of their sessions. She sent the tape to the institute director, hopeful that the boys might qualify to perform at the July conference.

Not only was the combo accepted, but it is the only Florida group which will perform and is one of only 22 from the entire country.

The conference will be the first national institute to followup the Tanglewood Symposium with actual youth group performances. Involvement of music educators in jazz has been underway for the past year. The Jazz Music Association is now a branch of the MENC. Music educators want to reach students through their own interests as well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause aid.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

The Lively Arts

ON EXHIBIT ON SCREEN
ON RECORD ON STAGE

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR.-1.700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Contin

by Pa

The Music Educators National Conference has ently formed a National Committee on Adult and C tinuing Music Education. Emmett Sarig, the Directo the Extension Music Department at the University Wisconsin, is serving as chairman of the national com
tee. The national committee has proposed that each S develop a State Committee on Adult and Continuing M Education.

The national committee is enlisting the aid of state committee in ferreting out programs of adult and tinuing music education within each state. Within near future you will be asked to respond to a question designed to identify such programs. A list of these grams will be collated in each State and compiled national directory to be used for reference and fu planning.

As the newly appointed State Chairman of the C mittee on Adult and Continuing Music Education, my wish to herein express some thoughts regarding the continuing music education movement in the Ur States, (2) its relationship to the adult education pr sión, and (3) the music teacher's responsibility regar the musical education of the adult community.

THE CONTINUING MUSIC EDUCATION MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the United States there is a growing cern about music in adult society, and the impact and portance of music in the total life of the individual.
Tanglewood Symposium dedicated to "Music in Amer Society" identified the necessity for relating music in schools to music in society. Specifically, the sympos emphasized the need to reduce the dualism betw
"school music" and "society's music" by integrating m education with the main stream of American culture.
The Third National Symposium on Adult and Contin
Music Education was dedicated, as the title of the mee indicated, to "View from the Action Front: What's Wa and Needed and How to Accomplish the Desired Resu
This symposium considered the present use of musi adult education and explored potentialities for more fective programming designed to reach all people.

The Tanglewood Symposium report on Basic Is
(4) states that a program of continuing education in m should have the following aims: (1) To persons of Hely states the goal of adult education below.

Those powers of mind and those qualities of which have given to mankind an abiding heritage of and judgment must continue everywhere to find, changing patterns of day-to-day living, full sco maturing and flowering in an enriched culture. (

Adults' needs and motivations vary considerably those of children involved in the educative proce though principles of learning, conditions which fac learning, and problem-solving techniques are adapta all levels of student participation, adults bring to the room identifiable characteristics which affect thei ticipation.

Music has an important role to play in the educa adults. The effort to establish meaningful goals an grams with meaningful goals is presently being taken by both adult education and music education.
is the music teacher's responsibility toward the edu
of adults?

IDEAS from the DISCUSSIONS

MUSIC AND MOVEMENT. We are built to move to music. The energy is there. It is being released at every hour and minute of the day through the muscles of the body. Music can shape the way that energy is released into the muscles. It leads to movement, even at the age of three. Children are often asked to sit quietly around the piano while the teacher plays. At no time do the students dare to move. Yet the body is built to move to rhythm—to move to whatever kinds of meanings are evoked by a melody or a harmony. This is the most natural thing in the world and should be used extensively.

INNER CITY. Many agencies are at work in the inner city, but they are designed to work for the disadvantaged rather than with them. There is no feeling of involvement. The important question is, How can we involve the disadvantaged in the planning of programs that will be more relevant to the needs of society? What can the school contribute to compensate when there are inadequacies in the home, the church, and the community? What does the school need to do to help the child become a responsible citizen? What can the school do to help the child find answers to questions like "Who am I?" and "Where am I going?" Teachers and schools must encourage and develop parental involvement in the music education program. All this requires special knowledge on the part of any music educator. Without question, prospective music teachers for schools in the inner city need practice-teaching experience in these schools.

SCHEDULING. New, flexible scheduling practices can bolster the music program, not by what will be removed, but by what can be added in the process of restructuring. The idea that one instructor should teach music to a given number of students for sixty minutes each day for 180 days each year must be discarded. Innovations such as modular scheduling have stimulated many studies of how we can best organize the school day. Some of the new approaches will involve teachers working together, and whether it is called team teaching or something else, music educators can expect to be involved in this ferment.

POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT. Closer and more effective relationships must be developed with all professional music and artistic organizations whose concerns are parallel to the music education profession. Dialogue must be sought and firmly established with other disciplines, with the business community, with foundations, in fact with any type of organization involved with and interested in the development of a better and more effective society. If it becomes necessary for the profession to become involved either directly or indirectly in the political scheme to get the message to the public, then we must accept the challenge and do so in an intelligent and constructive manner. Music educators must come to realize that participation in politics is a necessity for all who are concerned with any phase of education. Fearful, uncreative, or insensitive teachers can alienate the entire community.

STUDENT-TEACHER RELATIONSHIP. The fact that a student learns better simply because he thinks the teacher likes him, and that he learns less well or not at all if he thinks the teacher doesn't like him, is frightening. Teachers are finding that these relationships are just as important, or perhaps more important, to the learning process than the subject-matter content.

108a

ent goes, guilty

comments Mr. or new music,
ed themselves ckled with the l method can nposer employues." It obvi-d to Mr. Klein
th at least his pples with this begins a new clusion by an of composers not only "run jump higher ball and chain
when shackled of traditional most appalling le is that the come a prophet ind of teacher onally irrespon-

s student come future backs on the past?
ttitude with my fortunately, be the classroom.—
, Assistant Prod Composition, ens, West Vir-

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 34.000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included: Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755
J 17 1969

ds Some 'Bread'

Arts
ON SCREEN ON STAGE

l as the usual forms of sic training. "MENC mem-s agreed at Tanglewood summer they could learn ething from their students well as teach them some-ng," Pinellas County music
ervisor Wallace Gause

he boys are rehearsing for ir segment of the confer-e and are trying to raise necessary $500 for their . However, civic clubs
e completed their projects the year and the musi-ns union expressed no in-est in the project.

According to Gause, "the ellas County Music Educas Association (PCMEA)
some funds from its ing festival which could ast the boys since they will representing the county.
t PCMEA president Bill deison is at school in Talassee and the other offi-
s would have to be contact-to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR.-1,700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and C

The Music Educators National Confe
ently formed a National Committee on A tinuing Music Education. Emmett Sarig, t the Extension Music Department at the Wisconsin, is serving as chairman of the na
tee. The national committee has proposed t develop a State Committee on Adult and Co Education.

The national committee is enlisting th state committee in ferreting out programs of tinuing music education within each stat near future you will be asked to respond to a designed to identify such programs. A list grams will be collated in each State and national directory to be used for referenc
planning.

As the newly appointed State Chairman mittee on Adult and Continuing Music Ec my wish to herein express some thoughts the continuing music education movement
States, (2) its relationship to the adult edu sión, and (3) the music teacher's responsibi the musical education of the adult commu

THE CONTINUING MUSIC EDUCATION MO IN THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the United States there is a cern about music in adult society, and the in portance of music in the total life of the in Tanglewood Symposium dedicated to "Music Society" identified the necessity for relating schools to music in society. Specifically, th emphasized the need to reduce the dual "school music" and "society's music" by inte education with the main stream of American
The Third National Symposium on Adult an Music Education was dedicated, as the title o indicated, to "View from the Action Front: W and Needed and How to Accomplish the Des
This symposium considered the present use adult education and explored potentialities fective programming designed to reach all

The Tanglewood Symposium report on
(4) states that a program of continuing educa should have the following aims: (1) To p

Hely states the goal of adult education be

Those powers of mind and those qu which have given to mankind an abiding he and judgment must continue everywhere changing patterns of day-to-day living, maturing and flowering in an enriched c

Adults' needs and motivations vary con those of children involved in the educati though principles of learning, conditions learning, and problem-solving techniques a all levels of student participation, adults bri room identifiable characteristics which af
ticipation.

Music has an important role to play in t adults. The effort to establish meaningful grams with meaningful goals is presently taken by both adult education and music e is the music teacher's responsibility toward of adults?

as Means and Ends." Unpublished, Boston, 1968.

IDEAS from the DISCUSSIONS

MUSIC AND MOVEMENT. We are built to move to music. The energy is there. It is being released at every hour and minute of the day through the muscles of the body. Music can shape the way that energy is released into the muscles. It leads to movement, even at the age of three.

POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT. Closer and more effective relationships must be developed with all professional music and artistic organizations whose concerns are parallel to the music education profession. Dialogue must be sought and firmly established with other disciplines, with the business community, with foundations, in fact with any type of organization involved with and interested in the development of a better and more effective society. If it becomes necessary for the profession to become involved either directly or indirectly in the political scheme to get the message to the public, then we must accept the challenge and do so in an intelligent and constructive manner. Music educators must come to realize that participation in politics is a necessity for all who are concerned with any phase of education. Fearful, uncreative, or insensitive teachers can alienate the entire community.

STUDENT-TEACHER RELATIONSHIP. The fact that a student learns better simply because he thinks the teacher likes him, and that he learns less well or not at all if he thinks the teacher doesn't like him, is frightening. Teachers are finding that these relationships are just as important, or perhaps more important, to the learning process than the subject-matter content.

COMMUNITY. If a community is to have a good music program, it must have musical parents. No one is better equipped to bring music experiences to adults than the music educator. He can take music to the community by sit-ins, if necessary. The board of education must be taken to concerts, and if the board is recalcitrant, take the concert to the board through television, tape recordings, slides, or whatever. If you have something new to say about music education in your community, and have thought through changes that seem necessary—changes that have grown out of Tanglewood—you must formulate a plan. It must be objective and open-ended, and it must include a time schedule and budget considerations. Music educators can set up community advisory groups, which include parents and business people, to help formulate the plan and successfully sell it to administrators.

ADMINISTRATION. To expand and improve the music education program requires the support of school superintendents. Music educators need to furnish substantial evidence that what they are proposing is just as important to the whole education of the child as any other of the numerous educational innovations clamoring for admittance to the educational environment. Although superintendents are educational leaders, they cannot be authorities on everything. A real burden rests upon the shoulders of music educators to provide all possible information to enable superintendents to make sound judgments and recommendations to boards of education for the inclusion of the proposals in the school program. If superintendents can show their boards of education that well-qualified music educators have a proposed program of music education that has the support of administration, the boards are more apt to consider the proposal favorably. They are also in a better position to defend their policy on music with the public.

108a

DUCATORS
TON, D. C.
54.000

968

, the argument goes, guilty on.
nders if," comments Mr.
he quest for new music,
ve ever asked themselves omposer shackled with the ain of serial method can han the composer employ-nal techniques." It obviever occurred to Mr. Klein mposer worth at least his agweed grapples with this ery time he begins a new
. The conclusion by an ag majority of composers
t one does not only "run is able to jump higher kled to the ball and chain thod" than when shackled and chain of traditional onably, the most appalling this article is that the

. . must become a prophet
." What kind of teacher
o professionally irrespon-advise his student com-alk into the future back-their eyes on the past?
dopt this attitude with my would, fortunately, be ht out of the classroom.—
STEWART, *Assistant Pro-heory and Composition,
llege, Athens, West Vir-*

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

J 17 1969

eeds Some 'Bread'

Lively Arts

N EXHIBIT ON SCREEN
N RECORD ON STAGE

ring eth-
c — pro-l oricuthe heir e to eful y to iferaclororm

the

the folymouth lvein for usic h of tors

Danny Giannico, bass.

Mrs. Rowe is dedicated to want to reach students through their own interests as well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause aid.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR.-1.700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Co

The Music Educators National Conferenc ently formed a National Committee on Adult tinuing Music Education. Emmett Sarig, the the Extension Music Department at the Un Wisconsin, is serving as chairman of the nation
tee. The national committee has proposed that develop a State Committee on Adult and Contin Education.

The national committee is enlisting the state committee in ferreting out programs of ad tinuing music education within each state.
near future you will be asked to respond to a q designed to identify such programs. A list of grams will be collated in each State and cor national directory to be used for reference planning.

As the newly appointed State Chairman o
mittee on Adult and Continuing Music Educ
my wish to herein express some thoughts reg
the continuing music education movement in States, (2) its relationship to the adult educat sión, and (3) the music teacher's responsibility
the musical education of the adult communit

THE CONTINUING MUSIC EDUCATION MOVE IN THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the United States there is a gr cern about music in adult society, and the imp
portance of music in the total life of the indiv
Tanglewood Symposium dedicated to "Music i Society" identified the necessity for relating m schools to music in society. Specifically, the emphasized the need to reduce the dualisn
"school music" and "society's music" by integra education with the main stream of American c
The Third National Symposium on Adult and Music Education was dedicated, as the title of t indicated, to "View from the Action Front: Wha
and Needed and How to Accomplish the Desire
This symposium considered the present use o
adult education and explored potentialities fo fective programming designed to reach all pe

The Tanglewood Symposium report on B
(4) states that a program of continuing educatic should have the following aims: (1) To per

Hely states the goal of adult education belo

Those powers of mind and those quali which have given to mankind an abiding herit and judgment must continue everywhere to changing patterns of day-to-day living, fu maturing and flowering in an enriched cult

Adults' needs and motivations vary consi those of children involved in the educative though principles of learning, conditions wh learning, and problem-solving techniques are all levels of student participation, adults bring room identifiable characteristics which affe ticipation.

Music has an important role to play in the adults. The effort to establish meaningful g grams with meaningful goals is presently taken by both adult education and music edu is the music teacher's responsibility toward t
of adults?

EARLY CHILDHOOD. Musical experiences for the three-year-old child should highlight inquiry, discovery, and experimentation, leading to self-

SECONDARY SCHOOL CURRICULA. Whatever we do with young people, we must have involvement. There must be composing, there must be performing; we must not think of any course or any kind of program we develop for these people as strictly a listening, passive kind of course. There should be efforts made at playing recreational instruments; we must become involved with the instruments that are less sophisticated than the ones we usually teach, the kind they can put in their pocket and carry home. In a way, it is an exploitation of a young person to have him spend four, five, or six years playing a tuba, knowing that when he gets through school there is no chance of his ever playing the instrument again. We need somehow to get young people involved with instruments that can be very personal and can be a part of their life. We need to start where students are. If we are going to have a music program that meets the needs of all students, we can learn from mathematics curricula; all students do not take trigonometry and calculus and higher algebra. There are some courses that are down at the elementary level of mathematics. If we are to have a course in music that will be of interest to all students, we must have some kind of gradation of material to be covered. There should be some required study in music at the high school level, as a music course, as an independent study project, or as part of a humanities course. The content should be representative of all types of music; attention should be devoted to student involvement and understanding not only of musical works but also of musical processes.

TEACHER TRAINING. For too many years educators have dismissed the needs of the young child in favor of the more pressing concerns for older children. This has become a costly error, for in neglecting to study the learning problems in the early years of childhood, the crucial years in growth and development, we now have a Pandora's box of difficulties let loose upon us—the rise in juvenile delinquency at an ever-younger age, increasing crime and violence, dropouts from school and society, and many other problems. Preparation for the prospective teacher of very young children should include a four-year exposure to all art media. There should be great laboratories where teachers explore for themselves and find out at firsthand what art media are like. The expert teacher needs to use clay, use paints, move to music, explore sounds, and play with words at the adult level. If this were done, we would no longer see very young children's valuable time used in learning the exercise of "cutting on the line," and "painting within the circle," or following the teacher around the room literally to the beat of the drum. This is the way too many teachers of young children now approach all creative media.

JAZZ AND POPULAR. Jazz, having passed through an adolescence of bathtub gin, dope, and gangsters, is finding it difficult to establish its own true image, that of an art form that is at once truly American and universal in character. Music educators who by-pass jazz and popular music on the grounds of unworthiness or insignificance suffer a compound failure: that of failing to recognize an art form that has already proved itself, of viewing it with a closed mind, even if they have begrudgingly admitted its merit and its existence. It appears, then, that in music education, the formal training of jazz groups should be a part of the course of study for credit, not only from the technical standpoint in the teaching of intricate rhythms, harmonic sounds, and new forms, but also from the standpoint of those attitudes that will best prepare the teacher in training to meet the demands and challenges of his students and their society. We have talked for years about finding out where the students are and taking them on from there and about teaching students instead of subjects, but we have made little progress. If we used the students' music and taught for a thorough knowledge of the components of popular music and were not afraid of comparison to what we might identify as "great" music, we might see different choices being made by young people.

HUMANITIES AND RELATED-ARTS COURSES. While it is undoubtedly true that music educators should be able to teach effectively in either humanities or related-arts courses, it seems that if we really desire to place music in the mainstream—into the core of the curriculum—we should be stressing the importance of the type of course that puts the arts in the center, rather than on the periphery as a kind of fringe benefit. Music should be more than a Kiwanis-like service club that stands ready to perform on those two or three days each semester when someone invites it in. Above all else, humanities or related-arts courses for all senior high school students should not eliminate the need for traditional music courses, such as music history and literature, theory, and harmony. Instead, we should be planning for a senior high school where there are many avenues available, where musical performance, traditional music major courses, related-arts courses, and humanities are offered for the choice of tomorrow's students.

108a

ITORS
D. C.
54,000

e argument goes, guilty

rs if," comments Mr.
quest for new music,
ever asked themselves
oser shackled with the
of serial method can the composer employ-techniques." It obvi-occurred to Mr. Klein ser worth at least his eed grapples with this time he begins a new he conclusion by an najority of composers
e does not only "run
able to jump higher
to the ball and chain
" than when shackled chain of traditional ly, the most appalling

s article is that the ust become a prophet /hat kind of teacher ofessionally irresponise his student com-
into the future back-
ir eyes on the past?
this attitude with my ould, fortunately, be ut of the classroom.—
WART, Assistant Pro-
ry and Composition,
e, Athens, West Vir-

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JUN 17 1969

eds Some 'Bread'

vely Arts

XHIBIT ON SCREEN
ECORD ON STAGE

well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause said.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR.-1,700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Co

The Music Educators National Conferen
ently formed a National Committee on Adul tinuing Music Education. Emmett Sarig, the the Extension Music Department at the Ur
Wisconsin, is serving as chairman of the natior
tee. The national committee has proposed that develop a State Committee on Adult and Contir Education.

The national committee is enlisting the a state committee in ferreting out programs of adı tinuing music education within each state.
near future you will be asked to respond to a qu designed to identify such programs. A list of grams will be collated in each State and con national directory to be used for reference planning.

As the newly appointed State Chairman o
mittee on Adult and Continuing Music Educ
my wish to herein express some thoughts reg
the continuing music education movement in States, (2) its relationship to the adult educat
sión, and (3) the music teacher's responsibility
the musical education of the adult communit

THE CONTINUING MUSIC EDUCATION MOVE
IN THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the United States there is a gr cern about music in adult society, and the impa
portance of music in the total life of the indiv
Tanglewood Symposium dedicated to "Music in Society" identified the necessity for relating m schools to music in society. Specifically, the s emphasized the need to reduce the dualism
"school music" and "society's music" by integra education with the main stream of American cu
The Third National Symposium on Adult and C
Music Education was dedicated, as the title of tl indicated, to "View from the Action Front: Wha
and Needed and How to Accomplish the Desire
This symposium considered the present use o
adult education and explored potentialities fo
fective programming designed to reach all pe

The Tanglewood Symposium report on Ba
(4) states that a program of continuing educatio should have the following aims: (1) To pers

Hely states the goal of adult education belov

Those powers of mind and those qualit which have given to mankind an abiding herit and judgment must continue everywhere to changing patterns of day-to-day living, ful maturing and flowering in an enriched cultu

Adults' needs and motivations vary consid
those of children involved in the educative though principles of learning, conditions whi learning, and problem-solving techniques are all levels of student participation, adults bring room identifiable characteristics which affec ticipation.

Music has an important role to play in the adults. The effort to establish meaningful go grams with meaningful goals is presently b taken by both adult education and music educ is the music teacher's responsibility toward tl of adults?

JAZZ AND POPULAR. Jazz, having passed through an adolescence of bathtub gin, dope, and gangsters, is finding it difficult to establish its own true image, that of an art form that is at once truly American and universal in character. Music educators who by-pass jazz and popular music on the grounds of unworthiness or insignificance suffer a compound failure: that of failing to recognize [illegible]

TEACHER TRAINING. For too many years educators have dismissed the needs of the young child in favor of the more pressing concerns for older children. This has become a costly error, for in neglecting to study the learning problems in the early years of childhood, the crucial years in growth and development, we now have a Pandora's box of difficulties let loose upon us—the rise in juvenile delinquency at an ever-younger age, increasing crime and violence, dropouts from school and society, and many other problems. Preparation for the prospective teacher of very young children should include a four-year exposure to all art media. There should be great laboratories where teachers explore for themselves and find out at firsthand what art media are like. The expert teacher needs to use clay, use paints, move to music, explore sounds, and play with words at the adult level. If this were done, we would no longer see very young children's valuable time used in learning the exercise of "cutting on the line," and "painting within the circle," or following the teacher around the room literally to the beat of the drum. This is the way too many teachers of young children now approach all creative media.

SECONDARY SCHOOL CURRICULA. Whatever we do with young people, we must have involvement. There must be composing, there must be performing; we must not think of any course or any kind of program we develop for these people as strictly a listening, passive kind of course. There should be efforts made at playing recreational instruments; we must become involved with the instruments that are less sophisticated than the ones we usually teach, the kind they can put in their pocket and carry home. In a way, it is an exploitation of a young person to have him spend four, five, or six years playing a tuba, knowing that when he gets through school there is no chance of his ever playing the instrument again. We need somehow to get young people involved with instruments that can be very personal and can be a part of their life. We need to start where students are. If we are going to have a music program that meets the needs of all students, we can learn from mathematics curricula; all students do not take trigonometry and calculus and higher algebra. There are some courses that are down at the elementary level of mathematics. If we are to have a course in music that will be of interest to all students, we must have some kind of gradation of material to be covered. There should be some required study in music at the high school level, as a music course, as an independent study project, or as part of a humanities course. The content should be representative of all types of music; attention should be devoted to student involvement and understanding not only of musical works but also of musical processes.

EARLY CHILDHOOD. Musical experiences for the three-year-old child should highlight inquiry, discovery, and experimentation, leading to self-realization, self-expression, and perceptions about music. The best philosophies, the best resources that are found effective in early education carry into the regular school program. We should try to strive for balance between individual self-directed activities and the small- and large-group activities, the choice of the activity being determined by a very clear concept of what we are trying to accomplish for the child. In the early age groups, we should try to determine and make workable a team relationship between the classroom teacher and the music specialist. The effectiveness of this relationship could be heightened by a reappraisal and reshaping of our teacher-training programs and by developing a continuous and very stimulating in-service training program for the classroom teachers now in service.

RELEVANCE. Ninety percent of the serious music we hear today—the so-called "art" music—was composed in some other era. Students have the attitude that music has ceased to be regarded as an on-going creative activity, that it has become largely a performed and interpretive art, comparable to acting. Conservative demands make conservative results. Music teaching must be dedicated to making music meaningful. Unless it makes contact with human beings, it loses its place in society. Teachers must be aware of every device for making music personal. Prospective music teachers should be prepared with knowledge of all types and forms of music: Oriental, electronic, primitive, jazz, rock and roll, raga rock, folk song, as well as the "classical" heritage now in vogue. Making music personal may take away some rehearsal time, but it will build understanding.

108a

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

ITORS
D. C.
54.000

argument goes, guilty

s if," comments Mr.
quest for new music,
ever asked themselves
oser shackled with the
of serial method can the composer employ-techniques." It obvi-occurred to Mr. Klein oser worth at least his eed grapples with this time he begins a new he conclusion by an majority of composers ne does not only "run
able to jump higher l to the ball and chain d" than when shackled d chain of traditional bly, the most appalling his article is that the must become a prophet

What kind of teacher professionally irresponvise his student com-
into the future back-
eir eyes on the past?
t this attitude with my ould, fortunately, be out of the classroom.—
EWART, Assistant Pro-
ory and Composition,
ge, Athens, West Vir-

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JAN 17 1969

eds Some 'Bread'

vely Arts

EXHIBIT ON SCREEN
RECORD ON STAGE

well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause aid.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR.-1.700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Conti

by P

The Music Educators National Conference has ently formed a National Committee on Adult and tinuing Music Education. Emmett Sarig, the Directo the Extension Music Department at the Universit Wisconsin, is serving as chairman of the national com tee. The national committee has proposed that each develop a State Committee on Adult and Continuing M Education.

The national committee is enlisting the aid of state committee in ferreting out programs of adult and tinuing music education within each state. Within near future you will be asked to respond to a question designed to identify such programs. A list of these grams will be collated in each State and compiled national directory to be used for reference and f planning.

As the newly appointed State Chairman of the C mittee on Adult and Continuing Music Education, my wish to herein express some thoughts regarding the continuing music education movement in the U States, (2) its relationship to the adult education pr sión, and (3) the music teacher's responsibility regar the musical education of the adult community.

THE CONTINUING MUSIC EDUCATION MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the United States there is a growing cern about music in adult society, and the impact anc portance of music in the total life of the individual. Tanglewood Symposium dedicated to "Music in Ame Society" identified the necessity for relating music i schools to music in society. Specifically, the sympo emphasized the need to reduce the dualism bet "school music" and "society's music" by integrating n education with the main stream of American culture. The Third National Symposium on Adult and Contir Music Education was dedicated, as the title of the me indicated, to "View from the Action Front: What's Wa and Needed and How to Accomplish the Desired Res This symposium considered the present use of mus adult education and explored potentialities for mor fective programming designed to reach all people.

The Tanglewood Symposium report on Basic I (4) states that a program of continuing education in n should have the following aims: (1) To persons c

Hely states the goal of adult education below.

Those powers of mind and those qualities o which have given to mankind an abiding heritage of and judgment must continue everywhere to find, changing patterns of day-to-day living, full sco maturing and flowering in an enriched culture. (

Adults' needs and motivations vary considerabl those of children involved in the educative proc though principles of learning, conditions which fa learning, and problem-solving techniques are adapt all levels of student participation, adults bring to th room identifiable characteristics which affect their participation.

Music has an important role to play in the education of adults. The effort to establish meaningful goals and programs with meaningful goals is presently being undertaken by both adult education and music education. What is the music teacher's responsibility toward the education of adults?

Kaplan, Max. Foundations and Frontiers of Music Education. New York: Holt, Rhinehart and Winston, Inc., 1966.

Tanglewood Symposium Report. Basic Issues. "Music in the Emerging American Society." and "Values: Music as Means and Ends." Unpublished, Boston, 1968.

■ Lothar Klein's article on "Brahms, Boulez, and the Beatles" [April 1968, p. 55] demands a comment, if only to lament its disappointing comparison with other essays in this series.

With the publication of summary reports on the Tanglewood Symposium, and the regular appearance of articles exhorting the educator to make a positive commitment to the teaching and performance of twentieth-century music, it remained only a matter of time before the anguished

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.

TANGLEWOOD: A BEGINNING

Tanglewood was a mirror that reflected music education and its relationship to the lives of all people. To look at ourselves can be frightening. It can also be rewarding. In this context, I should like to examine these reflections.

The summarizing session of the Tanglewood discussions at Seattle concluded what was originally planned as the full cycle of the Tanglewood Symposium project—a cycle that included the input phase of last year's Division conventions, the Symposium itself, and the follow-through this fall and winter, culminating in the sessions at the National Convention.

In the framework of this finale (which I feel is really only a beginning), there are three questions I should like to ask.

What has the Tanglewood experience told us? There are many answers to this question, but to me the following are important:

(a) Hundreds of music educators participated actively when asked to discuss and debate the issues of music in American society at the 1967 MENC Division Conventions.

(b) By broadening the subject to the whole spectrum of music and by reaching out to those with related interests, we enjoyed the cooperative sponsorship and support of a major symphony orchestra (the Boston Symphony Orchestra), an important university (Boston University), and a foundation (the Theodore Presser Foundation).

(c) Experts from fields outside music education joined us for a week at Tanglewood to involve themselves in these same issues, contributing generously of their own time and thought.

(d) Newspaper writers, educators and administrators outside our own field, arts council leaders, and many others enthusiastically reacted to the speeches and recommendations coming out of the Symposium.

(e) MENC membership moved into a strong momentum of follow-up activities after the Symposium. "Little Tanglewoods" were set up in state after state; sessions patterned after the Symposium were programed in state conventions, articles were written in state magazines, close to 200 filmstrip programs on Tanglewood were in circulation within two months of its release, and many more symptoms of purpose and involvement showed a movement into the future.

(f) School administrators from all parts of the country traveled to Seattle to carry on discussions of the issues of the Symposium, thereby clearly indicating their own concern for the future of the arts in education.

In other words, the experience of Tanglewood has told us new things about our own membership's capacity for involvement and for dealing with ideas. And we know as never before that individuals and groups outside MENC are ready to share these concerns and experiences, both as contributors of new insights and ideas for music education and as appreciative listeners when we have something significant to say.

What has Tanglewood not told us? As Robert Choate described the purpose of Tanglewood, "We are trying to extend—not to prove anything about what has been accomplished in music." Tanglewood was a stretching experience, reaching in all directions for new stimuli, new challenges, and new insights. As such, Tanglewood did not attempt to set priorities or guidelines or time-

ent goes, guilty

comments Mr. for new music, ked themselves ackled with the ial method can nposer employ- ques." It obvi- ed to Mr. Klein rth at least his pples with this e begins a new nclusion by an y of composers s not only "run o jump higher ball and chain when shackled n of traditional most appalling icle is that the ecome a prophet kind of teacher onally irrespon- is student com- he future back- es on the past? ttitude with my fortunately, be the classroom.— , Assistant Pro- d Composition, hens, West Vir-

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JAN 17 1969

ds Some 'Bread'

Arts

T ON SCREEN
D ON STAGE

ll as the usual forms of sic training. "MENC mem- s agreed at Tanglewood t summer they could learn nething from their students well as teach them some- ng," Pinellas County music pervisor Wallace Gause l.

The boys are rehearsing for ir segment of the confer- ce and are trying to raise necessary $500 for their p. However, civic clubs ve completed their projects the year and the musi- ans union expressed no in- est in the project.

According to Gause, "the nellas County Music Educa- ors Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could as- sist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

heard them at the festival and was impressed with their versatility and ease of performance, both as accompanists and a solo group. Members of the group are Paul Rowe, guitar; Don Leighton, piano; Rich Giannico, drums; and Danny Giannico, bass.

Mrs. Rowe is dedicated to follow up the Tanglewood Symposium with actual youth group performances. Involvement of music educators in jazz has been underway for the past year. The Jazz Music Association is now a branch of the MENC. Music educators want to reach students through their own interests as

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR.-1,700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Continuing Music Education

by Paul A. Aliapoulios

The Music Educators National Conference has recently formed a National Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education. Emmett Sarig, the Director of the Extension Music Department at the University of Wisconsin, is serving as chairman of the national committee. The national committee has proposed that each State develop a State Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education.

The national committee is enlisting the aid of each state committee in ferreting out programs of adult and continuing music education within each state. Within the near future you will be asked to respond to a questionnaire designed to identify such programs. A list of these programs will be collated in each State and compiled in a national directory to be used for reference and future planning.

As the newly appointed State Chairman of the Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education, it is my wish to herein express some thoughts regarding (1) the continuing music education movement in the United States, (2) its relationship to the adult education profession, and (3) the music teacher's responsibility regarding the musical education of the adult community.

THE CONTINUING MUSIC EDUCATION MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the United States there is a growing concern about music in adult society, and the impact and importance of music in the total life of the individual. The Tanglewood Symposium dedicated to "Music in American Society" identified the necessity for relating music in the schools to music in society. Specifically, the symposium emphasized the need to reduce the dualism between "school music" and "society's music" by integrating music education with the main stream of American culture. (4) The Third National Symposium on Adult and Continuing Music Education was dedicated, as the title of the meeting indicated, to "View from the Action Front: What's Wanted and Needed and How to Accomplish the Desired Results." This symposium considered the present use of music in adult education and explored potentialities for more effective programming designed to reach all people.

The Tanglewood Symposium report on Basic Issues (4) states that a program of continuing education in music should have the following aims: (1) To persons of all ages, it should offer an opportunity to move as far in depth or breadth as each man can, through a comprehensive program of music that will equip him to live in the modern world.

(2) Music should be offered to adults both for instrumental purposes – to satisfy psychological, religious, and vocational needs; and for expressive purposes – to help each individual find means for self-realization, either as creator or as participant audience. (3) We should have as a possibility in the educational program for those who want it, developing a "leisure occupation" in the music sphere. This means developing the role of audience member for the non-musician, by being not only a listener but also a tastemaker, by not only enjoying but also sharing in determining the destiny of music. (4) All we do should be part of an organic whole, with a beginning and a future direction implied. Continuity in educational purpose is a keynote of an appropriate response to present day objectives. (4:29)

The report continues by stating that while agendas for the above ends cannot be laid out in advance, the following variety of activities may be anticipated: 1. Learning to listen. 2. Learning to perform, read and write music. 3. Getting the opportunity of going to concerts. 4. Learning to analyze and discriminate. 5. Learning to judge and define taste. 6. Enlarging the extent of commitment. 7. Learning to integrate music into life. (4:29)

Federal legislation has provided financial resources in the area of adult education, and the result has been the creation of The Arts and Humanities Foundation. Institutions of higher learning, arts councils, foundations, and industry are contributing to make this a propitious climate for the development of the arts in society.

The three Symposia on Adult and Continuing Music Education sponsored by the University of Wisconsin have made important progress toward unifying in purpose those individuals concerned with adult education and music education. The Third National Symposium which included professional music educators, directors of extension services, directors and leaders of community services, representatives of organizations interested in the performance of music by amateurs and professionals, representatives of the mass media, and representatives of the various national educational organizations expressed a concern for the establishment of goals and directions for music in adult education.

Hely states the goal of adult education below.

Those powers of mind and those qualities of spirit which have given to mankind an abiding heritage of values and judgment must continue everywhere to find, in our changing patterns of day-to-day living, full scope for maturing and flowering in an enriched culture. (2:133)

Adults' needs and motivations vary considerably from those of children involved in the educative process. Although principles of learning, conditions which facilitate learning, and problem-solving techniques are adaptable to all levels of student participation, adults bring to the classroom identifiable characteristics which affect their participation.

Music has an important role to play in the education of adults. The effort to establish meaningful goals and programs with meaningful goals is presently being undertaken by both adult education and music education. What is the music teacher's responsibility toward the education of adults?

the same time to seek to educate everyone to the limit of his ability." (1:77)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gardner, John W. Excellence: Can We Be Equal and Excellent Too? New York: Harper and Row, Publishers, 1961.

Hely, A.A.M. New Trends in Adult Education. Paris: United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization, 1962.

Kaplan, Max. Foundations and Frontiers of Music Education. New York: Holt, Rhinehart and Winston, Inc., 1966.

Tanglewood Symposium Report. Basic Issues. "Music in the Emerging American Society." and "Values: Music as Means and Ends." Unpublished, Boston, 1968.

108a

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

DEC 1968

■ Lothar Klein's article on "Brahms, Boulez, and the Beatles" [April 1968, p. 55] demands a comment, if only to lament its disappointing comparison with other essays in this series.

With the publication of summary reports on the Tanglewood Symposium, and the regular appearance of articles exhorting the educator to make a positive commitment to the teaching and performance of twentieth-century music, it remained only a matter of time before the anguished groans of the far-right, rear guard would rise through the din. But what a desperate, unsophisticated, sophomoric attempt! Drawing an analogy between serialist thinking and Marxist thinking is as frightful a bore today as it was when heard over thirty years ago in Nazi Germany. True, Mr. Klein wasn't equating Marxist thought with serial composition, since he had already made it clear that, via Camus' Myth of Sisyphus, serial composition equates with the existential philosophy of the absurd. However, this observation hardly saves his article from the quagmire of half-truths and generalizations that glare contemptibly from the printed page.

For example: "The compositional act for serial composers consists of tabulating series of pitches, durations, correlating their possibilities on a graph. . . ." This generalization is absolutely utter nonsense. Klein groups all "serial composers" together and then applies an incidental fact that tentatively applies to a few compositions by a few "serial composers" to deliberately lead the uninitiated reader to a completely false conclusion. Incidentally, the "inspiration" expressed on graph paper is intrinsically as valid as those "inspirations" of the "pre-serial composers." Furthermore, ends are confused with means. Unconventional notation does not automatically mean bad, "uninspired" music. Of course Mr. Klein knows that; what I object to is the inference that hokus-pokus notation equals hokus-pokus music. Thus, the argument goes, guilty by association.

"One wonders if," comments Mr. Klein, "in the quest for new music, serialists have ever asked themselves whether a composer shackled with the ball and chain of serial method can run faster than the composer employing traditional techniques." It obviously has never occurred to Mr. Klein that any composer worth at least his weight in ragweed grapples with this question every time he begins a new composition. The conclusion by an overwhelming majority of composers today is that one does not only "run faster" but is able to jump higher when "shackled to the ball and chain of serial method" than when shackled to the ball and chain of traditional techniques.

Unquestionably, the most appalling comment in this article is that the "composer . . . must become a prophet of the past." What kind of teacher would be so professionally irresponsible as to advise his student composers to walk into the future backwards with their eyes on the past? Were I to adopt this attitude with my students, I would, fortunately, be laughed right out of the classroom.—ROBERT J. STEWART, Assistant Professor of Theory and Composition, Concord College, Athens, West Virginia 24712.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JUL 17 1969

MUSIC NOTES

Jazz Combo Needs Some 'Bread'

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

The Lively Arts
ON EXHIBIT ON SCREEN
ON RECORD ON STAGE

St. Petersburg will be the only Florida city represented by a student jazz combo at the July 7-14 Institute for music educators and guidance counselors at the University of Wisconsin in Madison.

That is, if the Northeast High School Jazz Combo can raise $500 for the trip.

In response to the 1968 Tanglewood Symposium of the Music Educators National Conference (MENC), Northeast High School formed a student jazz group under the direction of choral music director Mrs. Jack Rowe.

"The group formed the middle of April as an accompanying group for my mixed chorus," Mrs. Rowe said. "But they were so good I asked them to play some numbers alone on our May Festival of the Arts concerts."

THEY WERE GOOD. I heard them at the festival and was impressed with their versatility and ease of performance, both as accompanists and a solo group. Members of the group are Paul Rowe, guitar; Don Leighton, piano; Rich Giannico, drums; and Danny Giannico, bass.

Mrs. Rowe is dedicated to the MENC program to bring students and teachers together through their own music — not only the formalized programs of chorus, band and orchestra in the school curriculum. And she encouraged the group to tape one of their sessions. She sent the tape to the institute director, hopeful that the boys might qualify to perform at the July conference.

Not only was the combo accepted, but it is the only Florida group which will perform and is one of only 22 from the entire country.

The conference will be the first national institute to followup the Tanglewood Symposium with actual youth group performances. Involvement of music educators in jazz has been underway for the past year. The Jazz Music Association is now a branch of the MENC. Music educators want to reach students through their own interests as well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause aid.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

music educators have.

Kohler & Campbell builds only one studio piano, the highly respected Professional. Technically, the Professional meets and often surpasses the twelve stringent requirements for school pianos recommended by Dr. Elwyn Carter and adopted as a standard by MENC. You'll find the Professional sturdy and dependable, built with a full perimeter plate and other features to keep maintenance at a minimum.

Specifications aside, however, the most persuasive factor in your selection of the Kohler & Campbell Professional will be its musical tone. Powerful and resonant, the tone, from deep sustained bass to clear middle register to brilliant treble, encourages student music appreciation. Tonal quality has earned the Professional a place in many music departments, including those of Dartmouth College, Rice University and the North Carolina School of the Arts. The Professional is the choice, too, of leading elementary and secondary schools in 49 states.

Now styled with a trim, low-looking cabinet, the Professional has aesthetic appeal beyond its superb tone. To learn more, write for a free copy of the Kohler & Campbell Professional Brochure and the comprehensive Portfolio Collection Brochure.

Music educators are becoming more aware of the inadequacies of the traditional music offerings in large numbers of adult education programs. Motivated by increased funds and national support, music educators are moving in the direction of greater participation in adult music education programs. It is time for each of us to consider the role of music education in the adult education programs in our respective communities.

ADULT EDUCATION

Adult education should be everyone's concern. It is important that a philosophy for the education of adults be considered by all thoughtful persons who wish to assume their share of responsibility for the kind of society in which they live. While the professional adult educator should play an important role in this field of activity, it is not an enterprise limited to his talents alone. Actually, most of the work in adult education is carried on by persons who have had little or no professional training in the problems of the education of the adult. These people have made a substantial contribution to the field of adult education.

The history and development of the adult education movement in the United States points to a broader concept of adult education. A move from the technical education of adults to a more liberal arts education and the development of the idea of continuing education are supportive to the cause of aesthetic education for adults.

The goals of adult education are many and varied. Their nature is greatly dependent upon the agency with which they are associated. However, there is a concern by adult educators to consistently re-establish meaningful goals and procedures for adult education in our society. The nature of such all inclusive goals is necessarily of a broad consequence.

Based on an international conference in adult education, Hely states the goal of adult education below.

Those powers of mind and those qualities of spirit which have given to mankind an abiding heritage of values and judgment must continue everywhere to find, in our changing patterns of day-to-day living, full scope for maturing and flowering in an enriched culture. (2:133)

Adults' needs and motivations vary considerably from those of children involved in the educative process. Although principles of learning, conditions which facilitate learning, and problem-solving techniques are adaptable to all levels of student participation, adults bring to the classroom identifiable characteristics which affect their participation.

Music has an important role to play in the education of adults. The effort to establish meaningful goals and programs with meaningful goals is presently being undertaken by both adult education and music education. What is the music teacher's responsibility toward the education of adults?

THE MUSIC TEACHER

Music can be a vital part of the adult education movement as it is presently developing. It can serve to meet the overall purpose of adult education in contemporary society by helping to fulfill the aesthetic needs of its constituency. Moreover, it can serve the total society if music educators establish more varied goal-centered programs designed to meet people where they are and move them into the sphere of artistic envelopment.

The music teacher should become increasingly aware of adult needs with regard to adult participation in musical activities which are guided by music specialists. The music teacher should be made aware of the desirable setting for adult learning and of how adults learn. The music teacher should not feel that because he has not been specifically instructed in the education of adults he should not take on the responsibility of an adult education course in music. As the Tanglewood Symposium suggests, music educators should assume leadership in developing continuing music opportunities for their communities.

Kaplan suggests that certain developments are called for in order for music to gain a more active role in adult education. He states that, "a formal relation between MENC, MTNA, and other professional organizations should be established with the AEA (adult education association) or other agencies that specialize in adult work." (3:154) He also seeks more research and experiments dealing with music for adults.

The present need is for more emphasis to be placed on music's role in the development of the whole man. With such an emphasis, the purposes of music education and of adult education will not only be more compatible but will also be of more consequence to society. This can be a reality under the guiding philosophy of John Gardner who says: "It is possible to have excellence in education and at the same time to seek to educate everyone to the limit of his ability." (1:77)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gardner, John W. Excellence: Can We Be Equal and Excellent Too? New York: Harper and Row, Publishers, 1961.

Hely, A.A.M. New Trends in Adult Education. Paris: United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization, 1962.

Kaplan, Max. Foundations and Frontiers of Music Education. New York: Holt, Rhinehart and Winston, Inc., 1966.

Tanglewood Symposium Report. Basic Issues. "Music in the Emerging American Society." and "Values: Music as Means and Ends." Unpublished, Boston, 1968.

108a

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

DEC 1968

■ Lothar Klein's article on "Brahms, Boulez, and the Beatles" [April 1968, p. 55] demands a comment, if only to lament its disappointing comparison with other essays in this series.

With the publication of summary reports on the Tanglewood Symposium, and the regular appearance of articles exhorting the educator to make a positive commitment to the teaching and performance of twentieth-century music, it remained only a matter of time before the anguished groans of the far-right, rear guard would rise through the din. But what a desperate, unsophisticated, sophomoric attempt! Drawing an analogy between serialist thinking and Marxist thinking is as frightful a bore today as it was when heard over thirty years ago in Nazi Germany. True, Mr. Klein wasn't equating Marxist thought with serial composition, since he had already made it clear that, via Camus' Myth of Sisyphus, serial composition equates with the existential philosophy of the absurd. However, this observation hardly saves his article from the quagmire of half-truths and generalizations that glare contemptibly from the printed page.

For example: "The compositional act for serial composers consists of tabulating series of pitches, durations, correlating their possibilities on a graph. . . ." This generalization is absolutely utter nonsense. Klein groups all "serial composers" together and then applies an incidental fact that tentatively applies to a few compositions by a few "serial composers" to deliberately lead the uninitiated reader to a completely false conclusion. Incidentally, the "inspiration" expressed on graph paper is intrinsically as valid as those "inspirations" of the "pre-serial composers." Furthermore, ends are confused with means. Unconventional notation does not automatically mean bad, "uninspired" music. Of course Mr. Klein knows that; what I object to is the inference that hokus-pokus notation equals hokus-pokus music. Thus, the argument goes, guilty by association.

"One wonders if," comments Mr. Klein, "in the quest for new music, serialists have ever asked themselves whether a composer shackled with the ball and chain of serial method can run faster than the composer employing traditional techniques." It obviously has never occurred to Mr. Klein that any composer worth at least his weight in ragweed grapples with this question every time he begins a new composition. The conclusion by an overwhelming majority of composers today is that one does not only "run faster" but is able to jump higher when "shackled to the ball and chain of serial method" than when shackled to the ball and chain of traditional techniques.

Unquestionably, the most appalling comment in this article is that the "composer . . . must become a prophet of the past." What kind of teacher would be so professionally irresponsible as to advise his student composers to walk into the future backwards with their eyes on the past? Were I to adopt this attitude with my students, I would, fortunately, be laughed right out of the classroom.—ROBERT J. STEWART, Assistant Professor of Theory and Composition, Concord College, Athens, West Virginia 24712.

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JAN 17 1969

MUSIC NOTES

Jazz Combo Needs Some 'Bread'

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

The Lively Arts
ON EXHIBIT ON SCREEN
ON RECORD ON STAGE

St. Petersburg will be the only Florida city represented by a student jazz combo at the July 7-14 Institute for music educators and guidance counselors at the University of Wisconsin in Madison.

That is, if the Northeast High School Jazz Combo can raise $500 for the trip.

In response to the 1968 Tanglewood Symposium of the Music Educators National Conference (MENC), Northeast High School formed a student jazz group under the direction of choral music director Mrs. Jack Rowe.

"The group formed the middle of April as an accompanying group for my mixed chorus," Mrs. Rowe said. "But they were so good I asked them to play some numbers alone on our May Festival of the Arts concerts."

THEY WERE GOOD. I heard them at the festival and was impressed with their versatility and ease of performance, both as accompanists and a solo group. Members of the group are Paul Rowe, guitar; Don Leighton, piano; Rich Giannico, drums; and Danny Giannico, bass.

Mrs. Rowe is dedicated to the MENC program to bring students and teachers together through their own music — not only the formalized programs of chorus, band and orchestra in the school curriculum. And she encouraged the group to tape one of their sessions. She sent the tape to the institute director, hopeful that the boys might qualify to perform at the July conference.

Not only was the combo accepted, but it is the only Florida group which will perform and is one of only 22 from the entire country.

The conference will be the first national institute to followup the Tanglewood Symposium with actual youth group performances. Involvement of music educators in jazz has been underway for the past year. The Jazz Music Association is now a branch of the MENC. Music educators want to reach students through their own interests as well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause aid.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR.-1,700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Continuing Music Education

by Paul A. Aliapoulios

The Music Educators National Conference has recently formed a National Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education. Emmett Sarig, the Director of the Extension Music Department at the University of Wisconsin, is serving as chairman of the national committee. The national committee has proposed that each State develop a State Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education.

The national committee is enlisting the aid of each state committee in ferreting out programs of adult and continuing music education within each state. Within the near future you will be asked to respond to a questionnaire designed to identify such programs. A list of these programs will be collated in each State and compiled in a national directory to be used for reference and future planning.

As the newly appointed State Chairman of the Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education, it is my wish to herein express some thoughts regarding (1) the continuing music education movement in the United States, (2) its relationship to the adult education profession, and (3) the music teacher's responsibility regarding the musical education of the adult community.

THE CONTINUING MUSIC EDUCATION MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the United States there is a growing concern about music in adult society, and the impact and importance of music in the total life of the individual. The Tanglewood Symposium dedicated to "Music in American Society" identified the necessity for relating music in the schools to music in society. Specifically, the symposium emphasized the need to reduce the dualism between "school music" and "society's music" by integrating music education with the main stream of American culture. (4) The Third National Symposium on Adult and Continuing Music Education was dedicated, as the title of the meeting indicated, to "View from the Action Front: What's Wanted and Needed and How to Accomplish the Desired Results." This symposium considered the present use of music in adult education and explored potentialities for more effective programming designed to reach all people.

The Tanglewood Symposium report on Basic Issues (4) states that a program of continuing education in music should have the following aims: (1) To persons of all ages, it should offer an opportunity to move as far in depth or breadth as each man can, through a comprehensive program of music that will equip him to live in the modern world.

(2) Music should be offered to adults both for instrumental purposes – to satisfy psychological, religious, and vocational needs; and for expressive purposes – to help each individual find means for self-realization, either as creator or as participant audience. (3) We should have as a possibility in the educational program for those who want it, developing a "leisure occupation" in the music sphere. This means developing the role of audience member for the non-musician, by being not only a listener but also a tastemaker, by not only enjoying but also sharing in determining the destiny of music. (4) All we do should be part of an organic whole, with a beginning and a future direction implied. Continuity in educational purpose is a keynote of an appropriate response to present day objectives. (4:29)

The report continues by stating that while agendas for the above ends cannot be laid out in advance, the following variety of activities may be anticipated: 1. Learning to listen. 2. Learning to perform, read and write music. 3. Getting the opportunity of going to concerts. 4. Learning to analyze and discriminate. 5. Learning to judge and define taste. 6. Enlarging the extent of commitment. 7. Learning to integrate music into life. (4:29)

Federal legislation has provided financial resources in the area of adult education, and the result has been the creation of The Arts and Humanities Foundation. Institutions of higher learning, arts councils, foundations, and industry are contributing to make this a propitious climate for the development of the arts in society.

The three Symposia on Adult and Continuing Music Education sponsored by the University of Wisconsin have made important progress toward unifying in purpose those individuals concerned with adult education and music education. The Third National Symposium which included professional music educators, directors of extension services, directors and leaders of community services, representatives of organizations interested in the performance of music by amateurs and professionals, representatives of the mass media, and representatives of the various national educational organizations expressed a concern for the establishment of goals and directions for music in adult education.

Based on an international conference on adult education, Hely states the goal of adult education below.

Those powers of mind and those qualities of spirit which have given to mankind an abiding heritage of values and judgment must continue everywhere to find, in our changing patterns of day-to-day living, full scope for maturing and flowering in an enriched culture. (2:133)

Adults' needs and motivations vary considerably from those of children involved in the educative process. Although principles of learning, conditions which facilitate learning, and problem-solving techniques are adaptable to all levels of student participation, adults bring to the classroom identifiable characteristics which affect their participation.

Music has an important role to play in the education of adults. The effort to establish meaningful goals and programs with meaningful goals is presently being undertaken by both adult education and music education. What is the music teacher's responsibility toward the education of adults? the same time to seek to educate everyone to the limit of his ability." (1:77)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gardner, John W. Excellence: Can We Be Equal and Excellent Too? New York: Harper and Row, Publishers, 1961.

Hely, A.A.M. New Trends in Adult Education. Paris: United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization, 1962.

Kaplan, Max. Foundations and Frontiers of Music Education. New York: Holt, Rhinehart and Winston, Inc., 1966.

Tanglewood Symposium Report. Basic Issues. "Music in the Emerging American Society." and "Values: Music as Means and Ends." Unpublished, Boston, 1968.

108a

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

DEC 1968

■ Lothar Klein's article on "Brahms, Boulez, and the Beatles" [April 1968, p. 55] demands a comment, if only to lament its disappointing comparison with other essays in this series.

With the publication of summary reports on the Tanglewood Symposium, and the regular appearance of articles exhorting the educator to make a positive commitment to the teaching and performance of twentieth-century music, it remained only a matter of time before the anguished groans of the far-right, rear guard would rise through the din. But what a desperate, unsophisticated, sophomoric attempt! Drawing an analogy between serialist thinking and Marxist thinking is as frightful a bore today as it was when heard over thirty years ago in Nazi Germany. True, Mr. Klein wasn't equating Marxist thought with serial composition, since he had already made it clear that, via Camus' Myth of Sisyphus, serial composition equates with the existential philosophy of the absurd. However, this observation hardly saves his article from the quagmire of half-truths and generalizations that glare contemptibly from the printed page.

For example: "The compositional act for serial composers consists of tabulating series of pitches, durations, correlating their possibilities on a graph. . . ." This generalization is absolutely utter nonsense. Klein groups all "serial composers" together and then applies an incidental fact that tentatively applies to a few compositions by a few "serial composers" to deliberately lead the uninitiated reader to a completely false conclusion. Incidentally, the "inspiration" expressed on graph paper is intrinsically as valid as those "inspirations" of the "pre-serial composers." Furthermore, ends are confused with means. Unconventional notation does not automatically mean bad, "uninspired" music. Of course Mr. Klein knows that; what I object to is the inference that hokus-pokus notation equals hokus-pokus music. Thus, the argument goes, guilty by association.

"One wonders if," comments Mr. Klein, "in the quest for new music, serialists have ever asked themselves whether a composer shackled with the ball and chain of serial method can run faster than the composer employing traditional techniques." It obviously has never occurred to Mr. Klein that any composer worth at least his weight in ragweed grapples with this question every time he begins a new composition. The conclusion by an overwhelming majority of composers today is that one does not only "run faster" but is able to jump higher when "shackled to the ball and chain of serial method" than when shackled to the ball and chain of traditional techniques.

Unquestionably, the most appalling comment in this article is that the "composer . . . must become a prophet of the past." What kind of teacher would be so professionally irresponsible as to advise his student composers to walk into the future backwards with their eyes on the past? Were I to adopt this attitude with my students, I would, fortunately, be laughed right out of the classroom.—ROBERT J. STEWART, Assistant Professor of Theory and Composition, Concord College, Athens, West Virginia 24712.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JUN 17 1969

MUSIC NOTES

Jazz Combo Needs Some 'Bread'

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

The Lively Arts
ON EXHIBIT · ON SCREEN
ON RECORD · ON STAGE

St. Petersburg will be the only Florida city represented by a student jazz combo at the July 7-14 Institute for music educators and guidance counselors at the University of Wisconsin in Madison.

That is, if the Northeast High School Jazz Combo can raise $500 for the trip.

In response to the 1968 Tanglewood Symposium of the Music Educators National Conference (MENC), Northeast High School formed a student jazz group under the direction of choral music director Mrs. Jack Rowe.

"The group formed the middle of April as an accompanying group for my mixed chorus," Mrs. Rowe said. "But they were so good I asked them to play some numbers alone on our May Festival of the Arts concerts."

THEY WERE GOOD. I heard them at the festival and was impressed with their versatility and ease of performance, both as accompanists and a solo group. Members of the group are Paul Rowe, guitar; Don Leighton, piano; Rich Giannico, drums; and Danny Giannico, bass.

Mrs. Rowe is dedicated to the MENC program to bring students and teachers together through their own music — not only the formalized programs of chorus, band and orchestra in the school curriculum. And she encouraged the group to tape one of their sessions. She sent the tape to the institute director, hopeful that the boys might qualify to perform at the July conference.

Not only was the combo accepted, but it is the only Florida group which will perform and is one of only 22 from the entire country.

The conference will be the first national institute to followup the Tanglewood Symposium with actual youth group performances. Involvement of music educators in jazz has been underway for the past year. The Jazz Music Association is now a branch of the MENC. Music educators want to reach students through their own interests as well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause aid.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

NORTH CAROLINA
MUSIC EDUCATOR
RALEIGH, N.C.
5 TI. a YR. 1,700

NOV DEC 1968

Adult and Continuing Music Education

by Paul A. Aliapoulios

The Music Educators National Conference has recently formed a National Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education. Emmett Sarig, the Director of the Extension Music Department at the University of Wisconsin, is serving as chairman of the national committee. The national committee has proposed that each State develop a State Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education.

The national committee is enlisting the aid of each state committee in ferreting out programs of adult and continuing music education within each state. Within the near future you will be asked to respond to a questionnaire designed to identify such programs. A list of these programs will be collated in each State and compiled in a national directory to be used for reference and future planning.

As the newly appointed State Chairman of the Committee on Adult and Continuing Music Education, it is my wish to herein express some thoughts regarding (1) the continuing music education movement in the United States, (2) its relationship to the adult education profession, and (3) the music teacher's responsibility regarding the musical education of the adult community.

THE CONTINUING MUSIC EDUCATION MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the United States there is a growing concern about music in adult society, and the impact and importance of music in the total life of the individual. The Tanglewood Symposium dedicated to "Music in American Society" identified the necessity for relating music in the schools to music in society. Specifically, the symposium emphasized the need to reduce the dualism between "school music" and "society's music" by integrating music education with the main stream of American culture. (4) The Third National Symposium on Adult and Continuing Music Education was dedicated, as the title of the meeting indicated, to "View from the Action Front: What's Wanted and Needed and How to Accomplish the Desired Results." This symposium considered the present use of music in adult education and explored potentialities for more effective programming designed to reach all people.

The Tanglewood Symposium report on Basic Issues (4) states that a program of continuing education in music should have the following aims: (1) To persons of all ages, it should offer an opportunity to move as far in depth or breadth as each man can, through a comprehensive program of music that will equip him to live in the modern world.

(2) Music should be offered to adults both for instrumental purposes – to satisfy psychological, religious, and vocational needs; and for expressive purposes – to help each individual find means for self-realization, either as creator or as participant audience. (3) We should have as a possibility in the educational program for those who want it, developing a "leisure occupation" in the music sphere. This means developing the role of audience member for the non-musician, by being not only a listener but also a tastemaker, by not only enjoying but also sharing in determining the destiny of music. (4) All we do should be part of an organic whole, with a beginning and a future direction implied. Continuity in educational purpose is a keynote of an appropriate response to present day objectives. (4:29)

The report continues by stating that while agendas for the above ends cannot be laid out in advance, the following variety of activities may be anticipated: 1. Learning to listen. 2. Learning to perform, read and write music. 3. Getting the opportunity of going to concerts. 4. Learning to analyze and discriminate. 5. Learning to judge and define taste. 6. Enlarging the extent of commitment. 7. Learning to integrate music into life. (4:29)

Federal legislation has provided financial resources in the area of adult education, and the result has been the creation of The Arts and Humanities Foundation. Institutions of higher learning, arts councils, foundations, and industry are contributing to make this a propitious climate for the development of the arts in society.

The three Symposia on Adult and Continuing Music Education sponsored by the University of Wisconsin have made important progress toward unifying in purpose those individuals concerned with adult education and music education. The Third National Symposium which included professional music educators, directors of extension services, directors and leaders of community services, representatives of organizations interested in the performance of music by amateurs and professionals, representatives of the mass media, and representatives of the various national educational organizations expressed a concern for the establishment of goals and directions for music in adult education.

Based on an international conference on adult [illegible] Hely states the goal of adult education below.

Those powers of mind and those qualities of spirit which have given to mankind an abiding heritage of values and judgment must continue everywhere to find, in our changing patterns of day-to-day living, full scope for maturing and flowering in an enriched culture. (2:133)

Adults' needs and motivations vary considerably from those of children involved in the educative process. Although principles of learning, conditions which facilitate learning, and problem-solving techniques are adaptable to all levels of student participation, adults bring to the classroom identifiable characteristics which affect their participation.

Music has an important role to play in the education of adults. The effort to establish meaningful goals and programs with meaningful goals is presently being undertaken by both adult education and music education. What is the music teacher's responsibility toward the education of adults? the same time to seek to educate everyone to the limit of his ability." (1:77)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gardner, John W. Excellence: Can We Be Equal and Excellent Too? New York: Harper and Row, Publishers, 1961.

Hely, A.A.M. New Trends in Adult Education. Paris: United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization, 1962.

Kaplan, Max. Foundations and Frontiers of Music Education. New York: Holt, Rhinehart and Winston, Inc., 1966.

Tanglewood Symposium Report. Basic Issues. "Music in the Emerging American Society." and "Values: Music as Means and Ends." Unpublished, Boston, 1968.

108a

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY

DEC 1968

■ Lothar Klein's article on "Brahms, Boulez, and the Beatles" [April 1968, p. 55] demands a comment, if only to lament its disappointing comparison with other essays in this series.

With the publication of summary reports on the Tanglewood Symposium, and the regular appearance of articles exhorting the educator to make a positive commitment to the teaching and performance of twentieth-century music, it remained only a matter of time before the anguished groans of the far-right, rear guard would rise through the din. But what a desperate, unsophisticated, sophomoric attempt! Drawing an analogy between serialist thinking and Marxist thinking is as frightful a bore today as it was when heard over thirty years ago in Nazi Germany. True, Mr. Klein wasn't equating Marxist thought with serial composition, since he had already made it clear that, via Camus' Myth of Sisyphus, serial composition equates with the existential philosophy of the absurd. However, this observation hardly saves his article from the quagmire of half-truths and generalizations that glare contemptibly from the printed page.

For example: "The compositional act for serial composers consists of tabulating series of pitches, durations, correlating their possibilities on a graph. . . ." This generalization is absolutely utter nonsense. Klein groups all "serial composers" together and then applies an incidental fact that tentatively applies to a few compositions by a few "serial composers" to deliberately lead the uninitiated reader to a completely false conclusion. Incidentally, the "inspiration" expressed on graph paper is intrinsically as valid as those "inspirations" of the "pre-serial composers." Furthermore, ends are confused with means. Unconventional notation does not automatically mean bad, "uninspired" music. Of course Mr. Klein knows that; what I object to is the inference that hokus-pokus notation equals hokus-pokus music. Thus, the argument goes, guilty by association.

"One wonders if," comments Mr. Klein, "in the quest for new music, serialists have ever asked themselves whether a composer shackled with the ball and chain of serial method can run faster than the composer employing traditional techniques." It obviously has never occurred to Mr. Klein that any composer worth at least his weight in ragweed grapples with this question every time he begins a new composition. The conclusion by an overwhelming majority of composers today is that one does not only "run faster" but is able to jump higher when "shackled to the ball and chain of serial method" than when shackled to the ball and chain of traditional techniques.

Unquestionably, the most appalling comment in this article is that the "composer . . . must become a prophet of the past." What kind of teacher would be so professionally irresponsible as to advise his student composers to walk into the future backwards with their eyes on the past? Were I to adopt this attitude with my students, I would, fortunately, be laughed right out of the classroom.—ROBERT J. STEWART, Assistant Professor of Theory and Composition, Concord College, Athens, West Virginia 24712.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY

JAN 1969

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING. The National Executive Board of MENC met at the National Headquarters Office in Washington, D.C., October 24-26, 1968. The first two days were spent in reviewing plans for the future. Among the problems identified in the Tanglewood Symposium Report, the Board expressed urgent concern for solutions to those dealing with music in the inner city, and in preschool education, and teacher education.

The last day of meetings dealt with current business. One item of importance: The constitution of the Guam Music Educators Association was approved and the Association was made a federated state unit of MENC.

Guests at the meetings included Roger Stevens, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts; Charles Mark, director of planning and program development for the National Endowment for the Arts; and Lyle Ashby, deputy executive secretary of the National Education Association.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JUN 17 1969

MUSIC NOTES

Jazz Combo Needs Some 'Bread'

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

The Lively Arts
ON EXHIBIT ON SCREEN
ON RECORD ON STAGE

St. Petersburg will be the only Florida city represented by a student jazz combo at the July 7-14 Institute for music educators and guidance counselors at the University of Wisconsin in Madison.

That is, if the Northeast High School Jazz Combo can raise $500 for the trip.

In response to the 1968 Tanglewood Symposium of the Music Educators National Conference (MENC), Northeast High School formed a student jazz group under the direction of choral music director Mrs. Jack Rowe.

"The group formed the middle of April as an accompanying group for my mixed chorus," Mrs. Rowe said. "But they were so good I asked them to play some numbers alone on our May Festival of the Arts concerts."

THEY WERE GOOD. I heard them at the festival and was impressed with their versatility and ease of performance, both as accompanists and a solo group. Members of the group are Paul Rowe, guitar; Don Leighton, piano; Rich Giannico, drums; and Danny Giannico, bass.

Mrs. Rowe is dedicated to the MENC program to bring students and teachers together through their own music — not only the formalized programs of chorus, band and orchestra in the school curriculum. And she encouraged the group to tape one of their sessions. She sent the tape to the institute director, hopeful that the boys might qualify to perform at the July conference.

Not only was the combo accepted, but it is the only Florida group which will perform and is one of only 22 from the entire country.

The conference will be the first national institute to followup the Tanglewood Symposium with actual youth group performances. Involvement of music educators in jazz has been underway for the past year. The Jazz Music Association is now a branch of the MENC. Music educators want to reach students through their own interests as well as the usual forms of music training. "MENC members agreed at Tanglewood last summer they could learn something from their students as well as teach them something," Pinellas County music supervisor Wallace Gause aid.

The boys are rehearsing for their segment of the conference and are trying to raise the necessary $500 for their trip. However, civic clubs have completed their projects for the year and the musicians union expressed no interest in the project.

According to Gause, "the Pinellas County Music Educators Association (PCMEA) has some funds from its spring festival which could assist the boys since they will be representing the county. But PCMEA president Bill Findeison is at school in Tallahassee and the other officers would have to be contacted to act on the idea."

Mrs. Rowe also is exhausting ideas for money for the boys. "We have some excellent talent here and I do want to see them have the opportunity of playing for the top music educators and jazz specialists in the country."

Such notables as MENC president Wiley Housewright (Dean of the School of Music at Florida State University), bassist Gary Karr and jazz man Joe Morello will be at the conference. The institute, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, MENC and music extension department of the University of Wisconsin, will continue until Aug. 1 for the music educators and guidance counselors who are attending on a federal grant.

Midsummer Musicale

The Florida Suncoast Opera Guild will sponsor a Midsummer Musicale July 18 and 19 at 8 p.m. at the St. Petersburg Little Theatre. Joseph Kreines, opera association musical director, will coordinate the program. Tickets are $2 and will be available at the door.

Auditions will be held for the musicale and for the opera association's productions of "Die Fledermaus" (October) and "La Traviata" (February) for principal roles and chorus on June 22 and 29. Sunday, June 22 auditions will be held in Tampa at Manhattan Avenue Methodist Church, 4511 S Manhattan Avenue. For appointments call Tampa 855-1449 or 839-3361.

On Sunday, June 29 St. Petersburg auditions will be held at the Community Covenant Church, 4501 30th Ave. N. For appointments call 867-9728.

1086

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000
JAN 1969

Performance II

Is "performance for all" the right goal? Or does it make more sense to liberate students from . . .

the musical assembly line

by leon c. karel

■ The recent emphasis upon the Tanglewood Symposium has vividly called to our attention many phases of music education we have been neglecting. Talk of "creativity," "perceptual training," and "aesthetic sensibility" now fills the air. Both outsiders and insiders tell us that we have strayed far from the true goals of our profession, and we wonder how we could have done this. Have we not had the good of our students at heart all these years, when we toiled so mightily to build our music programs in every village and town in these United States? Have not the colleges diligently built up their music education curricula and facilities to often-times magnificent heights? Are not the publishers and manufacturers doing all they can to help us by pouring out an amazing variety and quality of music, instruments, and accessories? How, then, can the experts of the Tanglewood Symposium possibly be right in their criticisms? Apparently, they can see our musical forest much better, or at least from a different vantage point, than we who are in it amongst the trees from one day to the next.

The author is Director, Allied Arts Certification, Northeast State College, Kirksville, Missouri.

In recent years, several theories have been advanced that allow music educators to take a new view of their situation. One theory—Marshall McLuhan's—begins with the idea that the mediums that carry our information (writing, radio, television) are themselves worthy of investigation because they shape the information we convey through them. Sooner or later, we begin to think like the medium by which we transmit and acquire information. Thus, says McLuhan, we formerly thought in a linear, piece-by-piece way when reading was our primary learning source. Today's television-raised child has been shaped differently, however, by an audiovisual sort of training and needs to be taught with both those senses, not just one.

A second, corollary theory deals with machines. Machines, it says, are extensions of man. They enable him to travel faster (car), throw farther (gun), lift more (derrick), or write with greater speed and precision (typewriter). But once a machine is invented and becomes widely used, man in a sense becomes its slave and can no longer do without it. We would surely starve to death if automotive transport were suddenly to cease, yet seventy-five years ago we got along nicely without it. As airplanes swiftly take over surface transportation, we are coming to find them indispensable too. And just now we are watching ourselves being reshaped by the computer. Already it has made us change our phone numbers, check-writing habits, and school scheduling and registration. Soon we will become completely dependent upon it. And so it goes throughout history, one order of machine succeeding another, driving it out of existence, each in turn allowing man to organize his activities in more and more complex ways. Although we might find application for these theories in many aspects of the profession, I propose to confine this discussion to the area of instrumental music. Let me begin by stating three propositions: First, musical instruments are machines, mechanical devices for extending man's music-making capabilities; second, the instrumental mediums used in the schools have mu ins pla co of ex str cre is fu an pe fo pr an bl

w ba of w su

classes but the instructors. Science teachers and students are never required to entertain, even though they could doubtless present some fascinating experiments before an audience. Likewise, a class studying music without instruments—a class in theory or literature, let us say—is not asked to perform. This should illustrate the immense power of the instrumental medium to shape what and how we teach.

Our decision to teach music for his skills, unless he can use them in playing for dances (a sub-skill not generally given him in school). Few town bands or orchestras are there to absorb him. One avenue open to him is to join the system again at the college level. Strangely enough, most high school instrumentalists who go to college refuse to do this. They, themselves, don't value their playing skills but turn to the business of "getting an education." If we follow the occasional

Write today for Ward's Catalog and Colorama Fabric Selector.

Caps and Gowns for High Schools and Colleges on a rental or purchase basis.

Get complete information on Ward's Band Uniforms now.

THE C. E. WARD CO.
Incorporated 1905
NEW LONDON, OH 44851

used, is always a piece-by-piece affair, requiring a long time before the student can study whole works of art.

The electronic medium of recorded music and its television counterpart, on the other hand, make large amounts of music instantly available at a high level of perfection. Can we afford to wait any longer for a child to master a mechanical means of music-making when an electronic means can have him listening to and studying the best immediately? Music theory, analysis, literature, and composition could all be taught in the time it takes the student to learn the technique of his instrument. Is it better for a student to spend six years training to take his place in the musical assembly line or to spend the same amount of time learning how to listen and understand?

A NEW CURRICULUM

Today's music educator is faced with a dilemma. He has been told by his college professors and is constantly reminded by professional literature that he must teach music to all children, that his teaching must include a full spectrum of musical learnings. At the same time, he has inherited a large and complex mechanical system of music teaching with its own demands and pressures, most of which are directly antithetical to the advice he has been given. The traditional music program has achieved tremendous results in producing large numbers of skilled instrumentalists and good ensembles. But surely this cannot remain the primary aim of music education.

Some schools and instructors are turning to the idea of related arts courses, in which music may be studied as one of the arts. Such courses are found now in many high schools and are making their way both upward into colleges and downward into the junior high and elementary schools. Because the whole movement is so new, courses have taken widely differing patterns, and as yet no single plan has emerged as typical. All, however, share one feature—music is now no longer taught by performance. Instead, listening, analysis, and creativity become primary aims. What performance there is in such a course, and this applies to the other arts also, is strictly for class purposes, as a means of learning. Thus, the new approach in many ways repeats the ideals of our first music educators, and the mechanical "system" has no chance to enforce its own demands.

The new job for aesthetic education is the "training of perception." Actually, it is not the senses that are to be trained but the mind. Up to now, we have rarely thought of music education as training the mind to interpret what enters the ears. But when we begin to think in this way, a whole new teaching world opens up to us. We are now in the business of teaching students to think, to use their minds, to explore their emotions (for these, too, are products of the mind, although they seem to arise in a separate part of it). Music teachers will find this infinitely more interesting than teaching the child how to finger a certain note or fix his muscles for a correct embouchure. If we really want our student to know what he s hearing, we will have to show im how to analyze, compose, and udge music.

Our present system does not llow such speculations—there is lways a concert, show, or contest ust ahead that requires more mehanical application. But in the reated arts course, the teacher may, nd should, spend time on getting tudents to work at these cognitive evels. The related arts course takes neither a "boxcar" approach, in which a few weeks each of art, music, and literature are presented sequentially, nor a historical approach, which studies all of the arts of one particular era. Conceived as perceptual training, it seeks to do two things primarily.

First, it attempts to open up the student to the wide world of the arts by ranging from ordinary examples of aesthetic principles in daily use (cars, fashion, houses, television, advertising) to the great masterworks in the several arts areas. The primary tenet of good teaching is to get the student interested. An obvious but surprisingly little-used device is to study the student's own world. If our youngsters are not sensitized to the aesthetic aspects of their own music, as well as their towns, homes, television, and films, it seems of little value to have them study the paintings of da Vinci or the symphonies of Beethoven.

Second, the course should prepare the student to deal with the many aesthetic problems in this world. America's once beautiful land is now being swiftly laid waste by sprawling, tasteless suburban growth, hidden by roadside advertising, polluted by air and water wastes, and covered uniformly by discarded beer cans. Our cities have been made unbearable; the potential of the airwaves has been bartered away.

The schools could have had a great deal to say about all of this had we assumed our responsibility in educating the people aesthetically. But the teachers of literature were interested in the masterworks of former ages and so could not be bothered by radio and television here and now. The art teachers were teaching techniques of putting paint on canvas; no time was left to teach students how to look at their world. The music teachers were always getting ready for the next performance and could not devote precious rehearsal time to the formation of values or the building of standards of musical taste. And so generations of Americans graduated from our schools not knowing how to see and hear "what's happening," and what is more important, how to pin down such problems and go to work on them!

Once the student (and here we mean every student, since related arts training is not just for the talented or the bright) has begun to take an interest in his daily surroundings and knows how to analyze to some extent what he sees and hears, we may then think about giving him a historical perspective, or one based on "great ideas" or philosophic themes. These ways of approaching the arts have undisputed value, but they must be preceded by a down-to-earth "allied arts" approach that will get the student forever entangled in the arts at the everyday level, on which he will meet them all the rest of his life.

CONCLUSION

The question uppermost in the minds of music educators is this: What will happen to the traditional music program if this new approach becomes widespread? The answer, as far as we have been able to observe, is that in schools where allied arts courses are begun, four things happen. First, the new course enrolls students that the present art, music, and drama programs have not reached; second, the enrolment in the new course increases year by year; third, the traditional arts activities and courses find themselves getting increased interest from students who have been awakened by the allied arts introduction; and fourth, the traditional art and music student becomes attracted to allied arts as a means of finding out more about his own art. In a survey[2] of the thirty-six secondary school teachers working in related arts courses in Missouri taken in 1965-1966 by Michael David Miles, it was found that eighty-two percent of those courses were open to all students. Seventy-seven percent said that their course was organized along "art principles" lines, while thirty-six percent used the "historical periods" approach. (Some, obviously, combined these approaches.) Miles found that forty-three percent of the high school seniors enrolled in the courses would be "more inclined to take future classes in the fine arts." At the same time, administrators were asked whether they felt this course would "supplant any other of the arts courses in existence." Fifty-eight percent replied in the affirmative, but almost all mentioned music appreciation as the music course most likely to be supplanted. No administrator said that the allied arts course would take the place of music performance.

We have an indication then, at least in one state, of the future possibilities. The new general arts approach can take over the badly needed aesthetic education of all students, thus freeing the music director to do what he was trained and hired for: developing the technical skills of the musically talented. Meanwhile, the allied arts courses can be developing a widespread interest in music and the other arts, so that when the talented one-fifth do perform, there will be an audience interested in listening.

Colleges will have to revise their curricula to produce teachers who can handle the new courses. Music departments might take a cue from other subject areas here. Physical education departments graduate both generalists (P.E. teachers) and specialists (coaches). English departments train the generalist English teacher but also produce drama and speech people, the "technicians" of that area. Why not music? The next few years may see the answer to that question emerging, as the demands of an electronic age make themselves felt in what has been up to now a mechanistic music program.

[2]Michael David Miles, "The 'Allied Arts' Course in Missouri Public Secondary Schools" (Unpublished M.A. thesis, Northeast Missouri State College, Kirksville, 1966).

1086 seriously limited the scope and content of what can be taught; and third, the mechanical approach to music teaching has been superseded by the electronic.

THOSE MUSICAL MACHINES

Instruments do indeed extend man's possibilities for music-making. They enable him to produce tones beyond either end of his vocal range, give him more dynamic power, vastly vary his selection of timbres, enable him to articulate pitches with greater precision, and allow him to produce simultaneously sounding tones. In addition, instruments provide greater constancy, not being subject to colds and sore throats. They do not suffer from either extreme youth or age, and may be repaired or even traded-in on newer ones. Regarded en masse, they seem only beneficial. But this aspect changes when we look for the effects the instruments have on individuals who may use them.

The instrument shapes the music written for it. Each instrument, like the assembly-line machine, takes a part in the production of the total musical product. Bass players rarely experience melody lines in an ensemble, and drummers get little else besides metrical and rhythmic work. A composer writing for an instrumental ensemble learns what kinds of music suit the various instruments, which is another way of saying that the machine governs what is written for it.

The instrument shapes the performer who plays it. Sometimes the "machine" even exercises a choice over who is allowed to operate it. An experienced director will not allow a child with stubby fingers to start on the bassoon, or a buck-toothed boy to learn horn. Once machine and operator are matched, the former requires more and more time and painstaking practice from the latter. Mastery is only attained by the player who dedicates himself to serving his machine. This, of course, is not an unworthy goal providing (a) that the expended time and effort is rewarded by an attainment of lifelong value to the student, not something he will drop on graduation; (b) that the requirements of the instrument have not excluded the player from other, more important learnings in music, such as the study of literature, vocal music, theory, and composition; and (c) that the player is given a thorough, comprehensive view of music as a part of the aesthetic area, so that his specialist instrumental training may be properly balanced by a generalist viewpoint. At present, many school musicians know only the technical aspects of their discipline and nothing of any other art, save the required English literature.

The instrument shapes the teaching program in which it is used. The decision to use instruments as a primary music-teaching medium dates from over a half-century ago. From that day to this, the medium has governed many aspects of the program, at times with beneficial results, and unfortunately often with poor ones. These points may be noted:

(a) The instrumental medium requires a training period for the student. During this time he is required by the nature of that medium to engage in highly repetitive mechanical exercises while simultaneously learning an archaic and extremely illogical system of pitch and durational notation. All of this combines to discourage many who might otherwise profit by a study of music.

(b) The instrumental medium effectively requires students to specialize. The instructor must regard his students as trumpeters, violinists, or clarinetists and must strive to bring each student to the highest pitch of perfection as such. This specialization prohibits students from learning the general principles on which music is based. Few students in such a program can analyze the form of what they are playing, or its thematic and harmonic content, its place in the literature, and so forth. The pervasive demands for specialization are felt by the teachers themselves, who have become, first of all, music teachers (rather than generalists in the arts); second, instrumental teachers (rather than vocal, theory, musicology, or literature); third, brass teachers (rather than string or wind); and finally, tuba (instead of baritone or trombone). We have yet to hear of a tuba teacher as opposed to a Sousaphone instructor, but it is theoretically possible in a mechanistic system. The only reason this has not become common in public school music education is that it cannot be justified economically in most situations. But given increased funds for personnel, we would see (as we do now in some large school systems) this very degree of specialization. Indeed, this was proved by a recent revelation that there were positions open for "junior high school, low brass" teachers. The most shocking thought is, however, that somewhere innocent youngsters are now being specialized to this extreme degree! Yet it is inevitable, given the system.

The instrument shapes the expectations of the audience it creates. Without a doubt, instrumental ensembles are highly attractive visually to audiences, but the music played is rarely adventurous. Instead, it features clearly defined the allied arts courses will be developing a widespread interest in music so that when the talented one-fifth do perform, there will be an audience interested in listening.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 83

the musical assembly line

by leon c. karel

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 38

melodies, comfortable harmonies, regular metrical features, and not-too-intricate formal structures. The march continues to be the real favorite with audiences, although the programmatic piece is probably a close second. Audiences have come to expect visual spectacle from the musical group. When the director instructs soloists to stand while playing or has his trombone section come down front for the last strain of the march, he is catering to that expectation.

The mechanical, specialistic, instrumental medium has, finally, created the idea that its function is to entertain. Deprived of this function, virtually all school bands and orchestras would soon disappear. Students who could not perform in public would lose their primary aim for studying music, and administrations whose ensembles never appeared anywhere would soon find reasons for disbanding them. Contrast the study of music (through instruments) with the study of almost any other subject. No one observes math classes but the instructors. Science teachers and students are never required to entertain, even though they could doubtless present some fascinating experiments before an audience. Likewise, a class studying music without instruments—a class in theory or literature, let us say—is not asked to perform. This should illustrate the immense power of the instrumental medium to shape what and how we teach.

Our decision to teach music through instrumental performance has brought in its wake a kind of fragmented, technical training in which students and teachers alike serve the needs of the system. We assign youngsters to musical instruments so the needs of the ensemble will be met, not so the students' needs are fulfilled. The willing student (and his teacher) lend their support to the system's requirements and often produce music of high quality, performed very well, under conditions of almost impossible difficulty and complexity. What great symphony orchestra conductor could start with a motley group of sixth graders and end up five or six years later with the type of high school ensemble that characterizes the school music education program at its best? Yes, the system works very well; the primary question is: Do we really need and want its product?

By and large, there is really nothing for the operator of the musical machine to do with his skill after he graduates from high school. There is little community demand for his skills, unless he can use them in playing for dances (a sub-skill not generally given him in school). Few town bands or orchestras are there to absorb him. One avenue open to him is to join the system again at the college level. Strangely enough, most high school instrumentalists who go to college refuse to do this. They, themselves, don't value their playing skills but turn to the business of "getting an education." If we follow the occasional

by Charles S. Peters and Paul Yoder
MASTER THEORY
SIX WORKBOOKS
30 Lessons and Student Assignments in Each Workbook for Instrumental and General Music Classes. $1.00 each book

BOOK 1 Beginning Theory Lessons 1-30
BOOK 2 Intermediate Theory Lessons 31-60
BOOK 3 Advanced Theory Lessons 61-90
BOOK 4 Elementary Harmony Lessons 1-30
BOOK 5 Intermediate Harmony Lessons 31-60
BOOK 6 Advanced Harmony Lessons 61-90

WRITE FOR FREE THEMATICS

Kjos
NEIL A. KJOS MUSIC CO.
Publisher
525 Busse
Park Ridge, Ill. 60068

Ward's CHORAL ROBES

Write today for Ward's Catalog and Colorama Fabric Selector.

Caps and Gowns for High Schools and Colleges on a rental or purchase basis.

Get complete information on Ward's Band Uniforms now.

THE C. E. WARD CO.
Incorporated 1905
NEW LONDON, OH 44851

used, is always a piece-by-piec affair, requiring a long time befor the student can study whole work of art.

The electronic medium of re corded music and its televisio counterpart, on the other hand make large amounts of music in stantly available at a high level o perfection. Can we afford to wai any longer for a child to master a mechanical means of music-making when an electronic means can have him listening to and studying the best immediately? Music theory analysis, literature, and composition could all be taught in the time i takes the student to learn the tech nique of his instrument. Is it better for a student to spend six years training to take his place in the musical assembly line or to spend the same amount of time learning how to listen and understand?

A NEW CURRICULUM

Today's music educator is faced with a dilemma. He has been told by his college professors and is constantly reminded by professiona literature that he must teach musi is hearing, we will have to show him how to analyze, compose, and judge music.

Our present system does not allow such speculations—there is always a concert, show, or contest just ahead that requires more mechanical application. But in the related arts course, the teacher may, and should, spend time on getting students to work at these cognitive levels. The related arts course takes neither a "boxcar" approach, in which a few weeks each of art, music, and literature are presented sequentially, nor a historical approach, which studies all of the arts of one particular era. Conceived as perceptual training, it seeks to do two things primarily.

First, it attempts to open up the student to the wide world of the arts by ranging from ordinary examples of aesthetic principles in daily use (cars, fashion, houses, television, advertising) to the great masterworks in the several arts areas. The primary tenet of good teaching is to get the student interested. An obvious but surprisingly little-used device is to study the arts at the everyday level, on wh he will meet them all the rest of life.

CONCLUSION

The question uppermost in minds of music educators is t What will happen to the traditio music program if this new appro becomes widespread? The ansv as far as we have been able observe, is that in schools wh allied arts courses are begun, things happen. First, the course enrolls students that present art, music, and drama grams have not reached; seco the enrolment in the new co increases year by year; third, traditional arts activities courses find themselves getting creased interest from students have been awakened by the al arts introduction; and fourth, traditional art and music stud becomes attracted to allied art a means of finding out more ab his own art. In a survey[2] of [2]Michael David Miles, "The 'Allied Course in Missouri Public Secon Schools" (Unpublished M.A. thesis, No east Missouri State College, Kirks 1966).

1086

s a training period for the
. During this time he is re-by the nature of that me
o engage in highly repetitiv nical exercises while simul sly learning an archaic an ly illogical system of pitc rational notation. All of th es to discourage many wh otherwise profit by a stud sic.

The instrumental mediu
ely requires students to spe
The instructor must regar
dents as trumpeters, violi clarinetists and must striv
g each student to the highe f perfection as such. Th ization prohibits studen arning the general princi-which music is based. Few ts in such a program can the form of what they are g, or its thematic and harcontent, its place in the lit-
, and so forth. The pervamands for specialization are the teachers themselves, ve become, first of all, music rs (rather than generalists arts); second, instrumental es (rather than vocal, theory, logy, or literature); third, eachers (rather than string ); and finally, tuba (instead one or trombone). We have r of a tuba teacher as a Sousaphone instruct it is theoretically possible chanistic system. The only this has not become com-public school music educathat it cannot be justified ally in most situations.
n increased funds for per-we would see (as we do some large school systems) degree of specialization.
this was proved by a reelation that there were open for "junior high low brass" teachers. The king thought is, however, newhere innocent young-now being specialized to me degree! Yet it is in-iven the system.
*nstrument shapes the ex-
ons of the audience it cre-*
Without a doubt, instrumental bles are highly attractive vis-audiences, but the music is rarely adventurous. Init features clearly defined

CONTINUED ON PAGE 83

the musical assembly line

by leon c. karel

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 38

melodies, comfortable harmonies, regular metrical features, and not-too-intricate formal structures. The march continues to be the real favorite with audiences, although the programmatic piece is probably a close second. Audiences have come to expect visual spectacle from the musical group. When the director instructs soloists to stand while playing or has his trombone section come down front for the last strain of the march, he is catering to that expectation.

The mechanical, specialistic, instrumental medium has, finally, created the idea that its function is to entertain. Deprived of this function, virtually all school bands and orchestras would soon disappear. Students who could not perform in public would lose their primary aim for studying music, and administrations whose ensembles never appeared anywhere would soon find reasons for disbanding them. Contrast the study of music (through instruments) with the study of almost any other subject. No one observes math classes but the instructors. Science teachers and students are never required to entertain, even though they could doubtless present some fascinating experiments before an audience. Likewise, a class studying music without instruments—a class in theory or literature, let us say—is not asked to perform. This should illustrate the immense power of the instrumental medium to shape what and how we teach.

Our decision to teach music through instrumental performance has brought in its wake a kind of fragmented, technical training in which students and teachers alike serve the needs of the system. We assign youngsters to musical instruments so the needs of the ensemble will be met, not so the students' needs are fulfilled. The willing student (and his teacher) lend their support to the system's requirements and often produce music of high quality, performed very well, under conditions of almost impossible difficulty and complexity. What great symphony orchestra conductor could start with a motley group of sixth graders and end up five or six years later with the type of high school ensemble that characterizes the school music education program at its best? Yes, the system works very well; the primary question is: Do we really need and want its product?

By and large, there is really nothing for the operator of the musical machine to do with his skill after he graduates from high school. There is little community demand for his skills, unless he can use them in playing for dances (a sub-skill not generally given him in school). Few town bands or orchestras are there to absorb him. One avenue open to him is to join the system again at the college level. Strangely enough, most high school instrumentalists who go to college refuse to do this. They, themselves, don't value their playing skills but turn to the business of "getting an education." If we follow the occasional used, is always a piece-by-piece affair, requiring a long time before the student can study whole works of art.

The electronic medium of recorded music and its television counterpart, on the other hand, make large amounts of music instantly available at a high level of perfection. Can we afford to wait any longer for a child to master a mechanical means of music-making when an electronic means can have him listening to and studying the best immediately? Music theory, analysis, literature, and composition could all be taught in the time it takes the student to learn the technique of his instrument. Is it better for a student to spend six years training to take his place in the musical assembly line or to spend the same amount of time learning how to listen and understand?

A NEW CURRICULUM

Today's music educator is faced with a dilemma. He has been told by his college professors and is constantly reminded by professional literature that he must teach music to all children, that his teaching must include a full spectrum of musical learnings. At the same time, he has inherited a large and complex mechanical system of music teaching with its own demands and pressures, most of which are directly antithetical to the advice he has been given. The traditional music program has achieved tremendous results in producing large numbers of skilled instrumentalists and good ensembles. But surely this cannot remain the primary aim of music education.

Some schools and instructors are turning to the idea of related arts courses, in which music may be studied as one of the arts. Such courses are found now in many high schools and are making their way both upward into colleges and downward into the junior high and elementary schools. Because the whole movement is so new, courses have taken widely differing patterns, and as yet no single plan has emerged as typical. All, however, share one feature—music is now no longer taught by performance. Instead, listening, analysis, and creativity become primary aims. What performance there is in such a course, and this applies to the other arts also, is strictly for class purposes, as a means of learning. Thus, the new approach in many ways repeats the ideals of our first music educators, and the mechanical "system" has no chance to enforce its own demands.

The new job for aesthetic education is the "training of perception." Actually, it is not the senses that are to be trained but the mind. Up to now, we have rarely thought of music education as training the mind to interpret what enters the ears. But when we begin to think in this way, a whole new teaching world opens up to us. We are now in the business of teaching students to think, to use their minds, to explore their emotions (for these, too, are products of the mind, although they seem to arise in a separate part of it). Music teachers will find this infinitely more interesting than teaching the child how to finger a certain note or fix his muscles for a correct embouchure. If we really want our student to know what he is hearing, we will have to show him how to analyze, compose, and judge music.

Our present system does not allow such speculations—there is always a concert, show, or contest just ahead that requires more mechanical application. But in the related arts course, the teacher may, and should, spend time on getting students to work at these cognitive levels. The related arts course takes neither a "boxcar" approach, in which a few weeks each of art, music, and literature are presented sequentially, nor a historical approach, which studies all of the arts of one particular era. Conceived as perceptual training, it seeks to do two things primarily.

First, it attempts to open up the student to the wide world of the arts by ranging from ordinary examples of aesthetic principles in daily use (cars, fashion, houses, television, advertising) to the great masterworks in the several arts areas. The primary tenet of good teaching is to get the student interested. An obvious but surprisingly little-used device is to study the student's own world. If our youngsters are not sensitized to the aesthetic aspects of their own music, as well as their towns, homes, television, and films, it seems of little value to have them study the paintings of da Vinci or the symphonies of Beethoven.

Second, the course should prepare the student to deal with the many aesthetic problems in this world. America's once beautiful land is now being swiftly laid waste by sprawling, tasteless suburban growth, hidden by roadside advertising, polluted by air and water wastes, and covered uniformly by discarded beer cans. Our cities have been made unbearable; the potential of the airwaves has been bartered away.

The schools could have had a great deal to say about all of this had we assumed our responsibility in educating the people aesthetically. But the teachers of literature were interested in the masterworks of former ages and so could not be bothered by radio and television here and now. The art teachers were teaching techniques of putting paint on canvas; no time was left to teach students how to look at their world. The music teachers were always getting ready for the next performance and could not devote precious rehearsal time to the formation of values or the building of standards of musical taste. And so generations of Americans graduated from our schools not knowing how to see and hear "what's happening," and what is more important, how to pin down such problems and go to work on them!

Once the student (and here we mean every student, since related arts training is not just for the talented or the bright) has begun to take an interest in his daily surroundings and knows how to analyze to some extent what he sees and hears, we may then think about giving him a historical perspective, or one based on "great ideas" or philosophic themes. These ways of approaching the arts have undisputed value, but they must be preceded by a down-to-earth "allied arts" approach that will get the student forever entangled in the arts at the everyday level, on which he will meet them all the rest of his life.

CONCLUSION

The question uppermost in the minds of music educators is this: What will happen to the traditional music program if this new approach becomes widespread? The answer, as far as we have been able to observe, is that in schools where allied arts courses are begun, four things happen. First, the new course enrolls students that the present art, music, and drama programs have not reached; second, the enrolment in the new course increases year by year; third, the traditional arts activities and courses find themselves getting increased interest from students who have been awakened by the allied arts introduction; and fourth, the traditional art and music student becomes attracted to allied arts as a means of finding out more about his own art. In a survey[2] of the thirty-six secondary school teachers working in related arts courses in Missouri taken in 1965-1966 by Michael David Miles, it was found that eighty-two percent of those courses were open to all students. Seventy-seven percent said that their course was organized along "art principles" lines, while thirty-six percent used the "historical periods" approach. (Some, obviously, combined these approaches.) Miles found that forty-three percent of the high school seniors enrolled in the courses would be "more inclined to take future classes in the fine arts." At the same time, administrators were asked whether they felt this course would "supplant any other of the arts courses in existence." Fifty-eight percent replied in the affirmative, but almost all mentioned music appreciation as the music course most likely to be supplanted. No administrator said that the allied arts course would take the place of music performance.

We have an indication then, at least in one state, of the future possibilities. The new general arts approach can take over the badly needed aesthetic education of all students, thus freeing the music director to do what he was trained and hired for: developing the technical skills of the musically talented. Meanwhile, the allied arts courses can be developing a widespread interest in music and the other arts, so that when the talented one-fifth do perform, there will be an audience interested in listening.

Colleges will have to revise their curricula to produce teachers who can handle the new courses. Music departments might take a cue from other subject areas here. Physical education departments graduate both generalists (P.E. teachers) and specialists (coaches). English departments train the generalist English teacher but also produce drama and speech people, the "technicians" of that area. Why not music? The next few years may see the answer to that question emerging, as the demands of an electronic age make themselves felt in what has been up to now a mechanistic music program.

[2]Michael David Miles, "The 'Allied Arts' Course in Missouri Public Secondary Schools" (Unpublished M.A. thesis, Northeast Missouri State College, Kirksville, 1966).

by Charles S. Peters and Paul Yoder

MASTER THEORY

SIX WORKBOOKS

30 Lessons and Student Assignments in Each Workbook for Instrumental and General Music Classes. $1.00 each book

BOOK 1 Beginning Theory Lessons 1-30

BOOK 2 Intermediate Theory Lessons 31-60

BOOK 3 Advanced Theory Lessons 61-90

BOOK 4 Elementary Harmony Lessons 1-30

BOOK 5 Intermediate Harmony Lessons 31-60

BOOK 6 Advanced Harmony Lessons 61-90

WRITE FOR FREE THEMATICS

Kjos

NEIL A. KJOS MUSIC CO.
Publisher
525 Busse
Park Ridge, Ill. 60068

Ward's CHORAL ROBES

Write today for Ward's Catalog and Colorama Fabric Selector.

Caps and Gowns for High Schools and Colleges on a rental or purchase basis.

Get complete information on Ward's Band Uniforms now.

THE C. E. WARD CO.
Incorporated 1905
NEW LONDON, OH 44851

108c

"We believe that education must have as major goals the art of living, the building of personal identity, and the nurturing of creativity. Since the study of music can contribute much to these ends, we now call for music to be placed in the core of the school curriculum."

■ This 1967 statement from the Tanglewood Declaration, backed by the thinking of contemporary psychologists and philosophers, reaffirms statements made by educators over the past forty years. In 1927, NEA's Department of Superintendents affirmed that music is "fundamental in the education of American children." In 1959, the American Association of School Administrators resolved that music belongs "side by side with other can devise a comprehensive examination in music for all high school graduates in line with the specific goals of its own curriculum. Other checks on the general strength of the program can be made by observation. Music in the Schools sug-

Mr. Broido, Director of Publications and Sales, Frank Music Corporation, New York City, is Immediate Past President of the Music Industry Council. Mr. Gary is Executive Secretary, Music Educators National Conference, Washington, D.C.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON D. C.
MONTHLY 51,000

MAR 1969

Wisconsin's Youth Music Project

Spotting Flowers in the Rock Garden

■ If there is a common bond that connects the youth of America, it is music. Technology has produced a mass-media system that ensures the communication of the "now music" to all youth from the inner-city to suburbia. Outside of school, it is this music that youth responds to and identifies with.

But music educators are usually not aware of the musical activities of youth outside of school. They either do not recognize the new music as a valid expression, or they ignore its existence entirely. Attention is focused on the talented, involved music student to the exclusion of the eighty percent of the students who are not in a regular music program.

In the "Music in American Society" report of the Tanglewood Symposium, Louis Wersen, then President of MENC, said, "In an era of protest, irritation, and rapid change, when students tell us that the music we teach and the methods we use are irrelevant and ineffectual, music educators cannot simply sit back with eyes closed and ears tuned backward." The Tanglewood Symposium challenged music educators to bridge the gap between the traditional music appreciation or performance class and the music of youth.

The Youth Music Project, jointly sponsored by the Extension Music Department of the University of Wisconsin, the Music Educators National Conference, and the U.S. Office of Education, is a response to this challenge. Emmett R. Sarig, chairman of Wisconsin's Extension Music Department and project director, has described the project as the first of its kind designed to teach music educators about the "now music" by bringing them into direct contact with youth music groups. The four-week institute, to be held July 7 to August 1, 1969, on the Madison campus of the University of Wisconsin, will introduce music educators not only to the new music but also to those who compose it, perform it, appreciate it, and enjoy it.

Forty school systems from the major population centers across the nation will be invited to send a youth music group selected from their school system to the institute for one week. Each group will be accompanied by a guidance counselor who will also participate in the program. To give depth to the project, a high school group from England will also be invited to attend, since many rock styles have been developed by English groups. The in-service training will really begin as music educators in each school system search for a rock group to attend the institute. In many areas, this will be the first time that educators and youth will be communicating through the medium of the music of youth. A music educator from each of the participating school systems will attend the workshop for the entire four-week period. Interested music educators from around the country will also be invited to attend.

A pretest will be given to participating music educators and guidance counselors to determine their perception of the music of youth—what it is and how it relates to education. The results of the test will influence the focus of the class sessions by indicating the needs and desires of the educators.

The program will consist of lectures, seminars, workshops, and classes. The music educators will observe and learn from the youth groups. The institute will guide educators in the development of new curriculum objectives, new courses, and new techniques of teaching. The youth groups will be offered guidance in composing and performing their music.

The end of the four-week project will mark the beginning of a new relationship between educators and youth, which will be reflected in new programs focusing on the music of youth. The impact that the Youth Music Project can have on increasing understanding and communication between the generations is enormous. Besides the immediate benefit to those involved in the institute, the project will have implications for teacher-training programs and for similar projects in the future.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON D. C.
MONTHLY 51,000

MAR 1969

are easy to teach? Is there not a responsibility to discover how to make music real to all children?

Even with a theoretically adequate curriculum on paper, however, not much will happen without further commitments on the part of the school board, administrators, and music educators. There must be adequate staffing and imaginative scheduling to make success at least appear attainable. It is possible that some experimentation may be necessary to ascertain just what is needed. It is apparent, however, that thirty minutes once a week in the elementary school, or half a semester of general music in the seventh grade taught by a music teacher trained for another assignment, will not get the job done. Music educators may need help in realizing that there is integrity in music that has not so far been allowed inside their schoolroom. Each school system will have to design its own method of reaching its objectives. Some idea of possible alternatives may be found in the chapter on "Organizing Music Experiences" in Music in General Education.

There are several ways of evaluating the success of a music program with broad objectives in general education. Standardized tests of musical achievement and performance are available but are limited in their usefulness in measuring the broad objectives under discussion here. A school system can devise a comprehensive examination in music for all high school graduates in line with the specific goals of its own curriculum. Obgests to parents that an "effective music program is not difficult to identify: Children can read music and sing part songs by the time they enter seventh grade. High school seniors are as familiar with the works of Mozart, Wagner, and Schoenberg as they are with those of Shakespeare, Dickens, and Hemingway. School orchestras are on a par with school bands. There are places for music listening as well as for rehearsal and performance. The high school offers courses in music theory and history and makes arrangements for credit and released time for private instruction." While this description of some of the characteristics of a strong program is not inaccurate, it falls short of what is now seen as necessary to ensure the total involvement of the students implied by "music in the core of the curriculum."

Another means of evaluating results, assuming that "turning on" the students is a primary goal, is a study of student behavior in and out of school. Is the music young people study at school reflected in the records they buy, the concerts they attend, the music they play and sing on their own time? How many young people continue their involvement with music after they leave school? In college? In church and community groups? What effect has the school curriculum in music had on the cultural life of the community? Have the offerings of local radio stations been affected? Is the music performed in the churches of a better quality? Does a community symphony or opera company exist and find support? Do families make music together? How many members of the school board consider themselves musicians, either amateur or professional? Remember the quartet Harold Hill made out of the Board in the River City, Iowa, of Meredith Willson's Music Man?

"Music outside the schools is the only 'real' music for most of America's children, even those who are taking music in school." This indictment of the relevance of today's school offerings in music was delivered at Tanglewood by William H. Cornog, superintendent of the New Trier Township High School District, Winnetka, Illinois.

It is an administrator who cries phony. The kids don't bother. They just seek music that is meaningful to them and use it to find a small part of the satisfactions we know this art can supply. The phoniness tag is justified because the schools have failed in many instances to make a vital and real connection between the needs that students feel and what music can offer to meet these needs. The schools must make better use of music to educate youth for "the art of living, the building of personal identity, and nurturing of creativity." ∎

Wisconsin's Youth Music Project

Spotting Flowers in the Rock Garden

■ If there is a common bond that connects the youth of America, it is music. Technology has produced a mass-media system that ensures the communication of the "now music" to all youth from the inner-city to suburbia. Outside of school, it is this music that youth responds to and identifies with.

But music educators are usually not aware of the musical activities of youth outside of school. They either do not recognize the new music as a valid expression, or they ignore its existence entirely. Attention is focused on the talented, involved music student to the exclusion of the eighty percent of the students who are not in a regular music program.

In the "Music in American Society" report of the Tanglewood Symposium, Louis Wersen, then President of MENC, said, "In an era of protest, irritation, and rapid change, when students tell us that the music we teach and the methods we use are irrelevant and ineffectual, music educators cannot simply sit back with eyes closed and ears tuned backward." The Tanglewood Symposium challenged music educators to bridge the gap between the traditional music appreciation or performance class and the music of youth.

The Youth Music P

tors National Conference, and the U.S. Office of Education, is a response to this challenge. Emmett R. Sarig, chairman of Wisconsin's Extension Music Department and project director, has described the project as the first of its kind designed to teach music educators about the "now music" by bringing them into direct contact with youth music groups. The four-week institute, to be held July 7 to August 1, 1969, on the Madison campus of the University of Wisconsin, will introduce music educators not only to the new music but also to those who compose it, perform it, appreciate it, and enjoy it.

Forty school systems from the major population centers across the nation will be invited to send a youth music group selected from their school system to the institute for one week. Each group will be accompanied by a guidance counselor who will also participate in the program. To give depth to the project, a high school group from England will also be invited to attend, since many rock styles have been developed by English groups. The in-service training will really begin as music educators in each school system search for a rock group to attend the institute. In many areas this will be the participating school systems attend the workshop for the four-week period. Interested educators from around the co will also be invited to attend.

A pretest will be given to pa pating music educators and ance counselors to determine perception of the music of yo what it is and how it relate education. The results of the will influence the focus of the sessions by indicating the n and desires of the educators.

The program will consist of tures, seminars, workshops, classes. The music educators observe and learn from the yo groups. The institute will gu educators in the development new curriculum objectives, n courses, and new techniques teaching. The youth groups will offered guidance in composi and performing their music.

The end of the four-week proje will mark the beginning of a ne relationship between educators a youth, which will be reflected new programs focusing on the m sic of youth. The impact that th Youth Music Project can have o increasing understanding and com munication between the genera tions is enormous. Besides the important subjects such as mathematics, history, and science." The record of high-level support for music is real. Yet, how "real" is music as a fundamental of education today?

Today's younger generation is involved with music in a way that has historians looking to the Renaissance for a parallel. Yet much of this is in spite of the schools rather than because of them. Discovering that there was something in what their elders said about music, if not in what they did, youngsters have found their own ways of discovering their identity and building a life style with music. These are valid comments that reflect both an overwhelming need among youth for a "real" involvement with music and an indictment of our schools for failing to meet this need.

Do school boards have a responsibility for providing education in music for these youngsters if they are going to learn it anyway? The answer is obvious, just as it would be if the question were put with respect to driver or sex education. The strong pronouncements that have been made on behalf of music over the past forty years are only being justified by today's youngsters. Has the support that followed been commensurate with the position taken? Are school music programs real and fundamental?

Granting that there are some extremely successful music programs in school systems across this country, it must also be admitted that, by and large, music is not yet a fundamental part of every American child's education. Most school systems list music as an aim of their elementary school curriculum, but many make teaching it the responsibility of the classroom teacher without requiring any musical training as a condition of employment. Where music is handled by elementary music specialists, they are frequently spread so thin that there is little hope of achieving the goals. Many secondary schools provide no musical experience for any students except those who wish to play or sing in the performing organizations. Where courses for other students exist, they are frequently assigned to teachers who are not prepared or anxious to conduct them.

If music is as vital as the establishment has said it is and as young people demonstrate that it is, how can the schools move to develop a more effective program? First, a well-defined set of goals for music in the general education program from kindergarten through grade twelve should be established. As indicated in "Musical Outcomes" from the book Music in General Education (Music Educators National Conference, 1965), these goals should include (a) skills such as ability to sing, play an instrument, read musical notation, and discriminate with respect to music; (b) understandings about music and its place in society; and (c) attitudes toward music. Of these categories, by far the most important is the last, and schools should do everything possible to make certain that every student is "turned on" about some aspect of music before leaving school. Many school systems will already have a well-developed set of objectives for the music program. If these objectives were developed more than two or three years ago, however, they probably need to be reexamined in the light of the expanding interest in ethnic, electronic, and avant-garde music, which is part of today's scene. NEA's pamphlet Music in the Schools suggests the need for continuity from grade to grade in order that "musical growth may parallel his [the student's] physical and emotional development."

The second step, of course, is the establishment of a K-12 curriculum designed to meet the prescribed goals. Many schools have done this, but have succeeded in involving only about twenty percent of the students. Attention has been given to those who demonstrated talent or interest, but this has resulted in a form of discrimination that is not easily defensible. If music is fundamental and vital, can the schools with integrity serve only those who are easy to teach? Is there not a responsibility to discover how to make music real to all children?

Even with a theoretically adequate curriculum on paper, however, not much will happen without further commitments on the part of the school board, administrators, and music educators. There must be adequate staffing and imaginative scheduling to make success at least appear attainable. It is possible that some experimentation may be necessary to ascertain just what is needed. It is apparent, however, that thirty minutes once a week in the elementary school, or half a semester of general music in the seventh grade taught by a music teacher trained for another assignment, will not get the job done. Music educators may need help in realizing that there is integrity in music that has not so far been allowed inside their schoolroom. Each school system will have to design its own method of reaching its objectives. Some idea of possible alternatives may be found in the chapter on "Organizing Music Experiences" in Music in General Education.

There are several ways of evaluating the success of a music program with broad objectives in general education. Standardized tests of musical achievement and performance are available but are limited in their usefulness in measuring the broad objectives under discussion here. A school system can devise a comprehensive examination in music for all high school graduates in line with the specific goals of its own curriculum. Other checks on the general strength of the program can be made by observation. Music in the Schools suggests to parents that an "effective music program is not difficult to identify: Children can read music and sing part songs by the time they enter seventh grade. High school seniors are as familiar with the works of Mozart, Wagner, and Schoenberg as they are with those of Shakespeare, Dickens, and Hemingway. School orchestras are on a par with school bands. There are places for music listening as well as for rehearsal and performance. The high school offers courses in music theory and history and makes arrangements for credit and released time for private instruction." While this description of some of the characteristics of a strong program is not inaccurate, it falls short of what is now seen as necessary to ensure the total involvement of the students implied by "music in the core of the curriculum."

Another means of evaluating results, assuming that "turning on" the students is a primary goal, is a study of student behavior in and out of school. Is the music young people study at school reflected in the records they buy, the concerts they attend, the music they play and sing on their own time? How many young people continue their involvement with music after they leave school? In college? In church and community groups? What effect has the school curriculum in music had on the cultural life of the community? Have the offerings of local radio stations been affected? Is the music performed in the churches of a better quality? Does a community symphony or opera company exist and find support? Do families make music together? How many members of the school board consider themselves musicians, either amateur or professional? Remember the quartet Harold Hill made out of the Board in the River City, Iowa, of Meredith Willson's Music Man?

"Music outside the schools is the only 'real' music for most of America's children, even those who are taking music in school." This indictment of the relevance of today's school offerings in music was delivered at Tanglewood by William H. Cornog, superintendent of the New Trier Township High School District, Winnetka, Illinois.

It is an administrator who cries phony. The kids don't bother. They just seek music that is meaningful to them and use it to find a small part of the satisfactions we know this art can supply. The phoniness tag is justified because the schools have failed in many instances to make a vital and real connection between the needs that students feel and what music can offer to meet these needs. The schools must make better use of music to educate youth for "the art of living, the building of personal identity, and nurturing of creativity." ∎

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY
MAR

important subjects such as mathematics, history, and science." The record of high-level support for music is real. Yet, how "real" is music as a fundamental of education today?

Today's younger generation is involved with music in a way that has historians looking to the Renaissance for a parallel. Yet much of this is in spite of the schools rather than because of them. Discovering that there was something in what their elders said about music, if not in what they did, youngsters have found their own ways of discovering their identity and building a life style with music. These are valid comments that reflect both an overwhelming need among youth for a "real" involvement with music and an indictment of our schools for failing to meet this need.

Do school boards have a responsibility for providing education in music for these youngsters if they are going to learn it anyway? The answer is obvious, just as it would being justified by today's youngsters. Has the support that followed been commensurate with the position taken? Are school music programs real and fundamental?

Granting that there are some extremely successful music programs in school systems across this country, it must also be admitted that, by and large, music is not yet a fundamental part of every American child's education. Most school systems list music as an aim of their elementary school curriculum, but many make teaching it the responsibility of the classroom teacher without requiring any musical training as a condition of employment. Where music is handled by elementary music specialists, they are frequently spread so thin that there is little hope of achieving the goals. Many secondary schools provide no musical experience for any students except those who wish to play or sing in the performing organizations. Where courses for other students exist, they are frequently assigned to teachers who are not pre-as ability to sing, play an instrument, read musical notation, and discriminate with respect to music; (b) understandings about music and its place in society; and (c) attitudes toward music. Of these categories, by far the most important is the last, and schools should do everything possible to make certain that every student is "turned on" about some aspect of music before leaving school. Many school systems will already have a well-developed set of objectives for the music program. If these objectives were developed more than two or three years ago, however, they probably need to be reexamined in the light of the expanding interest in ethnic, electronic, and avant-garde music, which is part of today's scene. NEA's pamphlet Music in the Schools suggests the need for continuity from grade to grade in order that "musical growth may parallel his [the student's] physical and emotional development."

The second step, of course, is the establishment of a K-12 curriculum designed to meet the prescribed

108c

Wisconsin's Youth Music Project

Spotting Flowers in the Rock Garden

■ If there is a common bond that connects the youth of America, it is music. Technology has produced a mass-media system that ensures the communication of the "now music" to all youth from the inner-city to suburbia. Outside of school, it is this music that youth responds to and identifies with.

But music educators are usually not aware of the musical activities of youth outside of school. They either do not recognize the new music as a valid expression, or they ignore its existence entirely. Attention is focused on the talented, involved music student to the exclusion of the eighty percent of the students who are not in a regular music program.

In the "Music in American Society" report of the Tanglewood Symposium, Louis Wersen, then President of MENC, said, "In an era of protest, irritation, and rapid change, when students tell us that the music we teach and the methods we use are irrelevant and ineffectual, music educators cannot simply sit back with eyes closed and ears tuned backward." The Tanglewood Symposium challenged music educators to bridge the gap between the traditional music appreciation or performance class and the music of youth.

The Youth Music Project, jointly sponsored by the Extension Music Department of the University of Wisconsin, the Music Educators National Conference, and the U.S. Office of Education, is a response to this challenge. Emmett R. Sarig, chairman of Wisconsin's Extension Music Department and project director, has described the project as the first of its kind designed to teach music educators about the "now music" by bringing them into direct contact with youth music groups. The four-week institute, to be held July 7 to August 1, 1969, on the Madison campus of the University of Wisconsin, will introduce music educators not only to the new music but also to those who compose it, perform it, appreciate it, and enjoy it.

Forty school systems from the major population centers across the nation will be invited to send a youth music group selected from their school system to the institute for one week. Each group will be accompanied by a guidance counselor who will also participate in the program. To give depth to the project, a high school group from England will also be invited to attend, since many rock styles have been developed by English groups. The in-service training will really begin as music educators in each school system search for a rock group to attend the institute. In many areas, this will be the first time that educators and youth will be communicating through the medium of the music of youth. A music educator from each of the participating school systems will attend the workshop for the entire four-week period. Interested music educators from around the country will also be invited to attend.

A pretest will be given to participating music educators and guidance counselors to determine their perception of the music of youth—what it is and how it relates to education. The results of the test will influence the focus of the class sessions by indicating the needs and desires of the educators.

The program will consist of lectures, seminars, workshops, and classes. The music educators will observe and learn from the youth groups. The institute will guide educators in the development of new curriculum objectives, new courses, and new techniques of teaching. The youth groups will be offered guidance in composing and performing their music.

The end of the four-week project will mark the beginning of a new relationship between educators and youth, which will be reflected in new programs focusing on the music of youth. The impact that the Youth Music Project can have on increasing understanding and communication between the generations is enormous. Besides the immediate benefit to those involved in the institute, the project will have implications for teacher-training programs and for similar projects in the future. ∎

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY
MAR

108d.

SIC EDUCATORS
RNAL
SHINGTON, D. C.
NTHLY 54.000

1969 Rockefeller

tion and performance of music, not the musical archives—the burden would be so much lighter (page 37). On this ground, we can link arms with the revolutionaries in musical history—Monteverdi, Beethoven, Schoenberg, and even our own avant-garde.

Once tradition has been redefined, we can prepare ourselves to venture into music of the past, not to venerate old relics but to rediscover the radicals of the past. Their music offers us so many modern opportunities—decisions on instrumentation, decisions on tempi, and wide areas open to improvisation. There is scarcely a greater challenge to creativity in performance. Gordon Sandford opts for the music of the Baroque and before, and claims for it a surprising measure of rele-knows their names. American composer Gail Kubik, who made his name with background music for the Gerald McBoing Boing cartoons, has spent most of the last decade and a half touring in the capitals of Europe, where money is hard to come by but prestige flows like a river of gold (page 40).

On this month's cover, photographer Grady Watts (creator of the new MENC filmstrip "Music: A Teaching Career") has captured the roving spirit of the music educator: the four bass cases, looking as if they might be able to walk out of the room under their own power, are ready for travel. During the summer of 1968, Theodore R. Brunson went halfway around the world to visit string mentor Dr.

In this issue for the second time graduate students are presenting interpretations of research studies in music education. All graduate schools are encouraged to contribute to "Insights and Applications" (page 3). Information on the department may be obtained by writing to the Editor, Music Educators Journal, MENC National Headquarters, 1201 Sixteenth Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.—Ed.

obeisance before the masters. But students have successfully resisted our dictates. For many of them, the opera house has long since become a museum displaying the relics of another age, and the symphony orchestra is fast becoming so.

What will take their place? It seems quite clear that a wide diversity of musical interests is now taking the place of our limited traditional fare. Musical interest will determine the future. Relationship rather than ritual should be the central concern of music education: the relevance of music to each individual. Our job is to help people get "turned on" to music—all kinds of music. Interest in music is motivational. It will demand and create its own expressive outlets in to-

Wiley L. Housewright

Confrontation with Tomorrow

■ If it is true that there is a dynamism in conflict, then music education today is approaching its most dynamic moment. Everywhere there is confrontation that challenges us to reassess our accomplishments, to reinterpret our role, to reformulate our causes, to revitalize our energies, and to reconstitute our profession.

WE CONFRONT SOCIETY

Our greatest confrontation is with the society we serve. Theoretically, every individual is capable of fully realizing his potential. Yet generation after generation falls short of the mark. The waste of human potential is the greatest of human crimes. Tomorrow demands that our political leaders begin their wars on crime by campaigns for changing human behavior. That means education. Teachers know that to learn is to modify human action and reaction. If our goal is to develop the full range of human potential, then arts education, with music as a specific component, must assume a large part of that responsibility.

We confront society. What will we teach for? What do we want American society to become musically? For years music educators have been teaching for the performance establishment. Our job was to prepare audiences for the professional performer. Students were to learn concert behavior. They were to appreciate the great music and to assume correct attitudes of lever with the same teachers who instruct performance majors. I ask, is it possible that instructional methods are not bringing out the best in these students, or that the music being taught has little cogency to the preparation of a teacher? What relationship does Beethoven have to the twentieth-century urban ghetto?

The author is President, Music Educators National Conference, and Dean, School of Music, Florida State University, Tallahassee. This speech was presented at each of the 1969 MENC Division Conventions.

Musicologists have been critical of the music contained in our textbooks and of the limited historical perspective we hold. Yet rather than encounter this problem head-on by making thorough studies of the

There are those who fear that democratization of music teaching will vitiate the art of music itself. I doubt that the amateur musician is the natural enemy of the professional composer.

is easy
in class, or forth-amantly jects.
antaged textures, instinc-
n should n to disatisfying
enly but ellectual e are too mediate
e biased

27 process.

cologists,
ey speak hem are ssion ene critical ie music hostile.
segment is clearly state of way. lents, we t matter,

1056

tion and performance of music, not the musical archives—the burden would be so much lighter (page 37). On this ground, we can link arms with the revolutionaries in musical history—Monteverdi, Beethoven, Schoenberg, and even our own avant-garde.

Once tradition has been redefined, we can prepare ourselves to venture into music of the past, not to venerate old relics but to rediscover the radicals of the past. Their music offers us so many modern opportunities—decisions on instrumentation, decisions on tempi, and wide areas open to improvisation. There is scarcely a greater challenge to creativity in performance. Gordon Sandford opts for the music of the Baroque and before, and claims for it a surprising measure of rele-knows their names. American composer Gail Kubik, who made his name with background music for the Gerald McBoing Boing cartoons, has spent most of the last decade and a half touring in the capitals of Europe, where money is hard to come by but prestige flows like a river of gold (page 40).

On this month's cover, photographer Grady Watts (creator of the new MENC filmstrip "Music: A Teaching Career") has captured the roving spirit of the music educator: the four bass cases, looking as if they might be able to walk out of the room under their own power, are ready for travel. During the summer of 1968, Theodore R. Brunson went halfway around the world to visit string mentor Dr.

In this issue for the second time graduate students are presenting interpretations of research studies in music education. All graduate schools are encouraged to contribute to "Insights and Applications" (page 3). Information on the department may be obtained by writing to the Editor, Music Educators Journal, MENC National Headquarters, 1201 Sixteenth Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.—Ed.

obeisance before the masters. But students have successfully resisted our dictates. For many of them, the opera house has long since become a museum displaying the relics of another age, and the symphony orchestra is fast becoming so.

What will take their place? It seems quite clear that a wide diversity of musical interests is now taking the place of our limited traditional fare. Musical interest will determine the future. Relationship rather than ritual should be the central concern of music education: the relevance of music to each individual. Our job is to help people get "turned on" to music—all kinds of music. Interest in music is motivational. It will

Wiley L. Housewright

is easy in class u forth-amantly
jects.
antaged textures, instinc-
should n to disatisfying nly but effectual e are too mediate
e biased

Confrontation with Tomorrow

■ If it is true that there is a dynamism in conflict, then music education today is approaching its most dynamic moment. Everywhere there is confrontation that challenges us to reassess our accomplishments, to reinterpret our role, to reformulate our causes, to revitalize our energies, and to reconstitute our profession.

WE CONFRONT SOCIETY

Our greatest confrontation is with the society we serve. Theoretically, every individual is capable of fully realizing his potential. Yet generation after generation falls short of the mark. The waste of human potential is the greatest of human crimes. Tomorrow demands that our political leaders begin their wars on crime by campaigns for changing human behavior. That means education. Teachers know that to learn is to modify human action and reaction. If our goal is to develop the full range of human potential, then arts education, with music as a specific component, must assume a large part of that responsibility.

We confront society. What will we teach for? What do we want American society to become musically? For years music educators have been teaching for the performance establishment. Our job was to prepare audiences for the professional performer. Students were to learn concert behavior. They were to appreciate the great music and to assume correct attitudes of process.

The author is President, Music Educators National Conference, and Dean, School of Music, Florida State University, Tallahassee. This speech was presented at each of the 1969 MENC Division Conventions.

27

ologists ty speak hem im-
ssion cri-
e critical ic music hostile, segment is clearly state of
MAY, ents, we f matter.

ence with the same teachers who instruct performance majors, I ask, is it possible that instructional methods are not bringing out the best in these students, or that the music being taught has little cogency to the preparation of a teacher? What relationship does Beethoven have to the twentieth-century urban ghetto?

Musicologists have been critical of the music contained in our textbooks and of the limited historical perspective we hold. Yet rather than encounter this problem head-on by making thorough studies of the

There are those who fear that democratization of music teaching will vitiate the art of music itself. I doubt that the amateur musician is the natural enemy of the professional composer.

108d.

Meet another Buescher stalwart that can add real strength to your band program!

THE BUESCHER 811 CLARINET

...so reliable, so durable, it's guaranteed against breakage for FIVE FULL YEARS!

Built to conform with acoustic principles found in the finest clarinets, the Buescher 811 is the one most likely to help young students contribute to your band's sound!

Constantly improving, constantly expanding... the time to discover the newest from Buescher is NOW!

Any Buescher instrument you select will feature famous Buescher innovations of the past, like snap-on pads, air-borne valves, floating lever octave mechanisms, unitized mouthpipes, Buescher "400" threaded springs ... improvements such as ADJUSTA-PAD tone holes, Brilhart mouthpieces. Mouthpieces are being added constantly you add strength to your band.

To learn how the brass and Buescher instruments can ... band program send for the Buescher catalog (write to ... Instruments, Box 310, Elkhart, ... or call your Buescher ...

Bues
Elkhart, I

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

MAY 1969

Overtones

■ Music education is haunted by music of the past. Perhaps as a result, music educators as a group exhibit difficulty in adjusting to the problems of the present and anticipating the conflicts of the future.

Speaking to each of the six division conventions on the topic "Confrontation with Tomorrow" (page 26), MENC President Wiley L. Housewright pointed out that the Tanglewood Symposium defined the profession's capacities and responsibilities. But we must not let ourselves be lulled into thinking of Tanglewood as the final answer. For one thing, it will take years of concentrated effort before Tanglewood's recommendations are effected; for another, music educators must constantly reassess their goals and procedures if they are to avoid the crushing weight of their own tradition.

One way to escape being buried under a ton of musical tradition is to redefine the word. Commonly, musical tradition is thought of as a circumscribed body of music literature. How sad, laments composer Allen Strange. For if musical tradition were seen for what it really is—the continuing creation and performance of music, not the musical archives—the burden would be so much lighter (page 37). On this ground, we can link arms with the revolutionaries in musical history—Monteverdi, Beethoven, Schoenberg, and even our own avant-garde.

Once tradition has been redefined, we can prepare ourselves to venture into music of the past, not to venerate old relics but to rediscover the radicals of the past. Their music offers us so many modern opportunities—decisions on instrumentation, decisions on tempi, and wide areas open to improvisation. There is scarcely a greater challenge to creativity in performance. Gordon Sandford opts for the music of the Baroque and before, and claims for it a surprising measure of relevance to the present (page 34).

That may be so. But thousands upon thousands of teachers will testify that most of their students don't spot this relevance right off. Old music isn't their bag. Rock is. Is there a way to extend relevance in both directions, forward to the students in the classroom and back to the music of the past? In the December 1968 Journal, Ned Rorem came out strong on the side of the Beatles, saying their music has the class of Monteverdi's, Schumann's, and Poulenc's. Now Robert Binkley outlines what the Philadelphia schools are doing to speak to students in their own idiom (page 31). Music educators who are still squeamish about using rock in the classroom have been invited to an open-door symposium at the Youth Music Project at the University of Wisconsin this summer (page 33).

While crowds of teen-agers, and thoroughly sane young adults, pour out to hear the latest rock sounds, "serious" American composers are getting short shrift from their usual audience. It isn't that the money isn't there. Universities and foundations take care of that. It's just that nobody knows their names. American composer Gail Kubik, who made his name with background music for the Gerald McBoing Boing cartoons, has spent most of the last decade and a half touring in the capitals of Europe, where money is hard to come by but prestige flows like a river of gold (page 40).

On this month's cover, photographer Grady Watts (creator of the new MENC filmstrip "Music: A Teaching Career") has captured the roving spirit of the music educator: the four bass cases, looking as if they might be able to walk out of the room under their own power, are ready for travel. During the summer of 1968, Theodore R. Brunson went halfway around the world to visit string mentor Dr. Shinichi Suzuki and observe his methods at the Talent Education Summer School in Matsumoto, Japan (page 54). Dr. Suzuki's miracle touch, he found, works for advanced pupils as well as beginners.

Everything seems to be more fun in the summer to young children, even school. Martha Pearman, an evaluator for Title I projects in Indiana, found that when the normal pressures of the academic curriculum are lifted and children are allowed to experiment freely in the arts they become more integrated people, both socially and individually (page 61). As the new generation says, these children are together.

In this issue for the second time graduate students are presenting interpretations of research studies in music education. All graduate schools are encouraged to contribute to "Insights and Applications" (page 3). Information on the department may be obtained by writing to the Editor, Music Educators Journal, MENC National Headquarters, 1201 Sixteenth Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.—Ed.

obeisance
cessfully opera hou ing the orchestra
What a wide di place of will dete ritual sho tion: the job is to kinds of m

Wiley L. Ho

Confron

■ If it is true that there then music education tod dynamic moment. Everyw that challenges us to reasse reinterpret our role, to r revitalize our energies, profession.

WE CONFRO

Our greatest confrontati serve. Theoretically, every fully realizing his potential.

*The author is President, M ference, and Dean, School of M
Tallahassee. This speech was p
MENC Division Conventions.*

26 lever with th

mance majors methods are n or that the m
the preparatio
Beethoven hav Musicologist
tained in our perspective w problem head-

108d.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54 000

MAY 1969

CHANGE!

Overton

■ Music education is haun music of the past. Perhaps as music educators as a group difficulty in adjusting to the
of the present and anticipa conflicts of the future.

Speaking to each of the six conventions on the topic "C tion with Tomorrow" (pa
MENC President Wiley L.
wright pointed out that the wood Symposium defined th
sion's capacities and respor
But we must not let ourselves into thinking of Tanglewoo final answer. For one thing, it years of concentrated effo
Tanglewood's recommendat effected; for another, music must constantly reassess th and procedures if they are to crushing weight of their o
tion.

One way to escape beir
under a ton of musical trad redefine the word. Commonl tradition is thought of as scribed body of music litera
sad, laments composer Alle
For if musical tradition wer
what it really is—the contin tion and performance of mus musical archives—the burd be so much lighter (page 37 ground, we can link arms
revolutionaries in musical Monteverdi, Beethoven, S
and even our own avant-ga

Once tradition has been
we can prepare ourselves
into music of the past, not to venerate old relics but to rediscover the radicals of the past. Their music offers us so many modern opportunities—decisions on instrumentation, decisions on tempi, and wide areas open to improvisation. There is scarcely a greater challenge to creativity in performance. Gordon Sandford opts for the music of the Baroque and before, and claims for it a surprising measure of rele-

On this month's cover, photographer Grady Watts (creator of the new MENC filmstrip "Music: A Teaching Career") has captured the roving spirit of the music educator: the four bass cases, looking as if they might be able to walk out of the room under their own power, are ready for travel. During the summer of 1968, Theodore R. Brunson went halfway around the world to visit string mentor Dr.

In this issue graduate students are presenting interpretations of research studies in music education. All graduate schools are encouraged to contribute to "Insights and Applications" (page 3). Information on the department may be obtained by writing to the Editor, Music Educators Journal, MENC National Headquarters, 1201 Sixteenth Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.—Ed.

Music Educators Journal

obeisance before the masters. But students have successfully resisted our dictates. For many of them, the opera house has long since become a museum displaying the relics of another age, and the symphony orchestra is fast becoming so.

What will take their place? It seems quite clear that a wide diversity of musical interests is now taking the place of our limited traditional fare. Musical interest will determine the future. Relationship rather than ritual should be the central concern of music education: the relevance of music to each individual. Our job is to help people get "turned on" to music—all kinds of music. Interest in music is motivational. It will demand and create its own expressive outlets in tomorrow's society. The result could well embrace opera, popular music, or something in between.

WE CONFRONT OUR STUDENTS

The teacher and the child form a dynamic confrontation that either belittles or begets. In the past, our expectations may not have been great enough. Our pace may have been inappropriate. The students I know are very earnest about subjects that interest them. They have learned long ago that they haven't the time to master everything. Whether music is a person's most compelling interest or a casual pastime is less important than whether it brings him alive and leads him into new worlds of thought, of emotion, of expression, and of understanding.

Physical education programs have faced the same problems. They have often discriminated against the nonteam member. Music teachers need to find their greatest rewards not in the spotlights and applause, but in the growth of all students toward musical understanding. Lifetime programs for all students will replace emphasis on the selected, talented few.

Students today are more independent, more aware, and more sophisticated. They want a piece of the action. They want to be counted in when the decision affects their life and future. They have already formulated ideas about music, even by the time they reach kindergarten. In junior high school they are already making music—their own music. As a means of expression, teen-age music holds more meaning for young people today than it ever has before. Teenagers have thrown over the rituals and preferences of the past. They prefer beads and bell bottoms to tie and tails, rhythm and tone color to melody and form. Do we understand what's happening? Can we teach an openness to all kinds of music? Can we teach control and discipline at the same time that we recognize the need for self-expression? Can we match the pace of students who are accustomed to and even expect rapid change?

We confront our students—all kinds of students. Jeanne Noble, professor of human relations at New York University, observes that "the report cards of thousands of black children could well read, 'We expected him to be dumb. He got the message. He was dumb.'" In music we expect that a few students will excel, most will be mediocre, and a fair number will fail or even rebel. Our low level of expectation begets what it sets out to achieve. It reduces aspirations, stifles motivation, and systematically destroys ego and self-concept. Add to these rejection, poverty, the race issue, and deprivation of opportunity, and it is easy to understand why these students go to sleep in class, why they develop either a protective malaise or forthright hostility toward society, and why they adamantly reject the abstract material of most school subjects.

In music we are more fortunate. The disadvantaged child does respond to sound, to rhythm, to textures, to manipulations, to improvisation—often most instinctively and imaginatively. Our greatest concern should be to devise situations in classes that lead them to discover all that is great and wonderful and satisfying in music, little by little, leap by leap, suddenly but surely. The child must be successful. The intellectual and emotional consequences of repeated failure are too great to bear. Music is particularly suited to immediate reward, not in the sense of showing off before biased the confrontation within our own family—the various segments of the music and teaching professions. There is no documentation to prove the assumption that music educators have claimed exclusive rights to the preparation of the next generation of music teachers. Yet the public keening of other segments of the music profession over our deficiencies appears to be based on the premise that they have nothing to do with what they label a regrettable state of affairs. Let's look at that carefully.

Professional performers have from time to time belittled the achievements of those preparing to teach. Yet most music and education majors entering a school of music have had from five to nine years of precollege performance study and four years at the collegiate level with the same teachers who instruct performance majors. I ask, is it possible that instructional methods are not bringing out the best in these students, or that the music being taught has little cogency to the preparation of a teacher? What relationship does Beethoven have to the twentieth-century urban ghetto?

Musicologists have been critical of the music contained in our textbooks and of the limited historical perspective we hold. Yet rather than encounter this problem head-on by making thorough studies of the responsibility all special disciplines have in the process.

We can accept the pronouncements of musicologists, theorists, performers, and composers when they speak as music educators, for, indeed, most of them are music educators. Our definition of our profession encompasses them and all they do. When they are critical from their imagined sanctuaries outside the music education profession, they are not necessarily hostile. They only emphasize the neglect of their own segment of the profession. Our need for collaboration is clearly as great as our desperation over the present state of affairs. We can ignore it, but it won't go away.

We confront society, we confront our students, we confront the school, we confront our subject matter,

There are those who fear that democratization of music teaching will vitiate the art of music itself. I doubt that the amateur musician is the natural enemy of the professional composer.

parents and friends, but because we have something human to say and can say it clearly, uniquely, even eloquently.

WE CONFRONT THE SCHOOL

Schools are just beginning to function on the premise that they are only one of many agencies for education. Doors are being opened to community resources. The concept of the self-contained classroom has been discarded. Schools no longer ignore the influence of television, radio, travel, and home environment.

Music education confronts this new school environment. Will we continue to support the worn-out theory of self-containment, when we know that students subject to it are not provided the kind of musical education in which we believe? The subject matter of music demands a music specialist in every elementary school. We can no longer avoid the responsibility that is ultimately ours. Quality music education requires quality music teaching.

But self-containment is a malady with other crippling effects. We close our classroom doors to the outside world even when we do the teaching. Our agony is that many people—young and old—know and respond to musics other than those we teach. Tomorrow we may be forced to give up our exclusive rights. We may no longer require students to give up what they know and like in the hope that eventually their taste will coincide with our own. Taste, we are learning, is not snobbery. It begins with an openness to new musical formulations. Taste is the capacity to discriminate to a degree that permits recognition of many kinds of music and the best examples of those kinds.

Teen-agers have thrown over the rituals and preferences of the past. Do we understand what's happening? Can we teach control and discipline at the same time that we recognize the need for self-expression?

Education provides students with a basis for making musical judgments.

Tomorrow the routes to musical learning will be diverse, and the teacher who pilots learning will need to know multiethnic music, popular musics, and new art musics on a scale not yet imagined. At the very least, the music educator will be a well-informed specialist on a team that teaches all of these. He will reach outside his classroom for expert help in teaching all aspects of musical art. He will recognize that music education cannot be confined to the classroom. It is a community enterprise that is not restricted to a twelve-year period but lasts a lifetime.

Self-containment deceives us in another way. It appears as a comfortable haven, protecting us from the alleged corruption of the commercial and social worlds. When one thinks "community," one thinks of art, not for its own sake, but for people—all people. There are those who fear that democratization of music teaching will vitiate our standards and the art of music itself. I am confident that music and our standards are neither frail nor immutable. I doubt that any Sunday painter ever destroyed a talented artist or that the amateur musician is the natural enemy of the professional composer. The teacher, clearly, must move students from one suitably significant experience to another, regardless of the level of sophistication. Mahler's Eighth Symphony may not thrill at a certain age as much as Shostakovich's The Golden Age ballet. An African chant or Varèse's Poème Electronique may touch more quickly than Beethoven's Fifth. We must come to choose our material not for concerts, but for cultivation.

WE CONFRONT OUR SUBJECT

One's definition of music can exclude or embrace. It can broaden or stagnate. Musical subject matter is continually expanding, yet with the year 2000 only thirty years away, students and teachers alike flounder with nineteenth-century ears in a twentieth-century world. The diversity of music is an immutable fact. Different types and styles of music represent different points of view that exist simultaneously. Juxtaposition need not mean conflict. One can enjoy rock 'n' roll in one situation, and Bach and Babbitt in another.

Cosmopolitanism is a more important goal of music education than elitism because it encompasses taste not only for Beethoven but for all kinds of musical art. We confront our subject matter for the totality it embodies, but we also face the need to find new means of communicating it. New technological capability must be acquired and applied, new psychological understandings absorbed and activated.

We are fortunate that music makes an immediate biological impact, that it has particular thrust to all whose lives are monotonous, drab, routine, void of the stimulation, the imagination, and the involvement necessary to simple psychic nourishment. We are fortunate if we can be the teacher who transforms this sensory response into learning, experience, play, or order. As teachers, our greatest defense against obsolescence is mind-engaging music classes that have stunning appeal to all in our presence.

WE CONFRONT OUR OWN DIVISIONS

There is the confrontation within our own family—the various segments of the music and teaching professions. There is no documentation to prove the assumption that music educators have claimed exclusive rights to the preparation of the next generation of music teachers. Yet the public keeping of other segments of the music profession over our deficiencies appears to be based on the premise that they have nothing to do with what they label a regrettable state of affairs. Let's look at that exceptio[illegible] difficulties and realistic proposals for resolving them, they seem content to hold annual meetings at which dull, repetitive papers erode the stones of the past with hardly a hint that those very stones have been hurled into the twentieth century.

And composers write articles for The New York Times not about composition, but about the wrongheadedness of music education. One of the latest attacks blatantly ignores the substantial work of the MENC Contemporary Music Project and the Tanglewood Symposium. Where has he been all these years?

I speak of the reactions of these groups not because they have been particularly damaging to any constructive efforts of MENC. The fact is, they probably have encouraged us to launch programs that were long overdue. In a few modest ways we are working together, but it is too little, too late. The time has come for all of us to recognize the urgency of preparing excellent music teachers for students from kindergarten through graduate school and to face up to the responsibility all special disciplines have in the process.

We can accept the pronouncements of musicologists, theorists, performers, and composers when they speak as music educators, for, indeed, most of them are music educators. Our definition of our profession encompasses them and all they do. When they are critical from their imagined sanctuaries outside the music education profession, they are not necessarily hostile. They only emphasize the neglect of their own segment of the profession. [illegible]

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000
MAY 1969

1082

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000

MAY 1969

Buescher "400" threaded springs... improvements such as ADJUSTA-PAD tone holes, Brilhart mouthpiec
Mouthpieces are being added constantl you add strength to your band p
To learn how the broad sel
Buescher instruments can impr band program send for t
Buescher catalog (write to Buesc Instruments, Box 310, Elkhart, In or call your Buescher dea
Buesc
Elkhart, Indi

Overto

■ Music education is hav music of the past. Perhaps a music educators as a grou
difficulty in adjusting to the
of the present and anticip
conflicts of the future.

Speaking to each of the si conventions on the topic "C tion with Tomorrow" (p
MENC President Wiley L
wright pointed out that th wood Symposium defined t
sion's capacities and respo
But we must not let ourselve into thinking of Tanglewo final answer. For one thing, i
years of concentrated effo
Tanglewood's recommenda effected; for another, music must constantly reassess t
and procedures if they are to crushing weight of their o
tion.

One way to escape bei
under a ton of musical trad redefine the word. Common tradition is thought of as scribed body of music litera
sad, laments composer Alle
For if musical tradition we what it really is—the contin tion and performance of mu
musical archives—the burd
be so much lighter (page 3
ground, we can link arms
revolutionaries in musical Monteverdi, Beethoven, S
and even our own avant-ga

Once tradition has been
we can prepare ourselves
into music of the past, not to venerate old relics but to rediscover the radicals of the past. Their music offers us so many modern opportunities—decisions on instrumentation, decisions on tempi, and wide areas open to improvisation. There is scarcely a greater challenge to creativity in performance. Gordon Sandford opts for the music of the Baroque and before, and claims for it a surprising measure of rele-

CHANGE!

MAY, NINETEEN SIXTY-NINE

On this month's cover, photographer Grady Watts (creator of the new MENC filmstrip "Music: A Teaching Career") has captured the roving spirit of the music educator: the four bass cases, looking as if they might be able to walk out of the room under their own power, are ready for travel. During the summer of 1968, Theodore R. Brunson went halfway around the world to visit string mentor Dr.

graduate students are presenting interpretations of research studies in music education. All graduate schools are encouraged to contribute to "Insights and Applications" (page 3). Information on the department may be obtained by writing to the Editor, Music Educators Journal, MENC National Headquarters, 1201 Sixteenth Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.—Ed.

parents and friends, but because we have something human to say and can say it clearly, uniquely, even eloquently.

WE CONFRONT THE SCHOOL

Schools are just beginning to function on the premise that they are only one of many agencies for education. Doors are being opened to community resources. The concept of the self-contained classroom has been discarded. Schools no longer ignore the influence of television, radio, travel, and home environment.

Music education confronts this new school environment. Will we continue to support the worn-out theory of self-containment, when we know that students subject to it are not provided the kind of musical education in which we believe? The subject matter of music demands a music specialist in every elementary school. We can no longer avoid the responsibility that is ultimately ours. Quality music education requires quality music teaching.

But self-containment is a malady with other crippling effects. We close our classroom doors to the outside world even when we do the teaching. Our agony is that many people—young and old—know and respond to musics other than those we teach. Tomorrow we may be forced to give up our exclusive rights. We may no longer require students to give up what they know and like in the hope that eventually their taste will coincide with our own. Taste, we are learning, is not sonblery. It begins with an [illegible]

Education provides students with a basis for making musical judgments.

Tomorrow the routes to musical learning will be diverse, and the teacher who pilots learning will need to know multiethnic music, popular musics, and new art musics on a scale not yet imagined. At the very least, the music educator will be a well-informed specialist on a team that teaches all of these. He will reach outside his classroom for expert help in teaching all aspects of musical art. He will recognize that music education cannot be confined to the classroom. It is a community enterprise that is not restricted to a twelve-year period but lasts a lifetime.

Self-containment deceives us in another way. It appears as a comfortable haven, protecting us from the alleged corruption of the commercial and social worlds. When one thinks "community," one thinks of art, not for its own sake, but for people—all people. There are those who fear that democratization of music teaching will vitiate our standards and the art of music itself. I am confident that music and our standards are neither frail nor immutable. I doubt that any Sunday painter ever destroyed a talented artist or that the amateur musician is the natural enemy of the professional composer. The teacher, clearly, must move students from one suitably significant experience to another, regardless of the level of sophistication. Mahler's Eighth Symphony may not thrill at a certain age as much as Shostakovich's The Golden Age ballet. At A[illegible]

Cosmopolitanism is a more important goal of music education than elitism because it encompasses taste not only for Beethoven but for all kinds of musical art. We confront our subject matter for the totality it embodies, but we also face the need to find new means of communicating it. New technological capability must be acquired and applied, new psychological understandings absorbed and activated.

We are fortunate that music makes an immediate biological impact, that it has particular thrust to all whose lives are monotonous, drab, routine, void of the stimulation, the imagination, and the involvement necessary to simple psychic nourishment. We are fortunate if we can be the teacher who transforms this sensory response into learning, experience, play, or order. As teachers, our greatest defense against obsolescence is mind-engaging music classes that have stunning appeal to all in our presence.

WE CONFRONT OUR OWN DIVISIONS

There is the confrontation within our own family—the various segments of the music and teaching professions. There is no documentation to prove the assumption that music educators have claimed exclusive rights to the preparation of the next generation of music teachers. Yet the public keening of other segments of the music profession over our deficiencies appears to be based on the premise that they have nothing to do with what they label a regrettable state of affairs. Let's look at that carefully.

Professional performers have from time to time belittled the achievements of those preparing to teach. Yet most music and education majors entering a school of music have had from five to nine years of precollege performance study and four years at the collegiate level with the same teachers who instruct performance majors. I ask, is it possible that instructional methods are not bringing out the best in these students, or that the music being taught has little cogency to the preparation of a teacher? What relationship does Beethoven have to the twentieth-century urban ghetto?

Musicologists have been critical of the music contained in our textbooks and of the limited historical perspective we hold. Yet rather than encounter this problem head-on by making thorough studies of the difficulties and realistic proposals for resolving them, they seem content to hold annual meetings at which dull, repetitive papers erode the stones of the past with hardly a hint that those very stones have been hurled into the twentieth century.

And composers write articles for The New York Times not about composition, but about the wrongheadedness of music education. One of the latest attacks blatantly ignores the substantial work of the MENC Contemporary Music Project and the Tanglewood Symposium. Where has he been all these years?

I speak of the reactions of these groups not because they have been particularly damaging to any constructive efforts of MENC. The fact is, they probably have encouraged us to launch programs that were long overdue. In a few modest ways we are working together, but it is too little, too late. The time has come for all of us to recognize the urgency of preparing excellent music teachers for students from kindergarten through graduate school and to face up to the responsibility all special disciplines have in the process.

We can accept the pronouncements of musicologists, theorists, performers, and composers when they speak as music educators, for, indeed, most of them are music educators. Our definition of our profession encompasses them and all they do. When they are critical from their imagined sanctuaries outside the music education profession, they are not necessarily hostile. They only emphasize the neglect of their own segment of the profession. Our need for collaboration is clearly as great as our desperation over the present state of affairs. We can ignore it, but it won't go away.

We confront society, we confront our students, we confront the school, we confront our subject matter,

There are those who fear that democratization of music teaching will vitiate the art of music itself. I doubt that the amateur musician is the natural enemy of the professional composer.

I propose nothing less than a full-scale study of music teacher education. At this time, no other task seems so critical. Until our teachers are strong, we cannot expect to achieve the goals we have set.

and we confront our own divisions. Above all else, it seems clear that these challenges can only be met by better teaching. To these ends I propose nothing less than a full-scale study of music teacher education in which relationships of the disciplines are examined, teacher preparation problems in each discipline identified, and proposals made for updating the education of music teachers. I am not proposing peace talks nor marriages of convenience. I am proposing that the MENC take the initiative by inviting respected teachers, scholars, and creative artists to consider difficult questions that probably have no final answers. We need specific recommendations for improving our present uneasy relationships, for knowing the other's field better, and for improving teaching in both our special and mutual fields. I recognize divergent ideas within subdisciplines of music. I am equally aware of vested interests and the self-consciousness of working with musicians outside one's own discipline. But I do not regard these as overriding reasons for continuing fragmentary, ad hoc improvisations when we have the attractive alternative of sustained work for our mutual benefit. Tomorrow, I hope we will keep our identities as music educators, musicologists, composers, and performers, but I also hope that on this problem we can establish high-voltage communication to refresh, invigorate, reinforce, or even sustain, encourage, and comfort each other when the going is rough. The major purpose of MENC's officers in devising the Tanglewood Symposium was to start a continuing dialogue between themselves and the many other forces that shape our world. We looked inward. We looked outward. We looked in the dark corners of our own obsolescence. We took a hard look at the disciplined work of a strong and powerful profession.

We were encouraged by the innovative programs that the music men and women were devising across the nation. We were impressed with the earnest, well-intentioned young men and women who have chosen our profession. But our idealism did not lead us into thinking we could do everything at once. Neither our resources nor our imaginations are rich enough to sustain productive programs in every segment of our profession. Our choices are now being made and our priorities established.

Musical interest will determine the future. Relationship rather than ritual should be the central concern of music education: the relevance of music to each individual. Our job is to help people get "turned on" to music—all kinds of music.

There are many reasons why a reevaluation of our teacher education is timely. It has been eighteen years since the Conference and the National Association of Schools of Music structured the curriculum presently followed in most teacher-preparation institutions. The American Association of Colleges of Teacher Education is currently asking for guidelines from professional organizations. Those in music education must be considered out of date.

In response to these urgent demands, the first official act of my administration has been the appointment of a National Commission on Teacher Education. At this particular time in the history of the organization, no other task seems so critical. Until our teachers are strong, we cannot expect to achieve the goals we have set.

The terminal objective of the Commission is to describe and recommend conditions that will result in the preparation of music educators who are competent, flexible, creative, curious, and prepared to survive and flourish in a world of change.

The specific tasks the Commission expects to undertake are numerous and because many of you will be invited to work on them, you deserve to know what they are. You will first be asked to identify strengths and weaknesses of current teacher education. You will then be asked to develop a list of competencies needed by music educators in the future. You will be asked to design experiments in the utilization of new technology and new scheduling problems, to identify innovative programs, to prepare evaluative instruments for certification and accreditation, to devise appropriate in-service programs for school systems. It is expected that these further verbal confrontations will bring into play the full range of knowledge available to the profession.

The Tanglewood Symposium clarified and defined unique functions of music in American society and education; it formulated a blueprint for our future. Many other projects, such as the Contemporary Music Project and the MENC Research Training Seminars, have improved our skills in critical areas of our professional work. We are in the position of a municipality that has spent its energy and budget on studies, surveys, and consultant services. I hope we will not take the route of filing these reports or of ignoring the potential that lies within them. We must put them into action.

It is clearly the responsibility of MENC officers and members to disseminate and develop by direct action the recommendations of Tanglewood. The questions asked at Tanglewood—the confrontations we face today—are neither casual nor frivolous. We are about to make a major thrust into the area of teacher education. The answers we must find go well beyond the requirements of complacent continuity. In them will be our response to the agony of today, our reach for the ecstasy of tomorrow.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54.000
MAY 1969

NEEDED – MORE EMPHASIS ON

The Tanglewood Fellowship Orchestra through the

Last summer it was my pleasure to spend three weekends at Tanglewood. In addition to the fine performances by the Boston Symphony, with renowned soloists, and the chamber music concerts with professional performers, there were many concerts by the fellowship students – also on a high level. The fellowship students are carefully selected college and post-college age young people and all receive a fellowship for the summer, which pays most if not all of their expenses during their stay at Tanglewood. The fellowship students are either music majors in college, or already embarking on professional careers in performance. In addition to instrumentalists, there are 40 singers, who form the nucleus of the chorus, in addition to doing solo work and opera. Also, there are pianists, composers, and conductors on fellowship there.

The principal student group for the instrumentalists is the Fellowship Orchestra, and it was with this group that I was most concerned. A survey of the members of this group resulted in an earlier article, "The Factors Which Produce the Serious Music Student," which appeared in the November, 1968 Instrumentalist. In addition to learning the background and impressions of the students in the orchestra, it was also interesting to talk to the conductors of the orchestra and to compare their feelings about the group.

Several men work with the Fellowship Orchestra during the summer. In addition to Erich Leinsdorf, who is musical director of the entire Tanglewood program, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Louis Speyer, oboist and English hornist with the Boston Symphony, and chamber music coach at Tanglewood, are the principal representatives from the Symphony itself. The fellowship conductors also direct the orchestra, as well as guest conductors such as Aaron Copland.

It was my privilege to talk at length with Charles Wilson and Louis Speyer, as well as with a German conductor, Stefan Minde, who was there on a fellowship. Minde had conducted at the opera house in Trier, Germany, for six years prior to coming to Tanglewood, and was going from there to San Francisco to be one of the conductors for the San Francisco Opera. (Minde, incidentally, was voted the outstanding fellowship conductor of the summer.) Instrumentalist readers will no doubt be interested in the remarks of these three men in regard to the playing, knowledge, and musicianship of the Fellowship Orchestra.

Louis Speyer prepared a short written statement which he gave to me at the beginning of our discussion. It is appropriate to quote it here:

> I admire our young players. Technically, they are excellent. They play avant-garde music very well; they do "tricks" on their instruments that are out of the range; but unfortunately they are losing the quality of tone we used to study so hard. The beauties of style and phrasing are foreign to them, because most of the teachers and many conductors do not ask for these. (I guess it must be to avoid giving them an inferiority complex!) The model for an orchestra should be a great string quartet, whose members use the same style, same bowings, and same interpretation. Too often in our Fellowship Orchestra we hear the same phrase played in different ways—sneaking attacks, short or long staccato, pushing the tone, etc. The students seem to try for quantity not quality.

The lack of musicianship which Louis Speyer pointed out was also stressed by Charles Wilson. In continuing the discussion, it became apparent that the program of the Fellowship Orchestra at Tanglewood is of necessity an attempt to balance various factors needed in orchestral playing, which the students should learn – or at least be exposed to – during their Tanglewood experience. These include:

1. Development of technical facility. The ability to play difficult orchestral passages in performance is a necessity and must be given considerable attention. It was the feeling of all three conductors with whom I talked, that the students possessed this skill.

2. Development of musicianship. This was emphasized by the conductors as one of the most underdeveloped facets. The principal players of the Boston Symphony, who worked with the fellowship students in sectionals and in chamber music groups, did quite a bit in this area. Also, those men who conducted the orchestra tried in rehearsal to stress musical playing.

3. Development of repertoire and sight-reading ability. As most of the students had had only limited orchestral experience, it was thought to be important to cover as large a repertoire as possible in the eight week period. This involved sight-reading, as well as preparing concerts at the rate of one per week.

4. Development of a unified orchestral style. In effect, this is the attempt to make a cohesive group out of the many members, who have not ever played together before. This includes all the refinements which differentiate the finest orchestras from the ubiquitous pick-up groups. The development of this kind of finesse requires long hours of rehearsal, phrase by phrase, note by note, until all the parts fit perfectly with each other. Time for this type of work is limited at Tanglewood.

Obviously, there is not adequate rehearsal time during eight weeks to accomplish all of these goals to the point reached by a major symphony orchestra. However, the conductors were unanimous in thinking that the students had at least adequate technical facility and that this was not the real problem. Any technical difficulties could be taken to the principal players in the Boston Symphony, whose suggestions could be applied in private practice. Hence the solving of technical problems could be handled outside the orchestra rehearsal for the most part.

Likewise, the development of musicianship can be undertaken in small groups, and even in private sessions. Individualistic, soloistic playing can be learned through the teachers and chamber music coaches. Phrasing and dynamic control in orchestral playing can be achieved to some extent during sectional rehearsals. This training ob-

With this kind of schedule the refinements must wait.

Louis Speyer felt that although the students lacked musicianship, they can and should learn this from their teachers in private study or through chamber music, and that this really should not be a prime function of the full orchestra rehearsal.

Charles Wilson stressed that the principal aim of the Fellowship Orchestra is to prepare the students for a professional playing career. In the smaller American orchesference can be seen already: in the U.S. only the large orchestras, with experienced players, can afford adequate rehearsal time, while the small orchestras, with inexperienced players, cannot. In Europe it is the other way around. The smaller orchestras, with only a few operas and a few symphony concerts to prepare each season, can have more rehearsal time per work to be performed than the large opera houses, or the radio station orchestras, or the Berlin Philharmonic. This means that a small orches-

Two Trends in Teaching Music: The Comprehensive and the Cross-Cultural

by John M. Eddins

■ According to such educators as Jerome Bruner, the most comprehensive learning takes place when the learner is involved in a total process rather than in the piecemeal absorption of isolated facets of that process.

It follows that any serious student of music should develop structural, analytical, performance, and listening skills by composing, performing, and critically evaluating music in various styles, rather than by studying these skills as separate, self-contained "subjects." In this way, the acquisition of musical skills will be based on and integrated with the comprehension of musical processes, rather than be prerequisite to such comprehension. In combination with this, music educators should learn about all kinds of music—from the best practitioners of the art. This second principle, though seemingly obvious, has too often been neglected in practice in the past.

These educational principles are being implemented in many programs and schools throughout the country. One example of a successful program incorporating this approach is the institute for music educators conducted by New England Conservatory at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox, Massachusetts. During the summer of 1968, two courses were offered, both meeting two hours daily for six weeks, and both carrying four graduate credits at the Conservatory. Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the Conservatory, coordinated both classes, and Donald Harris, assistant to the president for academic affairs, was overall director of the project.

The class in contemporary composition, taught by Mr. Alper, composed a number of short exploratory works for various instruments and sonorities, beginning with simple organizations of "nonmusical" sounds, using voices, then sound-producing objects. Next the class improvised on twelve-tone rows and composed pieces based on the same rows. There were totally serialized

The author is Assistant Professor of Music, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois. This article originated with the author's participation at the 1968 New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts.

SEP
MUSICIANS JOURNAL WAS MOVED UMENTALIST TON, ILL.
LY 16,000
969

NEEDED – MORE EMPHASIS ON

The Tanglewood Fellowship Orchestra through the

Last summer it was my pleasure to spend three weekends at Tanglewood. In addition to the fine performances by the Boston Symphony, with renowned soloists, and the chamber music concerts with professional performers, there were many concerts by the fellowship students – also on a high level. The fellowship students are carefully selected college and post-college age young people and all receive a fellowship for the summer, which pays most if not all of their expenses during their stay at Tanglewood. The fellowship students are either music majors in college, or already embarking on professional careers in performance. In addition to instrumentalists, there are 40 singers, who form the nucleus of the chorus, in addition to doing solo work and opera. Also, there are pianists, composers, and conductors on fellowship there.

The principal student group for the instrumentalists is the Fellowship Orchestra, and it was with this group that I was most concerned. A survey of the members of this group resulted in an earlier article, "The Factors Which Produce the Serious Music Student," which appeared in the November, 1968 Instrumentalist. In addition to learning the background and impressions of the students in the orchestra, it was also interesting to talk to the conductors of the orchestra and to compare their feelings about the group.

Several men work with the Fellowship Orchestra during the summer. In addition to Erich Leinsdorf, who is musical director of the entire Tanglewood program, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Louis Speyer, oboist and English hornist with the Boston Symphony, and chamber music coach at Tanglewood, are the principal representatives from the Symphony itself. The fellowship conductors also direct the orchestra, as well as guest conductors such as Aaron Copland.

It was my privilege to talk at length with Charles Wilson and Louis Speyer, as well as with a German conductor, Stefan Minde, who was there on a fellowship. Minde had conducted at the opera house in Trier, Germany, for six years prior to coming to Tanglewood, and was going from there to San Francisco to be one of the conductors for the San Francisco Opera. (Minde, incidentally, was voted the outstanding fellowship conductor of the summer.) Instrumentalist readers will no doubt be interested in the remarks of these three men in regard to the playing, knowledge, and musicianship of the Fellowship Orchestra.

Louis Speyer prepared a short written statement which he gave to me at the beginning of our discussion. It is appropriate to quote it here:

> I admire our young players. Technically, they are excellent. They play avant-garde music very well; they do "tricks" on their instruments that are out of the range; but unfortunately they are losing the quality of tone we used to study so hard. The beauties of style and phrasing are foreign to them, because most of the teachers and many conductors do not ask for these. (I guess it must be to avoid giving them an inferiority complex!) The model for an orchestra should be a great string quartet, whose members use the same style, same bowings, and same interpretation. Too often in our Fellowship Orchestra we hear the same phrase played in different ways — sneaking attacks, short or long staccato, pushing the tone, etc. The students seem to try for quantity not quality.

The lack of musicianship which Louis Speyer pointed out was also stressed by Charles Wilson. In continuing the discussion, it became apparent that the program of the Fellowship Orchestra at Tanglewood is of necessity an attempt to balance various factors needed in orchestral playing, which the students should learn – or at least be exposed to – during their Tanglewood experience. These include:

1. Development of technical facility. The ability to play difficult orchestral passages in performance is a necessity and must be given considerable attention. It was the feeling of all three conductors with whom I talked, that the students possessed this skill.

2. Development of musicianship. This was emphasized by the conductors as one of the most underdeveloped facets. The principal players of the Boston Symphony, who worked with the fellowship students in sectionals and in chamber music groups, did quite a bit in this area. Also, those men who conducted the orchestra tried in rehearsal to stress musical playing.

3. Development of repertoire and sight-reading ability. As most of the students had had only limited orchestral experience, it was thought to be important to cover as large a repertoire as possible in the eight week period. This involved sight-reading, as well as preparing concerts at the rate of one per week.

4. Development of a unified orchestral style. In effect, this is the attempt to make a cohesive group out of the many members, who have not ever played together before. This includes all the refinements which differentiate the finest orchestras from the ubiquitous pick-up groups. The development of this kind of finesse requires long hours of rehearsal, phrase by phrase, note by note, until all the parts fit perfectly with each other. Time for this type of work is limited at Tanglewood.

Obviously, there is not adequate rehearsal time during eight weeks to accomplish all of these goals to the point reached by a major symphony orchestra. However, the conductors were unanimous in thinking that the students had at least adequate technical facility and that this was not the real problem. Any technical difficulties could be taken to the principal players in the Boston Symphony, whose suggestions could be applied in private practice. Hence the solving of technical problems could be handled outside the orchestra rehearsal for the most part.

Likewise, the development of musicianship can be undertaken in small groups, and even in private sessions. Individualistic, soloistic playing can be learned through the teachers and chamber music coaches. Phrasing and dynamic control in orchestral playing can be achieved to some extent during sectional rehearsals. This training ob-

With this kind of schedule the refinements must wait.

Louis Speyer felt that although the students lacked musicianship, they can and should learn this from their teachers in private study or through chamber music, and that this really should not be a prime function of the full orchestra rehearsal.

Charles Wilson stressed that the principal aim of the Fellowship Orchestra is to prepare the students for a professional playing career. In the smaller American orches-terence can be seen already: in the U.S. only the large orchestras, with experienced players, can afford adequate rehearsal time, while the small orchestras, with inexperienced players, cannot. In Europe it is the other way around. The smaller orchestras, with only a few operas and a few symphony concerts to prepare each season, can have more rehearsal time per work to be performed than the large opera houses, or the radio station orchestras, or the Berlin Philharmonic. This means that a small orches-

Two Trends in Teaching Music: The Comprehensive and the Cross-Cultural

by John M. Eddins

■ According to such educators as Jerome Bruner, the most comprehensive learning takes place when the learner is involved in a total process rather than in the piecemeal absorption of isolated facets of that process.

It follows that any serious student of music should develop structural, analytical, performance, and listening skills by composing, performing, and critically evaluating music in various styles, rather than by studying these skills as separate, self-contained "subjects." In this way, the acquisition of musical skills will be based on and integrated with the comprehension of musical processes, rather than be prerequisite to such comprehension. In combination with this, music educators should learn about all kinds of music—from the best practitioners of the art. This second principle, though seemingly obvious, has too often been neglected in practice in the past.

These educational principles are being implemented in many programs and schools throughout the country. One example of a successful program incorporating this approach is the institute for music educators conducted by New England Conservatory at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox, Massachusetts. During the summer of 1968, two courses were offered, both meeting two hours daily for six weeks, and both carrying four graduate credits at the Conservatory. Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the Conservatory, coordinated both classes, and Donald Harris, assistant to the president for academic affairs, was overall director of the project.

The class in contemporary composition, taught by Mr. Alper, composed a number of short exploratory works for various instruments and sonorities, beginning with simple organizations of "nonmusical" sounds, using voices, then sound-producing objects. Next the class improvised on twelve-tone rows and composed pieces based on the same rows. There were totally serialized

The author is Assistant Professor of Music, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois. This article originated with the author's participation at the 1968 New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts.

The bands of the future should be better than the bands of the past. They have many more well-trained teachers and directors. They have many more well-trained musicians from which to choose. They have a much wider choice of excellent literature from which to select their program material. They have better instruments on which to play. Modern technology has given them superior communication facilities and they have more knowledgeable and discriminating audiences before which to perform.

The bands of the future will play increasingly important roles as serious and challenging mediums for artistic musical expression. But while growing in artistic stature, it is hoped that they will not lose their common touch. Band music has a unique appeal to people in all walks of life, from country villages to the street corners, as well as in the concert halls of the largest cities. It must continue to reflect the best of the past traditions and at the same time keep up to date with modern musical tastes and trends so that it can fulfill its various functions with vitality, vigor, and effectiveness.

Will there be another Sousa? I doubt it. But his spirit and influence will live on, in his music and in the lives and work of talented, dedicated young band directors, who, while still alert to changing times and new concepts, will carry on the ideals which Sousa espoused.

I think if Sousa were alive today he would be right here among us helping to work for the improvement of bands. For, as Kenneth Berger says in his excellent little book, "The March King and His Band:"

> "More than builders of empires, more than presidents and statesmen, John Philip Sousa illustrates the spirit that is America's. He made that spirit breathe, made it throb in the hearts of generations of Americans with the martial strains of his music. His life was full-flavored with incident and anecdote, with mellow humor and kindly wisdom. By using well the genius entrusted to him by his Creator, he won success and happiness in advancing one of the finer qualities of human nature — the love of music."

What nobler ideals can a band director have, whether he be directing a band in a school or college, in the armed forces, or in a public park?

In his interesting book "Of Men and Music," Deems Taylor has the following to say about John Philip Sousa:

> "Wherever he has gone, I am sure he found a welcome. There is a dining hall in the Elysian Fields marked GRADE A COMPOSERS ONLY. If you could look in at the door tonight, you would probably see him there; perhaps not at the speakers table with Wagner, Beethoven, and Mozart and Bach and Debussy and the rest, but somewhere in the room — at a small table, possibly with Herbert and Strauss and Delibes.
>
> 'However did he get in here,' asks some disapproving — a small small town Kapellmeister probably . . . 'Who got him in?'
>
> The guide smiles. 'The marching men. The men who had to go long miles, on an empty belly, under a hot sun, or through a driving rain. They made us take him in. They said he made things easier for them.' "

I do not believe that the stirring rhythms and sounds of band music are dead or are in permanent danger of becoming less popular. As one who has spent a lifetime in the band profession, I look forward with anticipation and confidence to exciting new horizons in the expansion of the art of music in which the band music of the future will play an even more important role in the cultural life of this nation.

Bibliography

Bachman, Harold. The Biggest Boom in Dixie. Campus Book Store, University of Florida, 1968.

Bachman, Harold. "Declaration of Principles." CBDNA Forum. The Instrumentalist. November 1964, pp. 63-65.

Bachman, Harold. The Role of Band Music In American Culture. Not published.

Berger, Kenneth. The March King and His Band. 1957. Band Associates, Inc., 647 Longmere Drive, Kent, Ohio.

Goldman, Richard Franko. "Fifty Years of Band Programs and Audiences." The Instrumentalist. June 1968, pp. 42-43.

Goldman, Richard Franko. The Wind Band. Allyn and Bacon, Inc. Boston, 1961.

Sousa, John Philip. Marching Along. Hale, Cushman & Flint. Boston, 1928.

Taylor, Deems. Of Men and Music. Simon & Shuster. New York, 1937.

Weeks, R. Stanwood. "We Need A Modern Day Sousa." Address at 8th Annual Meeting of the North American Band Directors Coordinating Committee, Sherman Hotel, Chicago, December 1967.

Prepared for the 15th National Conference of the College Band Directors National Association, Knoxville, Tennessee, February 11, 1969

Based on a paper presented before the 9th Annual Meeting of the North American Band Directors' Coordinating Committee in the Sherman Hotel in Chicago, December 18, 1968. ■

Harold Bachman's "Million Dollar Band" shown in Plant Park, Tampa, Florida, during the winter season of 1927.

MUSICIANSHIP

John Christie, editor

Eyes of its Conductors

viously must be supplemented by emphasis on musicianship in orchestral rehearsals. However, from a realistic standpoint, the enormous repertoire covered and the tight schedule preclude great emphasis on musicianship during full rehearsals.

Work toward a unified orchestral sound also must be somewhat shortchanged in the Tanglewood situation. First of all the administrators realize that any such attempts are really just an exercise, since the group will exist for only eight weeks. It would nevertheless be valuable, in the minds of all the conductors, if more time could be spent on the refinements which turn ten cellists into a cello section, and which transform two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, and two bassoons into a woodwind section which phrases alike, matches in pitch, and feels the music together. From the standpoint of the members going out into the professional world, such skills are very necessary. A young player will be measured in part by how well he fits into an already established pattern of playing within a given orchestra.

Work on building repertoire and developing sight-reading skills goes on at a prodigious pace. Each student participates in chamber music groups and does solo work, in addition to the frequent orchestral performances, each with the necessary sectional rehearsals. In addition, the Fellowship Orchestra plays for the contemporary opera production commissioned by the Fromm Foundation each summer.

It is unfortunate, and somewhat paradoxical, that the tras, where most of these young players will be starting, this involves competent sight-reading and the ability to play concerts with minimal rehearsal.

Stefan Minde was of the opinion that more time should be spent on the fine points of orchestral playing, and on developing a unified sound in the orchestra, especially in the string sections. He felt these skills would be transferable to other orchestras to a degree adequate to warrant their emphasis at Tanglewood.

It is difficult to continue this comparison of views without admitting to and explaining something of the differences between the situation of European and American orchestras. These differences are substantial and affect the thinking of the conductors considerably in this context.

At a relatively small European opera house, such as Trier, where Stefan Minde conducted, city tax money supports complete facilities for opera. This includes the required solo singers, a chorus, an orchestra, a ballet company, and all the technical personnel needed to produce opera. The productions are done on a somewhat limited scale, and the number of works in the repertoire per season is also limited. However, there are performances several nights a week, if not every night, for most of the year. In many cases, the orchestra plays symphony concerts in addition to playing for the operas. Ballets are also given throughout the season. The orchestra plays for oratorio performances, often with the local choral society (in many cases strengthened by paid members of the opera chorus). Hence the personnel from the opera house form the nu-

Two Trends in Teaching Music: The Comprehensive and the Cross-Cultural

by John M. Eddins

■ Accord
Jerome Br hensive Le the learne process ra mental absor of that pro
It follow
dent of mus
tural, and listening s forming, a music in a by studyin self-contai way, the skills will grated wit musical p proequisite
In combi educators kinds of m titioners ple, has ons, has in practic
These c being imp grams and country, c ful progra proach is ucators co Conservat sic Conte
During t courses w two hours both carry at the Con chamman department coordinate
All Hart
dent for a all direct position.
The ch posed a tory wor and sonot ple, orga

MUSICIANSHIP John Christie, editor

Eyes of its Conductors

viously must be supplemented by emphasis on musicianship in orchestral rehearsals. However, from a realistic standpoint, the enormous repertoire covered and the tight schedule preclude great emphasis on musicianship during full rehearsals.

Work toward a unified orchestral sound also must be somewhat shortchanged in the Tanglewood situation. First of all the administrators realize that any such attempts are really just an exercise, since the group will exist for only eight weeks. It would nevertheless be valuable, in the minds of all the conductors, if more time could be spent on the refinements which turn ten cellists into a cello section, and which transform two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, and two bassoons into a woodwind section which phrases alike, matches in pitch, and feels the music together. From the standpoint of the members going out into the professional world, such skills are very necessary. A young player will be measured in part by how well he fits into an already established pattern of playing within a given orchestra.

Work on building repertoire and developing sight-reading skills goes on at a prodigious pace. Each student participates in chamber music groups and does solo work, in addition to the frequent orchestral performances, each with the necessary sectional rehearsals. In addition, the Fellowship Orchestra plays for the contemporary opera production commissioned by the Fromm Foundation each summer.

It is unfortunate, and somewhat paradoxical, that the skill which the students already possess to the highest degree – technique – is the one which is called for most in their Tanglewood program. It is the prime skill needed in sight-reading and is also the first requirement for a student orchestra which programs a full concert every week. With this kind of schedule the refinements must wait.

Louis Speyer felt that although the students lacked musicianship, they can and should learn this from their teachers in private study or through chamber music, and that this really should not be a prime function of the full orchestra rehearsal.

Charles Wilson stressed that the principal aim of the Fellowship Orchestra is to prepare the students for a professional playing career. In the smaller American orchestras, where most of these young players will be starting, this involves competent sight-reading and the ability to play concerts with minimal rehearsal.

Stefan Minde was of the opinion that more time should be spent on the fine points of orchestral playing, and on developing a unified sound in the orchestra, especially in the string sections. He felt these skills would be tranferable to other orchestras to a degree adequate to warrant their emphasis at Tanglewood.

It is difficult to continue this comparison of views without admitting to and explaining something of the differences between the situation of European and American orchestras. These differences are substantial and affect the thinking of the conductors considerably in this context.

At a relatively small European opera house, such as Trier, where Stefan Minde conducted, city tax money supports complete facilities for opera. This includes the required solo singers, a chorus, an orchestra, a ballet company, and all the technical personnel needed to produce opera. The productions are done on a somewhat limited scale, and the number of works in the repertoire per season is also limited. However, there are performances several nights a week, if not every night, for most of the year. In many cases, the orchestra plays symphony concerts in addition to playing for the operas. Ballets are also given throughout the season. The orchestra plays for oratorio performances, often with the local choral society (in many cases strengthened by paid members of the opera chorus). Hence the personnel from the opera house form the nucleus for most of the professional music activities in the town. The members of the orchestra have year-round contracts, and make a living wage solely from playing in the orchestra. The smaller the town, the lower the wage, and also the more limited the repertoire. One significant difference can be seen already: in the U.S. only the large orchestras, with experienced players, can afford adequate rehearsal time, while the small orchestras, with inexperienced players, cannot. In Europe it is the other way around. The smaller orchestras, with only a few operas and a few symphony concerts to prepare each season, can have more rehearsal time per work to be performed than the large opera houses, or the radio station orchestras, or the Berlin Philharmonic. This means that a small orches-

The bands of the future should be better than the bands of the past. They have many more well-trained teachers and directors. They have many more well-trained musicians from which to choose. They have a much wider choice of excellent literature from which to select their program material. They have better instruments on which to play. Modern technology has given them superior communication facilities and they have more knowledgeable and discriminating audiences before which to perform.

The bands of the future will play increasingly important roles as serious and challenging mediums for artistic musical expression. But while growing in artistic stature, it is hoped that they will not lose their common touch. Band music has a unique appeal to people in all walks of life, from country villages to the street corners, as well as in the concert halls of the largest cities. It must continue to reflect the best of the past traditions and at the same time keep up to date with modern musical tastes and trends so that it can fulfill its various functions with vitality, vigor, and effectiveness.

Will there be another Sousa? I doubt it. But his spirit and influence will live on, in his music and in the lives and work of talented, dedicated young band directors, who, while still alert to changing times and new concepts, will carry on the ideals which Sousa espoused.

If Sousa were alive today he would be [illegible]

"Wherever he has gone, I am sure he found a welcome. There is a dining hall in the Elysian Fields marked CHADE. A CONPOSERS ONLY. If you could look in at the door tonight, you would probably see him there; perhaps not at the speakers table with Wagner, Beethoven, and Mozart and Bach and Debussy and the rest, but somewhere in the room — at a small table, possibly with Herbert and Strauss and Dahlies.

"However did he get in here," asks some disapproving — a small small town Kapellmeister probably . . . "Who got him in?"

The quite smiles. "The marching men. The men who had to go long miles, on an empty belly, under a hot sun, or through a driving rain. They made us take him in. They said he made things easier for them."

I do not believe that the stirring rhythms and sounds of band music are dead or are in permanent danger of becoming less popular. As one who has spent a lifetime in the band profession, I look forward with anticipation and confidence to exciting new horizons in the expansion of the art of music in which the band music of the future will play an even more important role in the cultural life of this nation.

Bibliography

Bachman, Harold. The Biggest Boom in Drum. Campus Book Store, University of Florida, 1968.

Bachman, Harold. "Declaration of Principles." (BIDNA Forum. The Instrumentalist. November 1964, pp. 65-66.

Bachman, Harold. The Role of Band Music in American Culture. Not published.

Berger, Kenneth. The March King and His Band. 1952. Band Associates, Inc., 647 Longmere Drive, Kent, Ohio.

Two Trends in Teaching Music: The Comprehensive and the Cross-Cultural

by John M. Eddins

■ According to such educators as Jerome Bruner, the most comprehensive learning takes place when the learner is involved in a total process rather than in the piecemeal absorption of isolated facets of that process.

It follows that any serious student of music should develop structural, analytical, performance, and listening skills by composing, performing, and critically evaluating music in various styles, rather than by studying these skills as separate, self-contained "subjects." In this way, the acquisition of musical skills will be based on and integrated with the comprehension of musical processes, rather than be prerequisite to such comprehension. In combination with this, music educators should learn about all kinds of music—from the best practitioners of the art. This second principle, though seemingly obvious, has too often been neglected in practice in the past.

These educational principles are being implemented in many programs and schools throughout the country. One example of a successful program incorporating this approach is the institute for music educators conducted by New England Conservatory at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox, Massachusetts. During the summer of 1968, two courses were offered, both meeting two hours daily for six weeks, and both carrying four graduate credits at the Conservatory. Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the Conservatory, coordinated both classes, and Donald Harris, assistant to the president for academic affairs, was overall director of the project.

The class in contemporary composition, taught by Mr. Alper, composed a number of short exploratory works for various instruments and sonorities, beginning with simple organizations of "nonmusical" sounds, using voices, then sound-producing objects. Next the class improvised on twelve-tone rows and composed pieces based on the same rows. There were totally serialized tra with less than the best players, or inexperienced players, can achieve a higher performance level than would be possible with an orchestra of this type in this country. The young professional player in Germany does not have to "free lance" ("starve"), in numerous odd jobs in order to make a living and gain the necessary experience to get into a fine orchestra. He can go right into a small orchestra after graduation and make a living wage at his playing. Because many of the other members of this orchestra are in the same situation, much rehearsing is needed to put on an acceptable performance of say, Der Freischutz. However, this time is available and the conductors expect that this rehearsal will be necessary.

The author is Assistant Professor of Music, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois. This article originated with the author's participation at the 1968 New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts.

With these remarks on European orchestras in mind, the comments of Stefan Minde can be evaluated with an understanding of the background which produced them. In a discussion of over an hour (conducted in German) Minde expressed great admiration for the American players and for our school music system which produces such a large number of technically proficient players. There is nothing of this scope in Western Europe today and there is no doubt that we have more fine young players per million inhabitants than the Western Europeans. It was Minde's impression that our college graduates in performance were better prepared for a career than their Western European counterparts. While this is indeed complimentary, it must be qualified with a consideration of where these people are headed. The American graduate must get a job in a relatively major orchestra if he is going to earn his living playing. Hence our graduates must be quite experienced to start with. The European graduate is headed for a small orchestra where experience is to be gained and where his inexperience is anticipated. It was Minde's feeling that the Tanglewood students were expected to prepare too much repertoire each summer. He felt that more time should be spent in polishing a few works over the entire summer, so that the orchestra could learn to play as a unit.

Louis Speyer was impressed by the ability of the students to handle contemporary music. In discussing the difficulty of some of the avant-garde works, he made the interesting comment that he had played oboe in the Paris orchestra which premiered Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," causing the now-famous riot afterwards. He said that when the parts for the "Rite" were passed out at that time, the music was every bit as revolutionary to them as anything being written today is to us. Many of the men in that orchestra frankly thought it would be impossible to play. Hence what is difficult and what is avant-garde are purely relative.

After Wilson and Speyer had given their views on the problems of the orchestra members, I asked them if any attempt were ever made to communicate these feelings back to the schools of music from which the students came. I was surprised to hear that there had not been. It would seem a necessary function of the professional training programs, such as Tanglewood, to communicate with the music training institutions. Perhaps this article can be a first step in this direction. If the schools of music want to place their graduates in professional playing jobs, then they must be sensitive to the criticisms of their students offered by the professionals.

In summation, the student who aspires to a professional career needs more experience in making music, more emphasis on musicianship, more opportunity to rehearse beyond the point where all the notes have been mastered — where the meaning of the music is the goal. This student also needs to cover a larger repertoire of works before graduation and he needs to begin to develop the steely nerves of the professional who does not flinch under pressure. This means more student performances. Hence we come again to the paradox that the student needs both more performances for sight-reading and repertoire, and fewer performances so that there can be more time for careful rehearsal and polishing. This is not an easy dilemma to solve.

Perhaps all orchestral students should be required to play in two orchestras — a reading orchestra, which also gives frequent concerts, as well as an orchestra which would rehearse beyond the notes and perform only infrequently, but with a high degree of musicianship and finesse. Much technique can be developed in private study and through individual practice. Musicianship can be learned, to some extent, in performance practice classes. An understanding of style and the various periods can be studied in music history classes. Musicianship can also be learned through playing chamber music and solos with piano accompaniment and by listening to live and recorded performances of great artists. Finally, much can be learned in full orchestra rehearsals, providing that the conductor himself possesses this musicianship.

The Tanglewood orchestra is preparing young American orchestral players to take jobs in American orchestras. The people there have done a remarkable job, in terms of the number of professionals now playing in major orchestras who have been students at Tanglewood. However, the men who administer the Tanglewood Fellowship Orchestra are not satisfied and are looking toward improving their program through a new and better balance of the four elements of training mentioned above. It is through airing their feelings among themselves, and through informing the schools of music of their impressions of the students, that such improvements can come about. With these improvements will come more suitable music school curricula, better personnel for the symphony orchestras, and eventually a higher level of performance in professional concerts. When these goals are realized we must say "Thank you" to Charles Wilson, Louis Speyer, and Stefan Minde — as well as others at Tanglewood and elsewhere — for their part in this progress. ■ the finer qualities of human nature — the love of music."

What nobler ideals can a band director have, whether he be directing a band in a school or college, in the armed forces, or in a public park?

In his interesting book "Of Men and Music," Deems Taylor has the following to say about John Philip Sousa:

lege Band Directors National Association. Knoxville, Tennessee, February 11, 1969

Based on a paper presented before the 9th Annual Meeting of the North American Band Directors' Coordinating Committee in the Sherman Hotel in Chicago, December 18, 1968. ■

Harold Bachman's "Million Dollar Band" shown in Plant Park, Tampa, Florida, during the winter season of 1927.

Two Trends in Teaching Music: The Comprehensive and the Cross-Cultural

by John M. Eddins

■ According to such educators
Jerome Bruner, the most comp hensive learning takes place wh the learner is involved in a t process rather than in the pie mental absorption of isolated fac of that process.

It follows that any serious s dent of music should develop str tural, analytical, performance a listening skills by composing, p forming, and critically evaluat music in various styles, rather t by studying these skills as separa self-contained "subjects." In t way, the acquisition of musi skills will be based on and in grated with the comprehension musical processes, rather than prerequisite to such comprehensi
In combination with this, mu educators should learn about kinds of music—from the best pr titioners of the art. This secon principle, though seemingly of ous, has too often been neglect in practice in the past.

These educational principles a being implemented in many p grams and schools throughout t country. One example of a succe ful program incorporating this a proach is the institute for music e ucators conducted by Xem Engla Conservatory at the Berkshire M sic Center, Lenox, Massachuset
During the summer of 1965, t courses were offered, both inten two hours daily for six weeks, a both carrying four graduate credi at the Conservatory. Herbert Alp chairman of the music educatio department at the Conservatory coordinated both classes, and Do ald Harris, assistant to the pro dent for academic affairs, was ov all director of the project.

The class in contemporary co position, taught by Mr. Alper, co posed a number of short explora tory works for various instrume and sonorities, beginning with si ple organizations of nonmusica

MPHASIS ON

Orchestra through the string quartet, whose members use the s, and same interpretation. Too often in we hear the same phase played in dif-ttacks, short or long staccato, pushing the em to try for quantity not quality.

nship which Louis Speyer pointed y Charles Wilson. In continuing the apparent that the program of the at Tanglewood is of necessity an rious factors needed in orchestral dents should learn – or at least be eir Tanglewood experience. These technical facility. The ability to passages in performance is a necesconsiderable attention. It was the ductors with whom I talked, that this skill.

musicianship. This was emphasized one of the most underdeveloped players of the Boston Symphony, fellowship students in sectionals groups, did quite a bit in this area.
onducted the orchestra tried in real playing.

epertoire and sight-reading ability.
s had had only limited orchestral ught to be important to cover as ossible in the eight week period.
ding, as well as preparing con-
per week.

unified orchestral style. In effect, make a cohesive group out of the ve not ever played together before.
finements which differentiate the he ubiquitous pick-up groups. The d of finesse requires long hours of rase, note by note, until all the parts ther. Time for this type of work is ot adequate rehearsal time during lish all of these goals to the point mphony orchestra. However, the nous in thinking that the students echnical facility and that this was ny technical difficulties could be players in the Boston Symphony, d be applied in private practice.

hnical problems could be handled hearsal for the most part.

pment of musicianship can be ups, and even in private sessions.
playing can be learned through er music coaches. Phrasing and estral playing can be achieved to ional rehearsals. This training ob-n already: in the U.S. only the large erienced players, can afford adequate le the small orchestras, with inexpernot. In Europe it is the other way r orchestras, with only a few operas concerts to prepare each season, can time per work to be performed than ses, or the radio station orchestras, or onic. This means that a small orches-they perceive them directly, without the limitations of an intervening conceptualized notational system. Perhaps music educators should de-emphasize conceptualization as the immediate goal of musical learning and pay increased attention to perceptual experience and patterned behavior.

The presuppositions behind many of our concepts will have to be reexamined if we are going to cope successfully with the music of other cultures. In our culture we tend to think of time in the Newtonian sense, that is, as a continuum with some sort of imposed regular articulations. But this notion of time does not describe reality for everyone; time can be conceived in a completely different way. African musicians apparently do not think of time as an abstraction; they simply think of rhythmic patterns as patterns per se. For them, rhythm is learned not as patterns superimposed over a regular pulse, but to the extent that there is a regular pulse, this is superimposed over the patterns, and the patterns themselves constitute the basis for the rhythm. As a result, they can often create and combine much more intricate patterns than we can using our complex notational system.

No account of the Institute would be complete without mention of its location at the Berkshire Music Center. The full resources of the Center were available to the participants, including free admission to all concerts and rehearsals. The programs of new music given during the Festival of Contemporary Music, and the three Contemporary Trends concerts, which included jazz and folk, Indian music, and rock, were particularly relevant to the Institute. There were also, of course, the regular weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as concerts by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, various chamber groups, and soloists, for those who still had time and energy left to attend.

During the summer of 1969, the Conservatory offered a second Institute. The class in contemporary composition was repeated, the study of jazz was expanded into two three-week seminars, and a seminar in recent trends in music education was conducted by various prominent leaders in the field. The availability of these institutes is certainly an encouraging development for music educators, and more programs of this nature should be offered all over the nation.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 51,000

SEP 1969

works, works in pan-diatonic style, works based on quartal harmonies and other symmetrical structures, bitonal works, and works for percussion instruments. Since all compositions were performed and judged by the members of the class, the performance media were limited to what was available within the class. This provided some practical problems in handling diverse sonorities in such unusual combinations as a sextet for piano, viola, flute, clarinet, trumpet, and trombone, and a trio for flute, clarinet, and alto saxophone. The members of the class also performed a selection of their best compositions in a special concert given as a part of "Tanglewood on Parade."

By starting with current compositional techniques, the class quickly learned to handle musical materials without having to acquire a detailed technical proficiency in a specific medium. This generated a freedom of expression that, along with the stimulus of the class members' involvement in the performance of their own works, resulted in a total production of over eighty compositions during a period of six weeks—this from a class of only eight people, most of whom had previously composed little or no music! By using untypical materials, such as objects from the bedroom or the inside of the piano, they freed themselves from the restrictions on their creative energies, restrictions imposed by the standard formulas and written symbols of traditional music.

The second class consisted of a series of seminars presented by outstanding professional musicians. One week each was devoted to (a) jazz, under David Baker and Gerald Coker, (b) Indian music, under Ali Akbar Khan and Shankar Ghosh, plus one session by Ravi Shankar and his troupe, (c) African music, under Ghanian master drummer Desmund Tay, and (d) theoretical studies, under Robert Cogan.

Each of the artists presented his materials in his own way, depending on how he could best understand and express his work. Yet their strikingly different modes of presentation all proved effective. The Indian musicians taught through lectures and demonstrations with a minimum of participation by the class in the actual music-making. They assumed that the subtleties and complexities of their music could not be acquired without long years of study, and they convincingly demonstrated this through their impressive performing ability. In direct contrast, Desmund Tay taught several complex African rhythms by having the class members learn the patterns themselves. As they played these patterns together, he coordinated the performance on the master drum, improvising a structure that included the simultaneous combination of all these patterns. The class could understand the complexities of his art because they themselves were participating in its structure.

The acquisition of musical skills should be based on and integrated with the comprehension of musical processes.

David Baker and Gerald Coker presented jazz through a combination of these two approaches. They first gave a theoretical exposition of the pitch organizations in jazz; then the class applied these principles by learning some chord changes and practicing improvisations.

There was no apparent effort to coordinate the presentation of the separate artists; yet as the program progressed, each facet seemed to lend meaning to and alter the meaning of the others. The number and intensity of provocative and stimulating ideas and experiences forced the participants to make relationships themselves in order to integrate the parts into a rational whole. The depth of their understanding was clear when techniques studied in the seminar began to appear in compositions written by the class.

The week of Robert Cogan's seminar on theoretical studies coincided with the Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, during which one of his aleatory compositions was performed. He discussed the concept of nonlinearity and other ideas that influenced him in the creation of the work, and the class attended the final rehearsal as well as the performance. The class thus had the rare opportunity to observe closely the process of creating an avant-garde composition. A major feature of the work was the chance combination of partially improvised timbres.

Many of our presuppositions will have to be reexamined if we are going to cope successfully with the music of other cultures.

During the final two weeks, several artists who are active in the performance of contemporary music gave lecture-demonstrations on experimental instrumental sounds available through nontraditional playing techniques and ways in which such sounds are being employed by composers today. These performers included John Heiss (flute), Paul Zukofsky (violin), Harvey Phillips (tuba), Gilbert Kalish (prepared piano), and Frank Nazzari (clarinet, bassoon, and saxophone, as used in jazz).

The necessity for music educators to learn from performing artists was well illustrated in the seminars because some experiences common to several of the artists seemed to run counter to accepted educational theories. The elaborate improvisations in jazz, Indian music, and African music are all based on the instantaneous retrieval and appropriate rearrangement of prelearned pitch and rhythm patterns. These patterns are learned almost exclusively through rote repetition, and they represent patterned perceptual behavior rather than highly conceptualized abstractions. The Indians use a system of vocal syllables, comparable to the Western sol-fa system, to represent pitch relations. They, as well as the Africans, also have elaborate systems of vocal sounds to represent every nuance of tone possible on their instruments, especially the drums. According to Shankar Ghosh, Indian drummers learn all of their prodigiously intricate and subtle rhythm patterns by first vocalizing them, then transferring the vocal equivalents to the drums. It is quite probable that jazz, African, and Indian musicians are able to manage such intricate rhythmic complexities because they are concerned only with the patterns as

MENTALIST
TON, ILL.
LY 16,000

969

1087

Tanglewood

Our Teachers May Be in Another World

by Harris Danziger

■ I remember as children we were taken to the mountains for our summer holidays. In those days, before the advent of radio and television, children had to create their own diversions and entertainments. One of ours was to watch multiple sunsets from different positions. Each evening a group of us would walk to a high spot and watch the sun go down. Before it completely disappeared, we would scurry to a higher spot and watch it go down again. It was not unusual for the more agile among us to see three or four sunsets in a single evening.

In some ways, this experience has always symbolized for me the nature of the child's world in that preatomic age. The world was his, and he could apply such laws to it as pleased him. Who said there was only one sunset a day? Above all, he could watch each new horizon with no obligation but to admire the changing colors and cloud shapes; he needed to do nothing about them but admire.

From the vantage point of maturity, who is to say that the child was altogether wrong? Anyone who maintains that the sun sets each day at a time stated in geological tables will have an argument on his hands when he meets his first astronaut. But before the child in us becomes too smug about the truth of his insights, it would be well to remember that in real life new horizons really do not appear because we decide to change our position. They confront us suddenly, when we least expect them, with the additional and often frightening moral imperative that we must do something about them.

Our age, the postatomic age, has been called the Age of Anxiety. It is also an age of violence, of con-

The author is Director, The Third Street Music School Settlement, New York City, and President, National Guild of Community Music Schools. This paper was delivered as the keynote address at the annual convention of the National Guild of Community Music Schools, Los Angeles, California, November 1968.

OCT 1969

admire. Every man and boy in the stadium swings with him. And this is a necessary relationship for the continued popularity of baseball. Let us consider for a moment another unlikely (we hope) occurrence. An American dictator decides that baseball is an un-American activity. If he is a shrewd dictator, he will not close down Yankee Stadium or the Houston Astrodome. He will just forbid the teaching and playing of baseball in the schools and sandlots of the country. Organized baseball would die out in a generation.

Thus, we see there were valid considerations dictating the course music education took. Music, as we know it, could not have continued to exist without the training we have provided, and we are completely justified in asking for public support on the ground that our schools provide educated audiences for the future. But think what this has done to our curriculum. The beginning student slated to become a cultivated amateur is given essentially the same material to master as is required of the potential artist—perhaps watered down somewhat and with less rigorous demands on the part of the teacher, but in essence the same. The result is a built-in frustration that is the emotional reward of a good proportion of our students. (This frustration need not, of course, always be tragic. Jascha Heifetz and Jack Benny both studied the Kreutzer études, and both have made considerable, if disparate, contributions to our culture.)

But what of the second, the creative way? Is it, in fact, suitable only for the Mozarts and Bartóks? Has it no function in our curriculum except to train embryonic composers or to provide that vague yearning and aspiration that is summed up in the essentially cop-out word "inspiration"? The discussion at Tanglewood provided some illuminating insights. That some of the more pertinent came from nonmusicians and nonartists may point a lesson for us. Music educators may have to look beyond music for the answers to their problems—to psychology, anthropology, and the social conditions under which our students live.

It is beautiful that young men and women will fight an encrusted academic bureaucracy for the privilege of getting an education that is relevant to their time.

One of the outstanding contributions at Tanglewood was made by Professor Abraham Maslow of Brandeis University, probably the leading exponent of an increasingly influential school of psychology that in evidence, again to quote Maslow, in "making a good soup" as in writing a symphony. The difference is one of degree.

musical expression it is, and seek to incorporate it in our curricula. Let me sketch the possible results of such an incorporation.

Improvisation as an art has practically disappeared in serious music in spite of the heroic efforts being made by the aleatory groups to revive it. The keyboard harmony courses that are meant to prepare students for improvisation are dismal failures. I can, however, report from personal observation that improvisation is alive and well in Latin combos and in jazz and rock groups. They not only do it well but have fun doing it. It seems to me that vital theory departments of the future will have pop musicians in charge of keyboard harmony.

The character of the folk song material that is used may also un-teach allemandes, courantes and gigues, not to speak of minuets and gavottes. How about calypso? Poetry being such a vital part of Puerto Rican culture, it would seem to be a logical extension of our program to include courses in the creation and recitation of Spanish poetry.

Music Educators Journal

Have we music teachers paid sufficient attention to another signal our young people are flashing us: their enthusiasm for Indian music? We rightly honor Leonard Bernstein for the magnificent teacher he is, but have we learned anything from Ravi Shankar?

How many of us have attended discothèques, electric circuses, and happenings, not to cluck and bemoan, but to understand? It may well be that the writings of Tom Wolfe with his sympathetic descriptions of the subcultures of youth will be more useful to us than any standard textbook on the principles of music education.

Above all, the relationship of the settlement schools to the neighborhoods around them will undergo a fundamental change. We see some of these changes already occurring in the work of the Cleveland Music School Settlement and others sponsoring massive city-wide programs in music and other arts. What I mean is that these programs will move from a crisis stage to a normal form of a school's activity—in housing projects, nursery schools, in neighborhood happenings, and in close cooperation with the local public schools. This is the guiding philosophy behind the work of the executive director of the National Guild of Community Music Schools, Herbert Zipper, in the projects he is developing for the city of Chicago and the rural areas of Arkansas and upper New York State.

Music educators may have to look beyond music for the answers to their problems — to psychology, anthropology, and the social conditions under which our students live.

It will no longer be enough to say, as in the statement of the Guild's principles, that we "have placed the study of music within the reach of all." It is we, the schools, who must do the reaching.

There are some structural changes that will have to occur if we are to meet our historical responsibility to our students. The number of contact hours between pupil and teacher must be increased from the present average of about one hour and forty minutes to between four and five hours per week; the school year, from the present thirty-two to forty weeks plus a summer program. It is surprising how our school year has been determined by the needs and free time of middle class children whose days are far more structured than those of poorer students.

It may be objected that this look into the future that I have been providing is an ideal picture that will take a miracle to actualize. To this I will say that I believe, with that ace fund raiser, that "He who does not believe in miracles is no realist." Anything less will fail to measure up to the real problems of our time. And I ask you to remember the moral imperative under which we live: not merely to admire new horizons but to do something about them.

If I could sum up in one phrase the viewpoint I have attempted to sketch, I would quote Ezra Pound's exhortation, "Make it New!" Not that everything new is better than what is old. But that there is no danger of our overexperimentation. Our training is rooted in tradition. What is needed now is a return to tradition as it was before it became traditional.

Fundamental to the art of teaching music is the teacher's realization that what most needs improving is himself. The ancient adage, "Physician, heal thyself," applies with equal force to him. Faced with this miraculous force—music, with its seemingly endless change and variety—he must set no boundaries to his continuing attempts to master it and to understand the quality of the experience it evokes in the children he seeks to guide. ■ frontation, and above all, an age of confusion. We literally haven't the slightest idea of what was involved politically and socially in that bomb over Hiroshima. Only one thing is clear. We have the power to blow ourselves apart.

And yet, even as I watch my TV screen, with its obscene show of power arrogantly and excessively used, our situation seems to be far from hopeless and is, in fact, full of promise.

Black—as well as white and yellow—is beautiful! The increasing awareness by more and more people that this is in fact true must be regarded as a positive force for good. I find other things beautiful. I find beautiful a man struggling for his freedom—now, and not in the wild blue yonder. It is beautiful that a man will fight for the rights and privileges of first-class citizenship. It says a lot for the society he wants to bring into being. It is also beautiful that young men and women will fight an encrusted academic bureaucracy for the privilege of getting an education that is relevant to their time and can help them shape their values.

It is not at all fortuitous that some of the major confrontations of our time take place around education. For it is only education that will keep us from ripping ourselves apart.

And that brings us to where we are.

We are musicians and teachers, all interested in education. We believe that music is an integral part of all education—in fact, its most elemental form. This is almost an article of faith with us. Yet, have we convinced the American people of this? Have we in fact made this clear to other educators? The answer is obvious, as is the reason for the failure. Are we ourselves clear as to what we mean to accomplish with the music we teach?

In July and August of 1967, a group of musicians, educators, and representatives of several intellectual disciplines, labor unions, corporations, and government met at Tanglewood to consider the place of music in American society. The questions asked and discussed were fundamental. One of them was, "Why music?" You can't get much more fundamental than that. And there was the corollary question that concerns us directly, "What are the lessons for music education?"

And the dilemma for music education is this: the child is nothing if not contemporaneous, but the teacher, by virtue of his training, may be inhabiting another world.

With such a diverse group of participants, it was to be expected that the points of view expressed would be diverse and at times contradictory. Some touched on the surface aspects of problems, others contributed profound analyses of a theoretical and psychological nature. All were provocative, and the printed report of the proceedings deserves serious study by all music educators. The summation made at the end of the conference—the Tanglewood Declaration—in part reads as follows:

> We believe that education must have as major goals the art of living, the building of personal identity, and nurturing creativity. Since the study of music can contribute much to these ends, we now call for music to be placed in the core of the school curriculum.

Music in the core of the curriculum! It rings so loud and clear, and like well-trained members of the congregation, we answer, "Amen." It is only after we think about it for a while that the misgivings set in. Suppose, for an unlikely moment, that the educators of the United States turned to us music teachers and said, "Come, help us place music in the core of the curriculum." I, for one, would start out scared. Just what should we place in that core? More folk songs to sing? More young audience concerts? More classes in appreciation and theory? More instrumental lessons? Is this our contribution to the art of living, to the development of personal identity and creativity?

The question again comes back to us. What is this music we are teaching? What is it meant to accomplish?

If I attempt some practical answers to these questions, it will be readily apparent, I believe, that the answers are tentative and possibly even wrong. No matter. It may well be that at this point in our discussion no answers are possible. What is imperative is that we understand the questions.

Historically, music education, not only in this country but throughout the Western world, has followed two paths. One, which might be called emulative and participatory, is exemplified in the course of study of almost every music school or conservatory. It says to the child, "See and hear that great artist play that masterpiece. Let us try to play like him." It is the Gradus ad Parnassum of European and lately of Japanese pedagogy. Surround the child with models of excellence that he may learn good taste and form.

The second, which can only be called creative, is best known to us through the training Leopold Mozart devised for his son, Wolfgang.

The fact that music education opted so completely for the first method cannot be wholly explained by the reason usually given: that the second way is applicable only for genius, for whom in fact no rules or methods are needed or even possible.

There are perfectly good objective reasons why music education took the path it did. These reasons are rooted in the nature of the musical experience as we know it in our society. We speak of the three-way relationship between the composer, the performer, and the audience. But that is only part of the story. In reality we honor the composer but get our emotional experiences solely through a relationship between performer and audience. And to make this relationship profitable (for which, read possible), the audience must be educated to achieve at least a partial identification with the performer.

It is important that we understand this distinction, because music is fundamentally no more a performing art than baseball a spectator sport. The analogy with baseball may be helpful. When Mickey Mantle, at bat, swings at a ball, the 70,000 spectators don't just sit and emotional realignment takes place, the child will take it from there. The teacher can do much worse than to step aside for a while. Almost every human being has the capacity and the need to rearrange and reorder a portion of his environment in a way unique to himself. It is a creative need as much as capable of manipulation and on just the kind of music education we are discussing—the creative. A child can now be placed in front of a module or electronic board and with a minimum of guidance produce sounds, timbres, and rhythms interesting in themselves their music in groups. The music school of the future will mirror this in an increasing attention to group work. Of course, we will continue with string quartets and orchestras and choruses, but we will add groups like harmonica ensembles and combos. We think it proper to look beyond music for the answers to their problems — to psychology, anthropology, and the social conditions under which our students live.

equal force to man, I need what this miraculous force—music, with its seemingly endless change and variety—he must set no boundaries to his continuing attempts to master it and to understand the quality of the experience it evokes in the children he seeks to guide. ■ admire. Every man and boy in the stadium swings with him. And this is a necessary relationship for the continued popularity of baseball. Let us consider for a moment another unlikely (we hope) occurrence. An American dictator decides that baseball is an un-American activity. If he is a shrewd dictator, he will not close down Yankee Stadium or the Houston Astrodome. He will just forbid the teaching and playing of baseball in the schools and sandlots of the country. Organized baseball would die out in a generation.

1087

Thus, we see there were valid considerations dictating the course music education took. Music, as we know it, could not have continued to exist without the training we have provided, and we are completely justified in asking for public support on the ground that our schools provide educated audiences for the future. But think what this has done to our curriculum. The beginning student slated to become a cultivated amateur is given essentially the same material to master as is required of the potential artist—perhaps watered down somewhat and with less rigorous demands on the part of the teacher, but in essence the same. The result is a built-in frustration that is the emotional reward of a good proportion of our students. (This frustration need not, of course, always be tragic. Jascha Heifetz and Jack Benny both studied the Kreutzer études, and both have made considerable, if disparate, contributions to our culture.)

But what of the second, the creative way? Is it, in fact, suitable only for the Mozarts and Bartóks? Has it no function in our curriculum except to train embryonic composers or to provide that vague yearning and aspiration that is summed up in the essentially cop-out word "inspiration"? The discussion at Tanglewood provided some illuminating insights. That some of the more pertinent came from nonmusicians and nonartists may point a lesson for us. Music educators may have to look beyond music for the answers to their problems—to psychology, anthropology, and the social conditions under which our students live.

One of the outstanding contributions at Tanglewood was made by Professor Abraham Maslow of Brandeis University, probably the leading exponent of an increasingly influential school of psychology that sees a healthy human being developing from the exercise of nonverbal, aesthetic, and intuitive perceptions. Maslow's scientific investigations have centered around what he calls "peak experiences," experiences that result in the heightening of one's emotional tone and an increase in both self- and other-awareness. The more peak experiences a person has, the happier he is and the readier for more experiences, including that of learning. And the interesting thing is that while these experiences may be felt in almost any area of a person's activities, they seem to occur most frequently in two: sex and music.

(It seems that music educators, without scientific proof, have strayed intuitively into a field that has immense significance for human development. Perhaps this, our peak experience, is what keeps us in education when so many other rewards beckon elsewhere.)

I venture to suggest that this is one of the goals of music education: to bring a child in contact with a comfortable, manageable musical environment within which a peak experience may be achieved, call it wonder, love, or delight. When this emotional heightening takes place, the child will take it from there. The teacher can do much worse than to step aside for a while. Almost every human being has the capacity and the need to rearrange and reorder a portion of his environment in a way unique to himself. It is a creative need as much in evidence, again to quote Maslow, in "making a good soup" as in writing a symphony. The difference is one of degree.

It is beautiful that young men and women will fight an encrusted academic bureaucracy for the privilege of getting an education that is relevant to their time.

What we call musicality is more than the ability to reproduce pitch and rhythm patterns; it is the need to order these elements significantly. And almost every child has it. It is the gift he brings to his teacher. In return, he asks that this creative need be respected and not frustrated, and allowed to become increasingly more sensitive. In a way, the teacher-pupil relationship may be seen as an exchange of gifts.

Admittedly, music education has particular problems in providing for creativity. Elementary teachers of painting and sculpture have it easier. We cannot place a child before a piano and ask him to express himself in the way he can with finger paint, clay, and dance. But we can provide the environment in which he will be encouraged and stimulated to react creatively. To me, the prime value of the work of Carl Orff lies in the presentation of just such a framework.

Recently, we have been presented with an important tool in the form of electronic music. This type of musical composition, the most completely contemporary in its technology and aesthetic, is destined to have a profound effect on just the kind of music education we are discussing—the creative. A child can now be placed in front of a module or electronic board and with a minimum of guidance produce sounds, timbres, and rhythms interesting in themselves and capable of manipulation and musical expression it is, and seek to incorporate it in our curricula. Let me sketch the possible results of such an incorporation.

Improvisation as an art has practically disappeared in serious music in spite of the heroic efforts being made by the aleatory groups to revive it. The keyboard harmony courses that are meant to prepare students for improvisation are dismal failures. I can, however, report from personal observation that improvisation is alive and well in Latin combos and in jazz and rock groups. They not only do it well but have fun doing it. It seems to me that vital theory departments of the future will have pop musicians in charge of keyboard harmony.

The character of the folk song material that is used may also undergo a change. For example, a creative teacher in a summer program for poor children in the neighborhood of the Third Street Music School Settlement used these tunes among others: "Tina," a two-part African folk song in Swahili; "Las Mananitas," a two-part Mexican folk song in Spanish; "The Crane," a two-part African folk song in Lutora language; "Groundhog," a two-part American folk canon with ostinato; and "Soupa Mana Pandrepse Me," a unison Greek folk song in 5/4 time.

Many of us have always believed that the study of intervals, the ability to recognize and sing them, should precede the study of chords, which are after all more complex. But by teaching theory with the use of guitars, which we do in some classes, we find the reverse procedure more effective. Children learn to recognize and play chords as entities much sooner than they hear major and minor thirds, sixths, and certainly sevenths.

The ideal of the soloist—one exceptionally gifted individual playing for thousands of listeners—is more a European than a Latin, African, or Oriental phenomenon. The latter cultures typically make their music in groups. The music school of the future will mirror this in an increasing attention to group work. Of course, we will continue with string quartets and orchestras and choruses, but we will add groups like harmonica ensembles and combos. We think it proper to teach allemandes, courantes and gigues, not to speak of minuets and gavottes. How about calypso? Poetry being such a vital part of Puerto Rican culture, it would seem to be a logical extension of our program to include courses in the creation and recitation of Spanish poetry.

Have we music teachers paid sufficient attention to another signal our young people are flashing us: their enthusiasm for Indian music? We rightly honor Leonard Bernstein for the magnificent teacher he is, but have we learned anything from Ravi Shankar?

How many of us have attended discothèques, electric circuses, and happenings, not to cluck and bemoan, but to understand? It may well be that the writings of Tom Wolfe with his sympathetic descriptions of the subcultures of youth will be more useful to us than any standard textbook on the principles of music education.

Above all, the relationship of the settlement schools to the neighborhoods around them will undergo a fundamental change. We see some of these changes already occurring in the work of the Cleveland Music School Settlement and others sponsoring massive city-wide programs in music and other arts. What I mean is that these programs will move from a crisis stage to a normal form of a school's activity—in housing projects, nursery schools, in neighborhood happenings, and in close cooperation with the local public schools. This is the guiding philosophy behind the work of the executive director of the National Guild of Community Music Schools, Herbert Zipper, in the projects he is developing for the city of Chicago and the rural areas of Arkansas and upper New York State.

Music educators may have to look beyond music for the answers to their problems — to psychology, anthropology, and the social conditions under which our students live.

It will no longer be enough to say, as in the statement of the Guild's principles, that we "have placed the study of music within the reach of all." It is we, the schools, who must do the reaching.

There are some structural changes that will have to occur if we are to meet our historical responsibility to our students. The number of contact hours between pupil and teacher must be increased from the present average of about one hour and forty minutes to between four and five hours per week; the school year, from the present thirty-two to forty weeks plus a summer program. It is surprising how our school year has been determined by the needs and free time of middle class children whose days are far more structured than those of poorer students.

It may be objected that this look into the future that I have been providing is an ideal picture that will take a miracle to actualize. To this I will say that I believe, with that ace fund raiser, that "He who does not believe in miracles is no realist." Anything less will fail to measure up to the real problems of our time. And I ask you to remember the moral imperative under which we live: not merely to admire new horizons but to do something about them.

If I could sum up in one phrase the viewpoint I have attempted to sketch, I would quote Ezra Pound's exhortation, "Make it New!" Not that everything new is better than what is old. But that there is no danger of our overexperimentation. Our training is rooted in tradition. What is needed now is a return to tradition as it was before it became traditional.

Fundamental to the art of teaching music is the teacher's realization that what most needs improving is himself. The ancient adage, "Physician, heal thyself," applies with equal force to him. Faced with this miraculous force—music, with its seemingly endless change and variety—he must set no boundaries to his continuing attempts to master it and to understand the quality of the experience it evokes in the children he seeks to guide. ∎

In July and August of 1967, a group of musicians, educators, and representatives of several intellectual disciplines, labor unions, corporations, and government met at Tanglewood to consider the place of music in American society. The questions asked and discussed were fundamental. One of them was, "Why music?" You can't get much more fundamental than that. And there was the corollary question keep us place music in the core of the curriculum." I, for one, would start out scared. Just what should we place in that core? More folk songs to sing? More young audience concerts? More classes in appreciation and theory? More instrumental lessons? Is this our contribution to the art of living, to the development of personal identity and creativity?

The question again comes back to us. What is this music we are

And to make this relationship profitable (for which, read possible), the audience must be educated to achieve at least a partial identification with the performer.

It is important that we understand this distinction, because music is fundamentally no more a performing art than baseball a spectator sport. The analogy with baseball may be helpful. When Mickey Mantle, at bat, swings at a ball, the 70,000 spectators don't just sit and

OCT 1969

1087

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

OCT 1969

zation in what are to him significant ways. I can testify from personal experience that the results achieved are perceivable not only in the electronic tapes produced but in the enthusiasm and heightened sense of discovery that students bring to their other work, whether it is the writing of a passacaglia or the playing of a Beethoven sonata. It is imperative, I believe, that all teachers acquaint themselves with some of the principles and techniques of this mode of musical expression.

Which brings us to what may be the heart of the matter. Creativity may not be synonymous with contemporaneity, but its roots lie in contemporary modes of thought. And the dilemma for music education is this: the child is nothing if not contemporaneous, but the teacher, by virtue of his training, may be inhabiting another world. I submit that it is the teacher and not the child who must change.

It may be objected that the masterpieces of music are universal and have something to say to any age. It may be further pointed out that some great artists are able to rekindle works of another period without being seriously influenced by contemporary music. The cases of Casals and even Toscanini come to mind. Granted. But it is important for music education that we examine this a bit further. Traditional music lives for us only as we experience the sense of wonder, expectation, and newness that the music had when it was first heard. And these great artists with their extraordinarily developed sensitivity and insight into the feeling-tone of another age can give us this. Can we expect such sophistication from a child? His prime function is to come to grips with the emotions he feels here and now.

For those in the community or settlement music school movement, the word "contemporary" has another meaning beyond music. It refers to the social and economic condition in which the students exist—at the present time. And, in this light, the curriculum must once again be examined.

The settlement music schools began in the 1890's in response to the cultural needs of an uprooted population, living in ghettos, in poverty, and rat-infested tenements, unaccepted by society in general, and with no firm indication that society's economic and aesthetic goods would ever be theirs. Superficially, this is the situation that exists today. It is, obviously, not the purpose of this article to examine the profound historical and social differences between the two eras that make the conditions today so much more critical. It is enough to examine the equally profound cultural changes that characterize our own time and to assess the manner in which we meet them.

The earliest students in the community music schools were largely the children of immigrants from Europe—Russian, Polish, German, and Italian in origin. The curriculum that was offered to them was tailor-made to their needs, for the teachers were trained in the same tradition. It was both easy and proper to teach Beethoven to a child who heard Verdi sung at home. Contrary to the myth, music is not a universal language, but those who had difficulty learning English found a language that was familiar to them in the settlement music schools.

Today, the new students represent a far more complex grouping. Essentially Spanish and Afro-American in origin, their one unifying element is the non-European character of their backgrounds. To believe that the curriculum—in fact the very form—of the settlement schools can remain unchanged in the face of these diverse needs is to court becoming irrelevant. One might even say that this has already occurred, for it is obvious that the most profound musical experiences projects he ty of Chi-as of Ar-

York State. enough to nt of the we "have sic within s we, the reaching. structural o occur if torical relents. The s between increased e of about ites to be-
per week;
of young people take place outside the present the school. ks plus a
The response of serious music surprising education to the inclusion of Span- been de-ish and Afro-American elements free time into our musical speech will de- hose days termine in large measure its con- han those tinued vitality. Several approaches are possible here, but two must be this look mentioned as being intrinsically have been self-defeating, if allowed to pre- ture that dominate. One, which I shall call ualize. To the social-worker approach (and I ieve, with do use the term here in a pejora- "He who tive sense), says, "Let's find out cles is no what the kids want—rock 'n' roll, will fail to smattering of guitar—and give it to oblems of them. It will keep them happy and to rememoff the streets." The other view ive under prevalent in conservatories and col- to admire lege music departments, sees edu- something cation as the repository of an ancient and valid tradition open to ne phrase change, provided, of course, it can mpted to be fitted neatly into subject matt a Pound's ter, discipline, and courses labeled ew!" Not ethnomusicology and so on. etter than
It seems to me that LeRoi Jones ere is no has something far more useful to entation.
say to us in his brilliant and dis- tradition.
turbing book Blues People. For return to Jones, African and Afro-American it became music was created out of the conditions of the black man's life, par- of teachticularly slavery, and developed its ealization own rhetoric, its own sense of pitch proving is rhythm, and a nondiatonic scale as ge, "Phy-much suited to its character as are lies with the elements of Western music. A with this good deal of this applies also to with its Latin American music. Before now nge and we have been aware only of certain oundaries commercial vulgarizations of this to master music and have rightly consigned quality of it to an entertainment category. We the chilmust now study it for the serious

The ideal of the soloist — one exceptionally gifted individual playing for thousands of listeners — seems to be more a European than a Latin, African, or Oriental phenomenon.

In July and August of 1967, a group of musicians, educators, and representatives of several intellectual disciplines, labor unions, corporations, and government met at Tanglewood to consider the place of music in American society. The questions asked and discussed were fundamental. One of them was, "Why music?" You can't get much more fundamental than that. And there was the corollary question deep as place music in the core of the curriculum." I, for one, would start out scared. Just what should we place in that core? More folk songs to sing? More young audience concerts? More classes in appreciation and theory? More instrumental lessons? Is this our contribution to the art of living, to the development of personal identity and creativity?

The question again comes back to us. What is this music we are

And to make this relationship profitable (for which, read possible), the audience must be educated to achieve at least a partial identification with the performer.

It is important that we understand this distinction, because music is fundamentally no more a performing art than baseball a spectator sport. The analogy with baseball may be helpful. When Mickey Mantle, at bat, swings at a ball, the 70,000 spectators don't just sit and admire. Every man and boy in the stadium swings with him. And this is a necessary relationship for the continued popularity of baseball. Let us consider for a moment another unlikely (we hope) occurrence. An American dictator decides that baseball is an un-American activity. If he is a shrewd dictator, he will not close down Yankee Stadium or the Houston Astrodome. He will just forbid the teaching and playing of baseball in the schools and sandlots of the country. Organized baseball would die out in a generation.

1087

Thus, we see there were valid considerations dictating the course music education took. Music, as we know it, could not have continued to exist without the training we have provided, and we are completely justified in asking for public support on the ground that our schools provide educated audiences for the future. But think what this has done to our curriculum. The beginning student slated to become a cultivated amateur is given essentially the same material to master as is required of the potential artist—perhaps watered down somewhat and with less rigorous demands on the part of the teacher, but in essence the same. The result is a built-in frustration that is the emotional reward of a good proportion of our students. (This frustration need not, of course, always be tragic. Jascha Heifetz and Jack Benny both studied the Kreutzer études, and both have made considerable, if disparate, contributions to our culture.)

But what of the second, the creative way? Is it, in fact, suitable only for the Mozarts and Bartóks? Has it no function in our curriculum except to train embryonic composers or to provide that vague yearning and aspiration that is summed up in the essentially cop-out word "inspiration"? The discussion at Tanglewood provided some illuminating insights. That some of the more pertinent came from nonmusicians and nonartists may point a lesson for us. Music educators may have to look beyond music for the answers to their problems—to psychology, anthropology, and the social conditions under which our students live.

One of the outstanding contributions at Tanglewood was made by Professor Abraham Maslow of Brandeis University, probably the leading exponent of an increasingly influential school of psychology that sees a healthy human being developing from the exercise of nonverbal, aesthetic, and intuitive perceptions. Maslow's scientific investigations have centered around what he calls "peak experiences," experiences that result in the heightening of one's emotional tone and an increase in both self- and other-awareness. The more peak experiences a person has, the happier he is and the readier for more experiences, including that of learning. And the interesting thing is that while these experiences may be felt in almost any area of a person's activities, they seem to occur most frequently in two: sex and music.

(It seems that music educators, without scientific proof, have strayed intuitively into a field that has immense significance for human development. Perhaps this, our peak experience, is what keeps us in education when so many other rewards beckon elsewhere.)

I venture to suggest that this is one of the goals of music education: to bring a child in contact with a comfortable, manageable musical environment within which a peak experience may be achieved, call it wonder, love, or delight. When this emotional heightening takes place, the child will take it from there. The teacher can do much worse than to step aside for a while. Almost every human being has the capacity and the need to rearrange and reorder a portion of his environment in a way unique to himself. It is a creative need as much in evidence, again to quote Maslow, in "making a good soup" as in writing a symphony. The difference is one of degree.

It is beautiful that young men and women will fight an encrusted academic bureaucracy for the privilege of getting an education that is relevant to their time.

What we call musicality is more than the ability to reproduce pitch and rhythm patterns; it is the need to order these elements significantly. And almost every child has it. It is the gift he brings to his teacher. In return, he asks that this creative need be respected and not frustrated, and allowed to become increasingly more sensitive. In a way, the teacher-pupil relationship may be seen as an exchange of gifts.

Admittedly, music education has particular problems in providing for creativity. Elementary teachers of painting and sculpture have it easier. We cannot place a child before a piano and ask him to express himself in the way he can with finger paint, clay, and dance. But we can provide the environment in which he will be encouraged and stimulated to react creatively. To me, the prime value of the work of Carl Orff lies in the presentation of just such a framework.

Recently, we have been presented with an important tool in the form of electronic music. This type of musical composition, the most completely contemporary in its technology and aesthetic, is destined to have a profound effect on just the kind of music education we are discussing—the creative. A child can now be placed in front of a module or electronic board and with a minimum of guidance produce sounds, timbres, and rhythms interesting in themselves and capable of manipulation musical expression it is, and seek to incorporate it in our curricula. Let me sketch the possible results of such an incorporation.

Improvisation as an art has practically disappeared in serious music in spite of the heroic efforts being made by the aleatory groups to revive it. The keyboard harmony courses that are meant to prepare students for improvisation are dismal failures. I can, however, report from personal observation that improvisation is alive and well in Latin combos and in jazz and rock groups. They not only do it well but have fun doing it. It seems to me that vital theory departments of the future will have pop musicians in charge of keyboard harmony.

The character of the folk song material that is used may also undergo a change. For example, a creative teacher in a summer program for poor children in the neighborhood of the Third Street Music School Settlement used these tunes among others: "Tina," a two-part African folk song in Swahili; "Las Mananitas," a two-part Mexican folk song in Spanish; "The Crane," a two-part African folk song in Lutora language; "Groundhog," a two-part American folk canon with ostinato; and "Soupa Mana Pandrepse Me," a unison Greek folk song in 5/4 time.

Many of us have always believed that the study of intervals, the ability to recognize and sing them, should precede the study of chords, which are after all more complex. But by teaching theory with the use of guitars, which we do in some classes, we find the reverse procedure more effective. Children learn to recognize and play chords as entities much sooner than they hear major and minor thirds, sixths, and certainly sevenths.

The ideal of the soloist—one exceptionally gifted individual playing for thousands of listeners—is more a European than a Latin, African, or Oriental phenomenon. The latter cultures typically make their music in groups. The music school of the future will mirror this in an increasing attention to group work. Of course, we will continue with string quartets and orchestras and choruses, but we will add groups like harmonica ensembles and combos. We think it proper to teach allemandes, courantes and gigues, not to speak of minuets and gavottes. How about calypso? Poetry being such a vital part of Puerto Rican culture, it would seem to be a logical extension of our program to include courses in the creation and recitation of Spanish poetry.

Have we music teachers paid sufficient attention to another signal our young people are flashing us: their enthusiasm for Indian music? We rightly honor Leonard Bernstein for the magnificent teacher he is, but have we learned anything from Ravi Shankar?

How many of us have attended discothèques, electric circuses, and happenings, not to cluck and bemoan, but to understand? It may well be that the writings of Tom Wolfe with his sympathetic descriptions of the subcultures of youth will be more useful to us than any standard textbook on the principles of music education.

Above all, the relationship of the settlement schools to the neighborhoods around them will undergo a fundamental change. We see some of these changes already occurring in the work of the Cleveland Music School Settlement and others sponsoring massive city-wide programs in music and other arts. What I mean is that these programs will move from a crisis stage to a normal form of a school's activity—in housing projects, nursery schools, in neighborhood happenings, and in close cooperation with the local public schools. This is the guiding philosophy behind the work of the executive director of the National Guild of Community Music Schools, Herbert Zipper, in the projects he is developing for the city of Chicago and the rural areas of Arkansas and upper New York State.

Music educators may have to look beyond music for the answers to their problems — to psychology, anthropology, and the social conditions under which our students live.

It will no longer be enough to say, as in the statement of the Guild's principles, that we "have placed the study of music within the reach of all." It is we, the schools, who must do the reaching.

There are some structural changes that will have to occur if we are to meet our historical responsibility to our students. The number of contact hours between pupil and teacher must be increased from the present average of about one hour and forty minutes to between four and five hours per week; the school year, from the present thirty-two to forty weeks plus a summer program. It is surprising how our school year has been determined by the needs and free time of middle class children whose days are far more structured than those of poorer students.

It may be objected that this look into the future that I have been providing is an ideal picture that will take a miracle to actualize. To this I will say that I believe, with that ace fund raiser, that "He who does not believe in miracles is no realist." Anything less will fail to measure up to the real problems of our time. And I ask you to remember the moral imperative under which we live: not merely to admire new horizons but to do something about them.

If I could sum up in one phrase the viewpoint I have attempted to sketch, I would quote Ezra Pound's exhortation, "Make it New!" Not that everything new is better than what is old. But that there is no danger of our overexperimentation. Our training is rooted in tradition. What is needed now is a return to tradition as it was before it became traditional.

Fundamental to the art of teaching music is the teacher's realization that what most needs improving is himself. The ancient adage, "Physician, heal thyself," applies with equal force to him. Faced with this miraculous force—music, with its seemingly endless change and variety—he must set no boundaries to his continuing attempts to master it and to understand the quality of the experience it evokes in the children he seeks to guide. ■

In July and August of 1967, a group of musicians, educators, and representatives of several intellectual disciplines, labor unions, corporations, and government met at Tanglewood to consider the place of music in American society. The questions asked and discussed were fundamental. One of them was, "Why music?" You can't get much more fundamental than that. And there was the corollary question map as place music in the core of the curriculum." I, for one, would start out scared. Just what should we place in that core? More folk songs to sing? More young audience concerts? More classes in appreciation and theory? More instrumental lessons? Is this our contribution to the art of living, to the development of personal identity and creativity?

The question again comes back to us. What is this music we are

And to make this relationship profitable (for which, read possible), the audience must be educated to achieve at least a partial identification with the performer.

It is important that we understand this distinction, because music is fundamentally no more a performing art than baseball a spectator sport. The analogy with baseball may be helpful. When Mickey Mantle, at bat, swings at a ball, the 70,000 spectators don't just sit and

POPS CONCERT

BROOKLYN CANARSIE DIGEST
Saturday, August 17, 1968

In Person

BOROITE Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tues., Aug. 20, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition "Fantasy and Improvisations."

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 18, 1968

BERKSHIRE-BOUND. Peter

PETER NERO, popular

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

AUG 9 1968

BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, August 17, 1968

In Person

BOROITE Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tues., Aug. 20, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition "Fantasy and Improvisations."

To Conduct

ARTHUR FIEDLER will conduct an all-American program by the Boston Pops on Tuesday, Aug. 20 at Tanglewood. The concert will include works by Gould, Copland, Gershwin, Nero, and Miller.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

AUG 15 1968

New England Newsclip

FLATBUSH LIFE
Saturday, August 17, 1968

In Person

BOROITE Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tues., Aug. 20, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition "Fantasy and Improvisations."

BROOKLYN BAY NEWS
Saturday, August 17, 1968

In Person

BOROITE Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tues., Aug. 20, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition "Fantasy and Improvisations."

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Tuesday August 20 at 8 pm

BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA
ARTHUR FIEDLER conductor

PENSION FUND CONCERT

American salute (When Johnny comes marching home)*	GOULD
An Outdoor Overture	COPLAND
Piano concerto in F (1925)*	GERSHWIN
Allegro
Adagio-andante con moto
Allegro agitato
PETER NERO
intermission
Fantasy and Improvisations for piano and orchestra	NERO
PETER NERO piano
JOE CUSATIS drums
GENE CHERICO bass
Love is blue	POPP
Lover's concerto	LINZER
À la Glenn Miller
Chattanooga Choo Choo	WARREN
Little brown jug	TRADITIONAL
In the mood	GARLAND
St Louis blues march	HANDY

Peter Nero plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

POPS CONCERT

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 18, 1968

BROOKLYN CANARSIE DIGEST
Saturday, August 17, 1968

In Person

BOROITE Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tues., Aug. 20, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition "Fantasy and Improvisations."

BERKSHIRE-BOUND. Peter

PETER NERO, popular

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

AUG 9 1968

BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, August 17, 1968

In Person

BOROITE Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tues., Aug. 20, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition "Fantasy and Improvisations."

To Conduct

ARTHUR FIEDLER will conduct an all-American program by the Boston Pops on Tuesday, Aug. 20 at Tanglewood. The concert will include works by Gould, Copland, Gershwin, Nero, and Miller.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

AUG 15 1968

New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL 1968

Tuesday August 20 at 8 pm

BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA
ARTHUR FIEDLER conductor

PENSION FUND CONCERT

American salute (When Johnny comes marching home)*	GOULD
An Outdoor Overture	COPLAND
Piano concerto in F (1925)*	GERSHWIN
Allegro
Adagio-andante con moto
Allegro agitato
PETER NERO
intermission
Fantasy and Improvisations for piano and orchestra	NERO
PETER NERO piano
JOE CUSATIS drums
GENE CHERICO bass
Love is blue	POPP
Lover's concerto	LINZER
À la Glenn Miller
Chattanooga Choo Choo	WARREN
Little brown jug	TRADITIONAL
In the mood	GARLAND
St Louis blues march	HANDY

Peter Nero plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS*

FLATBUSH LIFE
Saturday, August 17, 1968

In Person

BOROITE Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tues., Aug. 20, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition "Fantasy and Improvisations."

BROOKLYN BAY NEWS
Saturday, August 17, 1968

In Person

BOROITE Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tues., Aug. 20, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition "Fantasy and Improvisations."

110.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

AUG 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Pops To Be at Tanglewood

The annual appearance at Tanglewood of the Boston Pops Orchestra with its conductor, Arthur Fiedler, will be at 8 p.m on Aug. 20 in the Musci Shed.

Peter Nero will be piano so loist in the Gershwin Concerto in F, as well as his own "Fantasy and Improvisations." In the latter work, Nero will be joined by Joe Cusatis, drums, and Gene Cherico, bass.

Fiedler will open the program with Morton Gould's "American Salute" and Aaron Copland's "Outdoor Overture." He wil also lead the Boston Pops in some of its favorites, including "Love Is Blue," "Lovers' Concerto" and a group called " A la Glenn Miller.

Tickets for the Pops at Tanglewood are priced at $4, $5, $5.50 and $6. Box seats are $6.50. General admission to the lawn is $2.50. Tickets are available by mail or at the Tanglewood box office.

Shower, Pops Make Memorable Evening

By M. DICKEY DRYSDALE

TANGLEWOOD —A lot of people got wet at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

Disorderly Retreat

About 3775, according to the attendance figures, were forced into disorderly retreat during the slow movement of a Gershwin piano concerto as a short but violent shower swept over the grounds of the music center.

About 6000 other patrons inside the shed were spared the drenching but were treated instead to 10 minutes of exuberant screams from outside, which rather spoiled the effect of some delicate solo work that Peter Nero was trying to perform on the piano.

Even Carol Proctor, the pretty cellist of the Boston Symphony, broke into what looked very much like a giggle.

A Happening

And nobody minded, of course.

For it was Boston Pops and Arthur Fiedler night at Tanglewood, and everybody knows by now that Boston Pops night is not so much a concert as an occassion, a happening.

That almost 10,000 turned out for Tuesday night's occasion, in spite of wet grounds and threatening skies, is a tribute to the inexhaustible popularity of Fiedler's annual visit here.

Easy Well-Being

It all started pretty normally, with newly-cool breezes playing across the grounds while groups and couples spread their blankets. The pines that mark the edge of the shed area stood behind a veil of fine mist as the chicken legs and sandwiches and wine were broken out.

The crowd — a young crowd, was in a mood of easy well-being that comes from beautiful surroundings, good companionship and pleasant entertainment. They chatted quietly, munched on cookies, and snuggled a little bit.

The Pops did its bit with selections by Morton Gould and Aaron Copland, "An Outdoor Overture," and a composition written and played by Nero. The applause was enthusiastic.

Gershwin Concert

After the intermission, the program started with Gershwin's "Piano Concerto in F," and then came the downpour. Chicken legs and cold cuts were thrown into tote bags with zeal, and the picnickers scattered wildly, most of them in good spirits.

It was a sort of climax to the evening, and it offered real excitment that was almost welcome because of its total unexpectedness. It will be an evening long remembered.

As for the music, neither Arthur Fiedler nor the Boston Pops need any introduction. The major effort of the evening was the Gershwin concerto, which Mr. Nero played with considerable sensitivity, which was not always backed up by the orchestra.

Pseudo - Jazz Trio

Nero's own composition, "Fantasy and Improvisations for Piano and Orchestra," seems certain to endure as long as Nero is around to play it — and not a day longer. It utilizes a kind of Pseudo - jazz trio of piano, drums and bass backed up at intervals by the full orchestra.

The program also included several songs "A La Glenn Miller," and the usual Pops extras.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 21 1968 New England Newsclip

CATSKILL MAIL
Monday, August 19, 1968

Boston Pops Fiedler Nero Concert Aug. 20

The annual Tanglewood appearance of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler will be August 20 at 8 P.M. in the Music Shed. Peter Nero will be piano soloist in the Gershwin Concerto in F as well as in his own Fantasy and Improvisations. In the later, Mr. Nero will be joined by Joe Cusatis, drummer. and Gene Cherico, bassist. Mr. Fiedler opens the program with Morton Gould's American Salute, and Aaron Copland's Outdoor Overture. He will also lead the Boston Pops Orchestra in some of its popular favorites, including Love is Blue, Lovers Concerto, and a group called A la Glenn Miller.

Tickets for the Pops at Tanglewood are priced at $4, $5, $5.50, and $6. Box Seats are $6.50. General admission to the lawn is $2.50. Tickets are available by mail or at the Box Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. The Tanglewood phone number is (413) 637-1600 for information.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 111,000

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts — Peter Nero, pianist and composer, will be featured as a soloist in a concert by the Boston Pops on Tuesday, August 20. He will play Gershwin's Piano concerto in F and his own composition 'Fantasy and Improvisations.

BOSTON POPS

The complete concert by Boston Pops at Tanglewood will be on WGBH radio this week. Scheduled for Tuesday, Aug. 20 at 8 p. m., the Pops concert, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will be broadcast in stereo, direct from the Music Shed in Lenox.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 75,000

AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

UTICA OBSERVER DISPATCH
Sunday, August 18, 1968

Tanglewood Books Pops

The annual Tanglewood appearance of the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler will be at 8 p.m. Tuesday in the music shed at Lenox, Mass. Peter Nero will be piano soloist in the Gershwin Concerto in F as well as in his own Fantasy and Improvisations.

Fiedler opens the program with Morton Gould's American Salute, and Aaron Copland's Outdoor Overture.

Crowd Flees Rain; Nero Keeps Playing

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Pianist Peter Nero, who was the soloist with the Boston "Pop" Orchestra at Tanglewood last night, had to compete with the elements on this occasion.

Right in the middle of Gershwin's Concerto in F a deluge of rain came down, causing all sorts of consternation and confusion among the many loungers on the Tanglewood lawn. Despite the hullabalu no one dropped a note.

Arthur Fiedler, that 73-year-old youngster, was the conductor and he amazed me with the vim and vitality he brings to the task. I can still recall his appearances with the "Pops" in Boston's Symphony Hall when I was still in knee pants. Like Rubinstein and Casals, Fiedler is one of those amazing physical specimens.

For this annual pension fund concert the conductor restricted himself to an all-American program, rather than the usual potpourri. Morton Gould, Aaron Copland, Gershwin, and Nero the composer were represented on the musical agenda.

The pianist made his most favorable impression in his own Fantasy and Improvisations for piano and orchestra. His technical facility is quite arresting. He was assisted by Gene Cherico on bass and Bobby Rosengarden on drums.

In the Gershwin Nero was often inaudible because of the poor balance between orchestra and soloist. And he seemed less at home in the more classical format, referring to his score intermittently.

After intermission the fare was more typically "Pops" with such numbers as Popp's "Love is Blue," "Lover's Concerto," and several numbers ("Chattanooga Choo Choo," "Little Brown Jug," etc.) in the Glenn Miller manner or, more accurately, in the Fiedler "Pops" manner.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, August 19, 1968

Nero Soloist With Pops at Tanglewood

The annual appearance of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., will be at 8 p.m. Tuesday in the Music Shed.

Peter Nero will be piano soloist in the Gershwin Concerto in F, as well as in his own "Fantasy and Improvisations." In the latter, Nero will be joined by Joe Cusatis, drummer, and Gene Cherico, bassist.

Fiedler opens the program with Morton Gould's "American Salute" and Aaron Copland's "Outdoor Overture." He will also lead the orchestra in some of its popular favorites, including "Love Is Blue," "Lovers Concerto," and a group called "A la Glenn Miller."

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

AUG 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Sudden Downpour Interrupts Tanglewood Pops Concert

A crashing downpour spoiled the main course of the annual Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood Tuesday night, descending just as piano soloist Peter Nero played the slow movement of Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F. The clatter of chairs being folded, feminine squeals, and trampling feet, plus the roar of the rain itself, made the music all but inaudible to most of the crowd of 10,000.

This was exceptional, because Arthur Fiedler can usually summon the Pops orchestra to drown out the normal chatter with which Pops audiences like to accompany their communion with music.

Earlier ran did not prevent a large lawn crowd — more than 3,000 — from gathering on the wet ground, with the resutlant rush toward the open standing room under the shed when the later storm broke. Every seat in the Shed, with a 6,000 capacity, was appropriated by then.

The program was bright, and free of the dustier chestnuts. Opening with Gould's "American Salute," it carried on a brisk martial air with "An Outdoor Overture" by Aaron Copland. In what turned out to be an untimely switch, Peter Nero played his own Fantasy and Improvisations for piano and orchestra before the intermission, iwth no stormy interruptions for a pretentious, even 'schmaltzy' showpiece that sets off Nero's impressive technique with neon effect. Except for a tricky jazz interlude with good drums, this would make good Ice Capades music.

It probably would have sounded dorse after the Gershwin Concerto, which was brilliantly played by Nero. The allegro is delicate, imaginaitve, marked with the Gershwin signature of tone and rhythm; it has a timeless freshness.

The popular hit "Love is Blue" led off a group of favorites, which the Pops plays with appealing if mechanical zest. "Lover's concerto," "Chattanooga ChooChoo," "Little Brown Jug," "In the Mood," and "St. Louis Blues March" kept the crowd happy.

There was just one encore, but it was a substantial one, a rousing jazz version of "Song of the Volga Boatmen," a perfect Pops piece. Then the traditional sign-off, "The Stars and Stripes Forever," which is always just graet. No wonder Arthur Fiedler's crowds always stay right to the end.

The Berkshire Festival will hold the last three concerts of the season this weekend. On Friday night Aaron Copland will lead the Boston Symphony in a program including a first performance of his "Inscape" and alos his "Billy the Kid" suite, as well as a first performance of Carter's "Holiday Overture." Faure's suite from "Pelleas et Melisande" and Stravinsky's "Ode" will also be played. The weekend prelude before the main concert will offer songs by Brahms and Wagner, with Hanne-Lore Kuhse, soprano, and Charles Wilson, piano.

Saturday night Erich Leinsdorf will conduct an all-Wagner program with the "Tristan and Isolde" prelude, the entry of the gods from "Das Rheingold," and act one of "Die Walkure." Sunday afternoon will be given over to Brahms: the First Symphony, anda group of choral works to be presented by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

A.B.M.

HERALD TRAVELER, AUGUST 18, 1968

ARTHUR FIEDLER AND THE BOSTON POPS will present an all-American program including works by Gould, Copeland, Gershwin, Glenn Miller and Peter Nero at their annual Tanglewood concert on Tuesday night in Lenox.

Holyoke (Mass.) Transcript-Tele

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 30,000

AUG 21 1968 New England Newsclip

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

TANGLEWOOD ON PARADE

and

GALA CONCERT

for the benefit of the

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

ERICH LEINSDORF director

LOUIS SPEYER assistant director

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN chairman of the faculty

WEDNESDAY AUGUST 14 1968

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

'Tanglewood-on-Parade' Is Tomorrow To Benefit Berkshire Music Center

The annual "Tanglewood on Parade" program will be tomorrow starting at 2 p.m.

Continuous programs of theatre, dance, music by the Berkshire Music Center instrumental and vocal fellows, Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, Boston University Young Artists Orchestra, dance workshop and theatre program and the New England Conservatory of Music seminar and composers forum will be held from 2 to 7 p.m. on the Tanglewood grounds.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras in a concert at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimir, dancers from Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform with the orchestra in "As Quiet As" by Colgrass. Frank Langella will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" by Prokofieff.

The evening concert will be followed by a fireworks display.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky is chairman of the benefit for the music center. Mrs. Henry B. Cabot, Mrs. Silvio O. Conte and Mrs. John Volpe are honorary members of the committee, on which 20 area women and wives of orchestra members are serving.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

111.

Regional Roundup

Neighboring Artists Will Join In Tanglewood-on-Parade

Program details have been announced for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Tanglewood-on-Parade program by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the center.

★ ★ ★

List Events For Gala Wednesday

1.50: Fanfare in the colonnade of the theater.

2.00: Boston University Young Artist Orchestra in the theater and New England Conservatory of Music, exploratory compositions in Chamber Music Hall.

3.10: Fanfare on the porch of the Main House.

3.15: Music for winds on the porch of the Main House and music for strings in the theater.

4.30: Boston University dance program in the shed and composer's forum in the theater and recital by the vocal fellows in the Chamber Music Hall.

6.00: Tanglewood Choir on the porch of the Main House and chamber music in the theater.

7.50: Fanfare in front of the Shed.

8.00: Gala concert in the Shed (and fireworks over the lake after the concert).

Program: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Colgrass: "As Quiet As" with Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimer of Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival and the Norman Walker Dance Company; Prokofiev: "Peter and the Wolf" with Frank Langella of the Berkshire Theater, narrator. Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Wagner: "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" and funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung" and "Ride of the Valkyries."

Tanglewood-On-Parade which is on Wednesday, is a day-long series of performances by students of the center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. It culminates in a gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under Leinsdorf's direction, after which there is a display of fireworks.

From Jacob's Pillow

This year artists from neighboring performing groups will participate. Frank Langella, who costarred with Anne Bancroft in the Berkshire Theater Festival's recent premiere of William Gibson's "A Cry of Players," will narrate Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," joining the combined orchestras.

The Norman Walker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform to Colgrass's "As Quiet As," a work recorded and extensively played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert will also include three Wagner excerpts: Siegfried's Rhine Journey," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and "The Ride of the Valkyries," the latter with voices.

Between 2 p. m., when the day's activities begin, and the gala concert at 8 there will be vocal and chamber music performed by students of the music center, a composers forum, programs by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus, both of which are under the direction of the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, and performances and demonstrations by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra, dance and theater workshops, and the New England Conservatory seminars.

Benefits Center

Leinsdorf said, "Tanglewood-on-Parade is the one opportunity we have each year to put on display nearly all the multifaceted gifts of our young men and women, to display them in a single day so that the public can appreciate the scope of their study and accomplishment.

"Tanglewood - on - Parade is a program that always draws a large attendance and greatly benefits the Berkshire Music Center through the Friends of Music at Tanglewood."

Tickets for Tanglewood-on-Parade are available at the box office at Tanglewood and by mail.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade Program to Be Tomorrow

Program details have been announced for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Tanglewood-on-Parade program tomorrow by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the center.

Tanglewood-On-Parade is a day-long series of performances by students of the center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. It culminates in a gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under Leinsdorf' direction, after which there is a display of fireworks.

This year artists from neighboring performing groups will participate. Frank Langella, who costarred with Anne Bancroft in the Berkshire Theater Festival's recent premiere of William Gibson's "A Cry of Players," will narrate Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," joining the combined orchestras.

The Norman Walker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform to Colgrass's "As Quiet As," a work recorded and extensively played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert will also include three Wagner excerpts; Siegfried's Rhine Journey," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and "The Ride of the Valkyries," the latter with voices.

Between 2 p.m., when the day's activities begin, and the gala concert at 8 there will be vocal and chamber music performed by students of the music center, a composers forum, programs by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus, and performances and demonstrations by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra, dance and theater workshops, and the New England Conservatory seminars.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Fireworks at Tanglewood

The traditional display of fireworks will follow Tanglewood-on-Parade at Tanglewood, Lenox, on Wednesday, Aug. 14 the pyrotechnic show fitting climax to a day-long series of music performances by students of the Berkshire Music Center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory. A gala concert is the final music event, to be given by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf.

The day's program includes vocal and chamber music, a composers' forum, and performances by the Tnglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, BU Young Artists Orchestra, dance and theatre groups, and N.E. Seminars.

ITEM (e)
WAKEFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 6,600
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

TANGLEWOOD ON PARADE

and

GALA CONCERT

for the benefit of the

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

ERICH LEINSDORF director

LOUIS SPEYER assistant director

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN chairman of the faculty

WEDNESDAY AUGUST 14 1968

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

'Tanglewood-on-Parade' Is Tomorrow To Benefit Berkshire Music Center

The annual "Tanglewood on Parade" program will be tomorrow starting at 2 p.m.

Continuous programs of theatre, dance, music by the Berkshire Music Center instrumental and vocal fellows, Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, Boston University Young Artists Orchestra, dance workshop and theatre program and the New England Conservatory of Music seminar and composers forum will be held from 2 to 7 p.m. on the Tanglewood grounds.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras in a concert at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimir, dancers from Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform with the orchestra in "As Quiet As" by Colgrass. Frank Langella will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" by Prokofieff.

The evening concert will be followed by a fireworks display.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky is chairman of the benefit for the music center. Mrs. Henry B. Cabot, Mrs. Silvio O. Conte and Mrs. John Volpe are honorary members of the committee, on which 20 area women and wives of orchestra members are serving.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

111.

Regional Roundup

Neighboring Artists Will Join In Tanglewood-on-Parade

Program details have been announced for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Tanglewood-on-Parade program by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the center.

★ ★ ★

List Events For Gala Wednesday

1.50: Fanfare in the colonnade of the theater.

2.00: Boston University Young Artist Orchestra in the theater and New England Conservatory of Music, exploratory compositions in Chamber Music Hall.

3.10: Fanfare on the porch of the Main House.

3.15: Music for winds on the porch of the Main House and music for strings in the theater.

4.30: Boston University dance program in the shed and composer's forum in the theater and recital by the vocal fellows in the Chamber Music Hall.

6.00: Tanglewood Choir on the porch of the Main House and chamber music in the theater.

7.50: Fanfare in front of the Shed.

8.00: Gala concert in the Shed (and fireworks over the lake after the concert).

Program: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Colgrass: "As Quiet As" with Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimer of Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival and the Norman Walker Dance Company; Prokofiev: "Peter and the Wolf" with Frank Langella of the Berkshire Theater, narrator. Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Wagner: "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" and funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung" and "Ride of the Valkyries."

Tanglewood-On-Parade which is on Wednesday, is a day-long series of performances by students of the center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. It culminates in a gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under Leinsdorf's direction, after which there is a display of fireworks.

From Jacob's Pillow

This year artists from neighboring performing groups will participate. Frank Langella, who costarred with Anne Bancroft in the Berkshire Theater Festival's recent premiere of William Gibson's "A Cry of Players," will narrate Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," joining the combined orchestras.

The Norman Walker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform to Colgrass's "As Quiet As," a work recorded and extensively played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert will also include three Wagner excerpts: Siegfried's Rhine Journey," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and "The Ride of the Valkyries," the latter with voices.

Between 2 p. m., when the day's activities begin, and the gala concert at 8 there will be vocal and chamber music performed by students of the music center, a composers forum, programs by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus, both of which are under the direction of the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, and performances and demonstrations by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra, dance and theater workshops, and the New England Conservatory seminars.

Benefits Center

Leinsdorf said, "Tanglewood-on-Parade is the one opportunity we have each year to put on display nearly all the multifaceted gifts of our young men and women, to display them in a single day so that the public can appreciate the scope of their study and accomplishment.

"Tanglewood - on - Parade is a program that always draws a large attendance and greatly benefits the Berkshire Music Center through the Friends of Music at Tanglewood."

Tickets for Tanglewood-on-Parade are available at the box office at Tanglewood and by mail.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade Program to Be Tomorrow

Program details have been announced for the Berkshire Music Center's annual Tanglewood-on-Parade program tomorrow by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the center.

Tanglewood-On-Parade is a day-long series of performances by students of the center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. It culminates in a gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under Leinsdorf' direction, after which there is a display of fireworks.

This year artists from neighboring performing groups will participate. Frank Langella, who costarred with Anne Bancroft in the Berkshire Theater Festival's recent premiere of William Gibson's "A Cry of Players," will narrate Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," joining the combined orchestras.

The Norman Walker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform to Colgrass's "As Quiet As," a work recorded and extensively played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert will also include three Wagner excerpts; Siegfried's Rhine Journey," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and "The Ride of the Valkyries," the latter with voices.

Between 2 p.m., when the day's activities begin, and the gala concert at 8 there will be vocal and chamber music performed by students of the music center, a composers forum, programs by the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus, and performances and demonstrations by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra, dance and theater workshops, and the New England Conservatory seminars.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Fireworks at Tanglewood

The traditional display of fireworks will follow Tanglewood-on-Parade at Tanglewood, Lenox, on Wednesday, Aug. 14—the pyrotechnic show fitting climax to a day-long series of music performances by students of the Berkshire Music Center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory. A gala concert is the final music event, to be given by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf.

The day's program includes vocal and chamber music, a composers' forum, and performances by the Tnglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, BU Young Artists Orchestra, dance and theatre groups, and N.E. Seminars.

ITEM (e)
WAKEFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 5,600
AUG 13 1968 New England Newsclip

112.

Tanglewood on Parade

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
AUG 22 1968
New England Newsclip

Through the stage door . . .

At Tanglewood crowds are the norm.

Young musicians perform.

Tanglewood-on-Parade

LENOX, MASS. — Tanglewood, which is little over an hour's ride from Springfield, is famed the country over as the summer home of fine symphonic music. The Berkshire Music Center there says in effect: "Fine music, yes. But there is much more in the field of kindred arts created and encouraged each year at Tanglewood."

Its head, Erich Leinsdorf, who is also music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes this point with each year's "Tanglewood-on-Parade."

He said: "We display nearly all the multifaceted gifts of our young men and women in a single day so the public can appreciate the scope of their study and accomplishment."

This includes programs of students of Boston University and the New England Conservatory who played together under Leinsdorf's direction in Wednesday's grand finale. Dance groups come from nearby Jacob's Pillow and there are dramatic contributions of actors from nearby Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge. Boston University students also show their talents in dance and the graphic arts.

The "parade" ends late at night with a burst of fireworks. The Springfield Herald, covering the activities, was able to record pictorially only a portion of the action, so wide was the scope.

Spectators, thrilled by the performances, were convinced that Western Massachusetts not only offers summer programs of the highest quality but also acts as incubation center for young artists who will insure continuity and enrich the cultural quotient of the country.

TANGLEWOOD ON-PARADE
WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14, 1968
2 p.m. – 7 p.m. TANGLEWOOD GROUNDS
Continuous programs of THEATRE, DANCE, MUSIC by THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER INSTRUMENTAL AND VOCAL FELLOWS; TANGLEWOOD CHOIR, BERKSHIRE CHORUS; BOSTON UNIVERSITY YOUNG ARTISTS ORCHESTRA, DANCE WORKSHOP AND THEATRE PROGRAM; THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC SEMINAR AND COMPOSERS FORUM.
8 p.m. SHED THE GALA CONCERT
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTOR
AS QUIET AS . . . . . COLGRASS
NORMAN WALKER and PAMELA LADIMER DANCERS from Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival
'PETER AND THE WOLF' . . . . PROKOFIEV
FRANK LANGELLA NARRATOR from The Berkshire Theatre Festival
INTERMISSION
The combined BOSTON SYMPHONY and BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRAS
ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTOR
SIEGFRIED'S RHINE JOURNEY . . WAGNER
FUNERAL MUSIC from GÖTTERDÄMMERUNG
RIDE OF THE VALKYRIES
There will be a display of fireworks over the lake following the concert
TICKETS: $3.50, 4, 5. BOX SEAT: $6.00
GENERAL ADMISSION TO THE LAWNS: $2.50
FESTIVAL TICKET OFFICE, TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS
TELEPHONE (413) 637-1600
BALDWIN PIANO
RCA RECORDS

Exhibit by Boston U. students.

Dance group's interpretation of "Love."

The Weather Smiles on Tanglewood-on-Parade

Whitestone

Among picnickers on the lawn were Mrs. Emeric Trinkhauser and her children, Kristin, Lisa and Erik, of Mahkeenac Heights and Freeport, Long Island.

Dr. and Mrs. Vincent Barnaba arrive for the program.

Mr. and Mrs. Russell W. Dickinson and daughter, Nancy, of Lenox.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

At Afternoon Program

Young Musicians Play Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — "Tanglewood on Parade" brought an entire afternoon of demonstrations by young artists of the Berkshire Music Center, including groups from the summer programs at Tanglewood of Boston University and New England Conservatory. In the evening 5,735 came to a gala concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, under various conductors and with interesting assisting artists.

Gazette Review

Afternoon events ranged from music for winds to chamber works and choral groups, to a program of "exploratory compositions" and a composers' forum.

In the evening, the Boston Symphony played until intermission, then the Center Orchestra of 91 was added to make a total of nearly 200 musicians. Wagner's music was given added gloss and power by ample instrumentation.

No Fuzziness

The doubling of players did not create fuzziness but brought a fine glow and sonority. "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" and "Funeral Music" and "The Ride of the Valkyries" climaxed the evening, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, opened the concert with the Brahms "Academic Festival Overture," an appropriate choice, its collegiate songs culminating in the final broad "Gaudeamus Igitur."

Stage Extended

Gunther Schuller led the Boston Symphony in Colgrass' "As Quiet As . . ." with a notable innovation. The stage was extended, and Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimer from Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival danced all seven sections of the work. The subtitles regrettably were omitted, and I believe these clues would have been helpful. The duo interpreted in modern ways "A Leaf Turning Colors," "Children Sleeping" and "The First Star Coming Out." Miss Ladimer soloed in "An Uninhabited Creek" and "A Soft Rainfall," and Walker in the clever "An Ant Walking" and "Time Passing."

Frank Langella of the Berkshire Theater Festival narrated clearly the lengthy but tuneful "Peter and the Wolf" of Prokofiev. Youngsters were thrilled to see him, and voted him the evening's biggest kick.

Music Review

'Tanglewood on Parade'

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE ANNUAL "Tanglewood on Parade" and gala concert for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center are practically academic commencement exercises of the Tanglewood summer season. From 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon until the last "bombs bursting in air" over Stockbridge Bowl, every phase of the school's activities were displayed for a huge audience of which a great share brought supper and ate it on the lawns.

The academy started in 1940 by the late Serge Koussevitzky has been firmly consolidated with several departments of the Boston University music and arts schools and with the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood.

There was, therefore, a huge sequence of performances—embracing programs for orchestra from the familiar repertory, programs of exploratory compositions, music for winds, chamber music, dance programs, a composers' forum, recital by the vocal fellows, another by the Tanglewood choir and the Berkshire chorus, an exhibit from the painting and drawing classes of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, and, as the crowning event of the day, the gala concert at 8 o'clock.

* * *

ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, combined his forces for the climax of the evening with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, giving him violin sections of 30 performers each, 22 each of violas and cellos and 14 double basses. They played three of the great excerpts from Wagner's "Ring."

The program had opened with the Brahms' Academic overture under the direction of the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson. Gunther Schuller conducted Colgrass's "As quiet as," a series of symphonic sketches on the poetic answers small school children gave to a request to get them to express their imaginative thoughts. This was more vividly, and for the first time, danced by Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimer of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival. The wisps of sound, more often tableaux vivants than urgent rhythmic narratives, lent themselves with lambency to the expert technique and graphic interpretations of the dancers.

* * *

LEINSDORF here took the baton for a performance of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" for which Frank Langella, from the Berkshire Theatre Festival, was the narrator. This highly amusing and stimulating work is far more subtle than its apparently superficial innocence would suggest. Koussevitzky had Richard Hale, also from the Stockbridge theatre, as narrator for its first Tanglewood performance. Subsequent narrators were Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy. Ormandy once did it with his Philadelphia orchestra and Adlai Stevenson. Last night was the first time at Tanglewood a professionally adequate narrator was employed.

* * *

EXIT FROM the parking lots at the close of the concert was complicated by cholesterol narrowing of the public arteries by cars which had come to watch the display of fireworks over Lake Mahkeenac, the appellation of the lake which the Tanglewood grounds overlook, but which some natives still like to call Stockbridge Bowl.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
AUG 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood on Parade Attracts 5735 Persons

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The annual event in Lenox called Tanglewood on parade is becoming larger and larger. This year it began an hour earlier, at 2, and presented nine events at four concert halls one on the grass before the brass fanfare at 7.50 invited the throngs into the great shed for an evening concert by the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras with three conductors.

Display Works

The day's program is offered to give the musicians studying at Tanglewood an opportunity to display their work, and the activities have become so vast as to prohitibit an adequate report of them.

Joining the regular faculty of the Berkshire Music Center this summer have been contingents from the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston and Boston University.

And added to the instruction in music in all its phases have been classes and seminars in drama, dance and the graphic arts.

Open With Brahms

Thus it was that the evening concert, after opening with Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture" conducted by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented the contemporary "As Quiet As" by Colgrass with dancers Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimer from Jacob's Pillow and Gunther Schuller as conductor and then Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" with actor Frank Langella from the Berkshire Theater as narrator and Erich Leinsdorf as conductor.

A large thrust stage measuring 25 by 40 feet had been built into the audience to accommodate the dancers for the evening concert as well as the program at 4.30 which had offered three dance works with two dozen dancers.

The second half of the evening concert offered two grand earfillers by Wagner played by the combined Boston and music center orchestras (more than 200 musicians) conducted by Leinsdorf.

Fireworks Show

They were Siegfried's Rhine journey and funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung" and the ride of the Ralkyries from "Die Walkure" . . . followed by a display of fireworks over Lake Mahkeenac to wind up the eight hours of continuous music.

Listeners were beginning to stream into Tanglewood at 1. There were 200 listeners for the beginning of the 2 p. m. concert by the high-school-age orchestra trained under Boston University auspices and 1500 listeners when it finished a program of Haydn, Stravinsky, Mendelssohn and Defalla.

Music and nature lovers were wandering all over the grounds all afternoon setting out picnics or lying in the shade and reading or carrying on animated conversations. Most listened to the music, however.

Simultaneous Concerts

At 3.15 there were simultaneous concerts of music for winds from the porch of the main house for about 1000 listeners on the grass and chamber music in the theater for another 500.

Then, at 4.30, about 1000 strolled into the shed to watch dancers while perhaps 150 went into the theater for a demonstration of contemporary sounds organized by composers in attendance and another 150 attended a series of short vocal recitals in the open-sided chamber music hall . . . some inside and some under the trees.

There were many children running about, dozens of baby carriages, hundreds of aluminum chairs and seemingly thousands of cameras. A great many strollers apparently never had been at Tanglewood before. Some seemed more impressed by the grass and high trees and view of Stockbridge Bowl than by the availability of all styles of music on all sides of them.

Buried in Program

One housewife whose face was buried in the day's program of events as she moved away from the gate was overheard saying to her husband, who was burdened with picnic basket and folding chairs, "Shed. Shed. What shed is that."

Then at 6 there were the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus, about 80 voices, which joined to present excerpts from Haydn's "Nelson Mass" and Brahms' "German Requiem," both of which the singers had presented in full with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the regular festival concerts.

Also at six was a presentation of chamber music in the theater by surprising high-school musicians in the Boston University young artists program.

Brass Fanfare

And then suddenly at 7.50 there was the brass fanfare, six horns, four trumpets, five trombones, two tubas and three drummers, announcing the big concert in the shed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was a long, warm, sunny day, but everyone, listeners and musicians, seemed unhurried and leisurely (except reporters). More than 400 student performers, composers and conductors had been involved with the more than 100 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and about 75 members of the various faculties in a display of the musical wares of the 28th year of the music center founded by Koussevitsky.

Final tally showed that there were 5735 listeners here for the display.

114.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, August 16, 1968

Gala at Tanglewood Fun for Everyone

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Wednesday was Tanglewood-on-Parade day at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home. This annual function is a lot of fun for everybody because there's always something of interest for all concerned.

* * *

During the afternoon preceding the concert, student compositions written during the summer session receive premieres; the faculty gives joint recitals, brass fanfares and chamber music abound in various locations, modern dance programs are aired, choral excerpts may be heard while relaxing on the comfortable lawn, etc., etc. This year the Gala Festival was same in comparison with recent years, but listener interest seemed at an all-time peak.

A complete rundown of events is impossible here, but mention should be made of a fine wind program which included Hindemith's "Kleine Kammermusik," op. 24, No. 2, and a modern music concert which gave a performance of "Designs for 14" by Hutcheson. Here and there one could also hear a nice performance of Beethoven's op. 1, No. 1 Trio and a short choral concert comprised of selections from Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass and Brahms' Requiem.

* * *

The main event of TOP day, of course, is the 8 p.m. concert in the shed. Prior to it, the traditional fanfare was given outside by students. This year the work was Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man," which was given a solemn, weighty reading not without a sense of grandeur.

The evening concert began with Brahms' Academic Festival Overture. Charles Wilson, the orchestra's assistant conductor, led the musicians in a relatively flavorless performance. While it is true that he built the music up to a magnificently brilliant conclusion, the lack of sufficient detail earlier (those loud cascading horns, for instance, which weren't heard) made the overture only partially successful.

A lot better was Colgrass' "As Quiet as . . .", a composition whose inspiration was grounded in primary school written compositions. Asked by teachers to identify the quietest moments found in life, young students wrote such things as "A Leaf Turning Color," "A Dead Creek," "Rain Falling," and so forth. Michael Colgrass' composition follows these literal indications musically and the result has been hailed by critics as the most popular new composition of the decade.

* * *

In what was a new gesture (even for the Gala), dancers Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimer from the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival performed a balletic interpretation to the music. The results were outstanding and hopefully will set the precedent for many years to come. Some of the nicest moments occurred during the "Children Sleeping" section, in which Colgrass depicts the youngsters dreaming. During the course of the dream, music's evolution is portrayed by quoting a Beethoven piano sonata to represent the classical movement, then going to romantic, through jazz, and atonality. Mr. Walker danced this beautifully, becoming classical when the Beethoven sounded, or reflecting the other musical moods in appropriate dance steps.

"The First Star Coming Out" was realized persuasively by Mr. Walker's wearing a dark blue jersey and Miss Ladimer sheathed in white. Remarkable imagery, really. Gunther Schuller, a Berkshire Music Center faculty member and one of America's foremost composers, conducted the work in what was certainly the most brilliant rendition ever. The score is often played by Erich Leinsdorf, but even his familiarity was not quite as convincing as Schuller's way with the music.

Rounding out the first half was Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium and actor Frank Langella narrating the text. Delightful is the only word to describe the performance. Leinsdorf has always been at his interpretive best with Prokofiev's music, and Wednesday night he made the naive score tingle with cozy warth and vitality. The orchestra captured the conductor's enthusiasm to the letter, producing a marvelous singing sound which could only enhance the childlike aura surrounding the rendition. In the speaking role, Frank Langella eschewed the usual cornyness associated with the part and delivered the text in true storybook fashion. His voice was always just right, never condescending nor pompous, and this balance created a sense of hushed expectancy in young and old alike.

Following intermission the full BSO complement was augmented by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra for three Wagner selections, "Dawn and Seigfried's Rhine Journey" and "Siegfried's Funeral Music" from "Die Gotterdaemmerung" and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkuere." This music is always very exciting, but when you take a zealous group of students and combine them with the Boston Symphony the results cannot fail to be even more dramatic and breathtaking. In terms of sheer volume, the 170-piece orchestra puts out a sound that can really turn you on.

The Rhine Journey was a magnificent excursion into the realm of sonic stimulation, and those of us who were witness to the glorious sunrise prelude will not easily forget the heart-pounding excitement it generated. The quieter parts were handled well, too, especially the melismatic string figures and the off-stage horn calls. The Funeral Music that followed almost became loud enough in spots (forgive me) to wake the dead. Even so, Leinsdorf lost none of the tension and grief in the loud passages, and the music certainly benefited infinitely from the sustaining power of the large forces. "Ride of the Valkyries" closed the concert, and again the common denominator was hugeness, both in Leinsdorf's conception and the players' execution.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Friday, August 16, 1968

Music: Tanglewood's Self-Salute Celebrates the Arts

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

The annual "Tanglewood-On-Parade" concert Wednesday, a traditional salute to the talents and personalities of the Berkshire Music Festival, was expanded this year to a celebration of the arts in the Berkshires. Actor Frank Langella of the Berkshire Theater and dancers Pamela Ladimer and Norman Walker of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival represented their respective arts and establishments in the proceedings.

The entire Tanglewood-On-Parade program opened at 2:00 p.m. with a series of performances by students at the Berkshire Music Center leading up to a performance of Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man" in front of the music shed prior to the 8:00 p.m. concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and Gunther Schuller.

The orchestra was in good form, concentrating on one of its areas of special achievement, the music of Wagner. The emphasis in this concert is traditionally on the louder and more spectacular portions of the repertoire. There is little pretense at the conventionally balanced program although Wednesday's performance came close because of the inclusion of the guest artists.

Wagner is a special favorite for these performances and comprised half of the program with Siegfried's Rhine Journey and funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure."

The orchestra played in a manner befitting a self-celebration.

Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimer danced to Michael Colgrass' "As Quiet As . . ." played by the full orchestra conducted by Schuller. A special stage was constructed over the front of the auditorium but it was too low and made viewing difficult if not impossible for most of the audience.

"As Quiet As . . ." is a series of musical ideas on things that are as quiet as . . . Walker and Miss Ladimer danced a series of scences in the same vein, often resembling two people in a park.

Walker, a modern dancer, has a long, lean and supple body that moves exquisitely. His strength and leaps are those of a ballet dancer. But his motion has the freedom and luxury of modern dance.

Miss Ladimer is more sprite-ly, a pleasing contrast to Walker.

Fank Lagella narrated the story of "Peter and the Wolf" against the Procofiev background. Assisted by a microphone, Langella was easily heard by the entire audience ranging far beyond the shed.

His reading was easy and relaxed with a hint of humor. The orchestra was appropriately playful.

This concert also represents special awards to outstanding students presented by Leinsdorf following intermission. Representatives from the music center then played with the orchestra during the second portion of the concert, in this case the Wagner portion.

The Tanglewood-On-Parade Wednesday, as always, was just a bit giddy and self-conscious, qualities hard to avoid in commemoration of oneself.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Tuesday, August 13, 1968

Notes on Music Programs in Capitaland

The program for Wednesday's Tanglewood-On-Parade will be encompassing dance and theater as well as music. The annual celebration of the Berkshire Music Festival begins at 2:00 p.m. with concerts by the student of the Berkshire Music Center and runs through an evening concert by then Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This year the Norman Walker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, and Frank Langella of the Berkshire Theater will also participate.

The Norman Walker Company will dance to Michael Colgrass' "As Quiet As." Langella, who costarred with Ann Bancroft in the recent premiere of William Gibson's "A Cry of Players" at the Berkshire Theater, will narrate Prokoffief's "Peter and the Wolf."

Both events will be part of the evening concert and supported by the Boston Symphony. The orchestra will also play Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," the funeral from "Gotterdammerung" and "The Ride of the Valkyries," all by Wagner.

Proceeds from the concert will go into the fund to match the recently announced three year grant of $125,000 received from the Rockefeller Foundation to assist the Berkshire Music Center. The announcement of the grant requires the Friends of Music at Tanglewood to raise $50,000 this year.

* * *

Duncan Trotter Gillespie, organist and choirmaster of Calvary Episcopal Church in Burnt Hills, will present a program of sacred music at the Round Lake Auditorium at 8:00 p.m. Thursday.

The concert will be part of the week long Round Lake Centential celebration which began on Sunday. Featured in the performance will be a 75-voice choir and harpist Corky Christman. Also of interest will be the use of the well-known Round Lake organ. The program will encompass a large variety of choir and organ music.

* * *

General admission tickets for the appearance of Simon and Garfunkel at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center are now on sale. The tickets, admitting patrons to the lawn, generally do not go on sale until 5:30 of the evening of the performance. The box office demand has been so great that the management has released 5,000 tickets for advance sale in order to relieve jam-ups the night of the concert.

The pop singers will appear on Monday, August 19.

* * *

An "opera preview" of Benjamin Britten's "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given at the Lake George Opera Festival at 1:00 p.m. Wednesday by Hugh Allen Wilson of Union College and a member of the board of directors of the festival.

"Midsummer Night's Dream" will be presented for the first time at the Festival on Thursday. It will be the last of the Shakespearean based operas to be introduced into the season's repertoire.

Preview and performances are held at the Queensbury High School Auditorium.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, August 15, 1968

Tanglewood on Parade

By BERNARD DECKER

LENOX, Mas. — The Boston Symphony joined its sons and daughters, figuratively speaking, to serve a delightful smorgasbord of Wagner that topped a day-long musical extravaganza at Tanglewood yeaterday.

★ ★ ★

THE OCCASION was "Tanglewood on Parade," the annual concert to benefit the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood's school of music. The center's orchestra augmented the Boston Symphony in the three-pronged finale: Siegfried's Rhine journey and funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung" and the ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure."

With the Boston Symphony almost doubled in size, the sound was overwhelming. But who better to be overwhelming with then Wagner?

The Rhine journey also saw an unusual event—a girl playing the kettledrums.

★ ★ ★

THE EVENING concert open with a lagniappe, so to speak, Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture, opus 80." There can be few persons left unmoved by the stirring "Gaudeamus igitur" that concludes the piece.

This was followed by two works that perhaps explained the inordinate number of children in attendance. The first was Michael Colgrass' "As quiet as . ." Dancing to the lace-like music were Norman Walker and Pamela Ladimer of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival. Walker, especially, was effective as the young boy feeling rain or, in his dreams, dancing to the various types of music: Classical, romantic, jazz, modern.

The second piece was the old standard of the children's repertoire, Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf." The orchestra frolicked through the number, which was graced by the narration of Frank Langella, noted for his performances at the nearby Berkshire Theater Festival in Stockbridge.

★ ★ ★

THE EVENING even provided a chance to compare conducting styles. There was, of course, the meticulous style of the Boston Symphony's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Opposed to this you had the dynamic style of Charles Wilson, who conducted the first work in the program with his whole body, at one point his feet becoming unintentional percussion instruments as they stamped.

Somewhere in between the two could be placed Gunther Schiller, a gentle bear of a man who conducted the Colgrass work with all the delicacy and mirth it required.

FRANK LANGELLA

During the day, audiences were treated to performances by the Boston University Young Artist Orchestra, Walter Eisenberg, conductor; the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, Donald Harris, director; the Mary Anthony Dance Theater, Joseph Gifford, director, and others.

115.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to Rock

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced details of the cotemporary-trends concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The concerts will take place at Tanglewood on three Wednesday evenings this month. They represent examples of one direction in which concert performances have been developing in recent years.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director, noted that "The young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it shouldn't coexist amicably with what my colleague, Gunther Schuller, terms 'so-called serious music.' "

Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities at the center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center shows its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions but that the participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center, "teaching, talking, consulting and playing," as Josepn Silverstein, chairman of the BMC faculty, put it.

The dates, titles and participants, are: July 17, jazz-folk, Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz Quartet, and Don Ellis and The Don Ellis Orchestra; July 24, music from India, Ravi Shankar, and Ali Akbar Khan; July 31, rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p. m. in the Shed at Tanglewood.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,750

JUL 17 1968 New England Newsclip

'Contemporary-Trends' Concerts An Innovation at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced details of the contemporary - trends concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center.

The contemporary - trends concerts — jazz folk, music from India, and rock — will take place at Tanglewood in three Wednesday evenings during July. They represent examples of one direction in which concert performances have been developing in recent years.

Speaking in the Tanglewood formal gardens to representatives of the press, radio, and TV for Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Vermont and Rhode Island, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, noted, "The young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it should not co-exist amicably with what my colleague, Mr. Schuller, terms 'so - called serious music'."

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions, but that participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center, "teaching, talking, consulting and playing," as Joseph Silverstein, chairman of the BMC faculty, put it.

The dates, titles and participants, as previously announced, are: July 17 — Jazz-Folk, Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz Quartet, Don Ellis and The Don Ellis Orchestra; July 24 — Music from India, Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan; Shankar Ghosh, Tabla, and 10 other musicians will support Shankar and Khan; July 31 — Rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood. Tickets are now on sale at the box office and by mail.

Prices are $3, $4, $5 and $5.50 for box seats. General admission to the Tanglewood Lawns is $2.50 and will be on sale the day of each concert.

Contemporary Trends Concerts Slated This Month At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced details today of the Contemporary-Trends Concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The concerts, including jazz, folk, music from India and rock, will take place at Tanglewood, Lenox, in three Wednesday night performances during July.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, noted that "the young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it shouldn't coexist amicably with what my colleague, Mr. Schuller, terms 'so-called serious music.'"

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, said, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions but that the participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center.

The dates and participants in the concerts are as follows: July 17, jazz and folk, Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet, and Don Ellis and his Orchestra; July 24, music from India, Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan; July 31, rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood. Ticket prices are $3, $4, $5, and $5.50 for box seats and are now on sale at the box office and by mail. General admission to the Tanglewood Lawns is $2.50 and will be on sale the day of the concert. Box office address is Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 02114. Phone is (413) 637-1600.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Contemporary Trends

July 17 Jazz / Folk
Judy Collins
Modern Jazz Quartet
Don Ellis Orchestra

July 24 Music from India
Ravi Shankar, sitar
Ali Akbar Kahn, sarod
and many other musicians from north and south India

July 31 Rock
The Association

8:00 p.m. in the Shed / $3, $4, $5 and $5.50 for Box Seats

Tanglewood

Lenox, Massachusetts 01240 / Telephone (413) 637-1600

George Lewis/Design

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

JUL 16 1968

New Trends at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is presenting three "Contemporary - Trends" concerts during July at Tanglewood in an effort to give serious attention to popular music. The series opens tomorrow, a jazz-folk evening, in which Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz quartet and Don Ellis and his orchestra will perform. July 24, Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan will give a concert of Indian music. The final concert July 31 is a rock show with The Association. In addition to their concerts, the performers will be in residence at the Berkshire Music Center, for varying periods, to work with the students there.

Saturday, May 25, 1968

By Eileen Swift
Newsday Travel Writer

THE Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts are one vacation area where urban and suburban dwellers can get away from it all and yet enjoy the best of it all. And that's because Berkshire Hills people have managed to have their cake and eat it too.

Theirs is a gently undulating countryside, little marked by either farming or industry, combining everyone's dream of pastoral peace with vacation facilities and the most sophisticated program of summer entertainment to be found outside a metropolis and within a relatively small radius.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox (it runs from July 5 through Aug. 25 this year) is the core of a thriving cultural complex in the scenic hills. If the rich offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, swelling out from its summer home in a groomed green wonderland, don't suit everyone's musical mood, there's always the brave new world of sound offered by the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Music Barn in Lenox.

Even braver and newer sounds will emanate from there this year. As an extension of the festival, there will be four Trends Concerts providing mordant musical satire, homey folk-rock, and a piquant sampling of nonwestern music and jazz to jog classical musical senses.

Lovers of the dance can head to Ted Shawn's internationally famous dance festival [illegible] town of Becket, [illegible] zealot.

115.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to Rock

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced details of the cotemporary-trends concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The concerts will take place at Tanglewood on three Wednesday evenings this month. They represent examples of one direction in which concert performances have been developing in recent years.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director, noted that "The young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it shouldn't coexist amicably with what my colleague, Gunther Schuller, terms 'so-called serious music.' "

Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities at the center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center shows its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions but that the participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center, "teaching, talking, consulting and playing," as Josepn Silverstein, chairman of the BMC faculty, put it.

The dates, titles and participants, are: July 17, jazz-folk, Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz Quartet, and Don Ellis and The Don Ellis Orchestra; July 24, music from India, Ravi Shankar, and Ali Akbar Khan; July 31, rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p. m. in the Shed at Tanglewood.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,750

JUL 17 1968 New England Newsclip

'Contemporary-Trends' Concerts An Innovation at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced details of the contemporary - trends concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center.

The contemporary - trends concerts — jazz folk, music from India, and rock — will take place at Tanglewood in three Wednesday evenings during July. They represent examples of one direction in which concert performances have been developing in recent years.

Speaking in the Tanglewood formal gardens to representatives of the press, radio, and TV for Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Vermont and Rhode Island, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, noted, "The young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it should not co-exist amicably with what my colleague, Mr. Schuller, terms 'so - called serious music'."

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions, but that participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center, "teaching, talking, consulting and playing," as Joseph Silverstein, chairman of the BMC faculty, put it.

The dates, titles and participants, as previously announced, are: July 17 — Jazz-Folk, Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz Quartet, Don Ellis and The Don Ellis Orchestra; July 24 — Music from India, Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan; Shankar Ghosh, Tabla, and 10 other musicians will support Shankar and Khan; July 31 -- Rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood. Tickets are now on sale at the box office and by mail.

Prices are $3, $4, $5 and $5.50 for box seats. General admission to the Tanglewood Lawns is $2.50 and will be on sale the day of each concert.

Contemporary Trends Concerts Slated This Month At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced details today of the Contemporary-Trends Concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The concerts, including jazz, folk, music from India and rock, will take place at Tanglewood, Lenox, in three Wednesday night performances during July.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, noted that "the young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it shouldn't coexist amicably with what my colleague, Mr. Schuller, terms 'so-called serious music.'"

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, said, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions but that the participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center.

The dates and participants in the concerts are as follows: July 17, jazz and folk, Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet, and Don Ellis and his Orchestra; July 24, music from India, Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan; July 31, rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood. Ticket prices are $3, $4, $5, and $5.50 for box seats and are now on sale at the box office and by mail. General admission to the Tanglewood Lawns is $2.50 and will be on sale the day of the concert. Box office address is Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 02114. Phone is (413) 637-1600.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Contemporary Trends

July 17 Jazz / Folk
Judy Collins
Modern Jazz Quartet
Don Ellis Orchestra

July 24 Music from India
Ravi Shankar, sitar
Ali Akbar Kahn, sarod
and many other musicians from north and south India

July 31 Rock
The Association

8:00 p.m. in the Shed / $3, $4, $5 and $5.50 for Box Seats

Tanglewood

Lenox, Massachusetts 01240 / Telephone (413) 637-1600

George Lewis/Design

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

JUL 16 1968

New Trends at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is presenting three "Contemporary - Trends" concerts during July at Tanglewood in an effort to give serious attention to popular music. The series opens tomorrow, a jazz-folk evening, in which Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz quartet and Don Ellis and his orchestra will perform. July 24, Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan will give a concert of Indian music. The final concert July 31 is a rock show with The Association. In addition to their concerts, the performers will be in residence at the Berkshire Music Center, for varying periods, to work with the students there.

Saturday, May 25, 1968

By Eileen Swift
Newsday Travel Writer

THE Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts are one vacation area where urban and suburban dwellers can get away from it all and yet enjoy the best of it all. And that's because Berkshire Hills people have managed to have their cake and eat it too.

Theirs is a gently undulating countryside, little marked by either farming or industry, combining everyone's dream of pastoral peace with vacation facilities and the most sophisticated program of summer entertainment to be found outside a metropolis and within a relatively small radius.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox (it runs from July 5 through Aug. 25 this year) is the core of a thriving cultural complex in the scenic hills. If the rich offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, swelling out from its summer home in a groomed green wonderland, don't suit everyone's musical mood, there's always the brave new world of sound offered by the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Music Barn in Lenox.

Even braver and newer sounds will emanate from there this year. As an extension of the festival, there will be four Trends Concerts providing mordant musical satire, homey folk-rock, and a piquant sampling of nonwestern music and jazz to jog classical musical senses.

Lovers of the dance can head to Ted Shawn's internationally famous dance festival [illegible] town of Becket, [illegible] zealou

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 72,750

JUL 17 1968 New England Newsclip

115

Tanglewood to Rock

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced details of the contemporary trends concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The concerts will take place at Tanglewood on three Wednesday evenings this month. They represent examples of one direction in which concert performances have been developing in recent years.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director, noted that "The young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it shouldn't co-exist amicably with what my colleague, Gunther Schuller, terms 'so-called serious music'."

Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities at the center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center shows its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions but that the participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center. "Teaching, talking, consulting and playing," as Joseph Silverstein, chairman of the BMC faculty put it.

The dates, titles and participants, are: July 17, jazz-folk, Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz Quartet, and Don Ellis and The Don Ellis Orchestra; July 24, music from India, Ravi Shankar, and Ali Akbar Khan; July 31, rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood.

'Contemporary-Trends' Concerts An Innovation at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced details of the contemporary - trends concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center.

The contemporary - trends concerts — jazz folk, music from India, and rock — will take place at Tanglewood in three Wednesday evenings during July. They represent examples of one direction in which concert performances have been developing in recent years.

Speaking in the Tanglewood formal gardens to representatives of the press, radio, and TV for Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Vermont and Rhode Island, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, noted, "The young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it should not co-exist amicably with what my colleague, Mr. Schuller, terms 'so - called serious music'."

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends, introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions, but that participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center, "teaching, talking, consulting and playing," as Joseph Silverstein, chairman of the BMC faculty, put it.

The dates, titles and participants, as previously announced, are: July 17 — Jazz-Folk, Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz Quartet, Don Ellis and The Don Ellis Orchestra; July 24 — Music from India, Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan; Shankar Ghosh, Tabla, and 10 other musicians will support Shankar and Khan; July 31 — Rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood. Tickets are now on sale at the box office and by mail.

Prices are $3, $4, $5 and $5.50 for box seats. General admission to the Tanglewood Lawns is $2.50 and will be on sale the day of each concert.

Contemporary Trends Concerts Slated This Month At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced details today of the Contemporary-Trends Concerts to be presented under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center. The concerts, including jazz, folk, music from India and rock, will take place at Tanglewood, Lenox, in three Wednesday night performances during July.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, noted that "the young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it shouldn't co-exist amicably with what my colleague, Mr. Schuller, terms 'so-called serious music'."

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The point was made that Tanglewood would not present the groups merely as concert attractions but that the participants in the series would be in residence for varying period to work with the students of the Berkshire Music Center.

The dates and participants in the concerts are as follows: July 17, jazz and folk, Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet, and Don Ellis and his Orchestra; July 24, music from India, Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan; July 31, rock, The Association.

The three programs will be presented at 8 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood. Ticket prices are $3, $4, $5, and $5.50 for box seats and are now on sale at the box office and by mail. General admission to the Tanglewood Lawns is $2.50 and will be on sale the day of the concert. Box office address is Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 02114. Phone is (413) 637-1600.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

New Trends at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is presenting the "Contemporary - Trends" concerts during July at Tanglewood in order to give serious attention to popular music. The series opens [illegible] with a jazz-folk evening in which Judy Collins, The Modern Jazz Quartet and Don Ellis and his orchestra will perform. July 24, Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan will give a program of Indian music. The final concert, July 31, is a rock show with The Association. In addition to their concerts, the performers will be in residence at the Berkshire Music Center, for varying periods, to work with the students there.

THE Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts are one vacation area where urban and suburban dwellers can [illegible] away from it all and yet enjoy the best of it all. And that's be[illegible] Berkshire Hills people have managed to have it both ways and eat it too.

[illegible] rolling, undulating countryside, [illegible] be either farming or industry, [illegible] idyll of pastoral peace [illegible] and the most sophisticated [illegible] summer entertainment to be found [illegible] metropolis and within a relatively [illegible] ride.

[illegible] at Tanglewood in Lenox [illegible] from July 5 through Aug. 25 [illegible] of a thriving cultural [illegible] tulls. If the rich offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] from its summer home in a [illegible] Shedland, don't suit every [illegible] days the brave [illegible] world-renowned offered by the Festival of Contemporary American Music at the Music [illegible]

Even [illegible] will emanate from there this year. As an extension of the [illegible] Trends Concerts [illegible] cultural [illegible] Folk-rock and a [illegible] of newest [illegible] jazz to [illegible]

[illegible] of the [illegible] can head to Tel[illegible] annual famous dance festival [illegible] Town of Becket.

Saturday, May 25, 1968

By Eileen Swift

116.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Popular Music In 3 Programs At Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told a gathering of press representatives at Tanglewood yesterday that the Contemporary Trends concerts scheduled for this month "are hopefully another way to broaden our vision of our art. There should be no barriers in music," he added.

The concert series, which will begin July 17 and continue for the next two consecutive Wednesday nights this month, feature what Leinsdorf called "some of the most highly regarded practitioners of popular music." The first concert will be a jazz-folk program, with Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Don Ellis Orchestra. On July 24, Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Kahn will present a concert of Indian music, and a rock concert on July 31 will feature the Association.

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, also told the group, consisting of press, radio and television representatives from five surrounding states, that "it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

It was also emphasized that Tanglewood would not present the various groups merely as concert attractions but that the participants in the series would be in residence for varying periods to work with students of the Center.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

JUL 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Newport, Tanglewood start pop music concerts

PAGE ONE

Foremost figures in the realm of popular music will give concerts at Tanglewood and Newport during the next few weeks.

A series of concerts entitled "Contemporary Trends" marks a departure for the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood (in Lenox, Mass.). The Wednesday night concerts of folk, jazz, Indian, and rock music will augment the tradition of "serious music" at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Beginning tonight, July 17, at 8 pm at the Shed in Tanglewood, a concert will feature Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet and the big band of Don Ellis. Next Wednesday, Ravi Shakar and Ali Akbar Khan will present a festival of music from India, with a total of 13 musicians. (The group returns to Boston on August 2 and 3). On July 31, the Association ("Cherish," "Windy," and an album, "Birthday") will perform.

At Newport, Rhode Island, this Saturday, July 20, Harry Belafonte begins a series of concerts (to be followed by Aretha Franklin, Herb Alpert, and the Smothers Brothers). With him will be singers Kim Weston and Delores Hall and his own troupe of singers.

Belafonte's appearance is not part of the Newport Folk Festival, which begins Thursday, July 25. As usual, the festival is replete with well-known artists, from Joan Baez (Friday) to B. B. King and Big Brother and the Holding Company (Saturday) to Taj Mahal and Tim Buckley (Sunday afternoon). Tickets for the Folk Festival may be obtained by calling 262-1665.

(Continued on Page 3)

(Continued from page 1)

Tickets for the future Tanglewood concerts are available through Boston After Dark Priority Ticket Service, or from Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02114 (413) 637-1600.

GARDEN CITY NEWSDAY
Tuesday, July 16, 1968

047

New Beat on Way To Tanglewood

NE

Lenox, Mass.—The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, one of the traditional summertime homes of classical music, will rock to a different beat starting tomorrow. The Tanglewood Festival will offer a series of concerts devoted to jazz and folk, rock and East Indian music.

The series, called Contemporary Trends Concerts, will open tomorrow at 8 PM in the Tanglewood Shed with a jazz-folk concert featuring Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Don Ellis orchestra. On July 24 there will be music from India performed by Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan. A rock concert on July 31 will offer The Association.

In explaining the purpose of three-concert series, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, said: "The young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason it shouldn't coexist amicably with what my colleague Mr. (Gunther) Schuller, terms 'so-called serious music.' Certainly in the last 10 years we have serious music and popular music influencing one another in remarkable and unexpected ways. To bring some of the most highly regarded practitioners of popular music to Tanglewood under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center is hopefully another way to broaden our vision of our art."

Schuller, the composer who heads the music center's contemporary music activities, said, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends, and introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

JUL 18 1968 New England Newsclip

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,400

JUL 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Ravi Shankar, Associations Concerts Set

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced plans for two Contempoary-Trends Concerts to be given at Tanglewood in Lenox on the two remaining Wednesdays in July.

The dates, title and participants will be:

July 24-Music from India with Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan. Shan Kar Ghosh, Tabla and 10 other musicians will support Shankar and Khan.

July 31-Rock music by The Associations.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

JUL 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Modern Concerts At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is sponsoring three contemporary trends concerts this summer under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

The first one of jazz and folk music was performed Wednesday.

Others will be next Wednesday, July 24, Music from India and July 31, Rock. The programs begin at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of The Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, noted that "The young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it shouldn't co-exist amicably with 'so-called serious music.'"

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUL 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood gets with it

Tanglewood, usually the summer forum for the Boston Symphony's classical music concerts, will feature three Wednesday "Contemporary Trend" programs of jazz and fold, Indian, and rock music.

The Mdoern Jazz Quartet, folksinger Judy Collins and the Don Ellis Orchestra are to appear in the 6000-seat Music Shed July 17. This program will be followed July 24 by Ravi Shankar's "Music of India" The pop group The Association is scheduled for July 31. All begin at 8 p.m.

Participants in the series are expected to be on hand to work with students at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf noted that students here "have grown up with popular music in all its guises and I see no reason why it shouldn't co-exist amicably with what my colleague Gunther Schuller terms 'so-called serious music'."

Schuller, New England Conservatory president and Berkshire Music Center head of contemporary music, commented: "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

SARATOGA SARATOGIAN
Thursday, July 18, 1968

Tanglewood 'Current' Concerts Set

NE

LENOX, Mass. — The Berkshire Music Center will present two contemporary trends concerts during July.

The program consists of an Indian music performance, with Ravi Shankar, on July 24 at 8 p.m., and a rock show, starring the Association, July 31, 8 p.m.

Ticket prices are $3, $4, $5, and $5.50 for box seats. General admission to the Tanglewood Lawns is $2.50. The box office address is Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02114.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JUL 18 1968
New England Newsclip

sight and sound

Tanglewood 'Gets With It'

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

Only in their most unguarded moments have the upper-level officials at Tanglewood revealed a touch of tension during the last few days. They are, as most casual observers are well aware, the most urbane and cultivated of gentlemen. The surface of their troubled waters is (almost) invariably calm.

"Contemporary Trends"

But the focus of their special interest this year is on a new project called "Contemporary Trends," and the intensity with which they view this project is revealed not only in an enthisiasm in conversation which is almost unseemly for gentlemen supported by the strength and momentum of the Berkshire Music Festival, but also in the fact that they felt called upon to conduct a press conference to announce the project and explain it.

It was the first press conference at Tanglewood in at least six seasons, although the press was invited to Symphony Hall in Boston to discuss Tanglewood four or five years ago.

The conference was attended by among other officials, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center (which is sponsoring the project), Erich Leinsdorf; the manager of the orchestra, Thomas D. Perry, Jr.; and the man in charge of contemporary music at the center, Gunther Schuller, who is also president of the New England Conservatory of Music.

The reason for the intensity of their interest, of course, is that the project shows a distinct departure from Tanglewood's tradition.

They have no box - office experience which might help them predict what will happen when they open the gates for performances in the great, 6000 - seat shed by Judy Collins, folk singer; the Modern Jazz Quartet (MJQ), the Don Ellis

See TANGLEWOOD Page 37

Tanglewood Finally 'Gets With It'

Continued From Page 26

Orchestra, Ravi Shankar, sitar player; Ali Akbar Kahn, sarod player; the nine musicials of the Festival Troupe from India, and The Association, a group of six rock-n-rollers.

To be sure, great jazz artists have been on the stage of the shed before, Duke Ellington, for instance, but they were there with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops orchestra, and everyone at Tanglewood knows that Fiedler's Pops is good for an audience of about 15,000, if it doesn't rain, no matter who is with him.

Now, on July 17, there will be Judy and the MJQ and Don Ellis, and the management is praying, while smiling confidently, that the audience will be gigantic.

One cannot blame them for being a bit nervous, secretly, of course, even though the project is long overdue.

And let us, also, offer up a prayer for the project's success because the purpose is pure.

That purpose was explained quite succinctly at the press conference by that most articulate of modern composers, Gunther Schuller.

"Many musicians," he said, "are becoming aware of the fact that the boundaries of what is 'good' or 'serious' in music are breaking down."

He called attention to our expanded means of communications, the awareness of musicians around the world of all styles of music and the increase of "stylistic cross-fertilization" in music.

"It is high time," he said, "that we (at Tanglewood) are reflecting these trends in the music world."

Started by Kraut

Thus it is that the project idea, germinated by Harry Kraut, administrator of the center, receives its strongest support at Tanglewood. Now the whole staff is behind it.

But if Harry germinated the project, who chose the artists on the program? They were chosen by a kind of committee. Contributions of opinions were made by several members of the administrative staff, and probably Schuller had a major hand in the final decisions.

The vastness of the shed also had influence. My underground tells me that Simon and Garfunkle were high on the list of choices, but were scratched reluctantly because their intimate music is too small to sound well in the giant open - sided shed.

The choice of artists is of special interest because the project is being called "contemporary trends."

Music Really Established

With the possible exception of Don Ellis, who is offering new sounds with a big band, the others on the schedule are offering well - established music, not "trends."

The important point, however, is that they are first-class performers of music being synthesized in the newer forms, or, as Schuller might put it, of styles which are being cross-fertilized.

Judy Collins has performed at the Music Barn in Lenox three or four times and is my favorite female folk singer. The MJQ also has appeared more than once in the Music Barn and has stayed with its beautiful style several years, except when recording third-stream amalgams of jazz and atonal "serious" music.

Ravi Shankar, too, has played in the Music Barn and is the ranking practitioner of India's sitar music in America. And The Association has a folk-rock style that has been successful about four years.

If, next year, the "contemporary trend" series is continued, as it should be, perhaps some of the innovators will be heard. We might even see that eminent synthesizer of rock, blues and gospel called "soul," Aretha Franklin.

She would really shake up the shed.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

ERICH LEINSDORF Director

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC ACTIVITIES

GUNTHER SCHULLER Head

Wednesday July 17 at 8 pm

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS CONCERT

JUDY COLLINS

THE MODERN JAZZ QUARTET

JOHN LEWIS piano — MILT JACKSON vibraharp
PERCY HEATH bass — CONNIE KAY drums

DON ELLIS
and the
DON ELLIS ORCHESTRA

There will be two intermissions

John Lewis plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN is the official piano of the Berkshire Music Center

July 17 Jazz / Folk
Judy Collins
Modern Jazz Quartet
Don Ellis Orchestra

Movies TV Art

Music Review

'Contemporary Trends'

By DAVID E. PITT

THE MODERN Jazz Quartet, Judy Collins and the Don Ellis Orchestra are all musicians of major stature, but upon learning that they had been placed on the program of Tanglewood's first concert in its "Contemporary Trends" series, the natural reaction was to conclude that whoever decided on such an awesome assemblage must have taken total leave of his senses. The concert seemed destined to be either far too long or far too short, as many potential ticket-buyers might well have feared. Somehow there didn't seem to be a middle ground.

* * *

BUT GUNTHER Schuller, who is the head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center and in large part responsible for the programming of the new series, evidently was optimistic about the prospects for a box office success.

Last night his optimism paid off when 6,405 people streamed into the Tanglewood Shed for what was easily the most exciting concert this season.

The Modern Jazz Quartet started things rolling with "Blue Necklace," the first of seven numbers. There were a few familiar pieces, including the "Jasmine Tree," "Monterrey Mist" and "What Now My Love," and a few not-so-well-known, such as an arrangement of the adagio from Spanish composer Joaquin Rodrigo's Guitar Concerto, which sounded in spots very much like Villa-Lobos. They also came through with "A Cold Wind Is Blowing" and "Exposure."

Their highly cerebral musicianship has not suffered with the passage of the years (as a jazz group, they are second in longevity only to the Ellington Band) Lewis's piano is still magnificent, Milt Jackson continues to play the vibes with angelic sensitivity, and Heath and Kay are as intense and impeccable as ever. The MJQ hasn't changed in sound or approach very significantly, but nobody in the audience seemed to mind. The group got several sizable ovations.

* * *

AFTER THE first of two intermissions, Judy Collins arrived with the same superb backup team that was with her at Saratoga a few weeks ago. Michael Saul was on organ and piano (which he frequently played simultaneously), Maury Baker, drums, and Chris Ethridge, electric bass. The dulcet Miss Collins promptly launched into "Chelsea Morning," a sure-fire crowd pleaser, and then went through a varied repertoire of songs by her favorite Canadian poet, Leonard Cohen. She failed to sing "Both Sides Now," even when brought back for an encore (when she did the Lennon - McCartney number, "In My Life"), but there may have been some sighs of relief, since "Both Sides Now" is played much too frequently.

* * *

THE DON Ellis Orchestra, its members resplendent in red velveteen jackets and what appeared to be alligator collars, concluded the concert, and they all but brought down the house. The decibel count was astronomical, and the girders buzzed and the moths inside the Shed went slightly berserk. But Ellis, his "electrophonic woodwinds," Indian rhythms and electronic sound gadgetry made a strong impression on the many people who remained in the audience. His trumpet was electrifying as well as electrified. Such numbers as his arrangement of Charlie Parker's "K.C. Blues" and "Indian Lady," with soloists like Pete Robinson, piano, Glenn Curtis, trombone, Frank Strosher, alto sax, and John Clemmer, tenor, were simply out of sight.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
JUL 12 1968

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 18 1968

New England Newsclip

sight and sound

Tanglewood 'Gets With It'

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

Only in their most unguarded moments have the upper-level officials at Tanglewood revealed a touch of tension during the last few days. They are, as most casual observers are well aware, the most urbane and cultivated of gentlemen. The surface of their troubled waters is (almost) invariably calm.

"Contemporary Trends"

But the focus of their special interest this year is on a new project called "Contemporary Trends," and the intensity with which they view this project is revealed not only in an enthisiasm in conversation which is almost unseemly for gentlemen supported by the strength and momentum of the Berkshire Music Festival, but also in the fact that they felt called upon to conduct a press conference to announce the project and explain it.

It was the first press conference at Tanglewood in at least six seasons, although the press was invited to Symphony Hall in Boston to discuss Tanglewood four or five years ago.

The conference was attended by among other officials, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center (which is sponsoring the project), Erich Leinsdorf; the manager of the orchestra, Thomas D. Perry, Jr.; and the man in charge of contemporary music at the center, Gunther Schuller, who is also president of the New England Conservatory of Music.

The reason for the intensity of their interest, of course, is that the project shows a distinct departure from Tanglewood's tradition.

They have no box - office experience which might help them predict what will happen when they open the gates for performances in the great, 6000 - seat shed by Judy Collins, folk singer; the Modern Jazz Quartet (MJQ), the Don Ellis

See TANGLEWOOD Page 37

Tanglewood Finally 'Gets With It'

Continued From Page 26

Orchestra, Ravi Shankar, sitar player; Ali Akbar Kahn, sarod player; the nine musicials of the Festival Troupe from India, and The Association, a group of six rock-n-rollers.

To be sure, great jazz artists have been on the stage of the shed before, Duke Ellington, for instance, but they were there with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops orchestra, and everyone at Tanglewood knows that Fiedler's Pops is good for an audience of about 15,000, if it doesn't rain, no matter who is with him.

Now, on July 17, there will be Judy and the MJQ and Don Ellis, and the management is praying, while smiling confidently, that the audience will be gigantic.

One cannot blame them for being a bit nervous, secretly, of course, even though the project is long overdue.

And let us, also, offer up a prayer for the project's success because the purpose is pure.

That purpose was explained quite succinctly at the press conference by that most articulate of modern composers, Gunther Schuller.

"Many musicians," he said, "are becoming aware of the fact that the boundaries of what is 'good' or 'serious' in music are breaking down."

He called attention to our expanded means of communications, the awareness of musicians around the world of all styles of music and the increase of "stylistic cross-fertilization" in music.

"It is high time," he said, "that we (at Tanglewood) are reflecting these trends in the music world."

Started by Kraut

Thus it is that the project idea, germinated by Harry Kraut, administrator of the center, receives its strongest support at Tanglewood. Now the whole staff is behind it.

But if Harry germinated the project, who chose the artists on the program? They were chosen by a kind of committee. Contributions of opinions were made by several members of the administrative staff, and probably Schuller had a major hand in the final decisions.

The vastness of the shed also had influence. My underground tells me that Simon and Garfunkle were high on the list of choices, but were scratched reluctantly because their intimate music is too small to sound well in the giant open - sided shed.

The choice of artists is of special interest because the project is being called "contemporary trends."

Music Really Established

With the possible exception of Don Ellis, who is offering new sounds with a big band, the others on the schedule are offering well - established music, not "trends."

The important point, however, is that they are first-class performers of music being synthesized in the newer forms, or, as Schuller might put it, of styles which are being cross-fertilized.

Judy Collins has performed at the Music Barn in Lenox three or four times and is my favorite female folk singer. The MJQ also has appeared more than once in the Music Barn and has stayed with its beautiful style several years, except when recording third-stream amalgams of jazz and atonal "serious" music.

Ravi Shankar, too, has played in the Music Barn and is the ranking practitioner of India's sitar music in America. And The Association has a folk-rock style that has been successful about four years.

If, next year, the "contemporary trend" series is continued, as it should be, perhaps some of the innovators will be heard. We might even see that eminent synthesizer of rock, blues and gospel called "soul," Aretha Franklin.

She would really shake up the shed.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

ERICH LEINSDORF Director

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC ACTIVITIES

GUNTHER SCHULLER Head

Wednesday July 17 at 8 pm

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS CONCERT

JUDY COLLINS

THE MODERN JAZZ QUARTET

JOHN LEWIS piano — MILT JACKSON vibraharp
PERCY HEATH bass — CONNIE KAY drums

DON ELLIS
and the
DON ELLIS ORCHESTRA

There will be two intermissions

John Lewis plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN is the official piano of the Berkshire Music Center

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 12 1968

July 17 Jazz / Folk
Judy Collins
Modern Jazz Quartet
Don Ellis Orchestra

Movies TV Art

Music Review

'Contemporary Trends'

By DAVID E. PITT

THE MODERN Jazz Quartet, Judy Collins and the Don Ellis Orchestra are all musicians of major stature, but upon learning that they had been placed on the program of Tanglewood's first concert in its "Contemporary Trends" series, the natural reaction was to conclude that whoever decided on such an awesome assemblage must have taken total leave of his senses. The concert seemed destined to be either far too long or far too short, as many potential ticket-buyers might well have feared. Somehow there didn't seem to be a middle ground.

* * *

BUT GUNTHER Schuller, who is the head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center and in large part responsible for the programming of the new series, evidently was optimistic about the prospects for a box office success.

Last night his optimism paid off when 6,405 people streamed into the Tanglewood Shed for what was easily the most exciting concert this season.

The Modern Jazz Quartet started things rolling with "Blue Necklace," the first of seven numbers. There were a few familiar pieces, including the "Jasmine Tree," "Monterrey Mist" and "What Now My Love," and a few not-so-well-known, such as an arrangement of the adagio from Spanish composer Joaquin Rodrigo's Guitar Concerto, which sounded in spots very much like Villa-Lobos. They also came through with "A Cold Wind Is Blowing" and "Exposure."

Their highly cerebral musicianship has not suffered with the passage of the years (as a jazz group, they are second in longevity only to the Ellington Band) Lewis's piano is still magnificent, Milt Jackson continues to play the vibes with angelic sensitivity, and Heath and Kay are as intense and impeccable as ever. The MJQ hasn't changed in sound or approach very significantly, but nobody in the audience seemed to mind. The group got several sizable ovations.

* * *

AFTER THE first of two intermissions, Judy Collins arrived with the same superb backup team that was with her at Saratoga a few weeks ago. Michael Saul was on organ and piano (which he frequently played simultaneously), Maury Baker, drums, and Chris Ethridge, electric bass. The dulcet Miss Collins promptly launched into "Chelsea Morning," a sure-fire crowd pleaser, and then went through a varied repertoire of songs by her favorite Canadian poet, Leonard Cohen. She failed to sing "Both Sides Now," even when brought back for an encore (when she did the Lennon - McCartney number, "In My Life"), but there may have been some sighs of relief, since "Both Sides Now" is played much too frequently.

* * *

THE DON Ellis Orchestra, its members resplendent in red velveteen jackets and what appeared to be alligator collars, concluded the concert, and they all but brought down the house. The decibel count was astronomical, and the girders buzzed and the moths inside the Shed went slightly berserk. But Ellis, his "electrophonic woodwinds," Indian rhythms and electronic sound gadgetry made a strong impression on the many people who remained in the audience. His trumpet was electrifying as well as electrified. Such numbers as his arrangement of Charlie Parker's "K.C. Blues" and "Indian Lady," with soloists like Pete Robinson, piano, Glenn Curtis, trombone, Frank Strosher, alto sax, and John Clemmer, tenor, were simply out of sight.

118

AREA MUSIC NOTES

Dancing Is Permitted If You Reserve Seat

When Buddy DeFranco brings the Glenn Miller Orchestra to the Post Pavilion in Columbia on Aug. 9, the Washington National Symphony, which is booking the event, will try out a novel sort of class distinction. For the first half of the program, DeFranco and his orchestra will play for everyone. But for the second half, the musicians will move into the pit, and reserved seat holders will be invited to use the stage as a dance floor. Reserved seats are $3.50 and general admission is $2.50. "But," says the symphony sternly, "only reserved seat holders will be invited to dance in the second half."

The University of Maryland's musicians will be all over the area next week. On Monday and Wednesday, the school's woodwind quintet will play at the Washington Cathedral. Two separate programs are involved, and no work will be repeated.

On Friday and Saturday at Columbia the University Chorus conducted by Paul Traver will join the Washingon National Symphony under Howard Mitchell and the pianist Philippe Entremont in the Beethoven Choral Fantasy.

Meanwhile, the University Trio is continuing its successful series at the Tawes Recital Hall on the College Park campus. The emphasis there continues to be on contemporary music, with Amram, Bartok and Schubert the composers of the music on Tuesday's program.

One week later, on Tuesday, July 30, the trio will give the first performance of Mary Dyer by Robert Evett. Mrs. Dyer was a Quaker who sought to test the Massachusetts Bay Colony's law excluding members of the Society of Friends. She was sentenced to death, then banished from the colony. Seven months later she returned. The law provided for banishment under sentence of death for a first offense, and the death penalty itself should the person return. Mrs. Dyer was accordingly hanged for "rebellious sedition" on Boston Common on June 1, 1660.

Evett, who for some years was books and arts editor of the New Republic in Washington, recently transferred to a similar post at the Atlantic Monthly. Massachusetts is like many other societies: it erects monuments to those it martyrs. Thus Evett has been walking past a statue of Mary Dyer on the Boston Common. Finally, the subject struck him as appropriate for a contemporary, musical memorial.

Jazz, Etc.

The tendency for various areas of music to draw closer together has received official recognition from the Music Educators National Conference. Something called the National Association of Jazz Educators has just become associated with MENC. "Jazz," as the various releases make clear, is a short form of the phrase "jazz and popular music" which appears again and again in them.

Meanwhile, the Boston Symphony's summer home at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Massachusetts, has resounded to the music of Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet and Don Ellis, and is preparing to receive Ravi Shankar (July 24) and The Association (July 31). None of the people concerned is going to Tanglewood simply as a performer. All will be "teaching, talking, consulting and playing," said Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra and chairman of the faculty of the summer school run by the symphony.

"The young men and women studying here," said Erich Leinsdorf, "have grown up with popular music in all its guises and see no reason why it shouldn't coexist amicably with what my colleague Mr. (Gunther) Schuller terms 'so-called serious music.'" Schuller is a distinguished composer and historian of jazz as well as the head of contemporary music activities at the school. —D. M.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 309,245 SUN. 358,738
JUL 19 1968

Music Notes: Contemporary Trends Series Opens at Tanglewood

The Contemporary Trends series at Tanglewood opens tonight with performances by folk singer Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet and Don Ellis and the Don Ellis Orchestra.

The second concert, next Wednesday, at the Lenox, Mass. festival will feature "Music from India" with Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan. The final concert in the series will be given by The Association, a rock group.

Composer Gunther Schuller, head of the contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Festival, said in announcing the programs, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts, delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The Berkshire Music Center gives classes in all areas of music each summer during the Tanglewood season to aspiring professional musicians. The Tanglewood Festival has annually included an American Music Festival as one of its special events.

While folk music gets its first hearing in the Tanglewood Music Shed, conductor Erich Leinsdorf is taking the Boston Symphony to New York's Philharmonic Hall for a one-night concert Wednesday night.

* * *

The College of St. Rose opens its summer series of concert lectures this afternoon with a program by harpist Corky Christman from 1:00 p.m. to 2:00 p.m. in St. Joseph's Hall.

JUDY COLLINS

Young Audiences Inc. will demonstrate ancient instruments from 11:00 a.m. until noon on Wednesday and Caroline and Sandy Paton will give a folk concert on Friday at 9:30 a.m. for children and one for adults at 11:00 a.m.

Forklorist Dr. Barr Toelken will discuss American folklore and give a concert Friday at 8:00 p.m.

The program is called "Vision '68" and all events except the final concert are open to the public without charge. There will be a nominal fee for Dr. Toelken's performance.

* * *

The American Dressage Institute is in its second season at Saratoga, affilitated with the Saratoga Performing Arts Center. A two-week seminar in classical riding is now being given at the Oklahoma Training Track.

Director of the Institute is Colonel Hans Moeller who is assisted by Oberbereiter Franz Rochowansky of the Spanish Riding School in Vienna.

The Lake Placid Music Festival opens its seven-concert summer season tonight with a performance by the Metropolitan Opera Studio. Pianist Jose Echaniz is artistic director.

The recital begins at 9:00 p.m. sharp at the theater on Signal Hill. The weekly Tuesday concerts will also feature performances by Brenda Lewis of the Met and pianist Kenneth Drake.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006
JUL 16 1968

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
JUL 18 1968
New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,500
AUG 1 1968
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JUL 18 1968
New England Newsclip

Modern Jazz Quartet Stars at Tanglewood

By PETER GOODMAN

LENOX — The first of three contemporary trends concerts scheduled at Tanglewood this summer opened Wednesday night with a brilliant performance by the Modern Jazz Quarter.

Second Set

Judy Collins played the second set, and the concert was ended with a performance by Don Ellis and his orchestra.

The quartet, with Milt Jackson dominating most of their set with the piercing sound of his vibes, John Lewis staying close to the center of the keyboard for a very controlled piano, and Percy Heath and Connie Kay providing a smooth, disciplined base, played with subtle subdued energy.

The quartet played several of their own arrangements and the works of others, including "What Now My Love" and a calm and penetrating arrangement of the adagio from the Spanish composer Rodrigo's "Guitar Concerto." The tempos and dynamics were all very carefully and skillfully controlled.

The audience of some 6500 under the Shed responded enthusiastically to a good opening for this concert series.

Judy Collins

Judy Collins' set was a suspenseful contest between my image of her formed from the delicate and subtle arrangements of her albums and the live presentation of a very different, close to hard rock style.

It was not until she sang a hard, driving version of Dick Farinas' "Hard Lovin Loser," diametrically opposed to the cool Joshua Rifkin arrangement she recorded earlier that I could tell she made it.

The audience, which responded with pleased recognition to the more familiar performance of songs such as Leonard Cohen's "Suzanne," and "Michael From Mountains," was left roaring after the Farina piece.

Backed by Rock Trio

Miss Collins was backed by a rock trio composed of Michael Saul on piano and organ, Chris Ethridge on bass and Maury Baker on drums. This group did not form a very good accompaniment for several of the songs, and contributed to the doubts I had for most of the set as to whether she could make the switch to rock.

They were uneven, with some really moronic arrangements marring the performance.

An example of the difficulty Miss Collins seemed to have occurred in a song that began "Hello, Hurray."

It opened with a good solo, and the group came in hard behind her, but they couldn't keep up the intensity for the whole song.

Don Ellis a Veteran

Don Ellis has been around quite a while, but the complex new music he has been playing recently is rather electrifying.

It seems fairly entrenched in jazz, but brings in ideas from India. This really mixes up the rhythms and gave an esoteric air to his performance.

The audience went wild over his work. Wherever he goes, there will be quite a few following.

Don Ellis Electrifies Young Tanglewood Crowd

By S. H. Pope

Tanglewood surprised several housand young campers and more thousands of ye sedentary Wednesday evening as Don Ellis and his Big Band shattered he comfortable reminiscences nspired by the Modern Jazz Quartet and Miss Judy Collins, Wednesday, July 17. With Ellis' "electrifying woodwinds and electrifying trumpet" a program of familiar summery sounds, where the chief contentment was in knowing what to expect next, was suddenly climaxed by a clear view of "New Horizons." The number, which went for ten minutes or so and required some 20 musicians, seemed generated by Mr. Ellis himself and had the power of a Grand Canyon Suite staged at the edge of the Twilight Zone. Immense, stormlike energy by Ellis in his silk mandarin jacket created an eerie work where the flutes, saxophones and trombones seemed to chatter together like amplified sub-human creatures planning a world of their own. In his last number, adapted from a contemporary Spanish piece for the guitar and called "Indian Lady" Ellis drained the imaginative capacity of his audience as he plugged his own trumpet into a rock amplifier combined with a reverberator or echo-chamber The resulting sounds are too much for my educated vocabulary to describe.

The three-part program seemed to bring an end to the recent hot spell and brought a correspondingly lively crowd into the big shed for this new (to Tanglewood) kind of music. The Modern Jazz Quartet seemed more than ever to produce from the isolated and individual performances a floating, beautiful sound that — note by note — would rise and flutter in the trees for hours, accumulating like dreams in the listener's mind. Judy Collins, as always, brought enthusiasm and tremendous personal appeal to the stage, and, with the help of three back-up musicians, held full sway over the open reaches of the lawn.

Whitestone

THE MUSIC SHED at Tanglewood reverberated to a different kind of beat last night when the first concert of the new "Contemporary Trends" series opened with the Don Ellis Orchestra (shown here), Judy Collins and the Modern Jazz Quartet. Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center, acted as master of ceremonies for the event, which attracted throng of 6,405 despite threatening skies. Three-concert series continues Wednesday with Indian musicians Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan. Review appears on Page 4.

119.

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,050

AUG 17 1968

New England Newsclip

bizarre style of Don Ellis

"The Electric Bath With Don Ellis and His Orchestra" will be on Channel 1 for a full hour, Sunday, August 18 at 5 p.m.

"The Electric Bath" is the name of Ellis' latest jazz album, from which he plays such hit tunes as "New Dimensions", "Open Beauty" and "Turkish Bath."

One of the nation's top jazz trumpeters, Ellis won acclaim last month when he appeared at Tanglewood in a jazz concert televised by Channel 2. On this hour-long special he demonstrates the electronic verberation technique developed while he attended UCLA's Musicology Department and shows what changes electronic wizardry can make in the sound of a trumpet.

After a brief interview with jazz critic Leonard Feather, Ellis and his orchestra perform before an enhusiasi studio audience set against an "environmental background" designed specifically for Ellis by former MGM set designer Doug Stiles.

"The Electric Bath With Don Ellis and His Orchestra" was produced for the Eastern Educational Network's SUMMER FESTIVAL by KCET, Los Angeles, and is being seen on all stations of the E.E.N. Network.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JUL 19 1968

New England Newsclip

Contemporary trends:

Tanglewood jazz/folk

By David Sterritt
Lenox, Mass.

Tanglewood, the ordinarily sedate summer quarters of the Boston Symphony, opened its doors Wednesday night to a rather unusual combination of jazz and folk performers. By the time the evening was over, the traditional Berkshire Music Festival was really jumping.

The program was the first in a series of Contemporary-Trends Concerts, intended to showcase the best of today's jazz, folk, and pop talents, and to indicate some of the directions in which these forms of modern music are moving. Future evenings will feature Indian musicians Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan and the Association, an American rock group.

Appearing in the opening program were folksinger Judy Collins, jazzman Don Ellis and his orchestra, and the Modern Jazz Quartet. The concert's three segments were as varied as one could imagine, and they adequately represented the best of today's efforts in "Jazz/Folk," as the program was labeled.

The MJQ opened the proceedings in their usual refined yet forceful manner. Numbers were introduced in a quiet voice by pianist John Lewis, who also serves as musical director for the group. His colleagues are Percy Heath (bass), Milt Jackson (vibraharp), and Connie Kay (drums).

'Showmanship'

The MJQ eschew traditional "showmanship" and personal appeal; they wear somber black suits—as opposed to the colorful attire frequently sported by jazz musicians—and devote their energies entirely to making music. Their difficult practice of serious concert improvisation necessitates this concentration and avoidance of extraneous elements, which also focuses the audience's attention completely on the sounds. So the quartet was an ideal opener for a concert meant to showcase jazz and related forms as "serious" music.

Original songs like "A Cold Wind Is Blowing" alternated with standards like "What Now, My Love" and lesser-known pieces like "Monterey Mist." Fascinating dialogues between Mr. Lewis's piano and Mr. Jackson's vibraharp dominated the musical proceedings, with Mr. Heath—probably the finest bassist in the jazz world today—providing harmonic punctuation and unusual effects. Mr. Kay's drumming was, as always, dynamic yet tasteful, striking a perfect balance with the others.

Miss Collins filled the program's second segment with her own charming brand of folk music. Like practically every other well-known folk singer of the mid '60's, she has followed Bob Dylan's lead and added a small rock-blues band to her own guitar and voice, thus illustrating an observation by Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center, in introducing the concert; Mr. Schuller noted that barriers are breaking down between all forms of music. In all phases of musical activity, cross-fertilization and interrelation are becoming the rule rather than the exception. Thus, jazz and folk are drawing together again; they were identical when jazz began.

Whether singing a tender yet philosophical love song like Leonard Cohen's "Suzanne," or an earthy piece of psychedelia like Dylan's "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues," Miss Collins's voice was pure and bell-like, yet forceful and piercing when necessary. She is one of our most effective urban folk interpreters.

Mr. Ellis's orchestra has three percussionists, two bassists, five saxophonists who double on flute, and enough of everything else to drown these out easily. Yet the group's truly loud sound is coupled with a remarkable rhythmic subtlety and electronic inventiveness.

"New Horizons" was in the unusual time signature of 17/8; "Open Beauty" utilized an electric trumpet capable of the most outlandish sounds. On the other hand, Charlie Parker's "K.C. Blues" was alternately Coltrane-esque and stomping-bluesy.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 31,320

JUL 18 1968

Exciting Judy Collins captivates Tanglewood

By CORAL CROSMAN
Union-Star Staff

Judy Collins is an exciting, dynamic performer, by far the most "current" of the three groups who appeared in the first of the "Contemporary Trends" series initiated at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Wednesday night.

Also on the program was the Modern Jazz Quartet, a wistful, bluesy group that can spin magic webs around such numbers as "The Blue Necklace." "What Now, My Love." "Monterey Mist," "Exposure" and "A Cold Wind Is Blowing." Some of the tunes are their own and they make them thoroughly their own in a soft, quiet, intimately personal way.

★ ★ ★

In opposition to this roup was the last on the program, Don Ellis and his Orchestra. Ellis directs the large group — something like five flutes, four trombones, four trumpets (not counting his), two double bass, drums, organ, etc. They create a big, brassy sound, movnig out initially with an experimental bag of tricks called "New Horizons."

This number "pulled out all the stops," musically speaking, putting every instrument in the spotlight, sequentially, and dipping into a dozen different sound trends and effects, from a serial score for piano to wildly pounding drums, searing brass. It was loud, loud loud!

But, as a composition, in spite of all the forced excitement, it tended toward diffusion as a musical unity; it lacked the definition of a sure, guiding hand. After that, the musicians retreated to the safe, big band sound of the 40's, Glenn Miller styling.

Most impressive of the Modern Jazz Quartet selections was their adaptation of the 2nd Movement (Adagio) of Rodrigo's "Guitar Concerto." This is a reflective number, one that has the listener softly probing the inner textures of memory, in reverie, wistful.

With John Lewis on piano, Percy Heath on bass, Milt Jackson on vibraharp and Connie Kay on drums, it was gently penetrating. One could get lost in it, forgetting the big amphitheater, instead of in a dusky dimlit, smoky cafe where jazz belongs.

★ ★ ★

But Miss Collins, who came in the middle of the program, by far had the young (many teenaged) audience completely in her power. There was no quiet rustle of voices when she came on. Mostly, she sang what she sang at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center earlier this season, but she has had a chance to polish her style with those three wonderful musicians who back her.

She starts out with "Chelsea Morning" and she's got you: you're no longer slightly somewhere else but right up there with her, with the "sunlight coming through the yellow curtains." Michael Saul on piano; Maury Baker on organ and harp, and Chris Gutheridge on bass, provide a strong rock sound for this lusty singer.

She's not overwhelmed. Her voice, whether low and kind of earthy, middle range and almost harsh in its intensity, or high and lyrical, soft, pleading, escaping, is right there in healthy competition with the trio. They meet about in the middle like well-matched Indian wrestlers.

★ ★ ★

A funny simile—but nobody could overwhelm her. She sings like she doesn't really care if the audience is there or the seats are empty. When she dives into the number about the show going on, you suspect she hates the whole affair, and she's sincere and proud and scornful because of it. She's beautiful and she's real and the audience loves every moment of her.

Contemporary music — getting into the pop bag like SPAC is new territory for Tanglewood—probably a few ideas drifting across the mountains. Gunther Schuller, head of the Berkshire Music Center, emceed the program. The show was televised live on Channel 2 for viewers in Boston.

Next Wednesday brings Ravi Shankar with The Association the following week.

'Contemporary Trends' at Tanglewood

Don Ellis Orchestra Proves Big Bands Can Be Creative

By JAKE SHERMAN

Before going to Tanglewood Wednesday night, many people, myself included, had long ago decided that the big jazz band was dead as a doornail and no longer capable of anything even interesting, not to mention, creative.

The Don Ellis Orchestra, which concluded the first in a series of Wednesday Contemporary Trends concerts that also featured folksinger Judy Collins and the Modern Jazz Quartet, changed all these ideas in a hurry.

Ellis, the 34-year-old trumpeter and leader, warned the overflow crowd at the outset that they were in for something "a little different." But few were prepared for the startlingly original assault on the eardrums that followed.

The orchestra uses such novelties as "electrophonic" flutes and trumpets to produce a urrealitic sound that couldn't be more removed from the humdrum arrangement of standards and commercially successful pop tunes that for years have carried the Ellington and other big name ensembles along.

If novelty were all Ellis had to offer, he wouldn't be much worth getting excited about, but in at least two of the four selections—"New Horizons" and "Open Beauty"—he demonstrated the ability to fuse the techniques with vital musical ideas and radical rhythms.

Zany Variations

"New Horizons," for example, employs a theme in seventeen-eights time which is shunted around the orchestra in endlessly zany and cacoponic variation. Equally futuristic is "Open Beauty," described as "a psychedelic ballad," in which the full electronic arsenal is brought to bear to produce a wealth of other worldly echoes.

This is more than sound studio trickery, and certainly a closer musical approximation of the psychedelic experience than that furnished by the acid-rock groups.

Obviously, Ellis is not for all ears. Many left the auditorium, and many more, watching the program on television, flipped their dials to something less or not, though, one has to admit nerve-shattering. Like the stuff that Ellis has resurrected the big band concept and made it a viable instrument for the '60s and even the '70s.

The more one hears Judy Collins the more one becomes convinced that she should not allow her undoubted admiration for the songs of others to lead her to try to sing them herself. Or at least not without seeing if said songs are suitable vehicles for the vocal talents she posseses.

She is particularly out of her element with Dylan's "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues," a raunchy, bitter account of various misadventures in Juarez which, from her, comes up sounding more like a Sunday school picnic. Leonard Cohen's "Suzanne" fares equally poorly, Miss Collins' shifts in tempo and emphasis almost, but not quite, managing to destroy the song's great poetry.

Her velvet voice with it capacity to hit high notes effortlessly is much more suited to the lyrical Joni Mitchell ballad "Michael from Mountains" and, indeed, she offers a superb rendition of this. "Chelsea Morning," also by Joni Mitchell, and "In My Life," by Lennon-McCartney also find her in good form.

The Modern Jazz Quartet continues to sound pretty much the same and, though no one can doubt the musicians' subtlety and sophistication, their musical doodling to me at least, quickly become repetitious and tiresome.

A piece adapted by leader John Lewis from the adagio movement of a Spanish guitar concerto perhaps best typified the MJO's intellectual approach to jazz and their rarefied, tinkling sound.

Since the days when they recorded their great "Django," the group seems to have become even more introverted and disciplined, if such a thing is possible. Indeed, in their black Nehru jackets Wednesday night the musicians—Lewis on piano, Percy Heath on bass, Milt Jackson on vibes and Connie Kay on drums—looked almost monastic.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,013 SUN. 129,006

JUL 19 1968

119.

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,050

AUG 17 1968

New England Newsclip

bizarre style of Don Ellis

"The Electric Bath With Don Ellis and His Orchestra" will be on Channel 1 for a full hour, Sunday, August 18 at 5 p.m.

"The Electric Bath" is the name of Ellis' latest jazz album, from which he plays such hit tunes as "New Dimensions", "Open Beauty" and "Turkish Bath."

One of the nation's top jazz trumpeters, Ellis won acclaim last month when he appeared at Tanglewood in a jazz concert televised by Channel 2. On this hour-long special he demonstrates the electronic verberation technique developed while he attended UCLA's Musicology Department and shows what changes electronic wizardry can make in the sound of a trumpet.

After a brief interview with jazz critic Leonard Feather, Ellis and his orchestra perform before an enhusiasi• studio audience set against an "environmental background" designed specifically for Ellis by former MGM set designer Doug Stiles.

"The Electric Bath With Don Ellis and His Orchestra" was produced for the Eastern Educational Network's SUMMER FESTIVAL by KCET, Los Angeles, and is being seen on all stations of the E.E.N. Network.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JUL 19 1968

New England Newsclip

Contemporary trends:

Tanglewood jazz/folk

By David Sterritt

Lenox, Mass.

Tanglewood, the ordinarily sedate summer quarters of the Boston Symphony, opened its doors Wednesday night to a rather unusual combination of jazz and folk performers. By the time the evening was over, the traditional Berkshire Music Festival was really jumping.

The program was the first in a series of Contemporary-Trends Concerts, intended to showcase the best of today's jazz, folk, and pop talents, and to indicate some of the directions in which these forms of modern music are moving. Future evenings will feature Indian musicians Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan and the Association, an American rock group.

Appearing in the opening program were folksinger Judy Collins, jazzman Don Ellis and his orchestra, and the Modern Jazz Quartet. The concert's three segments were as varied as one could imagine, and they adequately represented the best of today's efforts in "Jazz/Folk," as the program was labeled.

The MJQ opened the proceedings in their usual refined yet forceful manner. Numbers were introduced in a quiet voice by pianist John Lewis, who also serves as musical director for the group. His colleagues are Percy Heath (bass), Milt Jackson (vibraharp), and Connie Kay (drums).

'Showmanship'

The MJQ eschew traditional "showmanship" and personal appeal; they wear somber black suits—as opposed to the colorful attire frequently sported by jazz musicians—and devote their energies entirely to making music. Their difficult practice of serious concert improvisation necessitates this concentration and avoidance of extraneous elements, which also focuses the audience's attention completely on the sounds. So the quartet was an ideal opener for a concert meant to showcase jazz and related forms as "serious" music.

Original songs like "A Cold Wind Is Blowing" alternated with standards like "What Now, My Love" and lesser-known pieces like "Monterey Mist." Fascinating dialogues between Mr. Lewis's piano and Mr. Jackson's vibraharp dominated the musical proceedings, with Mr. Heath—probably the finest bassist in the jazz world today—providing harmonic punctuation and unusual effects. Mr. Kay's drumming was, as always, dynamic yet tasteful, striking a perfect balance with the others.

Miss Collins filled the program's second segment with her own charming brand of folk music. Like practically every other well-known folk singer of the mid '60's, she has followed Bob Dylan's lead and added a small rock-blues band to her own guitar and voice, thus illustrating an observation by Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center, in introducing the concert; Mr. Schuller noted that barriers are breaking down between all forms of music. In all phases of musical activity, cross-fertilization and interrelation are becoming the rule rather than the exception. Thus, jazz and folk are drawing together again; they were identical when jazz began.

Whether singing a tender yet philosophical love song like Leonard Cohen's "Suzanne," or an earthy piece of psychedelia like Dylan's "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues," Miss Collins's voice was pure and bell-like, yet forceful and piercing when necessary. She is one of our most effective urban folk interpreters.

Mr. Ellis's orchestra has three percussionists, two bassists, five saxophonists who double on flute, and enough of everything else to drown these out easily. Yet the group's truly loud sound is coupled with a remarkable rhythmic subtlety and electronic inventiveness.

"New Horizons" was in the unusual time signature of 17/8; "Open Beauty" utilized an electric trumpet capable of the most outlandish sounds. On the other hand, Charlie Parker's "K.C. Blues" was alternately Coltrane-esque and stomping-bluesy.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 31,320

JUL 18 1968

Exciting Judy Collins captivates Tanglewood

By CORAL CROSMAN
Union-Star Staff

Judy Collins is an exciting, dynamic performer, by far the most "current" of the three groups who appeared in the first of the "Contemporary Trends" series initiated at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Wednesday night.

Also on the program was the Modern Jazz Quartet, a wistful, bluesy group that can spin magic webs around such numbers as "The Blue Necklace." "What Now, My Love." "Monterey Mist," "Exposure" and "A Cold Wind Is Blowing." Some of the tunes are their own and they make them thoroughly their own in a soft, quiet, intimately personal way.

★ ★ ★

In opposition to this roup was the last on the program, Don Ellis and his Orchestra. Ellis directs the large group — something like five flutes, four trombones, four trumpets (not counting his), two double bass, drums, organ, etc. They create a big, brassy sound, movnig out initially with an experimental bag of tricks called "New Horizons."

This number "pulled out all the stops," musically speaking, putting every instrument in the spotlight, sequentially, and dipping into a dozen different sound trends and effects, from a serial score for piano to wildly pounding drums, searing brass. It was loud, loud loud!

But, as a composition, in spite of all the forced excitement, it tended toward diffusion as a musical unity; it lacked the definition of a sure, guiding hand. After that, the musicians retreated to the safe, big band sound of the 40's, Glenn Miller styling.

Most impressive of the Modern Jazz Quartet selections was their adaptation of the 2nd Movement (Adagio) of Rodrigo' "Guitar Concerto." This is a reflective number, one that has the listener softly probing the inner textures of memory, in reverie, wistful.

With John Lewis on piano, Percy Heath on bass, Milt Jackson on vibraharp and Connie Kay on drums, it was gently penetrating. One could get lost in it, forgetting the big amphitheater, instead of in a dusky dimlit, smoky cafe where jazz belongs.

★ ★ ★

But Miss Collins, who came in the middle of the program, by far had the young (many teenaged) audience completely in her power. There was no quiet rustle of voices when she came on. Mostly, she sang what she sang at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center earlier this season, but she has had a chance to polish her style with those three wonderful musicians who back her.

She starts out with "Chelsea Morning" and she's got you: you're no longer slightly somewhere else but right up there with her, with the "sunlight coming through the yellow curtains." Michael Saul on piano; Maury Baker on organ and harp, and Chris Gutheridge on bass, provide a strong rock sound for this lusty singer.

She's not overwhelmed. Her voice, whether low and kind of earthy, middle range and almost harsh in its intensity, or high and lyrical, soft, pleading, escaping, is right there in healthy competition with the trio. They meet about in the middle like well-matched Indian wrestlers.

★ ★ ★

A funny simile—but nobody could overwhelm her. She sings like she doesn't really care if the audience is there or the seats are empty. When she dives into the number about the show going on, you suspect she hates the whole affair, and she's sincere and proud and scornful because of it. She's beautiful and she's real and the audience loves every moment of her.

Contemporary music — getting into the pop bag like SPAC is new territory for Tanglewood—probably a few ideas drifting across the mountains. Gunther Schuller, head of the Berkshire Music Center, emceed the program. The show was televised live on Channel 2 for viewers in Boston.

Next Wednesday brings Ravi Shankar with The Association the following week.

'Contemporary Trends' at Tanglewood

Don Ellis Orchestra Proves Big Bands Can Be Creative

By JAKE SHERMAN

Before going to Tanglewood Wednesday night, many people, myself included, had long ago decided that the big jazz band was dead as a doornail and no longer capable of anything even interesting, not to mention, creative.

The Don Ellis Orchestra, which concluded the first in a series of Wednesday Contemporary Trends concerts that also featured folksinger Judy Collins and, the Modern Jazz Quartet, changed all these ideas in a hurry.

Ellis, the 34-year-old trumpeter and leader, warned the overflow crowd at the outset that they were in for something "a little different." But few were prepared for the startlingly original assault on the eardrums that followed.

The orchestra uses such novelties as "electrophonic" flutes and trumpets to produce a urrealitic sound that couldn't be more removed from the humdrum arrangement of standards and commercially successful pop tunes that for years have carried the Ellington and other big name ensembles along.

If novelty were all Ellis had to offer, he wouldn't be much worth getting excited about, but in at least two of the four selections—"New Horizons" and "Open Beauty"—he demonstrated the ability to fuse the techniques with vital musical ideas and radical rhythms.

Zany Variations

"New Horizons," for example, employs a theme in seventeen-eights time which is shunted around the orchestra in endlessly zany and cacoponic variation. Equally futuristic is "Open Beauty," described as "a psychedelic ballad," in which the full electronic arsenal is brought to bear to produce a wealth of other worldly echoes.

This is more than sound studio trickery, and certainly a closer musical approximation of the psychedelic experience than that furnished by the acid-rock groups.

Obviously, Ellis is not for all ears. Many left the auditorium, and many more, watching the program on television, flipped their dials to something less or not, though, one has to admit nerve-shattering. Like the stuff that Ellis has resurrected the big band concept and made it a viable instrument for the '60s and even the '70s.

The more one hears Judy Collins the more one becomes convinced that she should not allow her undoubted admiration for the songs of others to lead her to try to sing them herself. Or a least not without seeing if said songs are suitable vehicles for the vocal talents she posseses.

She is particularly out of her element with Dylan's "Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues," a raunchy, bitter account of various misadventures in Juarez which, from her, comes up sounding more like a Sunday school picnic. Leonard Cohen's "Suzanne" fares equally poorly, Miss Collins' shifts in tempo and emphasis almost, but not quite, managing to destroy the song's great poetry.

Her velvet voice with it capacity to hit high notes effortlessly is much more suited to the lyrical Joni Mitchell ballad "Michael from Mountains" and, indeed, she offers a superb rendition of this. "Chelsea Morning," also by Joni Mitchell, and "In My Life," by Lennon-McCartney also find her in good form.

The Modern Jazz Quartet continues to sound pretty much the same and, though no one can doubt the musicians' subtlety and sophistication, their musical doodling to me at least, quickly become repetitious and tiresome.

A piece adapted by leader John Lewis from the adagio movement of a Spanish guitar concerto perhaps best typified the MJQ's intellectual approach to jazz and their rarefied, tinkling sound.

Since the days when they recorded their great "Django," the group seems to have become even more introverted and disciplined, if such a thing is possible. Indeed, in their black Nehru jackets Wednesday night the musicians—Lewis on piano, Percy Heath on bass, Milt Jackson on vibes and Connie Kay on drums—looked almost monastic.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,013 SUN. 129,006

JUL 19 1968

120.

July 24 Music from India
Ravi Shankar, sitar
Ali Akbar Kahn, sarod
and many other musicians from north and south India

Whitestone

RAVI SHANKAR, the Indian sitar virtuoso, was joined by the famed sarod player Ali Akbar Khan and tabla specialist Alla Rakha in a raga performance that climaxed the "Contemporary Trends" last night at Tanglewood. A review is on Page 4.

Scott

RAVI SHANKAR, Indian sitar virtuoso, tarried a little longer in the Berkshires after his concert at Tanglewood last Wednesday to conduct a lecture-demonstration class for the musicians in residence at the Talin Musical Festival at Music Inn, Lenox. The festival, in its premiere season, specializes in baroque and contemporary chamber concerts. Shankar gave a series of lectures to students at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood the same week.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JUL 30 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

ERICH LEINSDORF Director

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC ACTIVITIES

GUNTHER SCHULLER Head

Wednesday July 24 at 8 pm

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS CONCERT

By special arrangement with the Kinnara School of Indian Music Inc.
A Jay K. Hoffman presentation

RAVI SHANKAR and his
FESTIVAL FROM INDIA

Host PANDIT RAVI SHANKAR sitar

Special guest artist ALI AKBAR KHAN sarod
appears through the courtesy of Columbia Artists Management Inc.

THE ARTISTS AND RAGAS WILL BE ANNOUNCED FROM THE STAGE

The performers

Shankar Ghosh tabla
Fakir Mohammad Khan shehnai & dholak
Mohammad Miskin Khan shehnai & rabah
Sabri Khan sarangi
Sharad Kumar shehnai
Palghat Raghu mridangam
Alla Rakha tabla
Lakshmi Shankar vocalist
Shivkumar Sharma santoor

The above artists are supported on tamboura
by Kamala Chakravarty, Nodu C. Mullick

Collin Walcott stage manager
Robert Chambers tour manager

There will be an intermission after about one hour

BALDWIN is the official piano of the Berkshire Music Center rt

Music Review

Ravi Shankar at Tanglewood

By DAVID E. PITT

THE FOG and drizzle that enveloped Tanglewood last night created some tuning problems with the delicate instruments belonging to Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan and 11 other Indian musicians at the season's second "Contemporary Trends" concert. But music prevailed over the elements, and 4,200 listeners got three hours of some of the most strangely beautiful sounds heard this side of the Ganges.

* * *

INTEREST in Indian music may have developed in the U.S. with the kind of conformist sentiments that create overnight fads, but the majority of yesterday's assemblage were not faddists. Indeed, most seemed to treat the concert with all the seriousness and respect it warrants. Nobody fidgeted during some of the particularly long pieces, and nobody yawned. The entire audience seemed transfixed. (One wiseacre suggested that there was perhaps something more powerful than joss sticks burning on stage. Shankar, however, considers drugs to have no part whatever in performances of his music.)

* * *

SHANKAR, DRESSED unassumingly in a long white tunic and an embroidered Indian vest, spoke briefly before the concert began, asking the audience to be patient if the musicians seemed to take an inordinate amount of time to tune up, describing the nature of the music they would play and explaining the significance of some of the gestures that might be made during the performance. "Don't expect harmony, counterpoint or modulation in this music," said Shankar shortly before introducing the santoor player, Shivkumar Sharma. "Although Indian music is essentially melody, it never leaves the tonic mode."

There were four pieces in the first half of the concert. The first was with the santoor, a zither-like instrument played by striking the metal strings with two curved sticks. The accompanist on the tabla, two small drums tuned in treble and bass, was the famed Alla Rakha, who received almost as thunderous an ovation as Shankar. As is his wont, he played the most complicated rhythms with astonishing ease, the only indication of possible strain being his hair, which sometimes flopped comically about his ears. Sharma was no less adept.

* * *

SHANKAR'S sister-in-law, Lakshmi Shankar, sang three lovely pieces: a rhythmically standard raga, a lilting Bengali poem set to music and a "semi-classical" love song. Her performance, for all its unusual (for Westerners) shadings, was enthralling. It is interesting to note that in Indian music—according to a fascinating article in the recent Saturday Review—the human voice is considered the "quintessence of all instruments," which explains why traditional Indian instruments do not, by cultural choice, resemble any of the nonvocal-sounding instruments developed in the West.

There were a number of other selections, including a percussion duet between Alla Rakha, tabla, and Palghat Raghu, who played a cylindrical drum called a "mridangam" (the tone of which could be improved, he told a group of Berkshire Music Center students, by coating one of the drum heads—there are two—with a paste made from Cream-of-Wheat).

* * *

THERE WAS also an ensemble piece for a whole galaxy of different instruments, recently composed by Shankar, which he directed, oddly enough, by conducting. But the real highlight of the evening was when Shankar emerged with his sitar and joined sarod player Ali Akbar Khan for a duet, the second part of which was accompanied by Rakha. The improvisations—which Shankar said account for 50 to 95 per cent of a raga—were tremendously exciting. "Our music," he said earlier in the week, "is never something we have to think about first—it is always fresh." The final raga brought down the house. The three put in such a joyously intense effort that their performance could have done little else.

Picken Exhibit At Tanglewood

An exhibition of paintings by George Picken will be on display at the Glass House at Tanglewood this week.

ALI AKBAR KHAN, artist on the Indian sarod, will be featured as soloist with Ravi Shankar in a concert of music from north and south India Wednesday night at Tanglewood as part of the Contemporary Trends Series.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
JUL 22 1968 New England Newsclip

120.

July 24 Music from India
Ravi Shankar, sitar
Ali Akbar Kahn, sarod
and many other musicians from north and south India

Whitestone

RAVI SHANKAR, the Indian sitar virtuoso, was joined by the famed sarod player Ali Akbar Khan and tabla specialist Alla Rakha in a raga performance that climaxed the "Contemporary Trends" last night at Tanglewood. A review is on Page 4.

Scott

RAVI SHANKAR, Indian sitar virtuoso, tarried a little longer in the Berkshires after his concert at Tanglewood last Wednesday to conduct a lecture-demonstration class for the musicians in residence at the Talin Musical Festival at Music Inn, Lenox. The festival, in its premiere season, specializes in baroque and contemporary chamber concerts. Shankar gave a series of lectures to students at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood the same week.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 30 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

ERICH LEINSDORF Director

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC ACTIVITIES

GUNTHER SCHULLER Head

Wednesday July 24 at 8 pm

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS CONCERT

By special arrangement with the Kinnara School of Indian Music Inc.
A Jay K. Hoffman presentation

RAVI SHANKAR and his
FESTIVAL FROM INDIA

Host PANDIT RAVI SHANKAR sitar

Special guest artist ALI AKBAR KHAN sarod
appears through the courtesy of Columbia Artists Management Inc.

THE ARTISTS AND RAGAS WILL BE ANNOUNCED FROM THE STAGE

The performers

Shankar Ghosh tabla
Fakir Mohammad Khan shehnai & dholak
Mohammad Miskin Khan shehnai & rabah
Sabri Khan sarangi
Sharad Kumar shehnai
Palghat Raghu mridangam
Alla Rakha tabla
Lakshmi Shankar vocalist
Shivkumar Sharma santoor

The above artists are supported on tamboura
by Kamala Chakravarty, Nodu C. Mullick

Collin Walcott stage manager
Robert Chambers tour manager

There will be an intermission after about one hour

BALDWIN is the official piano of the Berkshire Music Center

rt

Music Review

Ravi Shankar at Tanglewood

By DAVID E. PITT

THE FOG and drizzle that enveloped Tanglewood last night created some tuning problems with the delicate instruments belonging to Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan and 11 other Indian musicians at the season's second "Contemporary Trends" concert. But music prevailed over the elements, and 4,200 listeners got three hours of some of the most strangely beautiful sounds heard this side of the Ganges.

* * *

INTEREST in Indian music may have developed in the U.S. with the kind of conformist sentiments that create overnight fads, but the majority of yesterday's assemblage were not faddists. Indeed, most seemed to treat the concert with all the seriousness and respect it warrants. Nobody fidgeted during some of the particularly long pieces, and nobody yawned. The entire audience seemed transfixed. (One wiseacre suggested that there was perhaps something more powerful than joss sticks burning on stage. Shankar, however, considers drugs to have no part whatever in performances of his music.)

* * *

SHANKAR, DRESSED unassumingly in a long white tunic and an embroidered Indian vest, spoke briefly before the concert began, asking the audience to be patient if the musicians seemed to take an inordinate amount of time to tune up, describing the nature of the music they would play and explaining the significance of some of the gestures that might be made during the performance. "Don't expect harmony, counterpoint or modulation in this music," said Shankar shortly before introducing the santoor player, Shivkumar Sharma. "Although Indian music is essentially melody, it never leaves the tonic mode."

There were four pieces in the first half of the concert: The first was with the santoor, a zither-like instrument played by striking the metal strings with two curved sticks. The accompanist on the tabla, two small drums tuned in treble and bass, was the famed Alla Rakha, who received almost as thunderous an ovation as Shankar. As is his wont, he played the most complicated rhythms with astonishing ease, the only indication of possible strain being his hair, which sometimes flopped comically about his ears. Sharma was no less adept.

* * *

SHANKAR'S sister-in-law, Lakshmi Shankar, sang three lovely pieces: a rhythmically standard raga, a lilting Bengali poem set to music and a "semi-classical" love song. Her performance, for all its unusual (for Westerners) shadings, was enthralling. It is interesting to note that in Indian music—according to a fascinating article in the recent Saturday Review—the human voice is considered the "quintessence of all instruments," which explains why traditional Indian instruments do not, by cultural choice, resemble any of the nonvocal-sounding instruments developed in the West.

There were a number of other selections, including a percussion duet between Alla Rakha, tabla, and Palghat Raghu, who played a cylindrical drum called a "mridangam" (the tone of which could be improved, he told a group of Berkshire Music Center students, by coating one of the drum heads—there are two—with a paste made from Cream-of-Wheat).

* * *

THERE WAS also an ensemble piece for a whole galaxy of different instruments, recently composed by Shankar, which he directed, oddly enough, by conducting. But the real highlight of the evening was when Shankar emerged with his sitar and joined sarod player Ali Akbar Khan for a duet, the second part of which was accompanied by Rakha. The improvisations—which Shankar said account for 50 to 95 per cent of a raga—were tremendously exciting. "Our music," he said earlier in the week, "is never something we have to think about first—it is always fresh." The final raga brought down the house. The three put in such a joyously intense effort that their performance could have done little else.

ALI AKBAR KHAN, artist on the Indian sarod, will be featured as soloist with Ravi Shankar in a concert of music from north and south India Wednesday night at Tanglewood as part of the Contemporary Trends Series.

Picken Exhibit At Tanglewood

An exhibition of paintings by George Picken will be on display at the Glass House at Tanglewood this week.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JUL 22 1968 New England Newsclip

Indian Music Thrills Crowd At Tanglewood

By M. DICKEY DRYSDALE

LENOX — At intermission Wednesday night — after almost two hours of Indian music by about eight instrumentalists and two vocalists — the audience at Tanglewood still had not heard the main offering of this second "Contemporary Trends" concert — Ravi Shankar and his sitar.

Exuberant Music

What they had heard, however, was an intricate and strange, but exuberant music played with an infectious involvement. Perhaps they had experienced intimations of a new kind of life from that in the rational, well-ordered West.

For what a change from the usual Tanglewood offering — instead of an orchestra playing written music from an "authenticated" score to the regular beat of a conductor, there were two or three instrumentalists playing 90 per cent improvised, intangible rhythms.

Instead of responding to a written score and the musical conceptions of the conductor, the musicians responded only to the music within themselves and each other.

Thus, the music and the musicians spoke of a new kind of involvement, with each player rejoicing in the discovery of the other and, in turn, carrying the discovery a little farther.

The same kind of involvement between players showed itself in long sections of more traditional imitation, when one instrument would imitate sections of improvisation, often long and complicated, introduced by the other.

Infinite Shadings

An example was a long sequence near the end of what was called an "Evening Rag," played by a santoon— like a zither with harshly plucked strings —and a tabla—an indescribable bongo like instrument with an infinity of possible shadings and sounds.

The santoon would play a long segment, followed immediately by the tabla, which picked up not only the rhythm but somehow the spirit of the segment.

Another example was the uncanny collaboration of the voice of Lakshmi Shankar and the sarangi, a short stringed instrument played with a bow. The vocalist was the leader, singing usually within a limited range but with the widest variety of voice inflection. The sarangi followed suit exactly — its range was identical with that of the voice, and the skill of the player, Sabri Khan, also made it imitate almost exactly the timbre of the voice, so that at times it was hard to tell which was which.

During all these imitations and other interactions between instruments, the players glanced and motioned at each other, a visual confirmation of the involvement that the ear detected.

Audience Knowledgeable

The crowd, although not large, was almost wildly enthusiastic, and it apparently contained a large number of Shankar devotees who were acquainted with different musicians and welcomed them enthusiastically. The crowd that passed through the gates — 4653 — was considered good, considering the rain and the fact that Shankar is playing in Boston and in Saratoga, N. Y., this month.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 25 1968 New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, July 26, 1968

Tanglewood's Second 'Contemporary' Finds Gazette Critic in Virgin Field

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

The second of three programs devoted to "Contemporary Trends" was offered at Tanglewood Wednesday evening.

* * *

Although they might be (crassly) described as a cross-section of present-day popular music, this trio of concerts actually focuses upon the more refined influences which lend shape and direction to music that is "In." Therefore these concepts have a profound artistic and social value, for they reflect the interests and aesthetic pursuits of what can only be described as a discriminating audience.

Last week the Jazz Influence was explored by Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet, and Don Ellis' Orchestra. Next week The Association examines Rock and its import in music today.

The concert Wednesday evening featured Ravi Shanker and his Festival from India, a group of 21 performing musicians currently touring the northeastern United States and teaching at the Tanglewood School.

* * *

It would be fatuous for me, a neophyte, to attempt an appraisal of the evening in critical terms. Certain correspondences exist between western and Indian music, however, and any listener with his ears open can begin to appreciate certain constructions of Indian forms.

For one thing, all the music is improvisational, something we Americans certainly understand ever since the advent of jazz. Just as obvious is the basic pattern which unifies any given improvisation: a slow, pensive, even introspective solo which presents one of several modes (playing white keys only on a piano starting with D is Dorian mode, E is Phrygian, etc.); then an elaboration of each note in the mode (so it virtually becomes another mode!); a return to the initial statement; then the entrance of other instruments (usually tabla, a kind of drums) to begin the all-important dialogue.

* * *

These dialogues are amazing. A part of the sitar's statement, for example, is seized by the tabla and reworked to present a different (or subtler) viewpoint, which suggests something else to the sitarist, who takes a fragment and mediates upon other hidden meanings, then back to the tabla, etc., etc. The astounding thing is that what is peripheral to one instrumentalist is a focus for another, and it is precisely this endless interplay that sustains and regenerates the music. In a very real sense it is probably the closest thing to perpetual motion man is ever likely to achieve.

* * *

A critic's note for the sociologist; Because of the extreme concentration necessary for both artists' performance and audience enjoyment, it is no wonder that this music appeals to our more serious social element, the hippies. Mom and dad are too worried about the bank balance to "get into" a raga, and kid sister can't groove on anything but her dull, blaring transistor radio, so Johnny Acidhead finds himself the lone appreciator of a fascinating universe of sound and symbol. Alienation, like charity, begins at home.

But back to Shankar . . . The selections seemed brilliantly executed. I was particularly fond of the solemn prelude which opened the evening (prior to concert-time yet) and the first joyful piece on the program. The singing, by Mrs. Shankar and Kamala Chakravaty, which followed did not impress me much, but a "sonata" for two tabla players sent me out of this world.

The first half closed with a piece especially composed for the occasion and conducted by Ravi Shankar, a piece which Shankar said has no name. Requiring the full ensemble, it explored myriad points of interest and left a breathless audience which did not seem to mind a two-hour long first half.

* * *

After intermission Ravi Shankar and sarod-player Akbar Khan launched another intellectual episode which was boisterously acclaimed by a totally approving audience. One thing's for sure: This music is more than just a fad, it is an art form which encompasses man's nature and divinity in no less valid a manner than we have grown accustomed to hearing. The sounds may not be the same, but the meaning certainly is.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION FRIDAY, JULY 26, 1968

Tanglewood Rises To Indian 'Ragas'

By M. DICKEY DRYSDALE

Devotees of Ravi Shankar gave a tumultuous ovation Wednesday night after the second half of a concert of Indian music at Tanglewood in which Shankar himself finally appeared with his sitar. He played two Indian "ragas" with Ali Agyar Khan, who plays the sarod.

Second of Two

The Wednesday night concert was the second of two "Contemporary Trends" concerts in Tanglewood.

The audience had listened attentively throughout the first half of the concert to 10 or more Indian artists playing various instruments and singing. But most had come to see and hear Shankar, who is the man chiefly responsible for the startling growth of interest in this country for Indian music.

When he appeared he was greeted by loud cheers, and when he and Khan finished their 1½ hours of music they received a standing ovation.

Indistinct at First

Indeed, the master was extraordinary, as was Khan on the sarod. The two instruments are both large stringed pieces with approximately the same range. To the Western ear it was some time before the sound of each was quite distinct.

The two men played with the same stupendous virtuosity that came from the Indian musicians all evening, a virtuosity which, however, was always bent to suit the musical instinct rather than the showman's flair.

The two ragas are classical Indian music, formal and developed forms. They might have seemed a bit dry and long to some after the variety of musical combinations that made up the first half of the program.

The intricate depth of the mostly-improvised music and the profound interactions between the two musicians, however, were a most stimulating ending to an absorbing evening.

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,550

JUL 20 1968 New England Newsclip

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 13,000

SEP 21 1968

Shankar Indian Ensemble Intro'd at N. Y. Workshop

NEW YORK—A limited number of the press as well as musicians (jazz, classical, pop) attended a closed rehearsal-workshop held on stage at Philharmonic Hall, 65th and Broadway, Tuesday, Sept. 10, at 11 a. m., by sitarist and composer Ravi Shankar, who has organized an experimental ensemble consisting of Indian musicians from North and South India.

Shankar followed the same format as he had earlier this summer for workshops at Tanglewood (Berkshire Music Center), Saratoga (Center for the Performing Arts) and Stratford, Ontario (The Shakespeare Festival).

The session, lasting over 90 minutes, ended with an informal question-and-answer period for the press and musicians attending.

For the last 20 years, Shankar has been a pioneer in composing for and conducting groups in India; however, this is the first time the American public has had the opportunity to hear such experimental Indian music. Traditionally in Indian classical music there is only the solo instrumentalist or vocalist, accompanied by percussion and a "drone" instrument—the "ensemble" in Indian classical music has been introduced by Shankar.

Purpose: New Sounds

When asked what his purpose was in bringing other musicians to the U. S., at the height of his own popularity here, Shankar answered that he wished to bring new sounds from India to the public, which has responded so much to the sound of the sitar. He expressed hope that some of the pop musicians who received inspiration from the sitar will also receive inspiration from these new instruments. Shankar suggested that using only the sitar in music is as though a pop group used only the guitar, and thinks that once musicians have started listening to the shehnai, the sarangi and the santoor, Western musicians may wish to start incorporating these "new" sounds into their music.

The Ensemble was performing nightly in New York's Philharmonic Hall through the 13th and Carnegie Hall Sept. 14 and 15, as part of Shankar's "Festival from India," as previewed at the rehearsal-workshop. They played pieces composed by Shankar based on traditional ragas, as well as folk tunes.

Berkshire Center Goes Contemporary in Music

LENOX — Two Contemporary Trends Concerts to be presented this month at the Berkshire Music Center will feature Ravi Shankar on July 24 and The Association on July 31.

The series of concerts was designed to demonstrate new directions and trends in music, according to officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting this series of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The three areas which the concerts will emphasize are jazz/folk, music from India, and rock. On July 17 the Berkshire Music Center presented Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz quartet, and Don Ellis and his orchestra.

Ali Akbar Khan, Shankar Ghosh, Tabla and ten other musicians will support Ravi Shankar at the 8 p.m. concert July 24.

Indian Music Thrills Crowd At Tanglewood

By M. DICKEY DRYSDALE

LENOX — At intermission Wednesday night — after almost two hours of Indian music by about eight instrumentalists and two vocalists — the audience at Tanglewood still had not heard the main offering of this second "Contemporary Trends" concert — Ravi Shankar and his sitar.

Exuberant Music

What they had heard, however, was an intricate and strange, but exuberant music played with an infectious involvement. Perhaps they had experienced intimations of a new kind of life from that in the rational, well-ordered West.

For what a change from the usual Tanglewood offering — instead of an orchestra playing written music from an "authenticated" score to the regular beat of a conductor, there were two or three instrumentalists playing 90 per cent improvised, intangible rhythms.

Instead of responding to a written score and the musical conceptions of the conductor, the musicians responded only to the music within themselves and each other.

Thus, the music and the musicians spoke of a new kind of involvement, with each player rejoicing in the discovery of the other and, in turn, carrying the discovery a little farther.

The same kind of involvement between players showed itself in long sections of more traditional imitation, when one instrument would imitate sections of improvisation, often long and complicated, introduced by the other.

Infinite Shadings

An example was a long sequence near the end of what was called an "Evening Rag," played by a santoon— like a zither with harshly plucked strings —and a tabla—an indescribable bongo like instrument with an infinity of possible shadings and sounds.

The santoon would play a long segment, followed immediately by the tabla, which picked up not only the rhythm but somehow the spirit of the segment.

Another example was the uncanny collaboration of the voice of Lakshmi Shankar and the sarangi, a short stringed instrument played with a bow. The vocalist was the leader, singing usually within a limited range but with the widest variety of voice inflection. The sarangi followed suit exactly — its range was identical with that of the voice, and the skill of the player, Sabri Khan, also made it imitate almost exactly the timbre of the voice, so that at times it was hard to tell which was which.

During all these imitations and other interactions between instruments, the players glanced and motioned at each other, a visual confirmation of the involvement that the ear detected.

Audience Knowledgeable

The crowd, although not large, was almost wildly enthusiastic, and it apparently contained a large number of Shankar devotees who were acquamted with different musicians and welcomed them enthusiastically. The crowd that passed through the gates — 4653 — was considered good, considering the rain and the fact that Shankar is playing in Boston and in Saratoga, N. Y., this month.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JUL 25 1968 New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, July 26, 1968

Tanglewood's Second 'Contemporary' Finds Gazette Critic in Virgin Field

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

The second of three programs devoted to "Contemporary Trends" was offered at Tanglewood Wednesday evening.

* * *

Although they might be (crassly) described as a cross-section of present-day popular music, this trio of concerts actually focuses upon the more refined influences which lend shape and direction to music that is "In." Therefore these concepts have a profound artistic and social value, for they reflect the interests and aesthetic pursuits of what can only be described as a discriminating audience.

Last week the Jazz Influence was explored by Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet, and Don Ellis' Orchestra. Next week The Association examines Rock and its import in music today.

The concert Wednesday evening featured Ravi Shanker and his Festival from India, a group of 21 performing musicians currently touring the northeastern United States and teaching at the Tanglewood School.

* * *

It would be fatuous for me, a neophyte, to attempt an appraisal of the evening in critical terms. Certain correspondences exist between western and Indian music, however, and any listener with his ears open can begin to appreciate certain constructions of Indian forms.

For one thing, all the music is improvisational, something we Americans certainly understand ever since the advent of jazz. Just as obvious is the basic pattern which unifies any given improvisation: a slow, pensive, even introspective solo which presents one of several modes (playing white keys only on a piano starting with D is Dorian mode, E is Phrygian, etc.); then an elaboration of each note in the mode (so it virtually becomes another mode!); a return to the initial statement; then the entrance of other instruments (usually tabla, a kind of drums) to begin the all-important dialogue.

* * *

These dialogues are amazing. A part of the sitar's statement, for example, is seized by the tabla and reworked to present a different (or subtler) viewpoint, which suggests something else to the sitarist, who takes a fragment and mediates upon other hidden meanings, then back to the tabla, etc., etc. The astounding thing is that what is peripheral to one instrumentalist is a focus for another, and it is precisely this endless interplay that sustains and regenerates the music. In a very real sense it is probably the closest thing to perpetual motion man is ever likely to achieve.

* * *

A critic's note for the sociologist; Because of the extreme concentration necessary for both artists' performance and audience enjoyment, it is no wonder that this music appeals to our more serious social element, the hippies. Mom and dad are too worried about the bank balance to "get into" a raga, and kid sister can't groove on anything but her dull, blaring transistor radio, so Johnny Acidhead finds himself the lone appreciator of a fascinating universe of sound and symbol. Alienation, like charity, begins at home.

But back to Shankar . . . The selections seemed brilliantly executed. I was particularly fond of the solemn prelude which opened the evening (prior to concert-time yet) and the first joyful piece on the program. The singing, by Mrs. Shankar and Kamala Chakravaty, which followed did not impress me much, but a "sonata" for two tabla players sent me out of this world.

The first half closed with a piece especially composed for the occasion and conducted by Ravi Shankar, a piece which Shankar said has no name. Requiring the full ensemble, it explored myriad points of interest and left a breathless audience which did not seem to mind a two-hour long first half.

* * *

After intermission Ravi Shankar and sarod-player Akbar Khan launched another intellectual episode which was boisterously acclaimed by a totally approving audience. One thing's for sure: This music is more than just a fad, it is an art form which encompasses man's nature and divinity in no less valid a manner than we have grown accustomed to hearing. The sounds may not be the same, but the meaning certainly is.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION FRIDAY, JULY 26, 1968

Tanglewood Rises To Indian 'Ragas'

By M. DICKEY DRYSDALE

Devotees of Ravi Shankar gave a tumultuous ovation Wednesday night after the second half of a concert of Indian music at Tanglewood in which Shankar himself finally appeared with his sitar. He played two Indian "ragas" with Ali Agyar Khan, who plays the sarod.

Second of Two

The Wednesday night concert was the second of two "Contemporary Trends" concerts in Tanglewood.

The audience had listened attentively throughout the first half of the concert to 10 or more Indian artists playing various instruments and singing. But most had come to see and hear Shankar, who is the man chiefly responsible for the startling growth of interest in this country for Indian music.

When he appeared he was greeted by loud cheers, and when he and Khan finished their 1½ hours of music they received a standing ovation.

Indistinct at First

Indeed, the master was extraordinary, as was Khan on the sarod. The two instruments are both large stringed pieces with approximately the same range. To the Western ear it was some time before the sound of each was quite distinct.

The two men played with the same stupendous virtuosity that came from the Indian musicians all evening, a virtuosity which, however, was always bent to suit the musical instinct rather than the showman's flair.

The two ragas are classical Indian music, formal and developed forms. They might have seemed a bit dry and long to some after the variety of musical combinations that made up the first half of the program.

The intricate depth of the mostly-improvised music and the profound interactions between the two musicians, however, were a most stimulating ending to an absorbing evening.

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,550

JUL 20 1968 New England Newsclip

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 13,000

SEP 21 1968

Shankar Indian Ensemble Intro'd at N. Y. Workshop

NEW YORK—A limited number of the press as well as musicians (jazz, classical, pop) attended a closed rehearsal-workshop held on stage at Philharmonic Hall, 65th and Broadway, Tuesday, Sept. 10, at 11 a. m., by sitarist and composer Ravi Shankar, who has organized an experimental ensemble consisting of Indian musicians from North and South India.

Shankar followed the same format as he had earlier this summer for workshops at Tanglewood (Berkshire Music Center), Saratoga (Center for the Performing Arts) and Stratford, Ontario (The Shakespeare Festival).

The session, lasting over 90 minutes, ended with an informal question-and-answer period for the press and musicians attending.

For the last 20 years, Shankar has been a pioneer in composing for and conducting groups in India; however, this is the first time the American public has had the opportunity to hear such experimental Indian music. Traditionally in Indian classical music there is only the solo instrumentalist or vocalist, accompanied by percussion and a "drone" instrument—the "ensemble" in Indian classical music has been introduced by Shankar.

Purpose: New Sounds

When asked what his purpose was in bringing other musicians to the U. S., at the height of his own popularity here, Shankar answered that he wished to bring new sounds from India to the public, which has responded so much to the sound of the sitar. He expressed hope that some of the pop musicians who received inspiration from the sitar will also receive inspiration from these new instruments. Shankar suggested that using only the sitar in music is as though a pop group used only the guitar, and thinks that once musicians have started listening to the shehnai, the sarangi and the santoor, Western musicians may wish to start incorporating these "new" sounds into their music.

The Ensemble was performing nightly in New York's Philharmonic Hall through the 13th and Carnegie Hall Sept. 14 and 15, as part of Shankar's "Festival from India," as previewed at the rehearsal-workshop. They played pieces composed by Shankar based on traditional ragas, as well as folk tunes.

Berkshire Center Goes Contemporary in Music

LENOX — Two Contemporary Trends Concerts to be presented this month at the Berkshire Music Center will feature Ravi Shankar on July 24 and The Association on July 31.

The series of concerts was designed to demonstrate new directions and trends in music, according to officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gunther Schuller, composer and head of contemporary music activities of the Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting this series of concerts delineating these new trends, and by introducing some aspects of them in its curriculum."

The three areas which the concerts will emphasize are jazz/folk, music from India, and rock. On July 17 the Berkshire Music Center presented Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz quartet, and Don Ellis and his orchestra.

Ali Akbar Khan, Shankar Ghosh, Tabla and ten other musicians will support Ravi Shankar at the 8 p.m. concert July 24.

122.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

The Association Takes Over Tanglewood Before 13,079

By PETER GOODMAN

LENOX — As The Association ran on stage for a concert at Tanglewood Wednesday night, a boy in the audience nearby whispered urgently to his friend next to him, "Look, he's got a butch hair cut."

Squealing Audience

There was a good bit of squealing from the audience about that fact. The long hair of the rest of the six - man group, and the mustaches were, of course, taken for granted.

The Association has a sound which, not long ago, would have been closely connected with that butch hair cut. It is a group in the tradition of college ensembles such as (way back) the Four Freshmen and somewhat more recently, the Kingston Trio.

Smooth and Light

Their music is simple, basic rhythm and harmonies, generally smooth and light, and accompanied with the light, topical and humorous patter associated with college concerts and, lately, the Smothers Brothers, who began as a college group before moving into the television big-time.

They play without the banks of amplifiers and electronic devices used by the acid and hard rock groups associated with the avant garde and underground popular sounds. There are no pyrotechnics, either instrumental or physical.

The group, in which no one stands out as the virtuoso or the defined leader, consists of Larry Ramos, Brian Cole, Russell Chigare, Terry Kirkman, and Jim Yester.

As is usual among modern rock groups, most play more than one instrument. Ramos is generally lead guitar, Cole is bass guitar, Jim Yester is organ, Kirkman is lead singer occasionally, doubling on flute, trumpet and drums, and Chigare usually is on guitar.

Mixed Programs

The program was a mix of new music and some of their most popular songs. They apparently do their own arrangements to whatever music Kirkman didn't write.

The songs are not generally remarkable for melodic content, and there were occasional fallings off-key and out-of-tune. But the general lightness of the show and professionalism of the group overcame most of the difficulties.

There was one revealing moment, directly after the group finished a light, pleasant parody of the late - 50's rock 'n roll hit, "Poison Ivy," when one member rea da short poem and they then launched into a quieter, more serious song.

They are not known for serious music, nothing more than the light sentimentality of "Cherish." Coming on the heels of a relatively funny bit, the attempted seriousness didn't quite come off.

"Cherish" was played, as well as "Along Comes Mary" and several other of their hits. The audience, reacted enthusiastically and there was a line of local and state troopers along the foot of the stage during their entrances and exists.

The crowd was the third largest at Tanglewood so far this season, 13,079. It was double the largest of the two preceeding contemporary trends concerts. Its average age appeared to be between 16 and 18.

'When Tanglewood Rocks...

By LEWIS C. CUYLER

Youth took over Tanglewood last night and it was great.

The occasion was a concert by The Association, one of the nation's leading rock groups. It drew the third largest crowd this season, 13,079, with 13,000 of them under 20. The other 79 were members of the press.

This member of the press likes rock, but is not particularly tuned in. For instance, it was a bit baffling to hear screams and clapping of eagerness after the first few notes of a number. The 13,000 knew what was to be played. The other 79 didn't but waited anyway in keen anticipation.

* * *

The performance varied from songs played at peak decibels to those at slightly less than peak. Always there was the characteristic beat. The evening was full of gags, some bright and sophisticated, some corny, but always appreciated. A patter of this kind of talk introduced each number.

The six performers were dressed in styles ranging from the crew cut, horn-rim glasses, suited look of the mid-1950s to Nehru jackets and medalions. There was no individual star. Instead each member took turns playing the various instruments or leading the songs. It was interesting to see how their respective personalities showed through their playing.

Mini-skirts were the most popular dress for the girls and the men dressed casually for the most part. But one wore a tuxedo and five or six, psychedelic pants.

* * *

Despite its size, the audience was more restrained than we expected. There was only one encore.

Tanglewood was braced for anything. At the end of the performance 25 burly state troopers silently moved up in front of the stage ready to fend off frantic fans. Their action wasn't necessary.

It was a delightful evening and it is reassuring to know there are so many young people around. We hope Tanglewood plans more of the same.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

The Association will give a concert of Rock music in the third event in the Contemporary Trends Series, Wednesday evening.

THE ASSOCIATION TO ROCK AT TANGLEWOOD

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox. —The Association will give a concert of rock music in the third event in the Contemporary Trends Series on Wednesday night at 8.

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 98,600

JUL 26 1968 New England Newsclip

July 31 Rock The Association

Music Review

Berkshire Eagle 8/1/68

The Association at Tanglewood

By DAVID E. PITT

A five-man "show-rock" outfit called The Association held sway over the season's final Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood last night and, to all appearances—such as the battered state of the lawn this morning—the event was big at the box office.

The attendance figure was the highest of the three concert series, and was topped among all Tanglewood concerts so far this season only by Van Cliburn's recent conquest. There are, however, other ways of measuring a concert's success quotient. It's hardly enough to assume that the evening had to have been a groove simply by virtue of the fact that The Association was there. The group obviously does possess a certain ineffable magnetism with audiences, as last night's throng of 13,079 would suggest, but unfortunately this appeal has little to do with The Association's flair for musical inventiveness.

* * *

FOR ON that score, the group is none too formidable. Harmonically their sound is faintly but pleasantly reminiscent of the Beach Boys. Most of their songs were so unabashedly plain and straightforward—a trademark—that after a short time all of them began to sound very much alike. The complement of instruments consisted of an electric organ, a tambourine, one soprano recorder, a trumpet, three guitars and drums. But there were no extended solos to speak of by anyone except Terry Kirkman on trumpet, and that was only because it was an integral part in a dull and rather pretentious arrangement that was not identified (no song titles were announced, presumably because most of the audience was supposed to know in advance what was what. Or maybe titles are considered unnecessary).

* * *

THE APPLAUSE after every number was generous, but everything about the concert, seemingly down to the smallest bit of stage banter (much of which was very funny), came out sounding so meticulously rehearsed that there were no fires lit under the audience, no restless uncertainty about what would happen next (although the depersonalizing vastness of Tanglewood no doubt figured in the problem). That lasted until the latter half of the evening, when the two most refreshing features of the performance were the singers fudging some lyrics in an otherwise textbook rendition of their hit song "Windy," and the drummer toppling off his collapsible stool in an unguardedly frenetic moment. Otherwise, the only real excitement was generated by the anticipation of when the group would break out their most popular tunes, such as "Never My Love," "Cherish" or "Windy."

* * *

WHICH ARE certainly pretty enough melodies. But that's about all they are. The ensemble playing seemed flat and uninspired throughout; the guitars frequently carried identical parts, note for note, with nary a hint of improvisation, while the drumming merely adhered competently to the beat. Lyrics, especially in the faster numbers, were all but totally unintelligible (the mikes may not have been up to the task at hand); where they were clearest was in the most banal of The Association's selections, such as one excursion into romantic profundity, which was distinguished by its extravagant use of words like "time," "space" and "eternity." The group actually seems to have a conscious urge to be the Guy Lombardo Band of the rock world.

* * *

BUT LIKE anything else, the Association is best enjoyed when accepted utterly on its own terms, as I would venture to guess much of last night's audience was more than willing to do. The concert was just not my cup of tea, however — at least not without something in it. Like a spot of Cream, for instance.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

ERICH LEINSDORF Director

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC ACTIVITIES

GUNTHER SCHULLER Head

Wednesday July 31 at 8 pm

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS CONCERT

THE ASSOCIATION

TED BLUECHEL JR — TERRY KIRKMAN
BRIAN COLE — JIM YESTER
GARY ALEXANDER — LARRY RAMOS

There will be one intermission

BALDWIN is the official piano of the Berkshire Music Center

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

AUG 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Association's Fans Strike Back

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I honor Mr. Pitt's views of The Association's performance at Tanglewood, [Eagle, Aug. 1], but I would like to expand upon a few of his impressions.

Mr. Pitt referred to Terry Kirkman's "trumpet" solo as a completion to a "dull and rather pretentious arrangement." Perhaps a more thorough investigation into the purpose of the song which he termed "dull" would find him using a less harsh adjective. The title of the song is "Requiem for the Masses" and it is, indeed, a funeral oration written by The Association to commemorate the death of an imaginary bullfighter. A church service, skillfully, tastefully set to music is "dull"? I cannot agree.

Although he complimented The Association through his approval of four of their songs, Mr. Pitt's evaluation of their music was lacking. He complained about the deficiency of recognizable inspiration and on-the-spot improvision in the group's music. Would he consider the state in which he might find himself if he were to stand on an enormous stage, gazing across a mass of 13,079 people expecting to be repaid? Would he endeavor then to depart from the previously arranged musical script, to experiment with a new beat which might prove to have a delightful effect, or inversely, if it did not quite blend with the melody as a whole, prove disastrous?

I cannot help feel that Mr. Pitt thinks of The Association, because it is a famous " 'show-rock' outfit," as composed of abnormal beings. I was fortunate enough to observe the rehearsal of The Association and was able to go backstage after the concert. During these periods, I saw The Association as the friendly, down-to-earth individuals they are.

Life would not be as interesting if the classical music-lovers did not seek to understand more contemporary music; and vice versa. The most accurate criticism comes from one who enjoys and is familiar with a specific type of music — familiar enough to be honest as to what is good and what is not. What I suggest is: let the contemporary judge the contemporary and the classical judge the clasical.

BARBARA J. DIETRICH.
1081 West St.,
Pittsfield.

A Critic Scorned

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Has David Pitt got something against the Association? I must say his review of the Association's concert at Tanglewood [Eagle, Aug. 1] is absolutely unfair. He called the Association a "five-man show rock outfit" in his first sentence. Just looking at the picture in The Eagle of the group, is enough to tell anyone that it is a six-man group. Maybe he excluded the one young man with the short hair. Actually, I thought he'd be on his side, as most adults are. I'm sorry he can't count.

He writes the Association is reminiscent of the Beach Boys. I'll have him know they are the complete opposite. The Beach Boys can't think of anything besides surfer girls and bikinis, whereas the Association has that certain romantic touch to suit anyone's taste. For the first time in rock 'n' roll history, you can understand the messag they're trying to get across. Tr listeting to a Beach Boys' re cord and tell me what they'r saying. And the mikes couldn' have been better. Did he forge that the Tanglewood Shed noted for its acoustics?

As for their not mentionin song titles, that is minor. If I re member correctly, the audienc broke into applause after the be ginning of each song. That usually the format if an aud ence is listening to any popula musical arrangement whos songs are widely known.

It's hard to believe that Mr Pitt can say that the ensembl playing seemed flat, that th guitars frequently carried iden tical parts, and that the drum ming merely adhered competent ly to the beat. Is he some kin of Erich Leinsdorf, who ca pick out a wrong note by memo ry?

The concert was certainly an unforgettable one. I helped to clap them back on stage to sing another number. I'm sorry if it wasn't Mr. Pitt's cup of tea. May I suggest adding a spot of bitter lemon?

DEBRA A. LEATHER.
46 Brighton Ave.,
Pittsfield.

Displeased

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Your review of The Association Aug. 1 stank. As the saying goes, "Give credit where credit is due." The Association concert was marvelous. Too bad you couldn't appreciate it.

Try again, Mr. Pitt.

CHERIE GAGNE
237 Second St.,
Pittsfield.

Teen Beat

Association Wins 'Em

By RUSS WINER

The Association came to Tanglewood Wednesday night and completely won over the more than 13,000 spectators in the shell and on the lawn. The six, consisting of Terry Kirkman, Larry Ramos, Jim Yester, Ted Bluechel, Russ Giguere, and Brian Cole, presented one of the finest balanced shows I've ever seen.

They sprinkled their show with comedy spots, and more than made up for any puns with their music. As always, the music was soft and pleasing, minus the "wall of sound" favored by many rock groups. The harmonies were perfect, with "Requiem for the Masses" deserving special credit.

The Association performed hits such as "Along Comes Mary," "Cherish," "Windy," and "Never My Love," along with some new tunes off their new LP "Birthday." It was enjoyable to sit back and appreciate the talents of one of America's premiere groups.

THE ASSOCIATION

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Association Scores Tanglewood Success

Lennox, Mass. — The Association drew a capacity crowd of 13,000 when they appeared at the Tanglewood Music Festival here Wednesday night. First pop group ever to appear at the festival, the Association grossed $37,000, according to their manager.

HOLLYWOOD REPORTER
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
D. 11,000

AUG 5 1968

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, July 31, 1968

BACK TONIGHT—The Association, a group of six young performers who appear tonight at Tanglewood. The group offered a "unified, well-paced" performance Monday at Colonie.

Association Offers Tanglewood Preview At Colonie Theater

The Association returns to the area tonight with an appearance at the Tanglewood Music Festival and judging from a performance Monday night at the Colonie Summer Theater before a standing room audience, Berkshire fans are due for a rewarding evening.

This group of six performers is an ingratiating ensemble whose music and showmanship blend neatly into a unified, well-paced production.

At Colonie, there was immediate contact with the audience, helped by the arena staging. Still, there was recognition that an audience existed and almost immediately, the good humor of the group warmed the young fans to its songs.

And, musically, the group shuns the wild electronic sound for the modified rock beat that blends well with the upbeat ballads they sing. They can stand out individually as singers and as instrumentalists, an important factor in a full evening's entertainment.

The six blend music, some comedy, improvised dialogue and readings but never to the detriment of the performance. There is discipline even in their improvisations. The comedy, for the most part, is self-depreciating, not the bitter humor so familiar to many of their contemporaries.

Still, it is the music the young fans come to hear, and they are treated to performances that are completely entertaining. Led by Terry Kirkman who plays a flute, harmonica and trumpet, as well as singing, the group runs through a number of its hits, "Cherish," "Windy," "Never My Love" and "Along Comes Mary."

The songs have a lyrical quality that is backed by sound instrumental rhythm, providing the sound that is now invading Broadway, notably in "Your Own Thing" and "Hair." There is an emphasis on lyrics which create vignettes of emotion or sentiment, and not hysteria.

The Association shuns to falsely arouse the audience to fever pitches by accented rhythms or blue lyrics. Instead, the audience, obviously appreciative, was a well-controlled gathering at Colonie that listened and appreciated.

This is probably one of the few groups who gain from appearing in public where their individual personalities can strike an empathy with the audience.

The two local dates are part of a tour through the east and midwest. (KELLY

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

ERICH LEINSDORF Director

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC ACTIVITIES

GUNTHER SCHULLER Head

Wednesday July 31 at 8 pm

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS CONCERT

THE ASSOCIATION

TED BLUECHEL JR — TERRY KIRKMAN
BRIAN COLE — JIM YESTER
GARY ALEXANDER — LARRY RAMOS

There will be one intermission

BALDWIN is the official piano of the Berkshire Music Center

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,404

AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Teen Beat

Association Wins 'Em

By RUSS WINER

The Association came to Tanglewood Wednesday night and completely won over the more than 13,000 spectators in the shell and on the lawn. The six, consisting of Terry Kirkman, Larry Ramos, Jim Yester, Ted Bluechel, Russ Giguere, and Brian Cole, presented one of the finest balanced shows I've ever seen.

They sprinkled their show with comedy spots, and more than made up for any puns with their music. As always, the music was soft and pleasing, minus the "wall of sound" favored by many rock groups. The harmonies were perfect, with "Requiem for the Masses" deserving special credit.

The Association performed hits such as "Along Comes Mary," "Cherish," "Windy," and "Never My Love," along with some new tunes off their new LP "Birthday." It was enjoyable to sit back and appreciate the talents of one of America's premiere groups.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

AUG 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Association's Fans Strike Back

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I honor Mr. Pitt's views of The Association's performance at Tanglewood, [Eagle, Aug. 1], but I would like to expand upon a few of his impressions.

Mr. Pitt referred to Terry Kirkman's "trumpet" solo as a completion to a "dull and rather pretentious arrangement." Perhaps a more thorough investigation into the purpose of the song which he termed "dull" would find him using a less harsh adjective. The title of the song is "Requiem for the Masses" and it is, indeed, a funeral oration written by The Association to commemorate the death of an imaginary bullfighter. A church service, skillfully, tastefully set to music is "dull"? I cannot agree.

Although he complimented The Association through his approval of four of their songs, Mr. Pitt's evaluation of their music was lacking. He complained about the deficiency of recognizable inspiration and on-the-spot improvision in the group's music. Would he consider the state in which he might find himself if he were to stand on an enormous stage, gazing across a mass of 13,079 people expecting to be repaid? Would he endeavor then to depart from the previously arranged musical script, to experiment with a new beat which might prove to have a delightful effect, or inversely, if it did not quite blend with the melody as a whole, prove disastrous?

I cannot help feel that Mr. Pitt thinks of The Association, because it is a famous " 'show-rock' outfit," as composed of abnormal beings. I was fortunate enough to observe the rehearsal of The Association and was able to go backstage after the concert. During these periods, I saw The Association as the friendly, down-to-earth individuals they are.

Life would not be as interesting if the classical music-lovers did not seek to understand more contemporary music; and vice versa. The most accurate criticism comes from one who enjoys and is familiar with a specific type of music — familiar enough to be honest as to what is good and what is not. What I suggest is: let the contemporary judge the contemporary and the classical judge the clasical.

BARBARA J. DIETRICH.
1081 West St.,
Pittsfield.

A Critic Scorned

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Has David Pitt got something against the Association? I must say his review of the Association's concert at Tanglewood [Eagle, Aug. 1] is absolutely unfair. He called the Association a "five-man show rock outfit" in his first sentence. Just looking at the picture in The Eagle of the group, is enough to tell anyone that it is a six-man group. Maybe he excluded the one young man with the short hair. Actually, I thought he'd be on his side, as most adults are. I'm sorry he can't count.

He writes the Association is reminiscent of the Beach Boys. I'll have him know they are the complete opposite. The Beach Boys can't think of anything besides surfer girls and bikinis, whereas the Association has that certain romantic touch to suit anyone's taste. For the first time in rock 'n' roll history, you can understand the messag they're trying to get across. Tr listehing to a Beach Boys' re cord and tell me what they'r saying. And the mikes couldn' have been better. Did he forge that the Tanglewood Shed noted for its acoustics?

As for their not mentionin song titles, that is minor. If I re member correctly, the audienc broke into applause after the be ginning of each song. That usually the format if an aud ence is listening to any popula musical arrangement whos songs are widely known.

It's hard to believe that Mr Pitt can say that the ensembl playing seemed flat, that th guitars frequently carried iden tical parts, and that the drum ming merely adhered competent ly to the beat. Is he some kind of Erich Leinsdorf, who ca pick out a wrong note by memo ry?

The concert was certainly an unforgettable one. I helped to clap them back on stage to sing another number. I'm sorry if it wasn't Mr. Pitt's cup of tea. May I suggest adding a spot of bitter lemon?

DEBRA A. LEATHER.
46 Brighton Ave.,
Pittsfield.

Displeased

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Your review of The Association Aug. 1 stank. As the saying goes, "Give credit where credit is due." The Association concert was marvelous. Too bad you couldn't appreciate it.

Try again, Mr. Pitt.

CHERIE GAGNE
237 Second St.,
Pittsfield.

THE ASSOCIATION

Association Scores Tanglewood Success

Lennox, Mass. — The Association drew a capacity crowd of 13,000 when they appeared at the Tanglewood Music Festival here Wednesday night. First pop group ever to appear at the festival, the Association grossed $37,000, according to their manager.

HOLLYWOOD REPORTER
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
D. 11,000

AUG 5 1968

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, July 31, 1968

BACK TONIGHT—The Association, a group of six young performers who appear tonight at Tanglewood. The group offered a "unified, well-paced" performance Monday at Colonie.

Association Offers Tanglewood Preview At Colonie Theater

The Association returns to the area tonight with an appearance at the Tanglewood Music Festival and judging from a performance Monday night at the Colonie Summer Theater before a standing room audience, Berkshire fans are due for a rewarding evening.

This group of six performers is an ingratiating ensemble whose music and showmanship blend neatly into a unified, well-paced production.

At Colonie, there was immediate contact with the audience, helped by the arena staging. Still, there was recognition that an audience existed and almost immediately, the good humor of the group warmed the young fans to its songs.

And, musically, the group shuns the wild electronic sound for the modified rock beat that blends well with the upbeat ballads they sing. They can stand out individually as singers and as instrumentalists, an important factor in a full evening's entertainment.

The six blend music, some comedy, improvised dialogue and readings but never to the detriment of the performance. There is discipline even in their improvisations. The comedy, for the most part, is self-depreciating, not the bitter humor so familiar to many of their contemporaries.

Still, it is the music the young fans come to hear, and they are treated to performances that are completely entertaining. Led by Terry Kirkman who plays a flute, harmonica and trumpet, as well as singing, the group runs through a number of its hits, "Cherish," "Windy," "Never My Love" and "Along Comes Mary."

The songs have a lyrical quality that is backed by sound instrumental rhythm, providing the sound that is now invading Broadway, notably in "Your Own Thing" and "Hair." There is an emphasis on lyrics which create vignettes of emotion or sentiment, and not hysteria.

The Association shuns to falsely arouse the audience to fever pitches by accented rhythms or blue lyrics. Instead, the audience, obviously appreciative, was a well-controlled gathering at Colonie that listened and appreciated.

This is probably one of the few groups who gain from appearing in public where their individual personalities can strike an empathy with the audience.

The two local dates are part of a tour through the east and midwest. (KELLY 124.

Association Ends Tour

NEW YORK—Bringing SRO crowds to seventeen of eighteen concerts the Association has just ended its four-week summer tour.

Highlighted by an appearance in the Tanglewood Music Festival, the concert string included dates at the Illinois State Fair and a sell-out at the Chicago Opera House. At Tanglewood, the Warners-7 Arts act drew the season's second largest audience.

Current plans feature a fall tour beginning this month (19) in Canada and the conclusion of a new album, their fifth.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

SEP 21 1968

Police Report Heavy Traffic After Tanglewood Concert

State and local police reported heavy traffic last night between the West Springfield and Lee exits to the Massachusetts Turnpike, but no major tieups resulted as some 13,000 persons gathered at Tanglewood to hear The Association in concert.

The audience, visibly averaging 15 to 18-year-olds, formed the third largest turnout at the Berkshire Festival so far this season.

The popular rock group offered the third in a series of three contemporary trends concerts. Previous programs featured jazz and folk artists Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Don Ellis Orchestra, and music from India by Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan.

The Association's audience numbered twice the attendance figured recorded at the more popular of the two preceding contemporary concerts.

The group intermingled many of their hit tunes such as "Cherish" and "Along Comes Mary" with some new arrangements by lead vocalist Terry Kirkman. The total effect was reminiscent of the former Chad Mitchell Trio college concert, smooth and professional, with an air of control.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

13,079 CONCERT-GOERS descended on Tanglewood last night to hear the Association, a rock group whose music filled the bill in the third and last of the "Contemporary Trends" concert series. A battery of state troopers, assisted by local law enforcement officers, was on hand to ring the stage, prepared for any eventuality. They were not needed. A review of the event appears on Page 4.

Music

Hail to Heterogeneity

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

Economic factors are bringing democracy and heterogeneity to the art centers.

While the cause is incidental, the effect is that the large music festivals are slowly and sometimes begrudgingly granting recognition to the pop arts.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center was the first in this immediate area to take the step by introducing a pre-season folk festival over the July Fourth weekend in 1967.

Tanglewood was not far behind, presenting a Contemporary Trends series of concerts this year at the Berkshire Music Festival.

While the Saratoga innovation on some fronts was a scarcely concealed attempt at increasing box office receipts, Tanglewood took a more open approach. Pop concerts were not only added to the schedule but advances were made toward including these trends in the Berkshire Music Center curriculum.

Permanent Practice . . .

Whichever the approach the practice appears to be a permanent one despite the feeling of more classically minded patrons, particularly at Saratoga, that it will be nice "when we get on our feet financially and won't have to use this stuff."

The sure financial footing will never come and neither will artistic stability if this is the predominant attitude. While many of the new pop forms of music are distasteful to establishment music tastes they are nevertheless legitimate music art forms with large followings of their own.

In announcing the Contemporary Trends series at Tanglewood, composer Gunther Schuller, director of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Center noted: "It is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating the new trends, and by introducing some aspects into the curriculum."

The program, as outlined by Schuller, included keeping the pop artists in residence for varying lengths of time to work with the students at the Center. This is the same use that is made of many of the visiting classical artists.

Participants in this initial series ranged from folk singer Judy Collins to the Indian music of Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan. Rounding out the pop areas were the Modern Jazz Quartet, the big band sound of the Don Ellis Orchestra and the folk-rock of The Association.

While the series offered merely a sampling of each area, the performers were all among

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.

SEP 8 1968

'THE ASSOCIATION' WHO MADE THE TANGLEWOOD SCENE
It is the supporters who find it difficult to co-exist . . .

Music: Hail to Heterogeneity . . .

Continued from Page 1

the tops in their field and represented a sure beginning.

In recognizing the new program, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Berkshire Music Center and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, noted that the young students at the Center, though all aspiring professional musicians, had neverheless grown up with these popular forms of music and for them pop and classical co-exist amicably.

Herein lies the dilemma. The music forms can co-exist. They use the same music principals and there are good and bad examples of each.

It is the supporters of the various forms who find it difficult to co-exist.

Some individuals were incensed by the songs that Pete Seeger sang at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center last month. It is their privilege to disagree. But the Seeger fans find in him values, while Dinah Shore, who appeared earlier in the season, is equally difficult for them to swallow.

But primarily it is the hard core fans of the "Three B's" who resent the intrusion of pop music on what they consider their home ground. It was the establishment which built both centers. But they are also non-profit organizations and the Saratoga Performing Arts Center uses a state-owned and operated theater.

Because these music festivals are not private clubs there is a responsibility to all legitimate music forms. And the pop groups and their fans should not be admitted with an attitude of "aren't we nice to give you this opportunity, now act like ladies and gentleman or we won't invite you back," because the kids aren't going to be greatful for what appears to them to be no concession at all.

And sitting quietly with folded, white-gloved hands, has no place in the mores of pop music.

Musical Responsibility . . .

The idea of civic responsibility aside, there is also a musical responsibility involved. The concept of a music festival is a broad one and it nicludes, by implication, all forms of music.

Pop and modern music are interrelated and interacting and all have a place in a music festival that purports to be representative of its art if it is to be vital rather than a museum.

There have been problems with a few of the more radical pop artists at Saratoga. Last year there was a failure to control the volume of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band that management has vowed will never happen again. And just last weekend there was a hint of trouble brewing following a performance by The Doors.

But these incidents are in a minority and more incomprehensible to management rather than any active threat to peace and order. They are certainly nothing compared to the Paris opera riots of the 19th Century.

Because they are pop art forms, the hard line maintains that folk, jass, soul and folk-rock do not have a legitimate place in the music festival. This is an argument of intolerance rather than a maintenance of quality. This same camp argues against the inclusion of modern "serious" music also, only here the line of defense is that the festival should offer what the majority want to hear and the Rachmaninoff-Beethoven-Tchaikowsky line is a guaranteed box office.

If this argument can be so steadfastly maintained in the case of Beethoven versus Carter, why isn't it applicable in the case of Peter, Paul and Mary who outdrew any classical performance in the three year history of the Center?

The problem is more acute at Saratoga than it is at Tanglewood. The Berkshire Center is well established and its prestige and following indestructible.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center is still a virtual newcomer. And while it possesses some enormous credits it has no longstanding reputation. While Tanglewood can gracefully make the magnanimous gesture of expanding its area of concentration there are people at Saratoga who feel threatened by the association of pop and classical art forms as though they fear it will cast shadows on their family tree.

Time will cure Saratoga's ills. Tanglewood has none.

Strange dress and behavior are somewhat commonplace for even classic music in the Berkshires. There is little apparent difference in audiences for Bach or rock.

There's a lesson there.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

AUG 1 1968 New England Newsclip

124.

Association Ends Tour

NEW YORK—Bringing SRO crowds to seventeen of eighteen concerts the Association has just ended its four-week summer tour.

Highlighted by an appearance in the Tanglewood Music Festival, the concert string included dates at the Illinois State Fair and a sell-out at the Chicago Opera House. At Tanglewood, the Warners-7 Arts act drew the season's second largest audience.

Current plans feature a fall tour beginning this month (19) in Canada and the conclusion of a new album, their fifth.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

SEP 21 1968

Police Report Heavy Traffic After Tanglewood Concert

State and local police reported heavy traffic last night between the West Springfield and Lee exits to the Massachusetts Turnpike, but no major tieups resulted as some 13,000 persons gathered at Tanglewood to hear The Association in concert.

The audience, visibly averaging 15 to 18-year-olds, formed the third largest turnout at the Berkshire Festival so far this season.

The popular rock group offered the third in a series of three contemporary trends concerts. Previous programs featured jazz and folk artists Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Don Ellis Orchestra, and music from India by Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan.

The Association's audience numbered twice the attendance figured recorded at the more popular of the two preceding contemporary concerts.

The group intermingled many of their hit tunes such as "Cherish" and "Along Comes Mary" with some new arrangements by lead vocalist Terry Kirkman. The total effect was reminiscent of the former Chad Mitchell Trio college concert, smooth and professional, with an air of control.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

AUG 1 1968

New England Newsclip

Whitestone

13,079 CONCERT-GOERS descended on Tanglewood last night to hear the Association, a rock group whose music filled the bill in the third and last of the "Contemporary Trends" concert series. A battery of state troopers, assisted by local law enforcement officers, was on hand to ring the stage, prepared for any eventuality. They were not needed. A review of the event appears on Page 4.

Music

Hail to Heterogeneity

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

Economic factors are bringing democracy and heterogeneity to the art centers.

While the cause is incidental, the effect is that the large music festivals are slowly and sometimes begrudgingly granting recognition to the pop arts.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center was the first in this immediate area to take the step by introducing a pre-season folk festival over the July Fourth weekend in 1967.

Tanglewood was not far behind, presenting a Contemporary Trends series of concerts this year at the Berkshire Music Festival.

While the Saratoga innovation on some fronts was a scarcely concealed attempt at increasing box office receipts, Tanglewood took a more open approach. Pop concerts were not only added to the schedule but advances were made toward including these trends in the Berkshire Music Center curriculum.

Permanent Practice . . .

Whichever the approach the practice appears to be a permanent one despite the feeling of more classically minded patrons, particularly at Saratoga, that it will be nice "when we get on our feet financially and won't have to use this stuff."

The sure financial footing will never come and neither will artistic stability if this is the predominant attitude. While many of the new pop forms of music are distasteful to establishment music tastes they are nevertheless legitimate music art forms with large followings of their own.

In announcing the Contemporary Trends series at Tanglewood, composer Gunther Schuller, director of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Center noted: "It is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating the new trends, and by introducing some aspects into the curriculum."

The program, as outlined by Schuller, included keeping the pop artists in residence for varying lengths of time to work with the students at the Center. This is the same use that is made of many of the visiting classical artists.

Participants in this initial series ranged from folk singer Judy Collins to the Indian music of Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan. Rounding out the pop areas were the Modern Jazz Quartet, the big band sound of the Don Ellis Orchestra and the folk-rock of The Association.

While the series offered merely a sampling of each area, the performers were all among the tops in their field and represented a sure beginning.

In recognizing the new program, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Berkshire Music Center and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, noted that the young students at the Center, though all aspiring professional musicians, had neverheless grown up with these popular forms of music and for them pop and classical co-exist amicably.

Herein lies the dilemma. The music forms can co-exist. They use the same music principals and there are good and bad examples of each.

It is the supporters of the various forms who find it difficult to co-exist.

Some individuals were incensed by the songs that Pete Seeger sang at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center last month. It is their privilege to disagree. But the Seeger fans find in him values, while Dinah Shore, who appeared earlier in the season, is equally difficult for them to swallow.

But primarily it is the hard core fans of the "Three B's" who resent the intrusion of pop music on what they consider their home ground. It was the establishment which built both centers. But they are also non-profit organizations and the Saratoga Performing Arts Center uses a state-owned and operated theater.

Because these music festivals are not private clubs there is a responsibility to all legitimate music forms. And the pop groups and their fans should not be admitted with an attitude of "aren't we nice to give you this opportunity, now act like ladies and gentleman or we won't invite you back," because the kids aren't going to be greatful for what appears to them to be no concession at all.

And sitting quietly with folded, white-gloved hands, has no place in the mores of pop music.

Musical Responsibility . . .

The idea of civic responsibility aside, there is also a musical responsibility involved. The concept of a music festival is a broad one and it nicludes, by implication, all forms of music.

Pop and modern music are interrelated and interacting and all have a place in a music festival that purports to be representative of its art if it is to be vital rather than a museum.

There have been problems with a few of the more radical pop artists at Saratoga. Last year there was a failure to control the volume of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band that management has vowed will never happen again. And just last weekend there was a hint of trouble brewing following a performance by The Doors.

But these incidents are in a minority and more incomprehensible to management rather than any active threat to peace and order. They are certainly nothing compared to the Paris opera riots of the 19th Century.

Because they are pop art forms, the hard line maintains that folk, jass, soul and folk-rock do not have a legitimate place in the music festival. This is an argument of intolerance rather than a maintenance of quality. This same camp argues against the inclusion of modern "serious" music also, only here the line of defense is that the festival should offer what the majority want to hear and the Rachmaninoff-Beethoven-Tchaikowsky line is a guaranteed box office.

If this argument can be so steadfastly maintained in the case of Beethoven versus Carter, why isn't it applicable in the case of Peter, Paul and Mary who outdrew any classical performance in the three year history of the Center?

The problem is more acute at Saratoga than it is at Tanglewood. The Berkshire Center is well established and its prestige and following indestructible.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center is still a virtual newcomer. And while it possesses some enormous credits it has no longstanding reputation. While Tanglewood can gracefully make the magnanimous gesture of expanding its area of concentration there are people at Saratoga who feel threatened by the association of pop and classical art forms as though they fear it will cast shadows on their family tree.

Time will cure Saratoga's ills. Tanglewood has none.

Strange dress and behavior are somewhat commonplace for even classic music in the Berkshires. There is little apparent difference in audiences for Bach or rock.

There's a lesson there.

'THE ASSOCIATION' WHO MADE THE TANGLEWOOD SCENE
It is the supporters who find it difficult to co-exist . . .

TIMES UNION
SEP 8 1968

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

AUG 1 1968

New England Newsclip

Music: Hail to Heterogeneity . . .

Continued from Page 1

TANGLEWOOD – Its history

125

Alb-T-U 8/6/26

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Shed 30 Years Old

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — Sunday, August 4, is the thirtieth anniversary of the opening of the 6000-seat Music Shed at Tanglewood which was dedicated on that date in 1938 at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, through whose efforts the Shed was built.

During the previous summer, when the Orchestra played in an enormous tent, a sudden and spectacular thunderstorm vividly demonstrated the need for a permanent structure. With plans originally sketched by Eliel Saarinen and modified by Joseph Frantz, who supervised construction, the acre-and-a-half shed was begun on New Year's eve, 1937, and completed in June, 1938. Shaped like a wedge of pie, with the Orchestra playing at the point, the Shed is so designed that every point on the outer edge is equidistant from the stage, assisting the sound of the music as it spreads out from under the open sides of the structure to reach the thousands who gather on the Tanglewood lawns to listen to the Berkshire Festival concerts.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,750

AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Shed at Tanglewood To Mark 30th Year

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend of the 1968 Berkshire Festival, Aug. 2,3,4, opens tonight at 7 when pianist Jorge Bolet plays the four Chopin Ballades as the weekend prelude.

At 9 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Sixten Ehrling, conductor of the Detroit Symphony, in a program consisting of Berlioz' "Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini,'" Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and "Rapsodie Espagnole," and Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5."

On Saturday evening's program, Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director, conducts an unusually interesting performance of Robert Schumann's piano concerto with Malcolm Frager as soloist.

Also on the Saturday evening program is the "Scottish Symphony, No. 3," of Mendelssohn. The concert opens with the overture to Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and closes with a suite from Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier."

On Sunday the orchestra will be conudcted by its future music director, William Steinberg in the only appearance he will make with the orchestra before assuming the music directorship in the fall of 1969.

Sunday will mark the 30th anniversary of the opening of the 6000-seat Music Shed, which was dedicated on that date in 1938 at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, through whose efforts the shed was built.

During the previous summer, when the orchestra played in an enormous tent, a sudden and spectacular thunderstorm vividly demonstrated the need for a permanent structure. With plans originally sketched by Eliel Saarinen and modified by Joseph Frantz, who supervised construction, the acre-and-a-half shed was begun on New Year's Eve, 1937, and completed in June, 1938.

Shaped like a wedge of pie, with the orchestra playing at the point, the shed is so designed that every point on the outer edge is equidistant from the stage, assisting the sound of the music as it spreads out from under the open sites of the structure to reach the thousands who gather on the Tanglewood lawns to listen to the Berkshire Festival concerts.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

AUG 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Music Shed Is 30 Years Old Today

Aerial View of Music Shed and Grounds at Tanglewood

Today is the 30th anniversary of the opening of the 6000 - seat Music Shed at Tanglewood which was dedicated on that date in 1938 at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

During the previous summer, when the orchestra played in an enormous tent, a sudden and spectacular thunderstorm vividly demonstrated the need for a permanent structure. With plans originally sketched by Eliel Saarinen and modified by Joseph Frantz, who supervised construction, the acre - and - a - half shed was begun on New Year's Eve, 1937, and completed in June, 1938.

Shaped like a wedge of pie, with the orchestra playing at the point, the Shed is so designed that every point on the outer edge is equidistant from the stage, assisting the sound of the music as it spreads out from under the open sides of the structure to reach the thousands who gather on the Tanglewood lawns to listen to the Berkshire Festival concerts.

AROUND THE TOWN

by Edgar S. Van Olinda

The Saga of Tanglewood

A newcomer's recent telephone request concerning the genesis of the music festival each summer at Tanglewood led me to believe that, perhaps, there are others in the Albany Area to whom Tanglewood is some kind of recreational center in Massachusetts, although, virtually, in our own back yard.

The great music festival grew from a local project for outdoor concerts in the Lenox, Mass. area.

It was launched in 1934 by the citizens of Berkshire County. At first, an orchestra recruited from The New York Philharmonic Symphony Society was engaged under the direction of the late Henry Hadley. The slogan was: "Music Under the Stars."

Two years later, the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the late Serge Koussevitzky was brought from their home city, with a shell for the musicians under a canvas tent for the audience. I still remember one concert under that tent and the terrific lightening, thunder and rain which drowned out the orchestra being broadcast on a coast-to-coast network. This was Wagner with sound effects provided by Nature. After several unsuccessful attempts to continue the concert during the lulls in storm, the maestro threw up his hands in despair. He told the trustees that never again would he appear in a tent.

The next step was brought about by a gift to the Boston Symphony Orchestra of a 200-acre estate, known as "Tanglewood" by the family of William Tappen, a Boston banker and merchant. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived there from 1851 to 1853. It was here that the author planned his "Tanglewood Tales," wrote the "Wonder Book" and assembled material for "The House of the Seven Gables." The house in which he lived burned in 1890. A replica on the original site was built in 1948 and presented to the orchestra by the National Federation of Music Clubs for use as a studio by the Berkshire Music Center and its hundreds of students from most of the countries on the globe.

The late Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York City, a summer resident in Lenox, made an appeal following one of the concerts to finance the erection of a shed. She raised nearly $100,000 and the present auditorium, seating 6,000 became a reality. There is a smaller Theater-Concert hall for operatic performances by the students, and a still smaller building for chamber music concerts. Incidentally, Dr. Koussevitzky is buried in the small cemetery back of the white church on the hill in Lenox.

It is amazing to me how many Albany music lovers have never attended any Tanglewood concerts but will drive farther than the 30-odd miles from this city to enjoy a good dinner. Not to have taken advantage of one of the great music festivals of the world in the beautiful New England atmosphere, surrounded by the Berkshire mountains is akin to going to Buffalo without continuing on to Niagara Falls.

To use a baseball term, it will be "fielders choice" come August with the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, the oBstonians starting July 5th. In either case, it will be a great spiritual and recreational experience. Call Lenox 637-1600 for information or tickets.

126

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, July 10, 1968

AROUND THE TOWN

by Edgar S. Van Olinda

History was made at Tanglewood on the opening night of the second series of concerts of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival onthe evening of Aug. 12, 1937. The largest audience in the history of the festival had been tracted to the Berkshires of the all-Wagner program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. When the orchestra started to play "The Ride of the Velkries" the heavens opened up, lihgtning streaked across the sky, thunder clapped overhead and torrential trains bombarded the canvas roof, of the tent. The roar of the lements completely drowned out the music being broadcast over a coastt-o-coast network. Ss one critic described the incident: "Even the French horns were shipping water. Wagner with sound effects contributed by Nature."

However, the sucience was in fine humor, even if those ditting near the main poles wer drenched and had to sit atop the backs of their chairs to keep their feet out of the many small lakes which sprang to life during the downpour. Just in front of me sat Miriam Hopkins, a Tanglewood paatron from Hollywood. Dr. Koussevitzky started a second time when the storm quieted for a mmoment, but before the trumptet reached his second call in the "Rienzi" overture, rain peilted the canvas roof again, sounding like the reports of funfire, compelling the cnductor to drop his arms in submit sion.

The orchestra started a third time, and Dr. Koussevitzky succeed ed in carrying the musicians through the first half of the program. George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, mounted the platform to announce a few changes i the program due to rain damage to some of the insiruments. Just as the concert ended, the late Gertrude Robinson Smith, "the" heart of the Berjshire Festival "made her way to the podium and declared to the audience:" The storm has proved conclusively the need of a shed .We must raise the necessary $100,000 to build it." And they did!

That was 31 years ago, come August. I was talking with Jay Rosenfeld erudite music critic of the Berkshire Eagle, during the opening series of three concerts of the 1968 season. He recalled the incident and the complete drenching.

I was covering the concert for this paper and was very anzious to file the report of Dr. Koussevitzky's battle with the elements. There was no telephone on the frounds on in immediate use for the patrons to phone their families back home that they were all rifht ,if a trifle damp. On the way back to Albany, I stopped in to see my old friend, Bill Monahan, boniface of the "Pillars Hotel" in New Lebanon for permission to use his telephone.

I dicated my story to the Times-Union from the telephone booth, which took a matter of some 15 minutes. When I had finished, Ifound a lind of some 8 or 9 frantie persons, lined up in high dudgeon, waiting to use the phone, folks marooned in the hotel, who, also, wanted to let their fmilies know where they were and that they were safe and sound. But did I get 8 or 9 dirty looks from the digruntled hotel habitues! That was a $100,000 storm, because it did result in the establishment of the 6,000-seat shed.

Photographs by MICHAEL STRAUSS

VICTORIAN—Naumkeag, the rambling summer cottage built in Stockbridge by Joseph Choate, Ambassador to the Court of St. James, was a showplace back in 1895.

The Gilt-Edge 'Cottages' Of Berkshires' Gilded Age

By MICHAEL STRAUSS

LENOX, Mass.—A century ago, the seat of Berkshire County was shifted from this quiet, tree-shaded village to industrial Pittsfield, 10 miles upstate. The change was popular with many Lenoxians, who preferred a bucolic atmosphere to the bustle usually spawned by a county seat.

Much to the surprise of almost everyone, however, the transfer seemed to have a salutary effect on Lenox's economy. In place of some of the lost commercial business came a mushrooming resort trade that made this scenic countryside one of the most popular in the East for vacationists.

Millionaires came, too, and built huge mansions. Lenox had entered upon a gilded age.

Their 'Cottages'

By the early 1880's, a total of 35 mansions — they were referred to by their owners as cottages—had been built. At the turn of the century, the number had reached 75.

Land that had sold for just a few dollars an acre in post-Civil War days was going for as high as $9,000 an acre. Soon, Lenox and neighboring Stockbridge became known as the "Inland Newport."

The most pretentious of all the "cottages" was Shadowbrook, the 100-room structure built by the Stokes banking family. It was believed to be the largest private home in America. Almost as large was Bellefontaine, the $2.5-million mansion built by Girard Foster to resemble the Petit Trianon in France. Foster was a New York banker.

It was an era in which household help numbered from perhaps a dozen to 100. Berkshire "cottagers" spent their free time at horse shows, at the thoroughbred races in nearby Lee, at cricket matches at the Lenox Club and at lawn and ballroom dances at the Stockbridge Casino.

Arrived in June

Many of the wealthy families did not linger in Lenox throughout the summer. Most of them came here in June to join friends who had leased cottages or rented hotel rooms. In July, many left for Newport, R. I., Bar Harbor, Me., or perhaps Europe. Most of them returned to the Berkshires in September, when the weather was cooler and gay parties more plentiful.

The railroad station was two miles from the middle of the village, and the "cottagers" would not have wanted it closer. It was all uphill from the station, and the stagecoach ride from the depot to the village was considered one of the town's most attractive features. It gave arriving royalty, as well as ambassadors from many European countries, a fine opportunity to attune themselves to the quiet and rural atmosphere from the very start.

Occupying center stage in the town's social life was the Lenox Club. Men eligible for membership had to be owners of summer homes, lessees of the more important cottages or guests at the major hotels.

The clubhouse was a simple, two-story wooden building with wide lawns and ample grounds. It included a tennis court, a bowling alley and wide, cool piazzas. Once each summer, the club gave a reception for women. It usually took place at the end of the season, and was considered one of the leading social events of the summer.

The gilded age finally came to an end with the start of World War I. Institution of income taxes and the end of cheap domestic help were the chief factors. For years, many of the great houses remained empty and, in some cases, were put up for sale at prices much below their original costs. Some of them, however, are still serving useful purposes.

For example, Stockbridge's Casino was converted into the Berkshire Summer Playhouse, one of the East's best-known strawhat theaters. Bellefontaine is now occupied by a religious order.

School for Girls

The old George Westinghouse mansion was destroyed by fire, but the Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt home, which replaced it in 1910, is now occupied by the Foxhollow School for Girls. Nearby is the 1890 home of Edith Wharton, the novelist; it is now part of the Foxhollow School campus.

Nearby, too, is the Cranwell School for Boys. It once was the castle-like summer home of John Sloane, a former Congressman.

Lenox still continues to enjoy a prominent role as a social and cultural retreat. A big reason for its present prominence, of course, is the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, where visitors have enjoyed music under the skies for more than three decades.

Another factor is that this community —and the same is true of Stockbridge— has never lost its old New England charm. It still has the classic white church, the vintage hotel, leisurely shops and a sedate air.

Surviving Hotels

Two of the old summer hotels in this part of the Berkshires have managed to survive competition from more modern ones. This is because they, too, are now modern in most details, except for their American clapboard facades. They are the Red Lion Inn in Stockbridge, where rocking chairs still line front porches, and the Curtis Hotel here in Lenox.

In contrast, there are such complete resorts as Jug End in South Egremont, Oak 'n' Spruce in South Lee and the Eastover and Avaloch, both in Lenox. They offer everything from old-fashioned barbecues to golf, and from modern outdoor pools to wall-to-wall carpeted bedrooms.

TURN-OF-THE-CENTURY—This Berkshires 'cottage' with its sweeping staircase served as summer home of novelist Edith Wharton in the Berkshires' heyday.

IN NEW ROLE—Old well fronts on the Sloane mansion, now a boys' school.

STATELY—The Vanderbilt 'cottage' in Lenox houses Foxhollow School for Girls.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,405 SUN. 1,494,704

JUL 7 1968

TANGLEWOOD TODAY

MUSICAL MIRACLE

The Tanglewood Tale Today

by CAROL L. ERON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S aspirations for an academy of the arts were not particularly new concepts when, in 1938, he described his plans for music in the Berkshires: "This great Music and Art Center [will become a place] where the greatest living composers will teach the art of composition; the greatest virtuosi, the art of perfect performance; the greatest conductors, the mystery of conducting orchestras and choruses. The most eminent thinkers and scholars will lecture there. A free cooperation of such an élite will certainly result in a creation of new and great values of art."

About 90 years before, Richard Wagner had written extensively of an art center for gesamtkunstwerk—the united work of art synthesizing poetry, drama, music, and painting (for scenery). Fortunately for Koussevitzky, his patrons were not deterred as was Wagner's, the wealthy King of Bavaria, Ludwig II, who withdrew support when he learned of the scope of Wagner's ideas for Bayreuth. And early in this century, before Tanglewood officially became the Boston Symphony's permanent summer home, there were several attempts at music festivals in the Berkshires, mainly privately organized with attendance by invitation.

According to legend, after composer-conductor Henry Hadley remarked while visiting Stockbridge that he had often aspired to "conduct a symphony orchestra out of doors, under a sky full of stars, in the shadow of great hills," he dispatched a representative from New York in May, 1934, who posed the idea of a public music festival to two philanthropic Stockbridge ladies. He was met with enthusiasm, and the project became a community enterprise once the eventual economic advantages were pointed out. With 65 members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, Hadley conducted three concerts in August, 1934, from a plywood shell in a horse-show ring at Stockbridge; about 5,000 attended.

Evidently the atmosphere of this first festival was less than formal, for as Mark DeWolfe Howe wrote in The Tale of Tanglewood, "A certain casual, friendly quality of it all is suggested by the record of an unexpected addition to the third and last concert, at which Mr. Hadley produced a new 'Scherzo Diabolique' of his own recent composition. In this, according to his reported words to the audience, he attempted to depict 'his impressions of a wild furious ride at an excessive speed from Stockbridge to New Haven to catch a train in the rain and darkness of night. He has employed every possible orchestral device to portray terror and violence in all its degrees.' "

"Scherzo Diabolique" notwithstanding, the concert series was judged a success, and the Berkshire Symphony Festival was incorporated to support an annual festival and to encourage education in the arts. After a second successful season, the Festival committee, realizing the potential of a summer festival, decided to seek a permanent orchestra of the highest quality; and the Boston Symphony was invited. Three concerts conducted by Koussevitzky in Stockbridge under a large tent in 1936 drew almost 15,000.

In the fall of 1936 the Tappan family, descendants of a well-known Boston banker, deeded Tanglewood, their lush, 210-acre estate (which included 40 cows) to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, to insure a permanent home for the Berkshire Festival. The appellation "Tanglewood," as Mark Howe traced it, originated with Nathaniel Hawthorne, who rented a cottage in Stockbridge at the edge of Highwood, the estate of the old Tappan family, where he lived from the summer of 1850 until the fall of 1851. There, in addition to The House of the Seven Gables he wrote the lesser known Wonder Book for Boys and Girls. Wonder Book and Tanglewood Tales, which followed, are situated at "Tanglewood," a country home where Primrose, Squash-Blossom and other children gathered to hear stories; in detail the house and setting corresponded to the Tappan home, thereafter called Tanglewood.

Letters and notes from Hawthorne's diary suggest that he and his family first referred to the exquisite view as "Tanglewood" soon after arriving at Stockbridge. In his Notebooks, Hawthorne described the setting:

"There is a glen between our house and the lake, through which winds a little brook with pools, and tiny waterfalls over the great roots of trees. The glen is deep and narrow, and filled with trees; so that, in the summer, it is all a dense shadow of obscurity. Now the foliage of the trees being almost entirely a golden yellow, instead of being full of shadow, the glen is absolutely full of sunshine, and its depths are more brilliant than the open plain or the mountain-tops. The trees are sunshine, and many of their golden leaves being freshly fallen, the glen is strewn with sunshine, amid which winds and gurgles the bright, dark little brook."

KOUSSEVITZKY, delighted with the gift, exclaimed after first surveying the estate, "This is wonderful! We will make beautiful music here. Festivals of music grow up for various purposes on a scale commensurate with their surroundings."

He protested that three concerts were inadequate and scheduled six concerts in two weeks for the summer of 1937. During the second concert a fortuitous misfortune occurred—the rainfall called "The $100,000 Storm." According to John Mahanna in Music Under the Moon:

> The biggest crowd in the history of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival had been attracted to Tanglewood for an all-Wagner program.
>
> When the orchestra started to play the "Ride of the Valkyries," the heavens opened up, lightning streaked through the sky, thunder clapped overhead and heavy rains bombarded the canvas roof of the tent. The roar it created within the shelter completely drowned out the music coming from the stage.
>
> Koussevitzky surrendered to the elements, and as one critic described the incident, "even the French horns were shipping water."
>
> The audience was in fine humor, even though many sitting near the main

TANGLEWOOD TODAY

MUSICAL MIRACLE

The Tanglewood Tale Today

by CAROL L. ERON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S aspirations for an academy of the arts were not particularly new concepts when, in 1938, he described his plans for music in the Berkshires: "This great Music and Art Center [will become a place] where the greatest living composers will teach the art of composition; the greatest virtuosi, the art of perfect performance; the greatest conductors, the mystery of conducting orchestras and choruses. The most eminent thinkers and scholars will lecture there. A free cooperation of such an élite will certainly result in a creation of new and great values of art."

About 90 years before, Richard Wagner had written extensively of an art center for gesamtkunstwerk—the united work of art synthesizing poetry, drama, music, and painting (for scenery). Fortunately for Koussevitzky, his patrons were not deterred as was Wagner's, the wealthy King of Bavaria, Ludwig II, who withdrew support when he learned of the scope of Wagner's ideas for Bayreuth. And early in this century, before Tanglewood officially became the Boston Symphony's permanent summer home, there were several attempts at music festivals in the Berkshires, mainly privately organized with attendance by invitation.

According to legend, after composer-conductor Henry Hadley remarked while visiting Stockbridge that he had often aspired to "conduct a symphony orchestra out of doors, under a sky full of stars, in the shadow of great hills," he dispatched a representative from New York in May, 1934, who posed the idea of a public music festival to two philanthropic Stockbridge ladies. He was met with enthusiasm, and the project became a community enterprise once the eventual economic advantages were pointed out. With 65 members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, Hadley conducted three concerts in August, 1934, from a plywood shell in a horse-show ring at Stockbridge: about 5,000 attended.

Evidently the atmosphere of this first festival was less than formal, for as Mark DeWolfe Howe wrote in The Tale of Tanglewood, "A certain casual, friendly quality of it all is suggested by the record of an unexpected addition to the third and last concert, at which Mr. Hadley produced a new 'Scherzo Diabolique' of his own recent composition. In this, according to his reported words to the audience, he attempted to depict 'his impressions of a wild furious ride at an excessive speed from Stockbridge to New Haven to catch a train in the rain and darkness of night. He has employed every possible orchestral device to portray terror and violence in all its degrees.' "

"Scherzo Diabolique" notwithstanding, the concert series was judged a success, and the Berkshire Symphony Festival was incorporated to support an annual festival and to encourage education in the arts. After a second successful season, the Festival committee, realizing the potential of a summer festival, decided to seek a permanent orchestra of the highest quality; and the Boston Symphony was invited. Three concerts conducted by Koussevitzky in Stockbridge under a large tent in 1936 drew almost 15,000.

In the fall of 1936 the Tappan family, descendants of a well-known Boston banker, deeded Tanglewood, their lush, 210-acre estate (which included 40 cows) to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, to insure a permanent home for the Berkshire Festival. The appellation "Tanglewood," as Mark Howe traced it, originated with Nathaniel Hawthorne, who rented a cottage in Stockbridge at the edge of Highwood, the estate of the old Tappan family, where he lived from the summer of 1850 until the fall of 1851. There, in addition to The House of the Seven Gables he wrote the lesser known Wonder Book for Boys and Girls. Wonder Book and Tanglewood Tales, which followed, are situated at "Tanglewood," a country home where Primrose, Squash-Blossom and other children gathered to hear stories; in detail the house and setting corresponded to the Tappan home, thereafter called Tanglewood.

Letters and notes from Hawthorne's diary suggest that he and his family first referred to the exquisite view as "Tanglewood" soon after arriving at Stockbridge. In his Notebooks, Hawthorne described the setting:

"There is a glen between our house and the lake, through which winds a little brook with pools, and tiny waterfalls over the great roots of trees. The glen is deep and narrow, and filled with trees; so that, in the summer, it is all a dense shadow of obscurity. Now the foliage of the trees being almost entirely a golden yellow, instead of being full of shadow, the glen is absolutely full of sunshine, and its depths are more brilliant than the open plain or the mountain-tops. The trees are sunshine, and many of their golden leaves being freshly fallen, the glen is strewn with sunshine, amid which winds and gurgles the bright, dark little brook."

KOUSSEVITZKY, delighted with the gift, exclaimed after first surveying the estate, "This is wonderful! We will make beautiful music here. Festivals of music grow up for various purposes on a scale commensurate with their surroundings."

He protested that three concerts were inadequate and scheduled six concerts in two weeks for the summer of 1937. During the second concert a fortuitous misfortune occurred—the rainfall called "The $100,000 Storm." According to John Mahanna in Music Under the Moon:

> The biggest crowd in the history of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival had been attracted to Tanglewood for an all-Wagner program.
>
> When the orchestra started to play the "Ride of the Valkyries," the heavens opened up, lightning streaked through the sky, thunder clapped overhead and heavy rains bombarded the canvas roof of the tent. The roar it created within the shelter completely drowned out the music coming from the stage.
>
> Koussevitzky surrendered to the elements, and as one critic described the incident, "even the French horns were shipping water."
>
> The audience was in fine humor, even though many sitting near the main poles were drenched. Dr. Koussevitzky started a second time when the storm quieted for a moment, but before the trumpet reached its second call in the introduction of the "Rienzi" overture, rain pelted the canvas roof again, compelling the conductor to wave his arms in submission. The applause from the audience was a mixed expression of pity and happy sympathy.

The orchestra started a third time and Dr. Koussevitzky succeeded in carrying the musicians through the first half of the program. At intermission, the Boston Symphony Orchestra manager, Mr. Judd, mounted the platform to announce a few changes in the second half, made necessary because of the damage to some instruments by the storm.

Koussevitzky refused to return to the Festival for another season without proper facilities; and remarkably a Festival committee succeeded in raising $80,000 for the completion by August, 1938, of the 6,000-seat music shed based on designs by Eliel Saarinen. At the second season's end, the symphonic success of the Festival had become evident, and the Boston Symphony president was asking if the Tanglewood concerts were not portent of a great artistic and educational reality—an institute of music for the entire country.

The educational facilities of the Berkshire Music Center, opened in July, 1940, were a small but exciting entity. As outlined by Koussevitzky, the Center was to "offer special opportunities to all for the practice and contemplation of music in its noblest aspects. It will bring them into association with the leading artists and scholars of the day. Tanglewood will be a place for those who wish to refresh mind and personality by the experience of the best in music and the related arts, and who long for a creative rest in the summer."

The fulfillment of Koussevitzky's dream, basically unchanged (though much expanded), served two basic functions: to provide advanced students with essential technical skill an intensive training period, a chance to work intimately with professionals to acquire the finishing touches that are not learned at school or conservatory; and to offer musical education to a larger group of students, teachers, and amateurs who could profit by expert instruction.

The first class of 312, selected from about 600 applicants, was offered during a six-week term: ensemble work in orchestra and chorus, orchestral conducting with Koussevitzky himself coaching select students, classes in composition taught by Paul Hindemith and Aaron Copland, and opera by Herbert Graf of the Metropolitan Opera. In addition there were lectures on musical history, form and style, and vocal and instrumental instruction by Symphony members.

By 1942 five distinct departments had emerged: Conducting, orchestral and choral; Orchestral and Chamber Music, which included the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and the important addition of a chamber music program, currently emphasized at the Center; Composition; Opera; and the Department of Music and Culture. The opera program for advanced singers combined the study of classical and modern roles with actual stage experience. Each year that opera remained part of the curriculum one complete production was mounted. In 1941 it was Così fan tutte; other productions ranged from Mozart's Idomeneo to The Tender Land by Copland, The Princess on the Pea by Toch, and several premieres, such as the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's Peter Grimes, commissioned by Koussevitzky. (The maestro had met the young composer, told him of opera activity at Tanglewood and wondered if he would write an opera. Skeptical, Britten wanted to know who would perform it and how he was to live while writing it. Koussevitzky answered, "We will perform it," and asked how much money he needed. Britten named a price and Koussevitzky immediately wrote out a check.) Peter Grimes, which established Britten as one of the major contemporary opera composers, was performed at Tanglewood in 1946.

The Department of Music and Culture, from which evolved the Tanglewood Institute, required for admission only choral singing experience, and members of this department formed the Festival Chorus, besides studying and performing choral and instrumental chamber music.

At this time the Center offered all members varied lectures, classes in solfège, and, anomalously, what the brochures described as Country Dancing ("Country, Morris, and American square dances will be taught. These activities are an important addition to the social and recreational life of the Berkshire Music Center."). For accommodation, students were provided dormitory rooms at nearby schools or the opportunity to camp at the lake front where Symphony musicians, including the entire Roger Voisin family, had roughed it in the Festival's earliest days. Camping is still available on a limited basis.

The 1941 Tanglewood season of nine concerts was the most successful yet; attendance reached 95,000 and reserved seats were sold out for every concert. But war conditions, especially the shortage of gasoline, and the termination of a two-year Rockefeller Foundation grant prohibited full-scale activities of the Festival and the Berkshire Center from then until 1946. However, Dr. Koussevitzky, through the Koussevitzky Foundation, sponsored a third Berkshire Center season in 1942, and in 1944 and 1945 conducted a small chamber ensemble of Boston Symphony members in the first chamber festivals of Tanglewood, a Mozart festival the first season, and Bach-Mozart, the second. They caused a prominent critic to remark that ". . . these modestly proportioned festivals, originally designed to keep the Tanglewood musical tradition alive in wartime, have won for themselves a unique place in our musical life. It is to be hoped that they will become an annual event, for they constitute a project which has great validity over and above their wartime expediency." They have since remained a valuable part of the Festival.

Koussevitzky leading Peter and the Wolf; Eleanor Roosevelt, narrator, 1950

After its formative years, the Festival and the Center remained unchanged through the reign of Charles Munch, 1951-1962, except for expansion of the orchestra season to the present eight weeks and, in 1957, the addition to the Center of the study of contemporary music. Under Munch, as Time expressed it, "Tanglewood wilted sadly . . . Munch was little interested in teaching, weary from his long winter, remote from Tanglewood's earnest youthfulness."

Erich Leinsdorf, arriving as director in 1963, announced aphoristically, "Tanglewood is a tree with many branches. You can't tell which will wither away and which will blossom." Shortly afterward the opera department was thrown out. Leinsdorf saw no sense in staging operas at Tanglewood since it could not be done there in the grand manner with students. In 1965 (in accord with Koussevitzky's goals), the Music Center was reorganized into the Performance Department and the Tanglewood Institute.

The Performance Department awarded young musicians, having completed formal training, a stipend to allow them exclusive devotion to music, with emphasis on performance. Now called the Fellowship Program, it is comprised of Fellows, over age 21, and Associate Fellows, over 18, whose fees are paid but who receive no stipend—in total, about 150 members this year. Annually, about $65,000 in scholarships is awarded. All fellows participate in the chamber program of contemporary and baroque music directed by Gunther Schuller and Boston Symphony members, and present 12 concerts during the season. The Music Center Orchestra, made up entirely of fellows, will rehearse under the highly professional guidance of Leinsdorf, Copland, Wilson, Silverstein, and Schuller for seven full-length concerts this summer. Vocalists in the program sing in a chamber chorus and the Berkshire Festival Chorus. For composers ready to work in more advanced forms there is a composition course of weekly sessions with Gunther Schuller or Ernst Krenek. To qualify, students submit letters of recommendation and, if approved, several scores. In general, admission to the program is based on auditions.

When in 1966 Leinsdorf invited Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music to direct Tanglewood Institute programs, he was certainly following the dictum of Koussevitzky who wrote in 1945: "Little did I think that my own early dream of a Music and Art Center in Moscow, in the heart of Russia, would find its realization in the heart of New England a quarter of a century later . . . The story of Tanglewood, however, is by no means completed—its future chapters are yet to be told. In 1938 I attempted to describe its soaring theme in a statement in which I said that the Berkshire Music Festival was 'the first step' toward the ultimate goal: 'The establishment of a great Music and Art Center.' For the 'rapid growth of American culture dictates its necessity as a historical mission and as a perennial contribution of America to art and culture.'" He further hoped it would become a creative center where great composers, artists, thinkers and scholars would gather. Leinsdorf also believed that the well-rounded musician must be aware and appreciative of the related arts. The following year both programs were expanded, with Boston University offering dance and art in addition to music and theater.

This year the Boston University Tanglewood Institute directs courses of four to eight weeks carrying college credit in music, art, theater, and dance. In addition to a general music seminar for performers, teachers, students, and amateurs, piano and voice seminars, workshops in ensemble literature, composition and orchestration, there is a special opportunity for about 70 outstanding high school juniors, Young Artists at Tanglewood. For eight weeks they will study privately, each week with a different member of the Boston University faculty or the Boston Symphony, and play in their own orchestra and chamber ensembles, preparing eight or nine concerts. Also of note, on the theater program is the Symposium-workshop for Playwrights for four professional writers with promising scripts who by invitation will be in residence. With access to an experienced company of actors they will see portions of their scripts in laboratory productions and receive criticism from Robert Lewis, Elliot Norton, and William Gibson.

Two sounds new to Tanglewood this summer will be the plucking of the sitar and an African drumbeat, emanating from a seminar in non-Western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, and advanced instrumental techniques—one of two six-week courses of the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood. Both are designed to give music educators and graduate students in music direct experience with several vital aspects of twentieth century music which are unfortunately absent from most college curricula. The seminar's one-week studies of African music directed by Ghanaian drummer Desmund Tay, and of Indian music with Ravi Shankar and his troupe, emphasize performance techniques and their theoretical implications. The theory and improvisation of jazz and the theory and practice of aleatoric and chance music follow, and the seminar concludes with two weeks of advanced instrumental techniques. The second course, Contemporary Composition, involves exploratory compositions for various instruments and sonorities, to be performed and evaluated by the class, and a survey of contemporary educational theories.

Besides the myriad activities of the Tanglewood Institute and the Boston Symphony, there are several other concert series indicative of increased emphasis on contemporary music. New this year, at student suggestion, are Contemporary Trends Concerts in July—performances and seminars by popular groups representing significant artistic trends in contemporary music other than "classical": musical satire, non-Western music, jazz, and folk-rock. For the five-year-old Festival of Contemporary Music early in August, Gunther Schuller will conduct a concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, and new works commissioned by four young composers will be heard.

Not much new music will be performed at the Boston Symphony summer concerts; except during the first week or two, for understandable reasons the programs are generally repeats of the previous season. (Notable exception this year is the first concert performance of the Frager version of the Schumann piano concerto scheduled for August 3.) But the tremendous value of the Berkshire Music Center—inspiring and educating young musicians and commissioning new works—is obvious with a glance at listings of artists who trained at Tanglewood with such teachers as Ibert, Babbitt, Dallapiccola, Isaac Stern, Stravinsky, Piatigorsky, Milhaud, Robert Shaw, and Messaien. The listing of their students includes such famous names as Leonard Bernstein, Robert Craft, Leontyne Price, Lukas Foss, Leonard Pennario, Thomas Schippers, Zubin Mehta, Seiji Ozawa, Frederick Fennell, Seymour Lipkin, and Lorin Maazel.

It is certainly hoped that Mr. Leinsdorf's successor will continue to develop Tanglewood as Serge Koussevitzky envisioned—a palace of the arts where young talent and great artistry commingle. □ 130.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra performs in Tanglewood Shed

"TANGLEWOOD, U.S.A.," The Home of the Berkshire Music Center

SESAC MUSIC

THE COLISEUM TOWER
10 COLUMBUS CIRCLE
NEW YORK, N.Y. 10019

Vol. 27, Nos. 7-9 • Summer, 1968 • Our Thirty-Seventh Year

Each Summer, thousands upon thousands of music lovers from all over the world join some 400 students and journey to Lenox, Massachusetts, to attend the Berkshire Music Festival and to enjoy the luxury of outdoor concerts at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Music Center was founded in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky as "a place for the contemplation and practice of music in its noblest aspects." The finest talents of the music world have contributed to each Summer's activities, teaching, performing, talking with the students and passing on their experience in the art of music. Thirteen of the conductors of the major orchestras in America today are alumni of the Center as are nearly ten percent of their orchestra members.

Located in a picturesque setting in the beautiful Berkshire Mountains of New England, Tanglewood affords the music lover an opportunity to devote his every moment to music, surrounded by the tranquility of nature. On June 30th of this year, in remarks delivered to the 1968 class, Erich Leinsdorf, director of the center, stated: "Dr. Koussevitzky said that Tanglewood is a place for those who long for a creative rest in the Summer." He advised the students, "Whatever you may get here, you may not think there's very much 'rest' involved. It is going to be a busy eight weeks. But there is a saying: of those to whom much is given, much is demanded. We ask much of music: in times of grief, we ask that it comfort us; in times of elation, we ask that it tell our joy; in times of doubt, we ask that it inspire us . . . and it does. But, in return, it asks much of us, too: discipline, dedication, faith and work."

The 1968 season is busy and SESAC is proud to be a part of this year's "Festival." Witold Lutoslawski's "Concerto For Orchestra" was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Stanislaw Skrowaczewski on July 19th.

Composed in 1954 and published by PWP, the Association of Polish Publishers, this work is internationally acclaimed as one of the composer's outstanding achievements, representing the sum total of his knowledge, invention and originality. The "Concerto" is a stirring work, inspired by folk motifs both genuine and imaginary.

Mr. Lutoslawski's "Concerto" is no stranger to the New England scene. The composer, himself, conducted the work at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire last Summer and the college's director, Mario de Bonaventura, directed some three other Lutoslawski works during the same program.

Other notable performances of the "Concerto" have been presented by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and the Los Angeles Philharmonic. The "Concerto" is available on the Philips label, performed by the Warsaw Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Music Festivals are known throughout the world. Its students each year consistently mold music opinions. As Dr. Leinsdorf said to this year's group: "Our alumni teach, perform, compose and write. They pursue the experiments that will some day, with good fortune, lead to entire new areas of music we have not yet experienced and now are understood by only an initiate few. They talk to the mass audience through television and introduce children to their musical heritage. Some, who no longer pursue professional careers in music, are active in other areas, from management to criticism to the not-lightly-to-be-dismissed chores of fund-raising. Some are the backbone of the increasingly demanding and knowledgeable audiences we need in our concert halls. In short, there is probably not a moment that passes now, when music is not made somewhere by one of our alumni, nor a community in which the Berkshire Music Center's influence is not felt. Its work is built splendidly and pervasively into the fabric of American musical life."

Concerts are contemporary, but Tanglewood's the same

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Pale fog wreathed up from the lake and drifted across Tanglewood. Buildings and bustle disappeared into its grey anonymity, and the thin decisive rain washed out the picnickers with their bare legs, bottles and blankets, until the great green lawns swept uncluttered to the clipped curve of the hedges.

Only the violins sounded somewhere, and the swift skim of the swallows, and it was like that unforgettable day when Serge Koussevitsky's dream took shape at last and there was a place for musicians to spend the Summer months learning and playing, a center for both the young and the experienced to share their talent, a gathering of the faithful friends of music, some of whom had made Tanglewood come true.

Rain pelted those early listeners, too, and the members of the Boston Symphony had moved, and played, and moved again, and still were rained on. So the Shed was built, and there was another memorable opening with the world of music there.

Serge Koussevitsky would have rejoiced in this week's lustrous visitors from India, including Ravi Shankar, Director of his country's fabulous Festival and holder of its highest music honors, the "Padma Bhusan" for "bringing the music of India to the world—and back to his own people."

Son of India's foremost living musician, Ustah Khan, Ali Akbar Khan plays the sarod and this year founded the Ali Akbar College in Sausalito, Calif.

These men and their Festival players brought the essence as well as the sound of their country to the misty silences of Tanglewood on Wednesday night. Mrs. Koussevitsky, her lustrous face glowing in tribute, listened, swathed in veilings as beautiful as any Indian Begum. She entertained the brilliant young company after their fascinating performance.

Boston Symphony's Joseph Silverstein, chairman of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, is another prime welcomer for the visitors in Tanglewood's first series of Contemporary-Trends Concerts. "A chance to talk as well as teach is vital to the future of everyone in music today."

All visitors, including next week's Rock pros, "The Association," are invited to "stay as long as you can" and their hosts are the men of magnitude like the BSO's Erich Leinsdorf ("There can be no barriers in music—and especially here where Serge

MRS. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Koussevitsky founded the future of so many talented young musicians.")

The New England Conservatory's youngest president in its century of "firsts," vibrant composer-teacher Gunther Schuller, sparks the music activities of the Berkshire Music Center, feels that the "momentum in the media today, through recordings, TV, radio, as well as concerts, involves us all in a new awareness.

"The Center is offering the new aspects in both curriculum and concert programming."

And the audience of all ages matches the enthusiasm; dowagers with a rug tucked over their arthritic knees against the rain, a family of six from Michigan, even their five-year-old youngest mesmerized by the strange and beautiful sounds and people on stage. Rows of students of every race and creed listened intently, and went off afterwards arguing happily. The welcome mat is out for "The Association."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JUL 26 1969 New England Newsclip

CONCERT SUB CLAR DE LUNA

Tanglewood - Salzburgul american

SEDIUL DE VARĂ AL ORCHESTREI SIMFONICE DIN BOSTON

ROBERT COPELMAN
CORESPONDENTUL NOSTRU DIN NEW-YORK NE SCRIE :

Să stai întins pe iarbă... să privești cerul înstelat... siluetele mărețe ale pădurii de coniferi să capete forme fantastice... gîndurile să zboare... să te „relaxezi", în timp ce una din cele mai celebre orchestre din lume execută o simfonie de Mozart sub bagheta lui Erich Leinsdorf sau a altui ilustru dirijor, toate acestea îți dau desigur o senzație nouă, neobișnuită.

La numai trei ore distanță de New York, și la și mai mică distanță de Boston, în munții Berckshire se află o mică localitate, TANGLEWOOD, devenită celebră în lumea întreagă de cînd orchestra simfonică din Boston și-a stabilit aici reședința de vară.

Pe drept cuvînt această localitate se numește „Salzburgul american", căci festivalurile muzicale ce se desfășoară aici ating prin frumusețea naturii și calitatea muzicii ce se execută, nivelul celor din Salzburg.

Ideia „muzicii sub clar de lună" a luat amploare în 1936 cînd după doi ani de activitate „Comitetul Festivalului Simfonic Berckshire" a invitat orchestra simfonică din Boston să dea 3 concerte sub un cort clădit în mod temporar la Holmwood, pe domeniul Vanderbilt în munții Berckshire. Sub conducerea lui Serge Koussevitzky au fost executate trei concerte simfonice, la care au asistat 15.000 de spectatori.

Succesul acestor concerte a făcut ca descendenții familiei Tappan să ofere în dar doctorului S. Koussevitzky și orchestrei din Boston un teren de 210 hectare, situat pe o superbă pajiște între munții Berckshire, ca sediu permanent al concertelor festivale ale orchestrei.

În luna august 1937, sub un cort construit cam... de mîntuială, orchestra a început seria concertelor. Dar la 12 august, pe cînd se desfășura cel de al doilea concert și orchestra executa „Cavalcada Walkiriilor" de Wagner, cerul s-a deschis, fulgerele au început să răzbată printre norii grei, tunetele să concureze cu tobele orchestrei și ploaia să cadă deasupra cortului, să inunde totul și — bineînțeles — să întrerupă concertul.

Această furtună a rămas cunoscută în istoria festivalului sub numele de „Furtuna celor $ 100.000", căci imediat după ce s-a terminat furtuna a început o campanie de colectare de fonduri pentru construirea unei clădiri adecvate desfășurării în bune condițiuni a festivalului.

Banii au fost colectați cu ușurință, astfel că la 4 august 1938 s-a inaugurat construcția ce există și azi, cu o capacitate de peste 6000 de locuri, clădită pe superba pajiște înconjurată de pădurile mărețe de coniferi ale munților Berckshire. Construcția este în formă triunghiulară, acoperișul este susținut de 78 stîlpi de oțel, iar între acești stîlpi sînt spații libere care lasă ca sunetele orchestrei să răzbată, afară, departe, peste toată întinderea pajiștei, avînd o acustică perfectă pînă în cel mai extrem punct.

Pentru cele peste 6000 de locuri de sub partea acoperită se vînd — începînd încă din iarnă — locuri numerotate. Dar alte cîteva mii de amatori de muzică ocupă din vreme pajiștea. Ei vin aici cu pături, perne, scaune sau fotolii pliante. Iau masa pe iarbă, se odihnesc, discută, admiră natura... se relaxează în adevăratul sens al cuvîntului. Țin să menționez că tineretul este în special atras de acest festival, un tineret dornic de cultură, de muzică excepțional de bine interpretată.

•

„Festivalul Berckshire" a căpătat cu timpul un renume internațional, venind aici peste 250.000 de spectatori anual. Timp de 8 săptămîni ei pot asculta 24 concerte simfonice care se desfășoară vineri și sîmbătă seara și duminică în matineu — iar în restul săptămînii opt repetiții generale cu public, opt concerte de muzică de cameră și peste 50 concerte oferite de cei 300 studenți ai cursurilor de vară ce se țin în Centrul Muzical Berckshire.

Succesul extraordinar al festivalului nu rezidă numai în frumusețea peisajului ci și în calitatea excepțională a orchestrei din Boston (106 executanți) și mai ales a faimoșilor dirijori pe care i-a avut orchestra — enumerăm pe Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch (actualmente bolnav, astfel că a trebuit să anuleze un concert ce fusese anunțat că va fi dirijat de dînsul), iar în 1962 Erich Leinsdorf. Această orhestră este renumită în lumea întreagă prin turneele pe care le-a făcut, prin cele peste 31 milioane de discuri imprimate și vîndute precum si prin retransmisia concertelor de către 65 de stații de radio din Statele Unite și Canada și prin emisiunile de la televiziunea americană, canadiană și din alte 20 țări.

•

Conducerea muzicală a orchestrei din Boston va fi preluată începînd cu stagiunea muzicală 1969/1970 de către dl. WILLIAM STEINBERG.

În pauza concertului la care am asistat, am avut ocazia de a discuta cu dl. William Steinberg — care dirija acest concert. D-sa a venit în Statele Unite în anul 1938 la invitația personală a lui Arturo Toscanini, ca dirijor asociat al orchestrei NBC din New York. Apoi a preluat conducerea muzicală a orchestrei simfonice din Pittsburgh si în 1958 si pe aceia a orchestrei London Philarmonic (timp de doi ani a avut conducerea muzicală a ambelor orchestre).

Amintim că în cadrul Festivalului se execută muzică clasică, modernă și contemporană.

Bucuria muzicii, împletită cu încîntarea naturii, iată ce oferă un week-end la Tanglewood.

ROBERT COPELMAN

SUS: Vedere generală a sălii de concert
MIJLOC: Publicul care nu are locuri în sală, ascultă concertele așezat pe pajiște
JOS: Aspect din timpul unui concert

Dirijorul WILLIAM STEINBERG

REVISTA FAMILIEI

132 the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

THERE HAS ALWAYS been a great deal of controversy about how important the conductor of a symphony orchestra is to the quality of the music being performed. There are some who maintain you could give a monkey a stick, place him on the podium and the result would be no different than if you had any of the major conductors up there. A good, well-trained orchestra, they say, can play well no matter what kind of booby is up in front of them. Who trained the orchestra in the first place is a subject that never comes up with these people.

* * *

IT IS INTERESTING each summer to inspect the guest conductors at Tanglewood as they take the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's finest, through its paces. Every little movement has a meaning all its own, and the reaction of the orchestra as a whole to the guest conductor is a phenomenon all by itself.

One concert had a 32-year-old conductor who so blended his body movements and facial expressions into the music that he created a physical tension of his own as he literally swung his way through Boccherini, Bach, Handel and Haydn. The orchestra responded with verve and the result was a happy combination of music and dance with the conductor and the orchestra moving their bodies in happy harmony. The music snapped out of the instruments with such joyous control that there was visual as well as aural reaction. You blended into the being of the orchestra and the conductor and the music they were making.

* * *

A WEEK LATER the guest conductor was a stern-looking, erect individual in his middle years who confronted the music and the musicians in a most formal manner. The orchestra sat there impassively during the performance of Berlioz and Dvorak, playing as correctly as always but without any of the romantic lyricism that was demanded. They made music, they made excellent music, but they were one part of the making, the conductor was another part, the music was a third part and the audience was another part. There was no enfolding of the parts as there had been the week before, there was no spontaneous physical activity by the orchestra, no extra swinging of shoulders or heads or hearts or souls.

* * *

IN A SITUATION like this the attention wanders. You can close your eyes and listen to the music as music, but this is something you can do with a recording and a good stereo system. The liveness, the humanness were missing.

And then as my gaze wandered over the rows in front of me, I caught sight of a middle-aged woman who was not having my problem, who was so lost in Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D Minor that her whole being was being poured out with the music. She swayed and bobbed her head and smiled and nodded and beamed as each familiar strain hit her ears. She knew the symphony as well as the conductor did and moved her eyes to each instrumental section just before it was due to come in, anticipating every little nuance of the composer and his creation.

And through her I was given an added dimension of pleasure in the music I was hearing. I glued my eyes to her rather than to the conductor and the orchestra, enjoyed her enjoyment and followed her leads to what was to come.

And since all good columns should have a moral, here is a parable. When a man asked me who that conductor was who was with me last night, I told him that that was no conductor, that was a lady.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tanglewood Fest Shed.

L. 2. Press - Staton 2. Advance + Newark Star Ledger 7-21-'68

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 25 1968

New England Newsclip

William Carney

Legs and arms on Tanglewood lawn are jumbled around face hidden by new BSO program.

Critic-at-Large

Tanglewood Is Tops As Cultural Facility

By BYRON BELT

Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center, is probably one of the most influential cultural facilities in the world. In 1938, Miss Mary Aspinwall and Mrs. Gorham Brooks gave 210 acres and a handsome frame estate house to the Boston Symphony. Coming to summers after initial experimental concerts by the orchestra and its famed conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, the gift assured Lenox, Mass. of culturally active summers for time to come.

Byron Belt

The huge music shed was erected at Tanglewood for the 1938 season, and its 6,000 seat capacity has been one key to the Berkshire festival success through the years. Unlike Saratoga, where the New York City Ballet is in residence in July and the Philadelphia Orchestra in August, Tanglewood is completely dominated by the magnificent Boston Symphony.

Erich Leinsdorf, the present music director, will relinquish his post at the conclusion of the Berkshire season in 1969. Meanwhile, his tremendous energy and talents are everywhere felt, from the fact that he conducts a majority of the concerts, to his influence as head of the school, which is run in cooperation with New England Conservatory and Boston University.

* * *

THE ORCHESTRA performs each Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons through Aug. 25th.

General admission ticket on Fridays provides a particularly excellent Tanglewood buy. For $2.50, visitors may attend a "weekend prelude" featuring music and artists appearing during the orchestral concerts, in performances for small ensemble.

On the Friday of the festival opening (July 5) the 7 p.m. prelude featured two sonatas for violin and piano of Mozart, performed by pianist Lillian Kallir and violinist James Oliver Buswell IV. The 9 p.m. orchestral program was also all-Mozart, with young Buswell as soloist in the first concerto for violin and orchestra, and with Leinsdorf directing the marriage of Figaro overture and the "Posthorn" serenade.

Lillian Kallir is an outstanding pianist, and her strength, taste and forward thrust lent great vitality to the two sonatas. For his part, James Oliver Buswell IV is a technically sure but extremely bland performer. Perhaps playing comes too easily for him, and certainly he has been vastly overpromoted by his commerical management. In recent performances in recital, and the Boston Symphony, he has failed to strike a sympathetic chord with his listener., and does not seem to communicate overly well to audiences as a whole.

* * *

ON AUG. 19 and 20 Lillian Kallir, with her pianist husband, Claude Frank, will be a welcome guest at Philharmonic Hall as part of the "Midsummer Serenades" devoted to Mozart and Haydn. I would urge readers not to miss them.

Leinsdorf has many detracters and he is not always a warm and communicative musician himself. But for the Tanglewood opening, he and his orchestra were in fine fettle. Both the Figaro overture and the serenade bubbled along with a lithe buoyancy to be marveled at. This was Mozart at once aristocratic and human, totally delightful. The solo performers and ensemble were impeccable.

While the accoustics of the shed are outstanding, and hearing on the lawn is remarkably clear and strong, the building itself and the hard folding chairs are real horrors. Eero Saarinen designed two handsome smaller theaters for the school and it is a tragedy that he could not have lived to provide a new concert hall.

Great music and performances blend into a setting of such pastoral beauty as to inspire poets. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived on the grounds for a year in 1850 and wrote the "House of Seven Gables" and planned his "Tanglewood Tales" while in Lenox. A replica of his house may be seen on the grounds. The view overlooking Lake Mahkeenac is simply great, and wandering the grounds and eating one of the traditional box suppers are part of the special delights of any visit to Tanglewood.

* * *

WEEKEND visitors to the Tanglewood area will find such a wealth of things to see and do that they will promise, as I have been doing for years, to go up for an entire summer one year. From the many riches, I would say three things are absolute musts: The Saratoga and Berkshire festivals and Williamstown.

Williamstown is named for a revolutionary colonel, Ephraim Williams Jr., who set up a trust in his will for the establishment of a free school in West Hoosuck, provided the town change its name to Williamston. The school was opened in 1791 and Williams College is one of the oldest and finest of America's smaller universities.

The town of Williamstown is exceptionally lovely, with tree-lined streets and almost movie-set old houses of great character and charm. Williamstown is fortunate enough to have become the home of possibly the finest small art museum in the country, the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute.

* * *

IMAGINE, if you can, a snow-white marble neo-classic anachronism of a building nestled snugly into the rolling hills of a small Massachusetts village. Surround this pure marble mausoleum with splint-rail fencing and have cows grazing within a hundred feet of the front door. Then move from this unique exterior inside into one of the most beautifully arranged and lit exhibits of fine art imaginable.

The clarks built their bomb-proof museum in Williamstown because they feared the dangers of nuclear war for their home, New York City. The museum was opened in 1955 and fully lives up to its donors' dedication "not for the noisy applause of today, but for the quite approbation of enternity."

The Clark Museum is almost exactly the right size. Each room has a number of treasures, each of which is ideally displayed for relaxed contemplation and enjoyment. No typical museum exhaustion will result from a visit but the quite atmosphere and unusually well-preserved art provide a true balm for city visitors.

* * *

RENOIR does not happen to be my favorite artist, but there are 30 of his works on display, as well as a large number of other romantic and impressionist painters. The collection ranges from the 15th to the 20th Century, but the emphasis is clearly upon the 19th Century in its various guises.

Among the highlights for us were a "Virgin and Child With Four Angels" by Piero Della Francesca, Rubens' oft-reproduced "Holy Family Under an Apple Tree" and a really outstanding Turner seascape. The Silver collection is one of the finest anywhere, with particularly notable pieces by Paul Revere and Paul de Lamerie.

The Williamstown Theater provides quality drama all summer and along with the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge and Ted Shawn's dance festival at Jacob's Pillow provides additional quaity entertainment for those not exhausted by the endless possibilities of the area.

Every kind of artistic taste may be satisfied in the Berkshires and I can think of no area that is working harder to maintain the quality of its environment and yet offer a comfortable and lively spot for people to have a complete change less than four hours from New York.

Massachusetts Arts Council Announces Programs

The Council on the Arts and Humanities of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been voted $130,000 by the Legislature. Its projects to date in 1968 involved a total cost of $107,300.

John R. Watts, Chairman of the Council, announced at the State House that the Council's support of these programs has amounted to $60,000 with the balance being matched by local arts organizations, business and civic groups.

These programs included eight symphony orchestra concerts for children from New Bedford to North Adams. 80 chamber music concerts in elementary schools for more than 30,000 pupils, a regional arts festival for Berkshire County, and reduced ticket prices for professional theatre productions for members of social agencies and educational institutions.

In addition, the Council is currently providing partial support for professional workshops in the visual arts and theatre for high school students, a traveling summer "jazz wagon," a concert of Haydn's "The Creation," a project in grassroots theatre, and 12 neighborhood arts councils for the Boston Summer Neighborhood Arts Festival.

The funds voted by the Legislature include $30,000 in the Governor's deficiency budget and $100,000 for the next fiscal year.

In addition to these funds for state sources, Mr. Watts said that the Council has applied for a $50,000 Federal matching grant for the fiscal year beginning July 1. If Congress approves the appropriation for the National Endowment for the Arts, the Massachusetts Council plans to use these funds in the following areas:

The Springfield Theatre Company, Stage/West, will provide a program of high school matinees to schools in Western Massachusetts, particularly in the Springfield, Holyoke, and Chicopee areas. It is estimated that 18,000 high school students will be served.

The Council also plans to make these Federal funds available, on a matching basis, to regional and community arts festivals that wish to improve the quality and variety of their programs with professional attractions formerly unavailable because of prohibitive costs to the community.

In addition, the Council will work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to bring children from culturally and economically disadvantaged areas to the Berkshire Music Center for a day of experience with the arts at Tanglewood. One of the loveliest sites in Massachusetts and the center of a world-famous music festival, Tanglewood has been literally and figuratively out of reach to many children who might benefit greatly by exposure to the music and the setting.

The orchestra assistance project begun this spring resulted from a study the Council made last year of symphony orchestras in Massachusetts. This study reported that "the citizens of the Commonwealth are relatively well served with . . . symphony orchestra concerts . . . The areas of great weakness . . . are those involved with young people." There has been an appalling lack of children's concerts by all of the orchestras in the Commonwealth. In 1967, a total of only 32 such concerts was provided by all the orchestras in the state.

The orchestra assistance project encourages civic and regional orchestras to provide additional services, primarily in the form of concerts for children, and to expand their programs for their communities. Council funds for these concerts were matched, on a dollar-for-dollar basis, by the orchestras, schools, or civic associations.

More than 15,000 children attended the concerts this spring. The participating orchestras were the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Brockton Symphony Orchestra, the New Bedford Symphony Orchestra, the Pioneer Valley Symphony, the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, and the Worcester Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Watts went on to say that the recent appropriation of the Legislature will make it possible to expand the work of the Council into new areas serving the artist and the citizens of the Commonwealth, who are the audience for the arts.

JAMAICA PLAIN CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,350
JUL 18 1968 New England Newsclip

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
[illegible] 400
AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

HERALD
RANDOLPH, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,200
AUG 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Mass. Arts Council Receives State Grant

BOSTON — The Council on the Arts and Humanities of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been voted $130,000 by the Legislature. Its projects to date in 1968 involved a total cost of $107,300.

John R. Watts, Chairman of the Council, announced at the State House that the Council's support of these programs has amounted to $60,000 with the balance being matched by local arts organizations, business and civic groups.

These programs included eight symphony orchestra concerts for children from New Bedford to North Adams. Eighty chamber music concerts in elementary schools for more than 30,000 pupils, a regional arts festival for Berkshire County, and reduced ticket prices for professional theatre production for members of social agencies and educational institutions.

In addition, the Council is currently providing partial support for professional workshops in the visual arts and theatre for high school students, a traveling summer "jazz wagon," a concert of Haydn's "The Creation," a project in grassroots theatre, and 12 neighborhood arts councils for the Boston Summer Neighborhood Arts Festival.

In addition to these funds for state sources the Council has applied for a $50,000 Federal matching grant for the fiscal year beginning July 1.

The Council will work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to bring children from culturally and economically disadvantaged areas to the Berkshire Music Center for a day of experience with the arts at Tanglewood.

SUNDAY CAPE COD
HYANNIS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,800
JUN 30 1968 New England Newsclip

Legislature Votes Arts Council $130,000

The Council on the Arts and Humanities of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been voted $130,000 by the legislature, it was announced today. Its projects to date in 1968 involved a total cost of $107,300.

John R. Watts, council chairman, announced at the State House that the council's support of these programs has amounted to $60,000 with the balance being matched by local arts organizations, business and civic groups.

Area Interest

The council's activities have included two programs of interest to northern Berkshire.

In the first, the council worked with the Mt. Greylock Regional Arts Festival earlier this year in a three-day program of concerts, art lectures, dance recitals, band workshops, and film showings for students, teachers, and a general audience. A total of 3,600 people participated in the festival.

And in the second, the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra participated, with other regional orchestras in a council supported program to give children's concerts. These concerts were attended by more than 15,000 preschool, elementary and high school age young people throughout the state.

In another program, the council made possible reduced ticket prices for professional theater production for members of social agencies and educational institutions.

In addition, the council is currently providing partial support for professional workshops in the visual arts and theater for high school students, a traveling summer "jazz wagon," a concert of Haydn's "The Creation," a project in grassroots theater, and 12 neighborhood arts councils for the Boston Summer Neighborhood Arts Festival.

The funds voted by the Legislature include $30,000 in the governor's deficiency budget and $100,000 for the next fiscal year.

U.S. Aid Sought

In addition to these funds for state sources, Mr. Watts said that the council has applied for a $50,000 Federal matching grant for the fiscal year beginning July 1. If Congress approves the appropriation for the National Endowment for the Arts, the Massachusetts Council plans to use these funds in the following areas:

The Springfield Theatre Company, Stage-West, will provide a program of high school matinees to schools in Western Massachusetts, particularly in the Springfield, Holyoke, and Chicopee areas. It is estimated that 18,000 high school students will be served.

The council also plans to make these Federal funds available, on a matching basis, to regional and community arts festivals that wish to improve the quality and variety of their programs with professional attractions formerly unavailable because of prohibitive costs to the community.

In addition, the council will work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to bring children from culturally and economically disadvantaged areas to the Berkshire Music Center for a day of experience with the arts at Tanglewood.

The orchestra assistance project begun this spring resulted from a study the council made last year of symphony orchestras in Massachusetts. This study reported that "the citizens of the Commonwealth are relatively well served with . . . symphony orchestra concerts . . . The areas of great weakness . . . are those involved with young people." There has been an "appalling" lack of children's concerts by all of the orchestras in the Commonwealth the study found. In 1967, a total of only 32 such concerts was provided by all the orchestras in the state.

Children's Concerts

The orchestra assistance project encourages civic and regional orchestras to provide additional services, primarily in the form of concerts for children, and to expand their programs for their communities. Council funds for these concerts were matched, on a dollar-for-dollar basis, by the orchestras, schools, or civic associations. More than 15,000 children attended the concerts this spring.

The participating orchestras were the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Brockton Symphony Orchestra, the New Bedford Syymphony Orchestra, the Pioneer Valley Symphony, the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, and the Worcester Symphony Orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
JUN 26 1968 New England Newsclip

State Legislature Votes Art Council $130,000

The Council on the Arts and Humanities of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been voted $130,000 by the Legislature. Its projects to date in 1968 involved a total cost of $107,300.

John R. Watts, chairman of the council, announced at the State House that the council's support of these programs has amounted to $60,000 with the balance being matched by local arts organizations, business and civic groups.

These programs included eight symphony orchestra concerts for children from New Bedford to North Adams, 80 chamber music concerts in elementary schools for more than 30,000 pupils, a regional arts festival for Berkshire County, and reducted ticket prices for professional theater production for members of social agencies and educational institutions.

In addition, the council is currently providing partial support for professional workshops in the visual arts and theater for high school students, a traveling summer "jazz wagon," a concert of Haydn's "The Creation," a project in grassroots theater and 12 neighborhood arts councils for the Boston Summer Neighborhood Arts Festival.

The funds voted by the Legislature include $30,000 in the Governor's deficiency budget and $100,000 for the next fiscal year.

In addition to these funds for state sources, Mr. Watts said that the council has applied for a $50,000 federal matching grant for the fiscal year beginning July 1. If Congress approves the appropriation for the National Endowment for the Arts, the Massachusetts Council plans to use these funds in the following areas:—

The Springfield Theater Company, Stage-West, will provide a program of high school matinees to schools in Western Massachusetts, particularly in the Springfield, Holyoke, and Chicopee areas. It is estimated that 18,000 high school students will be served.

The council also plans to make these federal funds available, on a matching basis, to regional and community arts festivals that wish to improve the quality and variety of their programs with professional attractions formerly unavailable because of prohibitive costs to the community.

In addition, the council will work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to bring children from culturally and economically disadvantaged areas to the Berkshire Music Center for a day of experience with the arts at Tanglewood. One of the loveliest sites in Massachusetts and the center of a world - famous music festival, Tanglewood has been literally and figuratively out of reach to many children who might benefit greatly by exposure to the music and the setting.

The orchestra assistance project begun this spring resulted from a study the council made last year of symphony orchestras in Massachusetts. This study reported that "the citizens of the commonwealth are relatively well served with. . symphony orchestra concerts. . .The areas of great weakness. . . are those involved with young people." There has been an appalling lack of children's concerts by all of the orchestras in the commonwealth. In 1967, a total of only 32 such concerts was provided by all the orchestras in the state.

The orchestra assistance project encourages civic and regional orchestras to provide additional services, primarily in the form of concerts for children, and to expand their programs for their communities. Council funds for these concerts were matched, on a dollar - for - dollar basis, by the orchestras, schools, or civic associations. More than 15,000 children attended the concerts this spring.

The participating orchestras were the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Brockton Symphony Orchestra, the New Bedford Symphony Orchestra, the Pioneer Valley Symphony, the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, and the Worcester Symphony Orchestra.

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 98,600
JUN 25 1968 New England Newsclip

134.

Trips Planned For Residents

The United Neighborhood Council will take a trip to Rocky Point on Wednesday, July 10. It is the second of a series of trips made possible by a $10,000 grant to the council by the Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts.

Fourteen buses will be available to transport 700 adults and children. The buses will leave from seven neighborhood centers including Harbor Terrace, Hillside Manor, Sunset Hill, Columbia, Bedford, Flint and Rodman-Tecumseh areas.

The buses will arrive at each center at 8 a.m. and depart at 9 a.m. At the park, following lunch, an unlimited rides policy will exist on the majority of amusements in the afternoon. Buses will leave for Fall River at 4 p.m.

On the first of the series of trips, some 38 children will bus to Tanglewood, where they will be guests of Massachusetts to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A trip to the Museum of Science in Boston is scheduled for Wednesday, Aug. 7, for 700 children. Tentative plans include a trip to Fenway Park in August for some 700 children.

The neighborhood council is sponsored by Citizens for Citizens, Inc.

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 40,200

JUL 5 1968 New England Newsclip

First Federal Is Offering Bus Trips To Three Cultural Events

Three bus trips to points of cultural interest are in the planning stage at the First Federal Savings of East Hartford. The trips are planned for different days of the week and at different times of day, in order to make at least one of them possible for everyone. With outdoor eating facilities available in all three places, it is planned to use picnic meals, with each person responsible for his own, either individually or in group planning.

The tentative plans are as follows:

Thursday, July 11: An evening performance of "As You Like It" at the Shakespeare Theatre in Stratford, leaving East Hartford at 5. The cost of the trip, including transportation and admission to the theatre, will be $7

Sunday, July 21: An after noon performance by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Erich Leinsdorf is the conductor and Grant Johannesen the piano soloist. The group will leave East Hartford at 10. The cost of the trip will be $9.

Wednesday, July 31: A matinee performance of "Allegro" by Rodgers and Hammerstein at the Goodspeed Opera House in Haddam. This will be prededed by a visit to the picturesque Gillette Castle which is nearby. The bus will leave East Hartford at 10. The cost is $7.

Further information about these trips and reservation blanks may be obtained at the First Federal Savings of East Hartford or at any of its branches. Since reserved seat tickets for the performances must be ordered well in advance, it is essential that reservations be made promptly. Applications will be accepted in the order of their receipt when accompanied by payment. Checks should be made payable to community services - First Federal Savings. They may be mailed to Miss Doris Rayner at the bank, located at 1137 Main St., or left with the receptionist at the bank or its branch offices.

THE INQUIRER
SO. WINDSOR, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,700

JUN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Some Trip Spots Open

A few places are still available for the trip to the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, scheduled for Sunday, July 21. This is one of the popular trips sponsored by the First Federal Savings of East Hartford as part of its Community Services activities.

The cost of the trip, including admission to the afternoon performance by Boston Symphony Orchestra, is $9.00. Further information and details may be obtained by calling the bank - Tel: 289-6401. It is important that reservations be made promptly.

GAZETTE
EAST HARTFORD, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6,350

JUL 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood trip

The annual trip to Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been set for Sunday, Aug. 18 by the YWCA of greater Rhode Island. A chartered air-conditioned bus will leave the Providence building, 54 Jackson St. at 9 a.m.

Tanglewood is located in the Berkshires at Lenox, Mass. The group will have luncheon on the festival grounds, picnic if they wish to bring their own, and will stop in Lee for dinner following the concert. The Beethoven program, to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, is scheduled for 2:30 p.m.

Mrs. Dorothy Lunney is the YWCA director of trips and tours and may be reached at the Providence building, 861-2910. A brochure will be mailed upon request.

ITEM (e)
CLINTON, MASS.
CIRC. 3,666

AUG 20 1968 New England Newsclip

VISITOR
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
WEEKLY CIRC. 60,300

JUL 26 1968 New England Newsclip

YWCA Slates Tanglewood Trip

Sunday, Aug. 18, has been set for the annual trip to Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The air-conditioned, chartered bus will leave the Providence building of the YWCA of Greater Rhode Island, 54 Jackson Street, at 9 a.m.

The Beethoven program, scheduled for 2:30 p.m., will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Tanglewood is located in the Berkshires at Lenox, Massachusetts. The group will have luncheon on the festival grounds (picnic if they wish to bring their own) and will stop in Lee for dinner following the concert.

Mrs. Dorothy Lunney is the YWCA director of trips and tours and may be reached at the YWCA, 861-2910. A brochure will be mailed upon request.

'Trips And Tours' Plan To Attend Music Festival

The Trips and Tours Club of the YWCA will sponsor a trip to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. August 18 to hear the Boston Symphony under the direction of Eerich Leinsdorf.

The bus chartered for the trip will leave the YWCA parking lot at 9:30 a.m. and should arrive at Tanglewood in time for a snack at the Cafeteria, or one may bring a box lunch to be enjoyed on the spacious grounds.

A tour of the grounds may be made before the performance at 2:30 p.m. After the performance the group will stop for dinner on the way home.

Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on a beautiful 200-acre estate. Hawthorne Cottage is on the Tanglewood grounds. Here Hawthorne wrote and collected material for Tanglewood Tales. It was destroyed by fire in 1891 and rebuilt in 1948.

Miss Marguerite W. Bedigie, advisor, announces that payments for reservations must be made by July 15, 1968.

At the present time the capacity of the bus is complete. However, inasmuch as there usually are cancellations for emergencies, names of those interested will be placed on a waiting list for future reference. YW membership is required.

For further information, please call the YWCA office or he advisor.

JOURNAL (e)
MERIDEN, CONN.
CIRC. 9,450

JUL 15 1968 New England Newsclip

RECORD (M)
MERIDEN, CONN.
CIRC. 20,400

JUL 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Treat For Rotary Ladies

A treat is in store for the honored guests in the observance of the annual Clinton Rotary Club "Ladies Night" when the ladies will be treated to an evening at the Pops Concert at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

At 4:30 this afternoon, 40 Rotarians, their wives and friends, left Clinton for Tanglewood where they wil enjoy Arthur Fiedler and his Pops Orchestra from front row seats. Peter Nero, renowned pianist, will be the featured solo artist.

A "picnic on wheels" was another event planned for the ladies while enroute to Tanglewood.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250

JUN 23 1968 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

JUL 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Summer Roundup Of Rail Excursions

By ROBERT MEYER Jr.

WHATEVER else is happening in the realm of railroad passenger service, the annual revival of summertime excursions renews hope among some rail enthusiasts that at least a few carriers will continue to provide room on their tracks for something other than freight.

Some notable examples of excursion trips are offered by the New Haven Railroad, the Penn Central Railroad and the Long Island Rail Road, all of which operate out of New York.

The New Haven is promoting one-, two- and three-day tours of southern New England. Among these is a one-day trip to Old Sturbridge Village, Mass., for $9.50 for adults and $6.50 for children. The package covers transportation and admission to the grounds of the re-created Colonial settlement.

Four Sundays

Trips to Old Sturbridge Village are scheduled on four Sundays—July 14, Aug. 18, Sept. 15 and Oct. 13—but a minimum of 25 persons is required. Upon special request, the New Haven will operate the tour on any other Sunday for 25 or more persons.

From now through Sept. 8, the New Haven will offer daily rail-steamer cruises from New York to Block Island, R.I., charging $8.65 for adults and $4.35 for children. The schedule allows two hours for sightseeing on Block Island and a two-and-one-quarter-hour ride by steamer each way between New London, Conn., and the island.

Since the American Shakespeare Theater in Stratford, Conn., is on the route of the New Haven, the carrier is offering reduced coach fares good any day from now through Sept. 15. One- or two-day round-trip tickets cost $3.67.

Tanglewood Festival

Eight Sunday trips to the Berkshire Music Festival between July 7 and Aug. 25 are also offered by the New Haven. The $8.95 package covers rail and bus transportation from New York to Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., and general admission to the afternoon concert. The price for children between 5 and 12 is $6.50.

Transportation is free for children under 5, but a general admission ticket is required. The carrier insists that tour tickets be purchased in advance.

The Penn Central is offering one-third off its regular fares for one- or two-day, round-trip tickets to Philadelphia, Wilmington, Del., Baltimore and Washington. These weekend excursion fares from New York are $5.75 to Philadelphia, $7.25 to Wilmington, $11.70 to Baltimore and $14.20 to Washington. Children between 5 and 11 travel at half fare.

On the Labor Day weekend, the excursion tickets will be valid for an extra day, with return permitted on Sept. 2.

Mystic Seaport

The preserved New England seafaring community of Mystic Seaport in Mystic, Conn., is the destination of excursions offered by both the New Haven and the Long Island Rail Road. The New Haven has scheduled one-day round trips every Saturday and Sunday between now and Oct. 13 at $4.65 for adults and half fare for children.

Reduced admission to Mystic Seaport — $2 for adults and 75 cents for children — can be obtained by presenting the return portion of the New Haven excursion ticket.

The Long Island's Mystic Seaport tour uses a train, a bus and a boat. The train leaves Pennsylvania Station at 8:44 A.M. and arrives in Greenport, L.I., two hours and 50 minutes later. The bus takes passengers to Orient Point, L.I., to connect with regular ferry service to New London. From there, another bus completes the trip to Mystic. Arrival back at Pennsylvania Station is scheduled for 11:05 P.M.

Admission Included

The cost of the 350-mile excursion is $10.50 for adults and $6 for children 5 to 11. Admission to Mystic Seaport is included in the tour price. Trips are scheduled for next Sunday, July 7, 21, 28, Aug. 11, 18 and Sept. 1.

Additional information on these and other excursions offered by the New Haven and Long Island can be obtained by calling the Tour Departments of the railroads at Grand Central Terminal and Jamaica (Queens), respectively. The numbers are MU 6-5960 for the New Haven and JA 6-0900 (Ext. 498) for the Long Island.

135

"A DAY IN THE ARTS"

40 Boston Youngsters Guests of Symphony at Tanglewood

Forty city boys and girls from Shawmut Neighborhood Center spent a day in the country recently, as guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its estate of Tanglewood at Lenox, in the Berkshire Hills.

After a ride by chartered bus, furnished by the Massachusetts Commission on Arts and Humanities they attended a rehearsal in the Theater-Music Hall, by the crack student orchestra, conducted by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Box lunches were served in the open-air restaurant.

Then, in tow of Tanglewood guides, the youngsters had a chance to have students at the Berkshire Music Center show them the operating principles of several instruments. Later they enjoyed an hour's swimming session in Lake Makheenac.

Boston Globe Sunday 8/4/68

Hub Children Tour Tanglewood

HOW TO HOLD a flute is demonstrated to Steven Alvarez by Kathy Bauer of B.U. Youth Orchestra.

By VIOLA OSGOOD

A big bus rolled up in front of the Shawmut Neighborhood Center one night last week and 43 dirty, tired, happy youngsters poured out.

The children had spent the day touring Tanglewood, Summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The "Day in the Arts" tour was one of 23 trips sponsored by a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities.

The bus left South End Settlement House early in the morning, arrived at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. three hours later.

The children, in four groups, were placed under the care of Tanglewood guides. Supervisors, who had come with them from Boston, tagged along.

The name-tagged children were shown into the Theater Concert Hall to hear the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra rehearse.

Afterwards they tromped off across the carpet-thick lawns of the 210-acre estate to the West Barn, to hear the Boston University Youth Symphony Orchestra rehearsing.

Listening to music, while surrounded by nature may help give music more meaning than listening to a concert in Symphony Hall.

Steven Alvarez, a little boy from Shawmut av., South End, said: "I came to learn and to see them blow instruments. I went to a concert in Boston, but I like it better here. I like the woods."

During the rehearsals, they were as quiet as could be expected of a group of children aged 8-14.

They had been instructed by John Immerwahr, one of the Tanglewood guides, to be very, very quiet.

"Remember," he told the children, "if you can hear them, that means they can hear you."

After box lunches, the children relaxed on the lawn, where they heard demonstrations on how to play the tuba, the violin, and the trumpet. In the Music Shed, Dan Hathaway, a staff member, gave an organ demonstration. The children then piled into the bus and were driven to Lake Mahkeenac for swimming.

After supper at one of the schools the Berkshire Music Center rents for the Summer, the children made the trip back to Boston.

135.

"A DAY IN THE ARTS"

40 Boston Youngsters Guests of Symphony at Tanglewood

Forty city boys and girls from Shawmut Neighborhood Center spent a day in the country recently, as guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its estate of Tanglewood at Lenox, in the Berkshire Hills.

After a ride by chartered bus, furnished by the Massachusetts Commission on Arts and Humanities they attended a rehearsal in the Theater-Music Hall, by the crack student orchestra, conducted by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Box lunches were served in the open-air restaurant.

Then, in tow of Tanglewood guides, the youngsters had a chance to have students at the Berkshire Music Center show them the operating principles of several instruments. Later they enjoyed an hour's swimming session in Lake Makheenac.

Boston Globe Sunday 8/4/68

Hub Children Tour Tanglewood

HOW TO HOLD a flute is demonstrated to Steven Alvarez by Kathy Bauer of B.U. Youth Orchestra.

By VIOLA OSGOOD

A big bus rolled up in front of the Shawmut Neighborhood Center one night last week and 43 dirty, tired, happy youngsters poured out.

The children had spent the day touring Tanglewood, Summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The "Day in the Arts" tour was one of 23 trips sponsored by a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities.

The bus left South End Settlement House early in the morning, arrived at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. three hours later.

The children, in four groups, were placed under the care of Tanglewood guides. Supervisors, who had come with them from Boston, tagged along.

The name-tagged children were shown into the Theater Concert Hall to hear the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra rehearse.

Afterwards they tromped off across the carpet-thick lawns of the 210-acre estate to the West Barn, to hear the Boston University Youth Symphony Orchestra rehearsing.

Listening to music, while surrounded by nature may help give music more meaning than listening to a concert in Symphony Hall.

Steven Alvarez, a little boy from Shawmut av., South End, said: "I came to learn and to see them blow instruments. I went to a concert in Boston, but I like it better here. I like the woods."

During the rehearsal, they were as quiet as could be expected of a group of children aged 8-14.

They had been instructed by John Immerwahr, one of the Tanglewood guides, to be very, very quiet.

"Remember," he told the children, "if you can hear them, that means they can hear you."

After box lunches, the children relaxed on the lawn, where they heard demonstrations on how to play the tuba, the violin, and the trumpet. In the Music Shed, Dan Hathaway, a staff member, gave an organ demonstration. The children then piled into the bus and were driven to Lake Mahkeenac for swimming.

After supper at one of the schools the Berkshire Music Center rents for the Summer, the children made the trip back to Boston.

136.

BERK. WK.
AUG 3-11

At top of page, visitors are shown at a Tanglewood rehearsal, after which (center photo) concertmaster Joseph Silverstein took time out to explain the violin. Later, on the lawn, a Berkshire Music Center voice student gave an impromptu concert.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 3 1968 New England Newsclip

20 Town Children Visit Tanglewood

ADAMS — Twenty Adams children visited Tanglewood today as part of the Northern Berkshire Community Action summer program.

Also on the day-long trip were about 20 youngsters from North Adams. They left about 9:15 this morning and will return this evening about 7:30.

During the tour of the music center in Lenox, they heard an informal concert. One group of children made a side trip to nearby Shaker Village in Hancock. The children also visited Stockbridge Bowl.

A chance to try it themselves made quite a hit with some of Tanglewood's visitors.

Photos by Joel Librizzi

One girl took a turn at conducting, while her colleagues observed.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,239

AUG 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Notes and Footnotes

TOP BILLING: Ted Shawn, founder-director of Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, announces turnpike toll booth and her Dad forked over the money, she piped up, "I'll have a hot dog and a Coke." . . . Interim reports at the Tanglewood press office have it that the new program this year of bringing culturally deprived children Tuesdays through Fridays for a tour of the Music Festival setup is pretty successful. The youngsters age 6 to 12 come by bus from as far as Boston, divide into small groups and are conducted all around. They sit in with music students and with orchestra members, eat a free cafeterial lunch, and swim at the orchestra's beach. The youngsters love it. One busload of about 40 comes daily, the kids being picked by boys' clubs, camps, neighborhood councils, and similar organizations in their home towns . . . If you hear crickets chirping, which we did the other day, doesn't it mean six weeks to the first frost? . . . Mr. Lawrence Grizey Sr. wants [illegible] thank the Pittsfield police [illegible] and Civil Defen[illegible]

Youngsters gather around Berkshire Music Center bass player to see how it's done.

a special day

A chartered bus pulls into Tanglewood most weekday mornings this summer and pills out 40 lively youngsters from urban reas of Massachusetts. For that day, ur Tanglewood guides, various students m the Berkshire Music Center, musicians from the Boston Symphony and the facilities of Tanglewood are theirs.

The "Day in the Arts" program, new at Tanglewood this year, is a project supported by a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities and administered by the BSO staff. It is designed to expose children to the arts in a natural setting, children who would otherwise be unlikely to have the opportunity.

The relationship of music to the listener is emphasized, and Music Center students frequently volunteer to let the visitors try out a bassoon, oboe or bass. Members of the BSO are also participating on a volunteer basis.

Swimming at Stockbridge Bowl breaks up the schedule of rehearsals and musical demonstrations. A side trip to High Lawn Farm, the Berkshire Garden Center, Pleasant Valley Sanctuary or Hancock Shaker Village, dinner and a bus ride home round out the day.

So far, more than 500 youngsters have made the excursion to Lenox from a dozen cities, including Fall River, Worcester, Lowell, New Bedford, Pittsfield, North Adams and Springfield. By the end of the summer, the total will pass the 1,200 mark and include a half dozen busloads from Boston.

The program costs $15 a child, and the children range in age from 8 to 18, with the majority in the 8 to 12-year-old bracket.

Sometimes the group begins to squirm when it reaches its second rehearsal of the day. Sometimes classical music threatens to be too much for the youngsters. Then Tanglewood demonstrates its increasing flexibility by bringing on a violinist who also plays guitar.

Both Tanglewood and its new visitors seem to be enjoying the program.

Swim at Stockbridge Bowl and visit to High Lawn Farm were highlights of the Springfield group's day.

137.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 6 1968 New England Newsclip

North Berkshire Weekly

Counting the Smiles

By Richard N. LeGrand

ADAMS.

TANGLEWOOD is only about 30 miles away from Adams, but until this past Wednesday it might just as well have been 300 miles away as far as a lot of youngsters here were concerned.

They had never had a way to get there, and no one to introduce them to the delights of classical and semi-classical music if they did. Now things have changed.

The Tanglewood trip was one of the first offerings of the Berkshire County Community Action Council's summer program. It was handled by the North Adams unit, the same group that has rented an apartment at 173 Columbia St. and with the help of the Adams Council for Action has transformed it into a neighborhood center—a center that is proving to be quite a help to the people in the Renfrew section.

* * *

WHO'S DOING the helping? It's people like Mrs. Joy Anne Dewey of Williamstown, a professional dance teacher who comes here every afternoon to give about 35 children in the Renfrew neighborhood a chance to look at their own world and express it in a new way. Helping her are Deborah Schneer, Marta Renzi and Linda Talarico.

And there is Prof. and Mrs. Lawrence Frank of Williams College. Both give individual tutoring lessons. So does Mrs. William Iacuessa of 14 Crandall St.

Mrs. Charles Louison and Mrs. Jean Lepine, who both live on Columbia Street, are the Commonwealth Service Corps workers who help out in numberless ways, especially in running the neighborhood center.

Mrs. Helen Johnson, employed by the Berkshire County Extension Service, gives sewing classes for about eight women every Monday. Beginning next week she is going to start another class for girls.

As close to the children as anyone are the VISTA volunteers who work at the center. There are 10 in North Berkshire, with Margaret Dickinson of North Adams and Nancy Charron and Barbara Bassett, both of Adams, usually serving in Adams. Ann Pytko, also of Adams, teaches arts and crafts both here and in North Adams.

* * *

THERE ARE several others who have done a lot to help, but more volunteers are needed. The efforts they put in are transforming the Renfrew neighborhood into a place where fewer kids are growing up with chips on their shoulders.

It almost always clicks when a kid feels someone cares. And if he knows someone cares enough to give him an even break it's going to change his attitude toward Adams. He won't grow up feeling he is locked into a town that ignores its troubles. Hopefully he won't want to desert it the first chance he gets. The kids that get help now may stick around to help other people, to help clean things up and make things better.

And the people who are working toward that goal are starting at the beginning. They are starting to teach opportunity rather than frustration, and they are beginning with the children.

* * *

BUT HOW do you measure that kind of progress? You can't do it with numbers. Hope doesn't have any ceiling and there isn't any bottom to frustration and despair. There's no scale to measure pain and happiness, nor is there any limit to the number of things a child can learn.

On second thought, maybe you can do it with numbers. You have to count smiles and tears. When you find a lot more smiles around Adams than you did a few years ago, and a lot fewer tears, that's progress.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JUL 3 1968 New England Newsclip

BCAC Sponsors Free Bus Trip To Tanglewood

The Berkshire Community Action Council today sponsored the first of three bus trips to Tanglewood in Lenox for children from low-income families.

Making the trip today were children from the Adams-North Adams area, under the direction of Northern Berkshire Community Action. Similar trips are scheduled July 26 for youth from Pittsfield and Aug. 1 from South Berkshire.

Participants range from 8 to 18 years old. Today's group attended a rehearsal at Tanglewood. They were scheduled to have a hot lunch at the Tanglewood grounds and a picnic later.

Time permitting, side trips were planned to the Pleasant Valley Bird Sanctuary in Lenox or the Shaker Museum in Hancock.

138.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
AUG 25 1968
New England Newsclip

Telegram Photos by RICHARD R. THIBODEAU

"A Day in the Arts" included Diane Legere's chat with cellist Martin Hoherman during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's coffee break and two hours of swimming and games at the Tanglewood waterfront.

City Youngsters Visit Tanglewood

Watching Aaron Copland at work in his shirt sleeves seemed to increase the speed at which gum was chewed for at least one of the 32 Main South youngsters who spent "A Day in the Arts" at Tanglewood last week.

Promptly at 8:30 a.m. Thursday driver Tom O'Connor pulled out of the Maywood Street yard of Clark University with 3 girls, 29 boys, and five adults aboard his bus headed for Tanglewood, the internationally famous music center in the Berkshires.

The Worcester younsters, who signed up for the trip through the Main South Neighborhood Center, were the next to the last group of city children taken to Tanglewood for "A Day in the Arts" under the sponsorship of the Massachusetts Council for the Arts and Humanities. The program closed Friday and the Tanglewood season ends today.

On their arrival in Lenox, home of Tanglewood, the Worcester boys and girls, mostly 9 or 10 years old, were met by guides, who escorted them through a variety of activities and sightseeing.

Dianne Wimberly of Cochran, Ga. took one group of eight youngsters (the three girls on the trip decided to stick together), accompanied by Edna Campaniello of the Main South Neighborhood Center staff.

The group set off across the Tanlewood grounds for the West Barn where the Young Artists orchestra (Boston University students) was rehearsing. After listening to the conductor give instructions and hearing the results, one of the visiting youngsters asked: "Can't they even make one little mistake?"

When the group began to show signs of restlessness Miss Wimberly took them to the lawn outside the Tanglewood music shed where musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra were having their coffee break.

Explains Cello

Symphony cellist Martin Hoherman took time from his break to explain the cello — "it's made of spruce and the wood must be at least 40 years old"—and its music.

When the musicians were recalled to the stage to resume rehearsing under Copland's baton, Miss Wimberly guided her group into front row seats in the huge shed. (That's where the sound made by the drums and brass startled the gum chewer to a furious pace.)

At noontime, the four groups of Worcester boys and girls were reunited for a picnic under the trees, after which the other guides took the visitors to the Tanglewood beach on the Stockbridge Bowl. The lifeguard who has charge of the boats and paddleboards became more of a hero that Aaron Copland had seemed to be.

Visist Wildlife Sanctuary

After more than two hours in the sun, sand, and water the boys and girls regrouped for another look at orchestra rehearsals. The next activity was a visit to the Berkshire Wildlife Sancturary, where curators allowed the youngsters to touch some of the animals, including snakes for the braver boys.

Then it was a stop at a nearby school, the summer residence for Tanglewood students, where a hot supper was served, and home again.

MARILYN W. SPEAR

David Turney wonders, "Does an olive sing or does an olive dance?"

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
JUL 4 1968
New England Newsclip

Cultural Life in the Bay State

A civic leader quoted in the recent first annual report of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities states that "What is most needed is overcoming the ethnic and sociological barriers which create the feeling that the arts are for the elite".

His point is unassailable and one this newspaper has made before in commenting editorially on the bitter irony in the fact that most of Boston's "underclass" lives within a stone's throw of its most renowned cultural institutions — Symphony Hall and the Museum of Fine Arts — but that through a devilish conspiracy of economic deprivation, miseducation and social snobbery — the two are rarely brought together.

We have also commented that Boston's reputation as the Athens of America is at present largely a public relations man's dream and that many other cities and states have, with less artistic talent perhaps, but with much more imagination and commitment, done wonders in bringing the arts and the people together.

Last year's budget for the new state Council on the Arts and Humanities, although miniscule, did fund a statewide census of cultural resources. The budget for next year's Council operation, much larger but still too small, was recently approved by the legislature and will be used in part to provide more children's concerts, to bring poor children to Tanglewood for Boston Symphony summer concerts and will be tied in with the City of Boston's "Summerthing" satellite programs in the neighborhoods.

Bringing the attractions to the neighborhoods is a welcome new departure, tailored as the programs are to local interests and ethnic cultures, in themselves a precious resource in the city and state which could use a lot of help. The Black community of Boston, under the inspired and imaginative leadership of Miss Elma Lewis, didn't wait for City Hall or the state and is about to begin its second season in Franklin Park, which will include a concert conducted by Arthur Fiedler, Duke Ellington's Orchestra, Olatunji's African music, ballet, theatre, etc., illustrating the range of interests and talents in just this one area of the city.

Our cultural development must, however, be centrifugal and centripetal. Museums, orchestras, theatre groups and ethnic cultural activity must be encouraged all over the state. Some areas are genuine cultural deserts, like Southeastern Massachusetts. Yet, why should this be so with a potential center in the burgeoning Southeastern Mass. Technological Institute in Dartmouth, with its striking architecture already internationally renowned? And, lastly, now is the time to seriously rethink the Boston Arts Festival, programmatically and financially. Neighborhood and regional programs are fine, but Boston is the "Hub" and deserves to be the magnet drawing all of us together, with all our disparate regional and ethnic involvements, to enjoy the great artistic achievements of our time.

FIDELITY
SICAL AMERICA
REAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
ONTHLY 130,000
JUL 1968

139.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16,000
OCT 1968

By Herbert Russcol

Music festivals may have been around for thousands of years—but never before have so many traveled so far to hear so much so similar to what they have at home

HERE WE GO AGAIN . . . summertime, and the livin' is easy. For performers the new three Bs of music are here once more—Bed, Board, and Bookings—and for the customers, Benches and Backache. (A colleague of mine, after suffering the hazards of folding seats in Vermont and stone slabs in Greece, has now overcome with a safari-type inflatable cushion from Abercrombie and Fitch; he straps it to his luggage May through September.) Apparently, festivalgoers never give up hope that music will sound better elsewhere.

Danes have deserted their priceless Royal Ballet and Opera—and all that food—to sit with sweat pouring down their faces on a sticky Roman evening as they listen al fresco to the sputtering roar of Vespas and vile Verdi. New Yorkers, who during the winter enjoy music played with excellence on every instrument and electronic machine as yet devised by man, wait for hours at air terminals and meekly accept partitioned rooms and hostile service for the unspeakable bliss of being able to hear, in the atrium of the Rector's Palace in Dubrovnik, the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto.

Here at home, the festival idea has revolutionized musical life. It's getting hard to remember that a scant twenty years ago the "concert music season" closed down in April, to wake up again only in October. Of course some big cities had summer concert series (mostly pops programs intended to provide another few weeks' employment for their symphony orchestras), and there was the Bach Festival in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and Koussevitzky's Berkshire Festival in Massachusetts—already a beacon shining from the hills. But the idea of giving symphonic concerts in the middle of nowhere and expecting large crowds to get a road map and follow you out there

A former member of the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Boston Pops, and other orchestras, Mr. Russcol has attended music festivals here and abroad as both French horn player and tourist. He first appeared in these pages last April with Liszt as Lover.

The Festival Fad

Festivals

Don Schlitten

wport

The Washington Post

Jazzmobile in New York

Krenek at Dartmouth

Diana J. Davies

Seeger at Newport Folk

...tler at Tanglewood

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16,000
OCT 1968

Washington Post

Festivals

Don Schlitten

Jazzmobile in New York

Schuller at Tanglewood

Krenek at Dartmouth

Diana J. Davies

Seeger at Newport Folk

was hardly conceived some thirty years back. Today it seems that nary a promising barn has been left unconverted to a rehearsal shed.

This season more than a hundred American festivals have been scheduled, and more than twice that number have been announced in Europe. For the professional musician the benefits of all this summer activity are obvious: the orchestral player need no longer start scrounging off his in-laws every April; a middle-rank soloist—if he has the stamina of a bull and is willing to jet continuously from Ann Arbor to Gstaad and back to Jackson Hole, Wyoming—can eat regularly until October. And an unflinching music lover, provided he too has a healthy stomach as well as a large supply of traveler's checks, can hear musical goings-on in a different place every day for a good three months.

The big boom in festivals began with the end of World War II. In this country more money, longer vacations, increased mobility (especially the proliferation of air travel) all intensified the eagerness of people to go places. At the same time the old countries were broke and hungry for tourist dollars as never before. The long-playing record also helped the festival business enormously, spawning a new generation of musically knowledgeable, culturally sophisticated young listeners who wanted to hear at first hand the baroque and Lieder and modern music they knew from records, and to see the Fischer-Dieskaus, and Oistrakhs, and Karajans who performed it. These New Romans invaded the Continent armed with ex-GI boots and Europe on Five Dollars a Day, their dream of heaven a walk-up pensione in Florence, near the Ponte Vecchio, where they could prowl the Uffizi Gallery and later hear Monteverdi madrigals in the Boboli Gardens. A short bus ride and they were in Venice, the jewel of them all, and shaken by the beauty of the bijou Teatro La Fenice or by Otello in the courtyard of the Doge's Palace.

Both at home and abroad, there is an informal camaraderie in summer music making which does not obtain at sober winter concerts. At Daytona Beach that young fellow sunning himself near you might be Vladimir Ashkenazy—or is it André Previn? At the Holland Festival, Richter sits down next to you at the hotel bar and gloomily orders a beer in German. At Edinburgh, Fischer-Dieskau is seen eating yogurt at the Lyons Corner House, with a sport shirt hanging out over his slacks; you wave at him and he waves back. We're all music-loving pals. You order a yogurt too.

For some, the Gemütlichkeit has its drawbacks. The famous virtuoso is in a continuous state of being interviewed, and is besieged at close quarters by amateur photographers and autograph hounds. Sir Thomas Beecham, for one, loathed festivals; the old curmudgeon complained that the hotels were overcrowded, that he kept meeting colleagues he preferred to avoid, and that when he finally fell asleep at eight in the morning, after tossing for hours on a lumpy mattress, the local Singverein started rehearsing that night's program in the courtyard below.

But for the festivalgoer this is all part of the fun, and so is getting there. It's one thing to take the IRT up to Lincoln Center, another to rent an Austin in London and drive for five hours in an English thunderstorm looking for a stately home called Ingestre Hall where a Purcell festival is taking place; and then, shivering and wretched, to be ushered into a tiny, dreamlike wood-paneled music room where Henry Purcell himself staged masques with the Duke's family. Or going to London's Moss Brothers' at nine in the morning to rent full-dress evening wear for a concert at Glyndebourne. They won't let you onto the grounds without it, and you catch the afternoon train dressed in your finery and feeling like a perfect fool, until you see that the whole car is in tails. Or arriving at Aix, the ancient capital of Provence, when the sun bakes the town the color of bread crust, and in the evening you can hear a superb torchlit Don Giovanni in the courtyard of the Archbishop's Palace.

ACTUALLY, MUSIC FESTIVALS have had a long, and mainly honorable, history since the day when King Solomon's Temple was raised to the bleating of rams' horns and the sounding of cymbals. In Wales the Celtic Bards held yearly Eisteddfods as early as the seventh century. When King Wenzel II of Bohemia dedicated the great church at Eger, in 1285, all the Minnesänger who were not working other dates showed up. In the Middle Ages the Sängerkriege on the Wartburg were famous events, and provided Wagner with material for Tannhäuser.

To go back only to fairly recent times—1724, for instance, was a great year for music festivals. The Emperor Charles VI was crowned King of Bohemia and he threw a celebration in the city of Prague. The gala programs—including a festival opera, Constanza e Fortezza by Fux, as well as oratorios, symphonies, and chamber music—attracted artists from all over Europe; and one rich noble, carried away with it all, decided then and there to found a permanent opera house for Prague. The same year saw the first Three Choirs Festival in England (Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester), which thrives to this day and is the granddaddy of them all though the festival movement really took off after Felix Mendelssohn conducted his St. Paul Oratorio in Birmingham in 1837 and his Elijah in 1846.

In America the festival fad also took hold early. As far back as 1829 a two-day Music Convention was held in Concord, New Hampshire. For many years Boston was the hub of festival concerts, and purists who deplore some of today's musical threering extravaganzas might consider the Peace Jubilee held in that city in 1869. This was organized by a fascinating operator, Patrick Gilmore (the band leader celebrated in The Music Man's hit number, Seventy-Six Trombones), together with Carl Zerrahn, conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society (founded in 1815, the offspring of another ad hoc music festival organized to celebrate the end of the War of 1812). A building large enough to seat 30,000 people was erected, the orchestra numbered 1,000, and the chorus 10,000. John Knowles Paine and Dudley Buck conducted works of their own, and Ole Bull and Carl Rosa played in the orchestra. The Jubilee cost $283,000, but managed to show a profit of $10,000 even after Gilmore's fees. Two years later Boston engaged Gilmore for another Jubilee. This time that impresario really thought big. His hall seated 50,000; the chorus, presumably [illegible]

By most music lovers today Bayreuth [illegible] sidered the doyen of modern festivals. [illegible] youthful Richard Wagner first saw this old [illegible] town, in 1835, he is reported to have e[illegible] "Ten horses couldn't pull me away fro[illegible] Thirty-five years later he returned, to esta[illegible] Wagner Festspielhaus. Among the celeb[illegible] tending the opening of the first Bayreuth [illegible] in 1876, was Tchaikovsky, who wrote hom[illegible] description of the proceedings: "I watc[illegible] arrival of Kaiser Wilhelm from a windo[illegible] neighboring house. Then came into view a [illegible] of brilliant uniforms, then the instrumentalis[illegible] the Wagner Theatre, with the conductor Har[illegible] ter at their head, and then the tall figure ar[illegible] known features of the Abbé Liszt, and finall[illegible] fashionable carriage, a little man with an a[illegible] nose and thin derisive lips—Richard Wagne[illegible] that same night the "little man" said to h[illegible] Cosima, "Every stone is red with your bloo[illegible] nine."

For nearly a century now, except when the [illegible] ungen were carrying out their wars in other th[illegible] Bayreuth has continued to function. The town [illegible] with tradition and lore; the huge sardonic sp[illegible] Wagner seems to hover everywhere. Silent rev[illegible] is the prescribed mood, and until recently ap[illegible] was forbidden in Parsifal. Motor cars are fr[illegible] upon on the road that leads from the Villa Wahn[illegible] the master's old home, onto the Bayreuth s[illegible] The whole place was designed by Richard W[illegible] architect. Though the chairs with armless seats [illegible] no known contour of the human form, som[illegible] perts are convinced that the Festspielhaus has [illegible] acoustics than any other opera house in the wo[illegible] despite the fact that the hall is said to defy [illegible] technical law of construction. Its ceiling is ca[illegible] much of the walls are wooden, and the p[illegible] mounted on the side walls are hollow.

Since Wagner's grandsons Wieland [illegible]

139.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16,000
OCT 1968

Dollars a Day: their dream of heaven a walk-up pensione in Florence, near the Ponte Vecchio, where they could prowl the Uffizi Gallery and later hear Monteverdi madrigals in the Boboli Gardens. A short bus ride and they were in Venice, the jewel of them all, and shaken by the beauty of the bijou Teatro La Fenice or by Otello in the courtyard of the Doge's Palace.

Both at home and abroad, there is an informal camaraderie in summer music making which does not obtain at sober winter concerts. At Daytona Beach that young fellow sunning himself near you might be Vladimir Ashkenazy—or is it André Previn? At the Holland Festival, Richter sits down next to you at the hotel bar and gloomily orders a beer in German. At Edinburgh, Fischer-Dieskau is seen eating yogurt at the Lyons Corner House, with a shirt hanging out over his slacks; you wave [illegible] provided Wagner with material for Tannhäuser.

To go back only to fairly recent times—1724, for instance, was a great year for music festivals. The Emperor Charles VI was crowned King of Bohemia and he threw a celebration in the city of Prague. The gala programs—including a festival opera, Constanza e Fortezza by Fux, as well as oratorios, symphonies, and chamber music—attracted artists from all over Europe; and one rich noble, carried away with it all, decided then and there to found a permanent opera house for Prague. The same year saw the first Three Choirs Festival in England (Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester), which thrives to this day and is the granddaddy of them all though the festival movement really took off after Felix Mendelssohn conducted his St. Paul Oratorio in Birmingham in 1837 and his Elijah in 1846.

In America the festival fad also took hold early. As far back as 1829 a two-day Music Convention was held in Concord, New Hampshire. For many years Boston was the hub of festival concerts, and purists who deplore some of today's musical three-ring extravaganzas might consider the Peace Jubilee held in that city in 1869. This was organized by a fascinating operator, Patrick Gilmore (the band leader celebrated in The Music Man's hit number, Seventy-Six Trombones), together with Carl Zerrahn, conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society (founded in 1815, the offspring of another ad hoc music festival organized to celebrate the end of the War of 1812). A building large enough to seat 30,000 people was erected, the orchestra numbered 1,000, and the chorus 10,000. John Knowles Paine and Dudley Buck conducted works of their own, and Ole Bull and Carl Rosa played in the orchestra. The Jubilee cost $283,000, but managed to show a profit of $10,000 even after Gilmore's fees. Two years later Boston engaged Gilmore for another Jubilee. This time that impresario really thought big. His hall seated 50,000; the chorus, assembled from as far west as Omaha, numbered 20,000 and the jumbo orchestra 2,000. In addition several famous military bands were brought over from Europe, and Johann Strauss was engaged to conduct. Unfortunately, this "colossal musical picnic," as one chaste Boston critic called it, resulted in a deficit of $100,000, and Patrick Gilmore left town on cool terms with his guarantors.

New York, of course, was not to be outdone by Boston. In 1870 it too had held a Gilmore-organized celebration, in the form of a "Great Beethoven Centennial Jubilee." This affair was originally planned as a massive choral jamboree, but the first rehearsal was enough to make disastrously clear that Beethoven's choral music was far too much for the singers. The programs were quickly revamped, the five-day Beethovenian fling climaxing in Verdi's Anvil Chorus with an "electric battery of artillery." New York's second (1873) music festival, it should be said, was a much more dignified circumstance, organized by Theodore Thomas and including as soloists Anton Rubinstein and Henri Wieniawski.

By most music lovers today Bayreuth is considered the doyen of modern festivals. When the youthful Richard Wagner first saw this old Bavarian town, in 1835, he is reported to have exclaimed, "Ten horses couldn't pull me away from here." Thirty-five years later he returned, to establish his Wagner Festspielhaus. Among the celebrities attending the opening of the first Bayreuth Festival, in 1876, was Tchaikovsky, who wrote home a vivid description of the proceedings: "I watched the arrival of Kaiser Wilhelm from a window of a neighboring house. Then came into view a number of brilliant uniforms, then the instrumentalists from the Wagner Theatre, with the conductor Hans Richter at their head, and then the tall figure and well-known features of the Abbé Liszt, and finally, in a fashionable carriage, a little man with an aquiline nose and thin derisive lips—Richard Wagner." On that same night the "little man" said to his wife Cosima, "Every stone is red with your blood and mine."

For nearly a century now, except when the Nibelungen were carrying out their wars in other theatres, Bayreuth has continued to function. The town reeks with tradition and lore; the huge sardonic spirit of Wagner seems to hover everywhere. Silent reverence is the prescribed mood, and until recently applause was forbidden in Parsifal. Motor cars are frowned upon on the road that leads from the Villa Wahnfried, the master's old home, onto the Bayreuth streets. The whole place was designed by Richard Wagner, architect. Though the chairs with armless seats meet no known contour of the human form, some experts are convinced that the Festspielhaus has better acoustics than any other opera house in the world—despite the fact that the hall is said to defy every technical law of construction. Its ceiling is canvas, much of the walls are wooden, and the pillars mounted on the side walls are hollow.

Since Wagner's grandsons Wieland and Wolfgang took over, in 1951, Bayreuth has flourished as never before. Briefly, they revolutionized the productions; they threw out the helmeted Wotans and swimming Rhinemaidens and brought in new techniques in keeping with modern theatrical developments—and it works. The startling changes seem to be permanent (despite the death of Wieland in 1966), and Old Wagnerians have resigned themselves to the New Order.

Salzburg offers a far more cheerful scene, and traveling from the intense, cultist atmosphere of the Wagner Festival to the birthplace of Mozart is like being handed a box of one's favorite bonbons after a strict diet of heavy roughage. The patron saint here, of course, is Wolfgang Amadeus, who cordially detested the place. One feels his presence everywhere, or rather it is grimly forced on one by the commercialized music caterers: the Viennese summer house in which he composed The Magic Flute has been transported to the garden of Salzburg's Mozart Museum; the Prince Archbishop's Residenz, from which Mozart was literally booted out, is now the pious locale of Mozart Serenades; and the famous Glockenspiel

Jazzmobile in New York

Schuller at Tanglewood

Krenek at Dartmouth

Seeger at Newport Folk

RICA GTON, MASS.
NO
18

Center awards no degrees or diplomas, but its influence, through its gifted alumni all over America, cannot be overestimated.

To the north and west, over in New York State, where nineteenth-century plutocrats gathered to drink the mineral waters in genteel style and where followers of the Sport of Kings still make and lose fortunes on horseflesh and jockeys, the relatively rural simplicities of Tanglewood are now being challenged by New York's state-subsidized Saratoga Festival. Unlike other festivals, which just grew, this annual double-barreled attraction of the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra was carefully planned. Its spacious air-conditioned rehearsal rooms, its depth of stage and proscenium possibilities, would be the envy of the best theatres or opera houses. For the audience, things are no less auspicious: if you arrive early enough, you can dine elegantly at the celebrated Gideon Putnam nearby or informally at outdoor bistros; there's a small museum you can visit, and the potable attractions of Saratoga of course include more than the celebrated mineral waters. Hefty pots of money went into creating this place and the aura of well-heeled society hangs over it, but the ordinary festivalgoer will be mainly conscious that the seats are really comfortable and there's no visual or acoustic obstacle to enjoying the performance.

Over at Marlboro, Vermont, you'll find what some people consider music making in its noblest and purest state. Here we have the European ideal of chamber music for the pleasure and self-reward of its performers, and listeners are accommodated as an afterthought. At the Festival's gate there is a sign reading: Danger, Musicians at Play. And the first Saturday night square-dance party is as much a tradition as is Beethoven's Choral Fantasy on the last program. On weekends you can sit in a 500-seat concert hall and intrude on the repeat performances of what the players have been working at the previous five days. The renditions are exhilarating and, as those who have heard the records of "Music from Marlboro" are aware, one catches a sense of [illegible] natural amphitheatre surrounded by ta serve as a sounding board for a footl woodpeckers, while the occasional pere adjacent railroad trains supply an addit of chance to aleatoric compositions.

surely the only music festival that holds rummage sale to augment its income and the modest contributions it solicits residents and businessmen. Somehow, a adds to Ojai's charm.

But for atmospheric charm and cultur probably no festival in America can eq Aspen, Colorado. Where else can one fi valley, the flat floor of which is 7,800 fee forests, superb mountains, trout streams
Victorian hotel—and such music makers
Milhaud, Piatigorsky, and the Juilliard St tet? Nobody gives a damn about money, a is picked up by the Institute for Humanist
It's just as well, with programs featuring by such composers as Olivier Messiaen a Stravinsky's operas performed within ten da same theatre by the same company—somet
New York itself would be hard-pressed t
Of late years Aspen has become someth celebrity stop-over and glamour seekers are known, but for the most part its public is of writers, musicians, artists, professors. Th tone of the place is civilized—one could e
America's intellectual life at its best.

All in all, festivals are flowering in a pr that would have amazed anyone two decad
In Cincinnati, Opera at the Zoo is the city's but thoroughly enjoyable specialty; you dine zoo gardens, then pass on to the big cage, a lions roar their approval as the tenor goes t his paces. Or you can travel to Alaska and vi festival at Anchorage, where the programs from Haydn oratorios to Eskimo music. Or taste runs to the guided and slightly preci might take in the Caramoor Festival, in the hills, a bare forty fi

Tower, with its thirty-five bells, noodles tunes from you-know-whom three times a day.

The genesis was 1920, when the great Max Reinhardt first produced the morality play Everyman in Cathedral Square. In 1928 the stables of Salzburg's former archbishops were converted into a festival hall, and by then half the musical world from each continent seemed to be turning up on the narrow streets every August (in 1960 a gleaming $9,000,000 festival hall opened its plate-glass doors). Toscanini and Bruno Walter were in charge of the podium here for several years, from 1934 on, and a light comes into the eyes of anyone you speak to who was present. Tales of a Fidelio to end all Fidelios under the crackling baton of Toscanini, with the cast and orchestra frightened out of their wits by the Maestro—except for the indomitable Lotte Lehmann; of an unforgettable Don Pasquale with Richard Mayr as the Don, and Walter's loving direction; of Rosenkavaliers with Lehmann, the Marschallin of Marschallins, and Mayr (still preserved on LP, praise God); of a Baron Puthon in charge of the festival, an Austrian aristocrat reputed to be the only man able to browbeat Toscanini, and certainly the only one who could write a letter to Toscanini and get a reply by return mail.

The vintage year of years at Salzburg was 1935. Conductors? Weingartner, Kleiber, Walter, Toscanini. (They don't make 'em like that any more. . . .) The opera programs included Falstaff, Fidelio, and Così. . . Dons and Figaros. At eleven in the morning, for openers, one could hear Lieder recitals by Lotte Lehmann with Bruno Walter at the piano.

Today, one of the most exciting music festivals in Europe is Spoleto's "Festival of Two Worlds." Spoleto, until lately a drowsy hill town some sixty miles from Rome along the Via Flaminia, joined the twentieth century when the Italian-American composer Gian-Carlo Menotti decided that this was the ideal spot for a summer musicale on an international scale. Menotti had a vision and artistic purpose: to present exciting new art and artists, to let Europeans hear what the Americans were up to, and to give Americans the benefit of exposure to European culture and audiences. The plan seemed lunatic to the Spoletini. The town was off the beaten track; an occasional busload of tourists wandered in to see the Fra Filippo Lippi frescoes in the cathedral, then fled to Perugia. There were only a handful of inns, and they were primitive, to put it kindly. The locals christened Menotti Del Matto—"The Madman"—and sat back to watch the fun.

Menotti bought up a crumbling hotel and put in an American bar and plumbing. He cajoled the ristorante owners into giving their establishments their first coat of whitewash since Garibaldi's army passed through. The first season in 1958 was a smash hit, and the locals now call Menotti "The Duke of Spoleto."

HERE AT HOME, Tanglewood is our most distinguished full-scale festival. It all began in 1936, when the handsome grounds of Tanglewood, the two-hundred-acre Tappan estate in the Berkshire Hills, was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A year later the orchestra gave a disastrous concert in a leaky tent on the grounds—it was raining so heavily that the French horns gushed water. At the end of the concert the late Gertrude Robinson Smith climbed onto the stage and calmly announced that $100,000 must be raised at once to provide a permanent shelter. A year later the famous Shed was opened. Since then, up to six thousand listeners at a time have sat under its roof (a second roof now—the original collapsed under a Berkshire snowfall a few winters ago) and thousands more have gathered on the spacious lawns. The acoustics are so good that only in a rare instance are amplifiers needed.

But the heart of Tanglewood is its student Music Center, for which Koussevitzky fought tooth and nail, despite urgings by advisers to call it off and concentrate on the crowd-drawing BSO concerts. ("No school, no Koussevitzky," he replied.) Back in 1940 it was a daring venture to take on the training of four hundred young musicians, although today we are apt to take such things for granted. The Center awards no degrees or diplomas, but its influence, through its gifted alumni all over America, cannot be overestimated.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

To the north and west, over in New York State, where nineteenth-century plutocrats gathered to drink the mineral waters in genteel style and where followers of the Sport of Kings still make and lose fortunes on horseflesh and jockeys, the relatively rural simplicities of Tanglewood are now being challenged by New York's state-subsidized Saratoga Festival. Unlike other festivals, which just grew, this annual double-barreled attraction of the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra was carefully planned. Its spacious air-conditioned rehearsal rooms, its depth of stage and proscenium possibilities, would be the envy of the best theatres or opera houses. For the audience, things are no less auspicious: if you arrive early enough, you can dine elegantly at the celebrated Gideon Putnam nearby or informally at outdoor bistros; there's a small museum you can visit, and the potable attractions of Saratoga of course include more than the celebrated mineral waters. Hefty pots of money went into creating this place and the aura of well-heeled society hangs over it, but the ordinary festivalgoer will be mainly conscious that the seats are really comfortable and there's no visual or acoustic obstacle to enjoying the performance.

Over at Marlboro, Vermont, you'll find what some people consider music making in its noblest and purest state. Here we have the European ideal of chamber music for the pleasure and self-reward of its performers, and listeners are accommodated as an afterthought. At the Festival's gate there is a sign reading: Danger, Musicians at Play. And the first Saturday night square-dance party is as much a tradition as is Beethoven's Choral Fantasy on the last program. On weekends you can sit in a 500-seat concert hall and intrude on the repeat performances of what the players have been working at the previous five days. The renditions are exhilarating and, as those who have heard the records of "Music from Marlboro" are aware, one catches a sense of dedication and of music making for the sake of making music. You will hear some of the topflight artists in the world up here (Pablo Casals has been coming back every summer since 1960), and none of them is paid—in fact they are paying guests. But they seem to be having a marvelous time, even to the kitchen cleanup squad composed of distinguished violinists and flutists.

Another off-the-beaten-track settlement too small for you to risk blinking your eyes while driving through is Ojai, seventy miles north of Los Angeles, which provides Southern California with at least three days of contemporary music a year. For nearly twenty years, Angelenos nurtured on their own Monday Evening Concerts' monthly servings of contemporary chamber music have migrated to Ojai for a sample of orchestral music as well. Both chamber and orchestral concerts have attracted such eminent conductor-composers as Pierre Boulez, Lukas Foss, and Ingolf Dahl. Performances are given in a cozy natural amphitheatre surrounded by tall trees which serve as a sounding board for a footloose flock of woodpeckers, while the occasional peregrinations of adjacent railroad trains supply an additional element of chance to aleatoric compositions. And Ojai is surely the only music festival that holds a year-round rummage sale to augment its income from tickets and the modest contributions it solicits from local residents and businessmen. Somehow, all this only adds to Ojai's charm.

But for atmospheric charm and cultural intensity probably no festival in America can equal that at Aspen, Colorado. Where else can one find an open valley, the flat floor of which is 7,800 feet high, rich forests, superb mountains, trout streams, a lovely Victorian hotel—and such music makers as Darius Milhaud, Piatigorsky, and the Juilliard String Quartet? Nobody gives a damn about money, and the tab is picked up by the Institute for Humanistic Studies. It's just as well, with programs featuring premieres by such composers as Olivier Messiaen and all of Stravinsky's operas performed within ten days in the same theatre by the same company—something that New York itself would be hard-pressed to match. Of late years Aspen has become something of a celebrity stop-over and glamour seekers are not unknown, but for the most part its public is made up of writers, musicians, artists, professors. The whole tone of the place is civilized—one could even say America's intellectual life at its best.

All in all, festivals are flowering in a profusion that would have amazed anyone two decades ago. In Cincinnati, Opera at the Zoo is the city's bizarre but thoroughly enjoyable specialty; you dine in the zoo gardens, then pass on to the big cage, and the lions roar their approval as the tenor goes through his paces. Or you can travel to Alaska and visit the festival at Anchorage, where the programs range from Haydn oratorios to Eskimo music. Or if your taste runs to the gilded and slightly precious, you might take in the Caramoor Festival, in the Katonah hills, a bare forty-five-minute drive from New York City. Here on the memorabilia-drenched estate of Charles and Lucy Rosen, patrons have sampled such offerings as Benjamin Britten's medieval music drama cum Noh play The Burning Fiery Furnace performed in an ersatz Spanish cloister, orchestral concerts in a mock Renaissance pavilion, and chamber programs in the estate's antique-cluttered music room. At Caramoor, moreover, each musical event is presided over with Elizabethan grandeur by the formidably coiffed Dame Lucy herself.

And all these gala goings-on seem only the beginning. Louis Harris, the man who runs the polls and ought to know, points out that the rate of Americans traveling two-hundred miles from home within America is leaping from year to year, and he predicts ten million Americans traveling to Europe every summer by 1975. When the day comes to register for orbital travel and to book reservations at the first Lunar Hilton, you may be sure that a "Festival of Two Planets" will be on the drawing board soon after.

Krenek at Dartmouth

Seeger at Newport Folk

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16,000
OCT 1968

ture and audiences. The plan seemed lunatic way off the beaten track;

Center awards no degrees or diplomas, but its influence, through its gifted alumni all over America, cannot be overestimated.

To the north and west, over in New York State, where nineteenth-century plutocrats gathered to drink the mineral waters in genteel style and where followers of the Sport of Kings still make and lose fortunes on horseflesh and jockeys, the relatively rural simplicities of Tanglewood are now being challenged by New York's state-subsidized Saratoga Festival. Unlike other festivals, which just grew, this annual double-barreled attraction of the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra was carefully planned. Its spacious air-conditioned rehearsal rooms, its depth of stage and proscenium possibilities, would be the envy of the best theatres or opera houses. For the audience, things are no less auspicious: if you arrive early enough, you can dine elegantly at the celebrated Gideon Putnam nearby or informally at outdoor bistros; there's a small museum you can visit, and the potable attractions of Saratoga of course include more than the celebrated mineral waters. Hefty pots of money went into creating this place and the aura of well-heeled society hangs over it, but the ordinary festivalgoer will be mainly conscious that the seats are really comfortable and there's no visual or acoustic obstacle to enjoying the performance.

Over at Marlboro, Vermont, you'll find what some people consider music making in its noblest and purest state. Here we have the European ideal of chamber music for the pleasure and self-reward of its performers, and listeners are accommodated as an afterthought. At the Festival's gate there is a sign reading: Danger, Musicians at Play. And the first Saturday night square-dance party is as much a tradition as is Beethoven's Choral Fantasy on the last program. On weekends you can sit in a 500-seat concert hall and intrude on the repeat performances of what the players have been working at the previous five days. The renditions are exhilarating and, as those who have heard the records of "Music from Marlboro" are aware, one catches a sense of dedication and of music making for the sake of making music. You will hear some of the topflight artists in the world up here (Pablo Casals has been coming back every summer since 1960), and none of them is paid—in fact they are paying guests. But they seem to be having a marvelous time, even to the kitchen cleanup squad composed of distinguished violinists and flutists.

Another off-the-beaten-track settlement too small you to risk blinking your eyes while driving gh is Ojai, seventy miles north of Los Angeles, provides Southern California with at least ys of contemporary music a year. For nearly ars, Angelenos nurtured on their own Mon- g Concerts' monthly servings of contem- ber music have migrated to Ojai for a chestral music as well. Both chamber l concerts have attracted such eminent composers as Pierre Boulez, Lukas Foss, Dahl. Performances are given in a cozy natural amphitheatre surrounded by tall trees which serve as a sounding board for a footloose flock of woodpeckers, while the occasional peregrinations of adjacent railroad trains supply an additional element of chance to aleatoric compositions. And Ojai is surely the only music festival that holds a year-round rummage sale to augment its income from tickets and the modest contributions it solicits from local residents and businessmen. Somehow, all this only adds to Ojai's charm.

But for atmospheric charm and cultural intensity probably no festival in America can equal that at Aspen, Colorado. Where else can one find an open valley, the flat floor of which is 7,800 feet high, rich forests, superb mountains, trout streams, a lovely Victorian hotel—and such music makers as Darius Milhaud, Piatigorsky, and the Juilliard String Quartet? Nobody gives a damn about money, and the tab is picked up by the Institute for Humanistic Studies. It's just as well, with programs featuring premieres by such composers as Olivier Messiaen and all of Stravinsky's operas performed within ten days in the same theatre by the same company—something that New York itself would be hard-pressed to match. Of late years Aspen has become something of a celebrity stop-over and glamour seekers are not unknown, but for the most part its public is made up of writers, musicians, artists, professors. The whole tone of the place is civilized—one could even say America's intellectual life at its best.

All in all, festivals are flowering in a profusion that would have amazed anyone two decades ago. In Cincinnati, Opera at the Zoo is the city's bizarre but thoroughly enjoyable specialty; you dine in the zoo gardens, then pass on to the big cage, and th lions roar their approval as the tenor goes throu his paces. Or you can travel to Alaska and visit festival at Anchorage, where the programs from Haydn oratorios to Eskimo music. Or taste runs to the gilded and slightly preci might take in the Caramoor Festival, in the hills, a bare forty-five-minute drive from City. Here on the memorabilia-drench Charles and Lucy Rosen, patrons have offerings as Benjamin Britten's drama cum Noh play The Burnin performed in an ersatz Spanish concerts in a mock Renaissance ber programs in the estate's an room. At Caramoor, moreove is presided over with Elizab formidably coiffed Dame

And all these gala go ginning. Louis Harris, t and ought to know, Americans traveling within America is he predicts ten mi rope every summ register for orbi at the first L "Festival of board soon

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Center awards no degrees or diplomas, but its influence, through its gifted alumni all over America, cannot be overestimated.

To the north and west, over in New York State, where nineteenth-century plutocrats gathered to drink the mineral waters in genteel style and where followers of the Sport of Kings still make and lose fortunes on horseflesh and jockeys, the relatively rural simplicities of Tanglewood are now being challenged by New York's state-subsidized Saratoga Festival. Unlike other festivals, which just grew, this annual double-barreled attraction of the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra was carefully planned. Its spacious air-conditioned rehearsal rooms, its depth of stage and proscenium possibilities, would be the envy of the best theatres or opera houses. For the audience, things are no less auspicious: if you arrive early enough, you can dine elegantly at the celebrated Gideon Putnam nearby or informally at outdoor bistros; there's a small museum you can visit, and the potable attractions of Saratoga of course include more than the celebrated mineral waters. Hefty pots of money went into creating this place and the aura of well-heeled society hangs over it, but the ordinary festivalgoer will be mainly conscious that the seats are really comfortable and there's no visual or acoustic obstacle to enjoying the performance.

Over at Marlboro, Vermont, you'll find what some people consider music making in its noblest and purest state. Here we have the European ideal of chamber music for the pleasure and self-reward of its performers, and listeners are accommodated as an afterthought. At the Festival's gate there is a sign reading: Danger, Musicians at Play. And the first Saturday night square-dance party is as much a tradition as is Beethoven's Choral Fantasy on the last program. On weekends you can sit in a 500-seat concert hall and intrude on the repeat performances of what the players have been working at the previous five days. The renditions are exhilarating and, as those who have heard the records of "Music from Marlboro" are aware, one catches a sense of dedication and of music making for the sake of making music. You will hear some of the topflight artists in the world up here (Pablo Casals has been coming back every summer since 1960), and none of them is paid—in fact they are paying guests. But they seem to be having a marvelous time, even to the kitchen cleanup squad composed of distinguished violinists and flutists.

Another off-the-beaten-track settlement too small you to risk blinking your eyes while driving igh is Ojai, seventy miles north of Los Angeles, provides Southern California with at least ys of contemporary music a year. For nearly ars, Angelenos nurtured on their own Mon- g Concerts' monthly servings of contem- ber music have migrated to Ojai for a chestral music as well. Both chamber l concerts have attracted such eminent composers as Pierre Boulez, Lukas Foss, f Dahl. Performances are given in a cozy natural amphitheatre surrounded by tall trees which serve as a sounding board for a footloose flock of woodpeckers, while the occasional peregrinations of adjacent railroad trains supply an additional element of chance to aleatoric compositions. And Ojai is surely the only music festival that holds a year-round rummage sale to augment its income from tickets and the modest contributions it solicits from local residents and businessmen. Somehow, all this only adds to Ojai's charm.

But for atmospheric charm and cultural intensity probably no festival in America can equal that at Aspen, Colorado. Where else can one find an open valley, the flat floor of which is 7,800 feet high, rich forests, superb mountains, trout streams, a lovely Victorian hotel—and such music makers as Darius Milhaud, Piatigorsky, and the Juilliard String Quartet? Nobody gives a damn about money, and the tab is picked up by the Institute for Humanistic Studies. It's just as well, with programs featuring premieres by such composers as Olivier Messiaen and all of Stravinsky's operas performed within ten days in the same theatre by the same company—something that New York itself would be hard-pressed to match. Of late years Aspen has become something of a celebrity stop-over and glamour seekers are not unknown, but for the most part its public is made up of writers, musicians, artists, professors. The whole tone of the place is civilized—one could even say America's intellectual life at its best.

All in all, festivals are flowering in a profusion that would have amazed anyone two decades ago. In Cincinnati, Opera at the Zoo is the city's bizarre but thoroughly enjoyable specialty; you dine in the zoo gardens, then pass on to the big cage, and the lions roar their approval as the tenor goes through his paces. Or you can travel to Alaska and visit the festival at Anchorage, where the programs range from Haydn oratorios to Eskimo music. Or if your taste runs to the gilded and slightly precious, you might take in the Caramoor Festival, in the Katonah hills, a bare forty-five-minute drive from New York City. Here on the memorabilia-drenched estate of Charles and Lucy Rosen, patrons have sampled such offerings as Benjamin Britten's medieval music drama cum Noh play The Burning Fiery Furnace performed in an ersatz Spanish cloister, orchestral concerts in a mock Renaissance pavilion, and chamber programs in the estate's antique-cluttered music room. At Caramoor, moreover, each musical event is presided over with Elizabethan grandeur by the formidably coiffed Dame Lucy herself.

And all these gala goings-on seem only the beginning. Louis Harris, the man who runs the polls and ought to know, points out that the rate of Americans traveling two-hundred miles from home within America is leaping from year to year, and he predicts ten million Americans traveling to Europe every summer by 1975. When the day comes to register for orbital travel and to book reservations at the first Lunar Hilton, you may be sure that a "Festival of Two Planets" will be on the drawing board soon after.

New York

Krenek at Dartmouth

Seeger at Newport Folk

140.

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W 1,935,000

JUL 15 1968

Clemens Kalischer

Berko from Rapho Guillumette

Tanglewood (left), Aspen's Rosina Lhevinne teaching (center) and Marlboro informality: 'We are all students'

Clemens Kalischer

Dubrovnik castle (left), Baalbek temple: Ancient Rome and Canaan too

Festival Time for Eye and Ear

"Sound loves to revel in a summer night," wrote Edgar Allan Poe, and these summer nights are filled with the sound of musical revelry at home and abroad. Because festivals are generally scenically situated, travelers can combine the delights of eye as well as ear. Here's a selected list.

■ TANGLEWOOD (July 5-Aug. 25). This 34-year-old granddaddy of summer festivals is at Lenox, Mass., in the Berkshire Hills. Tanglewood, where Hawthorne lived, mixes uncurtailed nature with formal gardens, and the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and such soloists as coloratura Beverly Sills and pianist Van Cliburn with lovers blanketed on the soft grass under the stars.

■ MARLBORO (July 6-Aug. 18). This Vermont banquet of chamber works is directed by pianist Rudolf Serkin, ornamented by some 80 brilliant musicians, including violinist Alexander Schneider and pianist Mieczyslaw Horszowski, and infused by the unique spirit of its resident guardian angel, 91-year-old Pablo Casals. No one is paid. "We are all students," says Serkin. They all play for the love of it and the music is ample proof. No need to ask for programs. In that informal setting, the programs are generally decided the night before.

■ ADIRONDACK-CHAMPLAIN (July 7-Sept. 30). While events in this informal but highly sophisticated regional festival take place at Saranac and Blue Mountain lakes and at Plattsburgh, the heart is in a charming century-old boathouse on beautiful mountain-ringed Schroon Lake in New York's Adirondack State Park. Brahms is a featured composer, and performers include such master musicians as pianists Gary Graffman and Julius Katchen, cellist Janos Starker, guitarist Rey de la Torre and the Hungarian, Beaux-Arts and Yale quartets. South of Schroon at Glens Falls, the LAKE GEORGE OPERA (July 13-Aug. 25) is devoting itself to Shakespearean opera, including Rossini's "Otello," Britten's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the world première of David Amram's "Twelfth Night." A few miles further south is SARATOGA (July 4-Aug. 25), whose Performing Arts Center is home in July for George Balanchine's New York City Ballet and in August to the Philadelphia Orchestra. Monday-night pop concerts include Diana Ross and the Supremes, Peter, Paul and Mary, and Simon and Garfunkel.

■ DAYTONA BEACH (July 18-Aug. 11). Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on the Florida sands? Tchaikovsky in the jai alai frontón? Bach in bikinis? It's an unlikely scene, and more unlikely still is the presence of the great London Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor, André Previn. Pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy heads the list of soloists and the rehearsals are delightfully open to the public.

■ BLOSSOM MUSIC CENTER (July 19-Sept. 1). When maestro George Szell opens the first Blossom festival by leading the Cleveland Orchestra in Beethoven's overture "The Consecration of the House," it will detonate a cultural explosion that Szell hopefully foresees as a Midwestern Tanglewood to come. Located on a high bluff of the upper Cuyahoga Valley between Akron and Cleveland, the $6,605,000 center's pavilion seats 4,600, and its sloping lawns accommodate another 10,000. Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Aaron Copland, conductors Robert Shaw and William Steinberg, the New York City Ballet, Louis Armstrong and Judy Collins are among the guests invited to help consecrate the house. At RAVINIA (June 27-Aug. 17), 38 miles north of Chicago, performances of the Chicago Symphony under conductor Seiji Ozawa, chamber music and dance are spiced with such pop and jazz performers as Lou Rawls, Oscar Peterson, the Ramsey Lewis Trio and Harpers Bizarre.

■ SANTA FE (July 2-Aug. 24). The finest summer opera company in America occupies its new 1,500-seat theater this summer, after the old one burned down in the middle of last summer's season. Director John Crosby, always ingenious, comes up this summer with two American premières: Hans Werner Henze's "The Bassarids" with a W.H. Auden and Chester Kallman libretto, on Aug. 7 and 9, and Arnold Schoenberg's "Die Jakobsleiter" on Aug. 14 and 16, with Vera Zorina in an acting role.

■ ASPEN (June 28-Aug. 25). The Wednesday and weekend concerts are really up, up and away at an altitude of 7,900 feet in the spectacular Rockies of Colorado. It's wonderful that the musicians of the Festival Orchestra, the Chamber Symphony, the Juilliard Quartet and the marvelous teaching faculty that includes Jennie Tourel and Rosina Lhevinne can breathe, let alone play and sing. At CENTRAL CITY (June 22-July 27), the historic 1878 opera house, where once John L. Sullivan acted, has been turned over to the Savoyards of the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company, doing five Gilbert and Sullivan operas.

■ EDINBURGH (Aug. 18-Sept. 7). This three-ring circus, 391 miles north of London, is the most comprehensive festival in the world. This year there are three opera companies, including the Hamburg State; seven symphony orchestras, among them the London Symphony (zipping back in time from Daytona Beach) and the U.S.S.R. State Orchestra; chamber music by the Stern-Rose-Istomin Trio and the Amadeus String Quartet, and such individuals as Yehudi Menuhin and his sister Hephzibah; Mstislav Rostropovich and his wife, soprano Galina Vishnevskaya, Daniel Barenboim and his wife, cellist Jacqueline Du Pré, and Benjamin Britten.

■ DROTTNINGHOLM-STOCKHOLM (May 21-Sept. 29). This is probably the world's second longest festival. The chief delight is the classic opera productions in the eighteenth-century jewel-box Drottningholm Palace Theatre, where the orchestra wears brocaded coats and powdered wigs to underscore the settings of Mozart, Paisiello, Pergolesi and Scarlatti operas. The longest festival is FLANDERS (April 29-Sept. 13), centering in midsummer in Ghent, Brussels and Bruges, which has survived intact the sleep of 600 years and whose tranquillity is perfect for the August Bach performances.

■ GLYNDEBOURNE (May 23-Aug. 4). Nearly everyone journeys to this arcadian retreat in the Sussex downs, 50 miles south of London, by train from Victoria Station, dressed in evening clothes (de rigueur) and lugging elaborate picnic baskets. The operas in the 800-seat theater this summer include Cavalli's "L'Ormindo" and Donizetti's "Anna Bolena." Don't forget to pack the champagne.

■ AIX-EN-PROVENCE (July 7-31). It seems only fitting that the financial risk of this sun-swept festival, including this year Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" and the Orchestra of Paris, conducted by Charles Münch and Lorin Maazel, should be borne by the gambling casino. PRADES (July 27-Aug. 5), in the French Pyrenees, will not be blessed this summer with Don Pablo Casals but he will be there, reflected in the homage of a dedicated band of musicians.

■ SALZBURG (July 26-Aug. 30). In "Mozart's city," his music is the chief attraction. This year's festival opens with Nicolai Ghiaurov as "Don Giovanni" conducted by Herbert von Karajan, and includes the infrequently heard "Zaïde." But in this bustling music-making, Beethoven's "Fidelio" is included, along with the usual full round of distinguished solo, chamber and orchestral concerts. At BAYREUTH (July 25-Aug. 28), anyone who can sing Wagner, led by Birgit Nilsson in "Tristan und Isolde," will be on hand for the mythical marathon. Opera lovers should not forget that in Italy outdoors at VERONA (July 20-Aug. 18) and in Rome at the BATHS OF CARACALLA (July 14-Aug. 25), Italian opera is presented on the grand scale; at Caracalla this summer's "Aida" is likely to comprise a cast of thousands, including horses, camels and elephants onstage.

■ LUCERNE (Aug. 14-Sept. 8). In the heart of the Alps, on the shore of the lake, the twenty-year-old festival has cornered the late-summer market in musicians, with such orchestras as the Berlin Philharmonic under von Karajan and Sir John Barbirolli, London's New Philharmonia under Otto Klemperer and Claudio Abbado, and a line-up of soloists that includes Sviatoslav Richter, Artur Rubinstein and Isaac Stern. One of the features at MONTREUX (Aug. 30-Oct. 2), along with Leopold Stokowski conducting the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, is the concerts played in the Byron-famed castle of Chillon. At GSTAAD (Aug. 8-31), high up in the mountains among the very rich in their dotted Swiss chalets, Yehudi Menuhin and his family and friends play chamber music in a 600-year-old Lutheran church. Says Menuhin: "The charm lies in the intimacy of the simple mountain village church where all distinctions of class or wealth disappear on the hard wooden pews."

■ DUBROVNIK (July 10-Aug. 25). This is a round robin of music and dance (often by amazing folk groups) which takes place on 26 open-air stages in this charming old Adriatic port. Among the highlights are appearances by the Alvin Ailey dance company, the Moscow Philharmonic, the U.S.A.'s Bach Aria Group and London's Amadeus Quartet.

■ BAALBEK (July 12-Sept. 4). History since the Canaanites has left the evidence of this Lebanese market town's ancient importance, most spectacularly in the massive Roman ruins of the temple of Jupiter. There, along with such international attractions as John Cranko's Stuttgart Opera Ballet, the festival will be opened by the fiery lamentations of Om Kalthum, the beloved voice of the Arab world. The ISRAEL FESTIVAL (July 20-Aug. 31), ignoring the exhortations of Madame Kalthum, opens with a special concert celebrating the recent unification of Jerusalem. The chief musical charms are to be heard in Herod the Great's theater in Caesarea, the ancient Roman seaport, where Carmen de Lavallade and her dancers and the New York Philharmonic under Leonard Bernstein will perform, and where Gian Carlo Menotti will stage a new production of his opera "The Consul."

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Thursday, August 29, 1968

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
AUG 29 1968
New England Newsclip

FAMILY FEATURES

Photos courtesy Boston University

Just so

Student at Tanglewood Institute, Susan Walp of Allentown, Pa., adjusts her canvas on her easel. She is one of 41 artists who polished their talent in the Berkshires of western Massachusetts this summer.

Method mime

Meli Davis (back to the camera) puts her dance classes through instruction in mime. The dance is one of the many arts which students may study at Tanglewood's summer sessions.

More than music at Tanglewood

Silent solo

The Berkshire Music Center sessions in music are the most well-known instruction offered at Tanglewood each summer. Here a cellist practices.

By Craig Stinson

Lenox, Mass.

At Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 210-acre estate overlooking Lake Maakeenas, there's more going on than meets the public ear. The weekend concerts, which make up the Berkshire Music Festival proper, and which keep Boston Symphony players solvent through the summer, are, in fact, only one aspect of the Tanglewood scene.

These grounds, where Emerson, Holmes, and Melville used to meet, and where Hawthorne wrote his "House of the Seven Gables," are still a center of artistic vitality. Only now the confrontations are more varied. In addition to the stimulus of nature, the young musician here can benefit from the tutelage of Ravi Shankar and Ali Akhbar Khan; and the young writer can study some of the less obvious aspects of playwriting in an institute directed by Robert Lewis.

There are now three separate educational programs in operation at Tanglewood. In addition to the Berkshire Music Center, which has a long and distinguished record of service to advanced music education, there are the more recently established institutes of Boston University and the New England Conservatory.

BU's program this summer has served some 215 students, ranging in age from 16 to 72 and representing 31 different states, plus Canada and Lebanon. Fifty-seven high-school students have been participating in a special program between their junior and senior years.

The course has included piano seminars, painting, dance, and the theater. The last of these has recently attracted the attention of the National Endowment for the Arts, which donated $17,000 for a program to train playwrights.

The Conservatory Institute offered a course in contemporary composition, directed by Herbert Alper, and a seminar in non-Western music. Subjects for the latter this summer have been jazz, Indian music, African music, theoretical studies, and advanced instrumental techniques; and the faculty has included such celebrities as Messrs. Shankar and Khan, for Indian music; Desmund Tay, for African; and Jerry Coker and David Baker, for jazz.

Playwright

Robert Lewis, prominent New York director and teacher, chats with a member of his play-writing symposium.

142.

Byron Belt on the arts

2 summer festivals combine fine talent, great scenery

By BYRON BELT

In the Adirondacks and the Berkshires, four hours from Staten Island, two of America's outstanding summer festivals were launched last weekend.

Considering the extravagant beauty of setting for both the infant Saratoga Performing Arts Center and the Tanglewood Festival, it is almost idyllic to find the quality of performance standards extraordinarily high.

While summer events burst on the scene with frightening frequency, and disappear almost at birth, the success of these two nearby projects may offer clues for future ventures in this vein.

Both the New York and Massachusetts festivals are based on two unbeatable combinations: Outdoor settings of unique natural beauty, pastoral charm and freedom from interfering noises of any kinds, coupled with performing ensembles of the very highest quality.

Saratoga is the summer home of two of America's greatest artistic organizations. In July, George Balanchine's glorious New York City Ballet is in residence in the handsome Performing Arts Center Amphitheater, and in August the sumptuous sounds of Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra may be heard. And during both July and August at nearby Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf leads his aristocratic Boston Symphony.

Anyway you look at it, these three organizations spell the kind of quality which assures success over the years. The lure of scenic splendor and recreation facilities for the entire family and the chance to see and hear three internationally acclaimed performing groups provide attractions only a Salzburg or Edinburgh can challenge.

Saratoga itself is loaded with history. The Battle of Saratoga resulted in General Burgoyne's surrender on Oct. 17, 1777. Monuments to the battle may be found in Schulyerville and in the National Historical Park, both just a few miles from Saratoga Springs.

Gideon Putnam selected one of the area's famed springs near which to build the first hotel.

The casino in Congress Park reflects Saratoga's century - long fascination with all phases of gambling. John Morrissey built the first Saratoga Race Course in 1863, and "the Queen Dowager of American Tracks" has been busy ever since.

Indoor sport was practiced in the elegant Casino presided over by the "Prince of Gamblers," Richard Canfield. Today, on Monday evenings, the room where John (Bet-a-Million) Gates won $200,000 in one night, houses chamber music recitals as a part of the summer festival.

If one can tear oneself away from the wonders of nature and the history of man, today's life is reflected at its best in the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

Vollmer - Ostrower, Associates, architects, created the superb Saratoga Amphitheater. Arnold H. Vollmer, engineer and landscape architect, and architect Robert L. Rotner were partners in charge of design, and Paul Veneklasen was the knowing acoustical consultant. Although he is given no credit, from experience I can state that Maestro Ormandy also had a great deal to say about the creation of the excellent facility sound-wise.

The New York City Ballet performs Tuesdays through Sundays until July 28, and the Philadelphia Orchestra performs Thursdays through Sundays from Aug. 1 through 25. There are various pops attractions and a few special events, but nothing matches the standards of the two resident ensembles.

In place of July 4th fireworks, Balanchine unveiled his popular special full-length ballet, "The Nutcracker". Snowflakes and children by the hundreds filled the spacious stage in fine fashion, and large audiences for both evening and matinee performances were treated to beautiful staging, and superb musical and dance performances.

Although the Saratoga management seems fairly lax and poorly directed (three management shifts in three brief seasons should confirm the need for board changes of some sort) the two resident organizations work sufficiently hard to assure temporary success. But when the state and private individuals have put up millions of dollars to provide a significant undertaking, local managerial incompetence must be considered a long-range threat to the integrity and viability of the project.

The mighty thoroughbreds of the New York City Ballet showed no signs of the strain of performing away from the conveniences of the city.

With a stage that can easily handle the most lavish productions, and with Robert Irving in supreme control of the excellent orchestra, the dancers had the room and challenge to dance up a storm. From the stars to the last girl in the corps, this summer's "Nutcracker" provided some of the most beautiful and exciting dancing I have ever experienced.

On opening night the principles were Melissa Hayden and Jacques D'Ambroise as the Sugar Plum Fairy and her Cavalier, and Suzanne Farrell as Dew Drop.

Miss Farrell and the ladies of the corps provided a Waltz of the Flowers of shimmering beauty. Even in Karinska's fading gowns the girls moved beautifully, and if someone hasn't named a luscious rose for Miss Farrell as yet, it is high time the deed be done to match her long-stemmed beauty.

In the grand pas de deux which climaxes Balanchine's affectionate memories of a magical Russian Christmas, Melissa Hayden, securely but a bit nonchalantly supported by Jacques D'Amboise, danced with brilliance and radiance of a kind to bring tears to the eyes, a lump in the throat, a smile to the face and roar of cheers at the end. Miss Hayden is one of the world's greatest dancers—she takes over any stage she ventures onto. As the Sugar Plum Fairy she is, quite simply, sublime.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIR. 25,900
JUL 26 1968
New England Newsclip

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,892 SUN. 56,019
JUL 14 1968

A Concordance Of Tanglewoods

When the Saratoga Performing Arts Center opened its gates two years ago, there was worried speculation hereabouts as to the effect on the Berkshire Festival box office. Pessimists predicted there would not be enough music lovers to go around.

They were wrong, of course. The near-record 13,290 who enjoyed the Van Cliburn concert at Tanglewood Saturday attested to that. The Berkshire and Saratoga festivals are thriving as symbiotically as anyone could expect of two major summer music attractions within an hour's drive of each other.

Nor are these festivals the only ones of their genre, though surely they are two of the best. A recent New York Times summary listed no less than 113 — count 'em, 113 — musical events in the Northeast and Midwest this summer, including the Marlboro (Vermont) Music Festival with the Serkins; the Caramoor festival in Katonah, New York; the Yale Concerts in Norwich, Connecticut; the Lincoln Center Festival '68; the Ravinia Festival with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; the New York Philharmonic's Promenades '68; the Provincetown Music Festival; and many, many others. Even Daytona Beach has latched onto the London Symphony Orchestra for a midsummer "international music festival." Then there is the celebrated Blossom Music Center festival, put on by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra under the direction of George Szell in a $7 million, 800-acre site 30 miles south of Cleveland.

Of all the up-and-coming musical enterprises, this one is most akin to Tanglewood. The Blossom Music Center, named after a prominent Cleveland family, has a huge pavilion in a natural amphitheater with space for 4,632 inside and more than 15,000 outside. It will encompass a summer music school much like the pioneering Berkshire Music Center in Lenox.

But no one at Tanglewood seems to be fretting unduly about the competition today. These summer festivals make economic sense for big orchestras seeking full-time employment for their members. And they meet a demand for fine, live music which evidently keeps growing year after year.

New York City Ballet star Melissa Hayden is a lovely, if unexpected, addition to a workout session at Saratoga's harness racing track.

Susan Farrell and Peter Martins are the Sugar Plum Fairy and her Cavalier in the New York City Ballet's production of "The Nutcracker."

143.

Garden State Fast Matching Beauty of Tanglewood On Hill

By Carl Richards

TANGLEWOOD — If you are from New Jersey, enjoying the pleasant and melodic surroundings of Tanglewood, comfortably, you think, "This is beautiful, but we're matching it in New Jersey." Thanks to the persistancy and vision of Louis Tonti, Garden State's Executive Director, the Garden State Cultural Center is a reality. While the Berskshires are beautiful, the view from Telegraph Hill rivals it's scenic beauty.

Both point to historical backgrounds. Tanglewood was the home of Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Telegraph Hill was the site of the laboratory where Marconi worked.

Tanglewood and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are synominmous. It is owned by, and serves as the summer home for the Orchestra. It was the gift, in 1937, of two sisters, Mrs. Gorham Brooks and Miss Mary Aspinwall to Dr. Koussevitxky, the then permanent conductor of the Orchestra. He turned it directly over to the Trustees.

Basically the programs at Tanglewood are built around the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Choir, Music Center Orchestra and groups of students studying at the Music Center. It's background is purely classical. Contemporary trends feature such concerts as, jazz and folk music, music from India, and The Association as examples of current forms of music expression. The Boston Symphony ranks as one of the leading orchestras in the world with none surpassing it.

Contrasting this, the Garden State Arts Center, because of its public sponsorship, must cater to all tastes. Hence a sell-out for an "Andy Williams concert" and open seats for the New Jersey Symphony.

The New Jersey Symphony, even though it has made remarkable strides in the short years of it's existence, has not matured. It must share the Center with a well known and more seasoned orchestra in order to attract the sophisticated Symphony goer.

Because of it's maturity, some thirty years at this point, Tanglewood has their traffic patterns, ushers, food and drink distribution, and sales outlet for books, music and musical items, down to a science. Smoking, late comers, restless audiences have been subtly controlled by lighting arrangements and discreet attendants. Timing and promptness of performances especially for week nights are gauged to get the audience home early.

Both have suffered "deluges" on their opening nights. So bad that each had to curtail the performance. They differ in accoustical arrangements. The obtrusive Talbot Memorial Stage Canopy, which was built at the cost of $40,000 in 1959, seems to carry sound better than the unobtrusive baffleting of the Arts Center Stage.

Tanglewood concerts highlight the weekend performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Guest artists and conductors are brought in as exponents of various composers or orchestra pieces. They are carefully designed so as to be not only sparkling and brilliant, but cover a wide range of musical appetites. During the week one may hear a concerto or a small group of musicians. On a Sunday evening a concert may be devoted to electronic music.

Garden State, because of It's wide entertainment range, has the symphony concerts interspersed with the more popular fare. It will be a while before they will be able to restudy their programing.

The drive and vision of it's impressario, Louis Tonti, bodes well for it's ultimate success and cultural growth. Tanglewood, as a focal point has drawn many visitors seeking entertainment and cultural relaxation and other attractions to the Berkshire area. The Garden State Arts Center can certainly do the same for Monmouth County and the surrounding area.

HIGHLANDS, N. J.
STAR
W. 1,000

SEP 5 1968

Casals at Marlboro

Music From a Musicians' Festival

By JAKE SHERMAN

The opening concerts of the Marlboro Music Festival last weekend gave fresh evidence of the truly great music that can be produced when musicians live and work together in an informal atmosphere and, for a few months at least, can forget about the general public.

A unique spirit pervades the 100 or so musicians who each summer make the pilgrimage to this southern Vermont retreat. They have come for at least three reasons: an overriding love of music, a chance to work under Pablo Casals and conditions which free them to pursue experiemental programs and approaches.

Not for Money . . .

At the same time, there are at least two reasons which they have not come for, the first being money. The musicians who participate in the festival, many of whom could command thousands of dollars for a single New York concert, don't receive a nickel for what, in other circumstances, would be an arduous summer of concerts and rehearsals.

More than 75 works selected by the musicians themselves are rehearsed each week, not to mention the informal concerts given among each other. This is not exactly a regimen for the dilletante, nor for the performer for whom cash remains the primary consideration.

The second reason for which no musician ever came to Marlboro is star billing. A pianist of the stature of Rudolf Serkin could almost instantaneously produce a sellout at Tanglewood were he to appear as a soloist there, but at Marlboro the program lists his name alphabetically among professionals of lesser note and even students.

Unlike Others . . .

Serkin, the festival's artistic director, has further discouraged the star system by refusing to publish progress or list performers very far in advance, and by choosing the festival orchestra in such a way that the amateur violinist can easily find himself seated next to the most seasoned virtuoso. In the former policy, he is like George Balanchine who has perhaps had lesser success in discouraging the star system in his New York City Ballet.

All of these aspects of the Marlboro experience make it markedly unlike Tanglewood, Saratoga or any of the other summer music festivals in the area. In the first place, since the musicians at Marlboro go without salary, the management of the festival does not have to worry about turning a profit or, at any rate, breaking even. Hence, there is no need to schedule so-called "balanced" programs, which generally are not so much balanced as they are given over to heavy doses of Beethoven, Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Dvorak and other mass-consumption composers.

And there is no need to bring in celebrities like Van Cliburn or Seiji Ozawa as a hedge against sagging box-office. Not that such musicians don't have a lot to offer for they certainly do, but they are nevertheless indicative of the "safe" approach which too often has led to mediocrity at Saratoga and Tanglewood.

The Marlboro approach to programming can literally afford to be a little more innovative. Perhaps its best feature is the scheduling of chamber works and symphonies on the same program, an idea which might profitably be explored by professional orchestras. A second promising idea is the evening-long study of a single composer, Bach or Mozart, for example, or of a group of composers, such as the lesser lights of the Baroque period. Contemporary composers, too often given short shrift by major orchestras, are also helathily represented.

But Marlboro differs from Saratoga and Tanglewood in at least two other respects: its general festivals where musicians play before thousands in what is essentially the open air, the Marlboro orchestra plays in a closed wooden barn that can accommodate perhaps 500. The audience, therefore, is in closer contact with the musicians in a sense, almost participating.

As for the audience itself, it is a dedicated one often coming from hundreds of miles away and capable of staging some unseemly battles for tickets at the cancellation window. Certainly, there are those among Tanglewood audiences no less dedicated, but the Tanglewood phenomenon of young couples slipping into the bushes during the New World Symphony is the kind of thing which rarely, if ever, happens at Marlboro.

Not Holier — Than Thou . . .

One does not want to give the impression that the Marlboro audience is any kind of holier-than-thou or super-discerning bunch. Obviously, many have come out of reverence for the aged maestro and how many out of a morbid curiousity as to whether his uncanny powers are still holding up.

If any of the opening night audience at the festival suspected that at 92 Casals had lost any of his strength, they were in for rude awakening. For, in conducting his own highly distinctive version of Mozart's Symphony No. 40, he showed that no living musician of whatever age knew more precisely what he wanted or could awaken in both the musicians playing under him and the audience almost a religious fervor.

Already Standing . . .

The audience is already standing when Casals emerges from the wings at the beginning of the second half of the program. Then, there is applause as several members of the orchestra assist him in mounting the podium where he sits in the chair placed there for him and perfunctorily scans the music.

The flourish with which he sets the orchestra into motion is so vigorous and abrupt as to be positively startling. He may have started conducting in the chair but before long he will jump to his feet, perhaps, to point to a horn from which he wants a fuller sound. And suddenly that horn is coming in loud and clear. On other occasions Casals voice will be audible as far back as the 15th row, as he "sh-h-h-s" the horns, telling them to quiet down. They do that too. And throughout, most members of the orchestra are casting quick glances at Casals, looking to his bony hands to tell them what to do.

Casals' Mozart is scarcely the cut-and-dried affair of the mathematicians and scholars: here is an unabashedly emotional interpretation, rich violins singing along at breakneck tempo all but obscuring the horns and winds. The musicians seem to be attacking their instruments with almost gustatorial relish, and so we discover drama, poetry and color in a place we usually don't look to find it.

The symphony is a fitting climax to a program whose earlier excellence had seemed difficult to top or even duplicate. For before the intermission, there had been an almost perfect rendering of the Mozart Quintet in A Major, the violinist Alexander Schneider bowing triumphantly, a kind of gray-haired lion of the concert stage, while opposite him played the young violist, Samuel Rhodes. This was Mozart in the way Mozartophiles expected to hear their man played.

The evening opened with the Mozart B-Flat trio featuring Sarkin on piano, Jaime Laredo on violin, and Madeline Foley on celloist. Here, Miss Foley was somewhat obscured amid the strongly-defined styles of Serkin and Laredo, most of whose careers have been spent as soloists. There was to be sure the inevitable clash of styles, Serkin the classicist, Laredo the romantic, trying to rein himself in. And yet out of this competition the work emerged with a distinctive new flavor.

It musn't be inferred from all this that the Marlboro Music Festival is entirely a Thoreau-like escape into the woods. The musical treasures which emanate from these idyllic surroundings are too rich for the recording industry to ignore, for one thing, with the result that the festival over the years has produced a long line of LP's with a guaranteed-to-sell label: "Recorded Live at Marlboro."

In spite of this creeping commercialism, though, it's not at all likely that the festival will ever become audience-oriented as opposed to musician-oriented. After all, when it can sell out 13 of 16 concerts this year without even printing an advance program, why should it?

PABLO CASALS AT THE MARLBORO PODIUM
A unique spirit pervades . . . (Photo by Kahn)

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,013 SUN. 129,006

JUL 14 1968

144.

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Sunday, July 14, 1968

Critic-at-Large

Nature Adds Dimension to City Ballet

By BYRON BELT

In the Adirondacks and the Berkshires, less than four hours from Long Island, two of America's outstanding summer festivals were launched last weekend.

BYRON BELT

Considering the extravagant beauty of setting for both the infant Saratoga Performing Arts Center and the Tanglewood Festival, it is almost idyllic to find the quality of performance standards extraordinarily high.

While summer events burst on the scene with frightening frequency, and disappear almost at birth, the success of these two nearby projects may offer clues for future ventures in this vein.

Both the New York and Massachusetts festivals are based on two unbeatable combinations: outdoor settings of unique natural beauty, pastoral charm and freedom from interfering noises of any kinds, coupled with performing ensembles of the very highest quality.

Saratoga is the summer home of two of America's greatest artistic organizations. In July, George Balanchine's glorious New York City Ballet is in residence in the handsome Performing Arts Center amphitheater, and in August the sumptuous sounds of Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra may be heard. And during both July and August at nearby Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf leads his aristocratic Boston Symphony.

* * *

ANY WAY YOU look at it, these three organizations spell the kind of quality which assures success over the years. The lure of scenic splendor and recreation facilities for the entire family and the chance to see and hear three internationally acclaimed performing groups provide attractions only a Salzburg or Edinburgh can challenge.

Saratoga itself is loaded with history. Monuments to General Burgoyne's surrender may be found in Schulyerville and in the national historical park, both just a [illegible] miles from Saratoga Springs. Gideon Putnam [illegible] one of the area's famed springs to build [illegible] near. The casino in Congress P[illegible] century-long fascination wi[illegible] toga race course we[illegible] Dowager of A[illegible]

Inde[illegible]

Ballerina Suzanne Farrell and George Balanchine, artistic director of the New York City Ballet, fondle horse at Saratoga Racetrack.

NEW YORK MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 15 1968

OUT OF TOWN—NORTH AND EAST

The two biggest bigtime music festivals in the East are, of course, the goings-on at the Philadelphia Orchestra's home in Saratoga Springs and the Boston Symphony's domain at Tanglewood. Both events are sort of Establishment bastions; the programs are good, solid, nourishing symphonic fare, most of it in the masterwork-of-the-week category, but the settings are pleasant and the performances, naturally, of high caliber. In and around the basic symphonic fare is threaded a network of other events that music-lovers looking for adventure may find even more worth their while. At Tanglewood, especially, there's almost always something interesting happening: baroque programs in the Theatre-Concert Hall on Sunday mornings, impromptu programs by student composers, formal programs of new music sponsored by the Fromm Foundation, and rehearsals. One especially interesting feature that nobody ever seems to find out about until he arrives at Tanglewood: the public Boston Symphony rehearsals on Saturday morning. They're a little stagey, but interesting.

Saratoga's "other events" this summer are something else: a pop-celebrity series running all the way to an Indian Festival with Ravi Shankar (August 6 and 7) to a Rowan and Martin "Saratoga Laff-In" over Labor Day weekend.

Just beyond Tanglewood to the north is one of the East's most enjoyable and rewarding summer events, the Music Center at Marlboro, Vermont, run by Rudolf Serkin. Everything here is informal: the concerts (Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons) are almost an afterthought. The reason is that Marlboro is really a musical think-tank, where top professional musicians come just to spend the summer playing with each other (chamber music, that is). The weekend programs are seldom planned in advance; they consist of whatever has gone particularly well during the week. There is a spirit of music-for-music's-sake at Marlboro that has to be experienced to be understood.

Closer to home, there is music in all sizes and conditions. Around the Tanglewood area there are several other interesting smaller events: the South Mountain chamber series at Pittsfield that runs all the way into October, and the Saturday chamber concerts at Falls Village, Connecticut, where the Berkshire Quartet plays at, naturally, Music Mountain. Along the road south, two educational institutions get into the act. The Hartt School of Music in Hartford has a chamber music series that runs until mid-August, and, at Norfolk, there is an exceptionally interesting series of chamber-music and vocal concerts produced by the Yale School of Music. On the Yale campus itself in New Haven, there are some lovely Starlight Concerts in the Law School Quadrangle from now until the end of July, involving an excellent small chamber group under various conductors. And at the very edge of Connecticut's commuterland, in New Canaan, the Silvermine Guild presents works for chamber orchestra on July 21, and August 11 and 25.

And opera? You have to cross back into New York State for that, but there you'll find plenty. This summer's Lake George Opera Festival (through August 25) is doing something unusual: five operas based on Shakespeare, and none of them too well-known. They're doing, for example, not Verdi's Otello but Rossini's, and the list also includes Britten's Midsummer Night's Dream and Nicolai's Merry Wives. At New Paltz (across the Hudson from Poughkeepsie), the Turnau Opera will present fully-professional performances of more standard repertory through August 24. New York City's Lyric Arts Opera Workshop visits Port Jervis, also through Aug. 24.

New York State isn't all operatic, however. Just around the corner in Purchase (Westchester), Manhattanville College has an interesting music series (chamber, mostly) through the end of July, and Claude Monteux' Hudson Valley Philharmonic is running a chamber-music series at Pawling into late August.

Head south to New York City now, and then make a left turn, and you'll find a thing called Long Island. Robert Bernstein, who has been running an excellent recital series during the winter in several L. I. communities, has now gone into summer business as well, in the tent on the C. W. Post College campus in Brookville where the former Long Island Music Festival used to be held. The orchestras involved include the peripatetic New Jersey Symphony, the Royal Philharmonic and the Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, and there are also piano recitals by Byron Janis and Mischa Dichter. The series runs from now through August 26, eleven concerts in all.

Music, in other words, is all over the map. Everything herein mentioned is an easy drive from New York (if you start out at 5 a.m., that is, and don't change lanes). Happy hunting!

The capital of summer-dancing America has, for the past 36 years, been the idyllic Jacob's Pillow at Lee, Mass. (not far from Tanglewood, culture-shopping generalists will note). The spirits of Ted Shawn and Ruth St. Denis hover beneficently over the place, reminding visitors of Where it All Came From. This summer's fare is, as usual varied and rich: seven performances a week through August 31, with two ballet companies (Boston and Pennsylvania) and the cream of the modern-dance crowd. There is also, as an indication of current trends, a strong admixture of Oriental styles, Indian and Japanese.

Similar in scope and in glamor is the more recent summer dance series at Connecticut College in New London, where experimentation and establishment jostle to the mutual enrichment of each. That goes on nightly, August 9 to 18. Meanwhile, to the west and over the hills, Saratoga (see also under music) is greatly dance-involved for its first few weeks. The New York City Ballet will be in residence there, as usual, through July 28, in a repertory that virtually duplicates their recent Spring season at State Theatre. Duplication of Slaughter on Tenth Avenue and Jewels is, however, no crime.

Here in New York City there are a number of events worth looking into, ranging from the alfresco dance concerts booked now and then onto the Central Park Mall to the lustrous current engagement by the American Ballet Theatre at the Metropolitan Opera House. Beginning next week and for six Monday and Wednesday nights thereafter, there is interesting new work on view at the Dance Theatre Workshop (215 W. 20th Street). On the streets of the city, watch for the Dance Mobile, sponsored by the Harlem Community Council and bringing dance programs via trailer into all five boroughs. After they pack up the Shakespeare in Central Park, Rebekah Harkness will present another Dance Festival at the Delacorte Theatre, from Sept. 3 to 14. And finally, don't forget that West Side Story at the State Theatre is as dance-oriented a show as the American theatre has ever produced.

144.

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Sunday, July 14, 1968

Critic-at-Large

Nature Adds Dimension to City Ballet

By BYRON BELT

In the Adirondacks and the Berkshires, less than four hours from Long Island, two of America's outstanding summer festivals were launched last weekend.

BYRON BELT

Considering the extravagant beauty of setting for both the infant Saratoga Performing Arts Center and the Tanglewood Festival, it is almost idyllic to find the quality of performance standards extraordinarily high.

While summer events burst on the scene with frightening frequency, and disappear almost at birth, the success of these two nearby projects may offer clues for future ventures in this vein.

Both the New York and Massachusetts festivals are based on two unbeatable combinations: outdoor settings of unique natural beauty, pastoral charm and freedom from interfering noises of any kinds, coupled with performing ensembles of the very highest quality.

Saratoga is the summer home of two of America's greatest artistic organizations. In July, George Balanchine's glorious New York City Ballet is in residence in the handsome Performing Arts Center amphitheater, and in August the sumptuous sounds of Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra may be heard. And during both July and August at nearby Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf leads his aristocratic Boston Symphony.

* * *

ANY WAY YOU look at it, these three organizations spell the kind of quality which assures success over the years. The lure of scenic splendor and recreation facilities for the entire family and the chance to see and hear three internationally acclaimed performing groups provide attractions only a Salzburg or Edinburgh can challenge.

Saratoga itself is loaded with history. Monuments to General Burgoyne's surrender may be found in Schulyerville and in the national historical park, both just a[illegible] miles from Saratoga Springs. Gideon Putnam[illegible] one of the area's famed springs to buil[illegible] near. The casino in Congress P[illegible] century-long fascination wi[illegible] toga race course w[illegible] Dowager of A[illegible]

Inde[illegible]

Ballerina Suzanne Farrell and George Balanchine, artistic director of the New York City Ballet, fondle horse at Saratoga Racetrack.

NEW YORK MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 15 1968

OUT OF TOWN—NORTH AND EAST

The two biggest bigtime music festivals in the East are, of course, the goings-on at the Philadelphia Orchestra's home in Saratoga Springs and the Boston Symphony's domain at Tanglewood. Both events are sort of Establishment bastions; the programs are good, solid, nourishing symphonic fare, most of it in the masterwork-of-the-week category, but the settings are pleasant and the performances, naturally, of high caliber. In and around the basic symphonic fare is threaded a network of other events that music-lovers looking for adventure may find even more worth their while. At Tanglewood, especially, there's almost always something interesting happening: baroque programs in the Theatre-Concert Hall on Sunday mornings, impromptu programs by student composers, formal programs of new music sponsored by the Fromm Foundation, and rehearsals. One especially interesting feature that nobody ever seems to find out about until he arrives at Tanglewood: the public Boston Symphony rehearsals on Saturday morning. They're a little stagey, but interesting.

Saratoga's "other events" this summer are something else: a pop-celebrity series running all the way to an Indian Festival with Ravi Shankar (August 6 and 7) to a Rowan and Martin "Saratoga Laff-In" over Labor Day weekend.

Just beyond Tanglewood to the north is one of the East's most enjoyable and rewarding summer events, the Music Center at Marlboro, Vermont, run by Rudolf Serkin. Everything here is informal: the concerts (Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons) are almost an afterthought. The reason is that Marlboro is really a musical think-tank, where top professional musicians come just to spend the summer playing with each other (chamber music, that is). The weekend programs are seldom planned in advance; they consist of whatever has gone particularly well during the week. There is a spirit of music-for-music's-sake at Marlboro that has to be experienced to be understood.

Closer to home, there is music in all sizes and conditions. Around the Tanglewood area there are several other interesting smaller events: the South Mountain chamber series at Pittsfield that runs all the way into October, and the Saturday chamber concerts at Falls Village, Connecticut, where the Berkshire Quartet plays at, naturally, Music Mountain. Along the road south, two educational institutions get into the act. The Hartt School of Music in Hartford has a chamber music series that runs until mid-August, and, at Norfolk, there is an exceptionally interesting series of chamber-music and vocal concerts produced by the Yale School of Music. On the Yale campus itself in New Haven, there are some lovely Starlight Concerts in the Law School Quadrangle from now until the end of July, involving an excellent small chamber group under various conductors. And at the very edge of Connecticut's commuterland, in New Canaan, the Silvermine Guild presents works for chamber orchestra on July 21, and August 11 and 25.

And opera? You have to cross back into New York State for that, but there you'll find plenty. This summer's Lake George Opera Festival (through August 25) is doing something unusual: five operas based on Shakespeare, and none of them too well-known. They're doing, for example, not Verdi's Otello but Rossini's, and the list also includes Britten's Midsummer Night's Dream and Nicolai's Merry Wives. At New Paltz (across the Hudson from Poughkeepsie), the Turnau Opera will present fully-professional performances of more standard repertory through August 24. New York City's Lyric Arts Opera Workshop visits Port Jervis, also through Aug. 24.

New York State isn't all operatic, however. Just around the corner in Purchase (Westchester), Manhattanville College has an interesting music series (chamber, mostly) through the end of July, and Claude Monteux' Hudson Valley Philharmonic is running a chamber-music series at Pawling into late August.

Head south to New York City now, and then make a left turn, and you'll find a thing called Long Island. Robert Bernstein, who has been running an excellent recital series during the winter in several L. I. communities, has now gone into summer business as well, in the tent on the C. W. Post College campus in Brookville where the former Long Island Music Festival used to be held. The orchestras involved include the peripatetic New Jersey Symphony, the Royal Philharmonic and the Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, and there are also piano recitals by Byron Janis and Mischa Dichter. The series runs from now through August 26, eleven concerts in all.

Music, in other words, is all over the map. Everything herein mentioned is an easy drive from New York (if you start out at 5 a.m., that is, and don't change lanes). Happy hunting!

The capital of summer-dancing America has, for the past 36 years, been the idyllic Jacob's Pillow at Lee, Mass. (not far from Tanglewood, culture-shopping generalists will note). The spirits of Ted Shawn and Ruth St. Denis hover beneficently over the place, reminding visitors of Where it All Came From. This summer's fare is, as usual, varied and rich: seven performances a week through August 31, with two ballet companies (Boston and Pennsylvania) and the cream of the modern-dance crowd. There is also, as an indication of current trends, a strong admixture of Oriental styles, Indian and Japanese.

Similar in scope and in glamor is the more recent summer dance series at Connecticut College in New London, where experimentation and establishment jostle to the mutual enrichment of each. That goes on nightly, August 9 to 18. Meanwhile, to the west and over the hills, Saratoga (see also under music) is greatly dance-involved for its first few weeks. The New York City Ballet will be in residence there, as usual, through July 28, in a repertory that virtually duplicates their recent Spring season at State Theatre. Duplication of Slaughter on Tenth Avenue and Jewels is, however, no crime.

Here in New York City there are a number of events worth looking into, ranging from the alfresco dance concerts booked now and then onto the Central Park Mall to the lustrous current engagement by the American Ballet Theatre at the Metropolitan Opera House. Beginning next week and for six Monday and Wednesday nights thereafter, there is interesting new work on view at the Dance Theatre Workshop (215 W. 20th Street). On the streets of the city, watch for the Dance Mobile, sponsored by the Harlem Community Council and bringing dance programs via trailer into all five boroughs. After they pack up the Shakespeare in Central Park, Rebekah Harkness will present another Dance Festival at the Delacorte Theatre, from Sept. 3 to 14. And finally, don't forget that West Side Story at the State Theatre is as dance-oriented a show as the American theatre has ever produced.

145.

Cleveland Symphony's Summer Home Has Familiar Look

Tanglewood Influence Recognized

By EDWARD J. FARRELL

It would appear that Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center have given more to the world of music than summer employment for musicians and summer enjoyment for the masses.

The Cleveland Symphony Orchestra this year joined other major musical organizations with a summer music festival. The orchestra moved out of Cleveland to Northampton Township some 40 minutes by highway from Cleveland and 15 minutes from Akron.

The summer site was appropriately named the Blossom Music Center honoring a long-prominent Cleveland family who had donated $1.3 million toward the $6.6 million total cost.

Success Declared

The first seven-week season at Blossom has been declared and unqualified success. The total attendance went over the 192,000 mark. Officials of Blossom have given serious thought recently to extending the season next year. Louis Hood, director of public relations for the Cleveland Orchestra, said the season may go up to 10 or 12 weeks next year.

In reviewing the first season, Hood said; "We are, of course, enormously proud of Blossom, and still more amazed that the opening was on schedule — less than a year after the construction.

"As always with a new facility," he noted," we encountered problems. The main one was a traffic situation outside the grounds. The current two-lane road leading to the center's entrance will be improved and widened by next summer."

The problem at Blossom sounds strangely familiar to Tanglewood patrons. There are, however, many other aspects of Blossom that would make any Tanglewood veteran feel very much at home.

Similar Design

The pie-shape Shed at Tanglewood obviously was the soundest of design. The Blossom pavilion is in the same wedge shape. There are seats for 4,642 seats inside and room for up to 15,000 on the sloping lawn surrounding the shed.

There is one major deviation on the interior design that makes Blossom superior to Tanglewood. There are no columns inside the structure giving the entire audience an unimpeded view of the stage. To achieve this construction, Architects Schafer, Flynn & van Dijk of Cleveland called for 21 long-span welded pipe trusses to support the sloping roof. The longest trusses span 175 feet and cantilever for another 28 feet to provide a covered, curved promenade at the rear of the pavilion seats. The trusses rest on a huge inclined steel arch which bears on two massive underground footings and is supported by 10 sloping, tapered steel columns which are outside the pavilion seats.

The sides and the rear of the shell are open for the benefit of the grass customers.

The interior, even without the support columns, bears a strange resemblance to Tanglewood. The entire stage area is sheathed in cedar boards including the ceiling which has been extended out over the audience for maximum accoutical effect.

From inside the shell it becomes apparent that the acoustical engineers Christopher Jaffe and Hinrich Keiholz drew on experimentation done both at Tanglewood and Lincoln Center to overcome sound distortion problems.

Space for Opera

Although the pavilion is designed primarily for orchestra and choral use, it will be possible to stage ballet, opera and other presentations.

The ancillary facilities provided at Blossom raise the center several notches over Tanglewood. Orchestra members' locker rooms are located under the stage. There are six rehearsal rooms, rooms for the radio and television manager as well as a 60 by 50-foot choral room.

In the same area they have constructed a suite of ten rooms for the music library, the conductor's room, room for the associate conductor, the orchestra manager and rooms for guests artists.

Blossom's luxurious accommodations put Tanglewood's rustic rooms to shame.

Striking Similarities

There were many striking similarities in the programming at Blossom. Many artists appeared last summer both at Tanglewood and Blossom. This duplication extended into the field of jazz and folk attraction which made a smashing debut in Lenox this past summer under the title of Contemporary Trends. The Association and Ravi Shankar were among the artists to perform at both centers.

Mr. Hood struck a familiar note when he reported that the center is "considering revising the sound system to accommodate the smaller groups which appeared on the popular specials. The sound system, "he stated" proved superb for symphony concerts, but was obviously not designed for such performers as The Association."

His observations were exactly the same as those made by Gunther Schuller who headed the contemporary music activities group at Tanglewood. Schuller, incidentally, served on the music advisory council of the Blossom Festival School of the Cleveland Orchestra.

The spread of the summer music festival concept has created a spirit of friendly competition among the various centers.

When The Association arrived in Lenox fresh from their appearance in Blossom, the first question asked by Marvin Schofer, Mr. Hood's counterpart at Tanglewood was: "How well did they draw at Blossom?"

Coincidentally, The Association placed second at both Tanglewood and Blossom to Van Cliburn.

LATEST ADDITION to the growing number of summer music festivals was the Blossom Music Festival which became the summer home for the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra this past summer. The center is located on a 520-acre site just 40 minutes from Cleveland. The pavilion's shape reflets the effectiveness of the pioneering efforts at Tanglewood in Lenox, the home of the country's first permanent summer festival.

ONE MISSING ITEM in the Blossom Music Center's pavilion which veterans of Tanglewood should realize immediately is that the interior view is unobstructed by support columns. The Ohio center's roof is supported by gigantic steel trusses anchored outside building. There are 4,642 seats on inside and room for 15,000 outside.

BLOSSOM MUSIC CENTER ADDING FIVE WEEKS

Cleveland, Dec. 17.

Despite an operating loss in its first year, Blossom Music Center plans five-week expansion summer program to 12 weeks next year for the Cleveland Orchestra.

Last year's seven-week season attracted 190,000, according to Fred M. Rankin, president of Musical Arts Assn. Income from all sources amounted to $536,119 against operating expenses of $878,417. However the $342,298 deficit included musicians salaries of $247,875—which had been guaranteed—plus non-recurring expenses of $94,423.

Rankin said this amounted to a "break-even basis." He added the orchestra's attractions average 5,000 "a figure comparable to venerable Berkshire Festival." New York City Ballet, in four shows averaged 5,300 and popular specials, 9,200. Tijuana Brass drew 13,587 and 16,142 on two successive August nights (5 & 6).

Next year will see an earlier start plus increase in popular features including jazz-folk nights.

Variety Dec. '68

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239.

NOV 16 New England

A CRITIC'S NOTEBOOK

Summer Festivals Multiplying in East

By PETER ALTMAN
Minneapolis Star Critic

Cool evenings and earlier sunsets herald not only the advent of autumn, but the end of another season of summer festivals.

Altman

Minnesota is not yet overrun with these shirtsleeve congregations of the arts. But it appeared from my summer perch in Cambridge, Mass. that on the East Coast the number of rural cultural installations is multiplying almost as fast as the number of "major league" sports teams. A corresponding decline of standards sometimes seemed general.

Summer music and strawhat theater can be stimulating, unaffected, fully professional and praiseworthy. The desire of musicians for year-round salary makes inevitable the proliferation of summer symphony concerts, and many of these will be in different format than traditional season programs.

Musicians and actors, like insurance underwriters and garbagemen, like to escape from sweltering cities into casual, shady environments. They like to be free from commercial pressures, deadlines and rackety air conditioners. Summer festivals are one way they can get away without going hungry. So long as city dwellers who go to summer houses in the country crave some reminders of civilization, they will have markets for their labors.

But festivals, city or country, highpowered or amateur, must have some reason for existence, some personality, some justification beyond finance, if they are to deserve our attention.

All too often this is not the case. An orchestra's summer festival turns out to be reprises of the most tired works from the previous season. A summer theater's programs reek with tried-and-true comedies originally designed for escape, which many playgoers now want to escape.

Festivals get more and more to be big business. The Cleveland Orchestra's new Blossom Center is a multi-million dollar facility; the Saratoga, N.Y. Performing Arts Center must draw thousands of persons to each performance to break even. Such size forces conservative programming.

Going to the Boston Symphony's summer home at Tanglewood to hear one of the world's best orchestras play in beautiful Berkshire surroundings can never be unrewarding. But why, oh why, does the season have to consist of all Tchaikovsky concerts, all Brahms programs?

Do bookers think that when concertgoers leave the city, they leave their brains behind? Do we park our imaginations at the city limits? Classics are classics because they deserve to be, but there are many less familiar works which we also should have a chance to discover, and a relaxed atmosphere encourages openmindedness.

Some smaller festivals in the East try to really use the summer for innovation, experiment, challenge. The Berkshire Playhouse this summer presented only new plays, by interesting writers like Elaine May, Jack Gelber and William Gibson. Because the theater, directed by Arthur Penn, has built up a good reputation, and because the plays got good reviews in the Boston and New York papers, box office business was brisk even though the plays were unknown.

At Dartmouth College, in Hanover, N.H., the summer music festival is built around composers-in-residence, who are invited to meet with festival musicians. Each composer is present for two weeks, and his latest works are introduced.

At Woodstock, N.Y., in the beautiful Hudson valley, I saw a fine production of Debussy's opera "L'Enfant Prodigue" that proved the worth of a neglected masterpiece. Amid the gargantuan chaos of Newport, and the impossible impersonality of the jazz and folk festival evening concerts, are wonderful, stimulating, little-attended afternoon workshops.

Before long the Minneapolis Symphony will almost certainly be having full summer seasons, some place outdoors, rather than just those awful Pops in the auditorium. The St. Paul Civic Opera is eyeing summer tent operations. College facilities are too good to be idle all summer.

Let's hope that those people lucky enough to have use of our facilities have a little confidence in us, the public. Informality is marvelous, but let's use it to stretch our mental muscles all year round.

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 282,219

SEP 9 1968

Cleveland Symphony's Summer Home Has Familiar Look

Tanglewood Influence Recognized

By EDWARD J. FARRELL

It would appear that Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center have given more to the world of music than summer employment for musicians and summer enjoyment for the masses.

The Cleveland Symphony Orchestra this year joined other major musical organizations with a summer music festival. The orchestra moved out of Cleveland to Northampton Township some 40 minutes by highway from Cleveland and 15 minutes from Akron.

The summer site was appropriately named the Blossom Music Center honoring a long-prominent Cleveland family who had donated $1.3 million toward the $6.6 million total cost.

Success Declared

The first seven-week season at Blossom has been declared and unqualified success. The total attendance went over the 192,000 mark. Officials of Blossom have given serious thought recently to extending the season next year. Louis Hood, director of public relations for the Cleveland Orchestra, said the season may go up to 10 or 12 weeks next year.

In reviewing the first season, Hood said; "We are, of course, enormously proud of Blossom, and still more amazed that the opening was on schedule — less than a year after the construction.

"As always with a new facility," he noted," we encountered problems. The main one was a traffic situation outside the grounds. The current two-lane road leading to the center's entrance will be improved and widened by next summer."

The problem at Blossom sounds strangely familiar to Tanglewood patrons. There are, however, many other aspects of Blossom that would make any Tanglewood veteran feel very much at home.

Similar Design

The pie-shape Shed at Tanglewood obviously was the soundest of design. The Blossom pavilion is in the same wedge shape. There are seats for 4,642 seats inside and room for up to 15,000 on the sloping lawn surrounding the shed.

There is one major deviation on the interior design that makes Blossom superior to Tanglewood. There are no columns inside the structure giving the entire audience an unimpeded view of the stage. To achieve this construction, Architects Schafer, Flynn & van Dijk of Cleveland called for 21 long-span welded pipe trusses to support the sloping roof. The longest trusses span 175 feet and cantilever for another 28 feet to provide a covered, curved promenade at the rear of the pavilion seats. The trusses rest on a huge inclined steel arch which bears on two massive underground footings and is supported by 10 sloping, tapered steel columns which are outside the pavilion seats.

The sides and the rear of the shell are open for the benefit of the grass customers.

The interior, even without the support columns, bears a strange resemblance to Tanglewood. The entire stage area is sheathed in cedar boards including the ceiling which has been extended out over the audience for maximum accoutical effect.

From inside the shell it becomes apparent that the acoustical engineers Christopher Jaffe and Hinrich Keiholz drew on experimentation done both at Tanglewood and Lincoln Center to overcome sound distortion problems.

Space for Opera

Although the pavilion is designed primarily for orchestra and choral use, it will be possible to stage ballet, opera and other presentations.

The ancillary facilities provided at Blossom raise the center several notches over Tanglewood. Orchestra members' locker rooms are located under the stage. There are six rehearsal rooms, rooms for the radio and television manager as well as a 60 by 50-foot choral room.

In the same area they have constructed a suite of ten rooms for the music library, the conductor's room, room for the associate conductor, the orchestra manager and rooms for guests artists.

Blossom's luxurious accommodations put Tanglewood's rustic rooms to shame.

Striking Similarities

There were many striking similarities in the programming at Blossom. Many artists appeared last summer both at Tanglewood and Blossom. This duplication extended into the field of jazz and folk attraction which made a smashing debut in Lenox this past summer under the title of Contemporary Trends. The Association and Ravi Shankar were among the artists to perform at both centers.

Mr. Hood struck a familiar note when he reported that the center is "considering revising the sound system to accommodate the smaller groups which appeared on the popular specials. The sound system, "he stated" proved superb for symphony concerts, but was obviously not designed for such performers as The Association."

His observations were exactly the same as those made by Gunther Schuller who headed the contemporary music activities group at Tanglewood. Schuller, incidentally, served on the music advisory council of the Blossom Festival School of the Cleveland Orchestra.

The spread of the summer music festival concept has created a spirit of friendly competition among the various centers.

When The Association arrived in Lenox fresh from their appearance in Blossom, the first question asked by Marvin Schofer, Mr. Hood's counterpart at Tanglewood was: "How well did they draw at Blossom?"

Coincidentally, The Association placed second at both Tanglewood and Blossom to Van Cliburn.

LATEST ADDITION to the growing number of summer music festivals was the Blossom Music Festival which became the summer home for the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra this past summer. The center is located on a 520-acre site just 40 minutes from Cleveland. The pavilion's shape reflets the effectiveness of the pioneering efforts at Tanglewood in Lenox, the home of the country's first permanent summer festival.

ONE MISSING ITEM in the Blossom Music Center's pavilion which veterans of Tanglewood should realize immediately is that the interior view is unobstructed by support columns. The Ohio center's roof is supported by gigantic steel trusses anchored outside building. There are 4,642 seats on inside and room for 15,000 outside.

BLOSSOM MUSIC CENTER ADDING FIVE WEEKS

Cleveland, Dec. 17.

Despite an operating loss in its first year, Blossom Music Center plans five-week expansion summer program to 12 weeks next year for the Cleveland Orchestra.

Last year's seven-week season attracted 190,000, according to Fred M. Rankin, president of Musical Arts Assn. Income from all sources amounted to $536,119 against operating expenses of $878,417. However the $342,298 deficit included musicians salaries of $247,875—which had been guaranteed—plus non-recurring expenses of $94,423.

Rankin said this amounted to a "break-even basis." He added the orchestra's attractions average 5,000 "a figure comparable to venerable Berkshire Festival." New York City Ballet, in four shows averaged 5,300 and popular specials, 9,200. Tijuana Brass drew 13,587 and 16,142 on two successive August nights (5 & 6).

Next year will see an earlier start plus increase in popular features including jazz-folk nights.

Variety Dec. '68

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,523
SEP 16 1968
New England

A CRITIC'S NOTEBOOK

Summer Festivals Multiplying in East

By PETER ALTMAN
Minneapolis Star Critic

Cool evenings and earlier sunsets herald not only the advent of autumn, but the end of another season of summer festivals.

Altman

Minnesota is not yet overrun with these shirtsleeve congregations of the arts. But it appeared from my summer perch in Cambridge, Mass. that on the East Coast the number of rural cultural installations is multiplying almost as fast as the number of "major league" sports teams. A corresponding decline of standards sometimes seemed general.

Summer music and strawhat theater can be stimulating, unaffected, fully professional and praiseworthy. The desire of musicians for year-round salary makes inevitable the proliferation of summer symphony concerts, and many of these will be in different format than traditional season programs.

Musicians and actors, like insurance underwriters and garbagemen, like to escape from sweltering cities into casual, shady environments. They like to be free from commercial pressures, deadlines and rackety air conditioners. Summer festivals are one way they can get away without going hungry. So long as city dwellers who go to summer houses in the country crave some reminders of civilization, they will have markets for their labors.

But festivals, city or country, highpowered or amateur, must have some reason for existence, some personality, some justification beyond finance, if they are to deserve our attention.

All too often this is not the case. An orchestra's summer festival turns out to be reprises of the most tired works from the previous season. A summer theater's programs reek with tried-and-true comedies originally designed for escape, which many playgoers now want to escape.

Festivals get more and more to be big business. The Cleveland Orchestra's new Blossom Center is a multi-million dollar facility; the Saratoga, N.Y. Performing Arts Center must draw thousands of persons to each performance to break even. Such size forces conservative programming.

Going to the Boston Symphony's summer home at Tanglewood to hear one of the world's best orchestras play in beautiful Berkshire surroundings can never be unrewarding. But why, oh why, does the season have to consist of all Tchaikovsky concerts, all Brahms programs?

Do bookers think that when concertgoers leave the city, they leave their brains behind? Do we park our imaginations at the city limits? Classics are classics because they deserve to be, but there are many less familiar works which we also should have a chance to discover, and a relaxed atmosphere encourages openmindedness.

Some smaller festivals in the East try to really use the summer for innovation, experiment, challenge. The Berkshire Playhouse this summer presented only new plays, by interesting writers like Elaine May, Jack Gelber and William Gibson. Because the theater, directed by Arthur Penn, has built up a good reputation, and because the plays got good reviews in the Boston and New York papers, box office business was brisk even though the plays were unknown.

At Dartmouth College, in Hanover, N.H., the summer music festival is built around composers-in-residence, who are invited to meet with festival musicians. Each composer is present for two weeks, and his latest works are introduced.

At Woodstock, N.Y., in the beautiful Hudson valley, I saw a fine production of Debussy's opera "L'Enfant Prodigue" that proved the worth of a neglected masterpiece. Amid the gargantuan chaos of Newport, and the impossible impersonality of the jazz and folk festival evening concerts, are wonderful, stimulating, little-attended afternoon workshops.

Before long the Minneapolis Symphony will almost certainly be having full summer seasons, some place outdoors, rather than just those awful Pops in the auditorium. The St. Paul Civic Opera is eyeing summer tent operations. College facilities are too good to be idle all summer.

Let's hope that those people lucky enough to have use of our facilities have a little confidence in us, the public. Informality is marvelous, but let's use it to stretch our mental muscles all year round.

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 282,219
SEP 9 1968

146.

FRIENDS OF TANGLEWOOD

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 12, 1968

Tanglewood Lists Grant, Program

LENOX, MVASS. — A challenge grant of 125,000 over a three-year period has been offered on a mtaching basis to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Rockefeller Roundation. The grant will aid the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. Annnouncement of the grant, which requires The Friedns of Music at Tanglewood to raise $50,000 this year, was made at the same time that program details were announced for the Center's annual Tanglewood-On-Parade program by Erich Leinsdorf, who is both Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood-On-Parade which this yearis on Wednesday, August 14, is a daylong series of performance by students of the Berkshire Musice Center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Consservatory. It culminates in a gala concet by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, after which there traditionally is a colorful display of fire works.

This year, performing artists from neighboring performng groups will also participate. Frank Langella, who co-starred with Anne Bancroft in the Berkshire Theatre Festival's recent prmiere of William Gibson's "A cry of Players", will narrate Prokofieff's "Peter And The Wolf," joining the combined orchestras under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

The Norman Wlaker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform to Colgrass's "As Quiet As," a work recorded and extensively played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert will also include three Wakner excerpts: Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," the funerla music from "Goetterdammeung," and "The Rie of the Vakyies," the latter wit voices.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

OCT 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Strengthens Roots

LENOX — Formation of a Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends has been announced by Talcott M. Banks, recently elected president of the orchestra's board of trustees.

Link to Community

The announcement was made after a series of organizational sessions attended by council members, trustees and orchestra staff. The meetings were held at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

"The new council's purpose is to provide a closer link with the Berkshire community," Banks said, "and to plan and sustain a healthy future for the orchestra's Tanglewood activities.

"During the years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made Tanglewood its summer home, many of its members have bought homes here and established close ties. We hope the new Council of Tanglewood Friends will help to make the Boston Symphony - Berkshire relationship even closer, and put it on a year-round basis," he said.

Alsop Chairman

It also was announced that the council, which replaces the former Tanglewood Advisory Committee, will take charge of the annual fund appeal.

Chairman of the new council is Robert C. Alsop of Stockbridge. Alsop, 45, an attorney, is international counsel for Stanley Home Products of Westfield. A graduate of Harvard, and the University of Virginia Law School, his home was originally in the Berkshires, to which he returned in 1967.

Vice-chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends is Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of Lenox. Other charter members are: Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner L. Brown of Richmond, Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mr. and Mrs. David T. Dana, Jr. of Lenox, Mrs. George Edman of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Fromm of Chicago, Ill., Mr. and Mrs. John H. P. Gould of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. John Mason Harding of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Hatch of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Amory Houghton, Jr. of Corning, N. Y., Walter Howard of Tyringham, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Howitt of New York City and Lenox, and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky of New York, and Lenox.

Also: Karl Lipsky of New Marlboro, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Lord of Stockbridge, Mr. and Mrs. Frank McCabe of Rensselaer, N. Y., Charles Meloun of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Miller of Pittsfield, Miss Margo Miller of Boston and Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. George E. Mole of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Jeffery Potter of Tyringham, Mr. and Mrs. George T. Sewall of South Lee, Mrs. John L. Senior of New York and Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. George Stedman of Loudonville, N. Y., Mr. and Mrs. Whitney S. Stoddard of Williamstown, Mr. and Mrs. Warren B. Syer of Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. George Wilde of Stockbridge and Mrs. C. D. Jackson of New York City.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

OCT 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Advisory Unit Formed

LENOX—The formation of a new Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends has been announced by Talcott M. Banks, recently-elected president of the orchestra's board of trustees.

The announcement was made by Mr. Banks at the conclusion of the council's weekend organizational and planning sessions attended by council members, trustees and staff of the orchestra. The meetings were held in the main house on the grounds of Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

"The new council's purpose is to provide a closer link with the Berkshire community," Mr. Banks said, "and to plan and sustain a healthy future for the orchestra's Tanglewood activities. During the years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made Tanglewood its summer home, many of its members have bought homes here and established close ties. We hope the new Council of Tanglewood Friends will help to make the Boston Symphony-Berkshire relationship even closer, and put it on a year-round basis."

The council, which replaces the former Tanglewood Advisory Committee, will take charge of the annual Friends fund appeal.

Chairman of the new council is Robert C. Alsop of Stockbridge. Vice chairman is Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of Lenox and Washington, D.C.

Tanglewood Friends Council Has Organizational Session

LENOX — The formation of a new Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends was announced by Talcott M. Banks, recently elected president of the orchestra's board of trustees.

The announcement was made by Mr. Banks at the conclusion of the council's weekend organizational and planning sessions attended by the council's members and trustees and staff of the orchestra. The meetings were held in the Main House at Tanglewood.

Chairman

Chairman of the new council is Robert C. Alsop of Stockbridge. Mr. Alsop, 45, an attorney, is international counsel for Stanley Home Products in Westfield.

Vice chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends is Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of Lenox and Washington, D.C.

Other charter members of the council are:

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Berle of Lenox and New York, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner L. Brown of Richmond, Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mr. and Mrs. David T. Dana Jr. of Lenox, Mrs. George Edman of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Fromm of Chicago, Ill., Mr. and Mrs. John H. P. Gould of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. John Harding of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Hatch of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Amory Houghton Jr. of Corning, N.Y., and Walter Howard of Tyringham.

Also, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Howitt of New York and Lenox, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky of New York and Lenox, Karl Lipsky of New Marlboro, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Lord of Stockbridge, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. McCabe of Rensselaer, N.Y., Charles Meloun of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Miller of Pittsfield, Miss Margo Miller of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. George Mole of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Jeffrey Potter of Tyringham, Mr. and Mrs. George T. Sewall of South Lee, Mrs. John L. Senior of New York and Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. George Stedman of Loudonville, N.Y., Mr. and Mrs. Whitney S. Stoddard of Williamstown, Mr. and Mrs. Warren B. Syer of Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. George Wilde of Stockbridge and Mrs. C. D. Jackson of New York.

On Tanglewood Planning Group

Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Miller of Pittsfield, Mass., are among the charter members of a new Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends. Miller is editor of The Register and vice president of the Torrington Register Publishing Corp.

The council replaces the former Tanglewood advisory committee and is designed to provide a closer link with the Berkshire community, plan and sustain a healthy future for the orchestra's Tanglewood activities.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
CIRC. 11,750

OCT 16 1968 New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

AUG 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

AUG 13 1968

Boston Symphony to Match Rockefeller Grant

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — A challenge grant of $125,000 over a three-year period has been offered on a matching basis to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Rockefeller Foundation. The grant will aid the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. Announcement of the grant, which requires The Friends Of Music at Tanglewood to raise $50,000 this year, was made at the same time that program details were announced for the Center's annual Tanglewood-On-Parade program by Erich Leinsdorf, who is both Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood-On-Parade which this year is Wednesday, August 14, is a day-long series of performances by students of the Berkshire Music Center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory. It culminates in a gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, after which there traditionally is a colorful display of fireworks.

This year, performing artists from neighboring performing groups will also participate. Frank Langella, who co-starred with Anne Bancroft in the Berkshire Theatre Festival's recent premiere of William Gibson's "A Cry of Players," will narrate Prokofieff's "Peter And The Wolf," joining the combined orchestras under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

The Norman Walker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform to Colgrass's "As Quiet As," a work recorded and extensively played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert will also include three Wagner excerpts: Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," the funeral music from "Goetterdammerung," and "The Ride of the Valkyries," the latter with voices.

Between 2 p.m., when the day's activities begin, and the gala concert at 8 p.m., there will be vocal and chamber music performed by students of the Berkshire Music Center, a composers forum, programs by the Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus, both of which are under the direction of the orchestra's Assistant Conductor, Charles Wilson, and performances and demonstrations by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra, dance and theatre workshops, and the New England Conservatory Seminars.

"A heartwarming package," Erich Leinsdorf called the joint announcement of the Rockefeller, Foundation Grant and the Tanglewood-On-Parade program. "Tanglewood - On - Parade is the one opportunity we have each year to put on display nearly all the multifaceted gifts of our young men and women, to display them in a single day so that the public can appreciate the scope of their study and accomplishment. Tanglewood-On-Parade is a program that always draws a large attendance and greatly benefits the Berkshire Music Center through The Friends of Music at Tanglewood. To be able to announce the generous grant from the Rockefeller Foundation at the same time, and to note that under its provisions it makes the public support of Tanglewood-On-Parade of even greater benefit to us is a genuine cause for celebration. We are deeply grateful."

146.

FRIENDS OF TANGLEWOOD

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 12, 1968

Tanglewood Lists Grant, Program

LENOX, MVASS. — A challenge grant of 125,000 over a three-year period has been offered on a mtaching basis to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Rockefeller Roundation. The grant will aid the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. Annnouncement of the grant, which requires The Friedns of Music at Tanglewood to raise $50,000 this year, was made at the same time that program details were announced for the Center's annual Tanglewood-On-Parade program by Erich Leinsdorf, who is both Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood-On-Parade which this yearis on Wednesday, August 14, is a daylong series of performance by students of the Berkshire Musice Center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Consservatory. It culminates in a gala concet by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, after which there traditionally is a colorful display of fire works.

This year, performing artists from neighboring performng groups will also participate. Frank Langella, who co-starred with Anne Bancroft in the Berkshire Theatre Festival's recent prmiere of William Gibson's "A cry of Players", will narrate Prokofieff's "Peter And The Wolf," joining the combined orchestras under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

The Norman Wlaker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform to Colgrass's "As Quiet As," a work recorded and extensively played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert will also include three Wakner excerpts: Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," the funerla music from "Goetterdammeung," and "The Rie of the Vakyies," the latter wit voices.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

OCT 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Advisory Unit Formed

LENOX—The formation of a new Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends has been announced by Talcott M. Banks, recently-elected president of the orchestra's board of trustees.

The announcement was made by Mr. Banks at the conclusion of the council's weekend organizational and planning sessions attended by council members, trustees and staff of the orchestra. The meetings were held in the main house on the grounds of Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

"The new council's purpose is to provide a closer link with the Berkshire community," Mr. Banks said, "and to plan and sustain a healthy future for the orchestra's Tanglewood activities. During the years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made Tanglewood its summer home, many of its members have bought homes here and established close ties. We hope the new Council of Tanglewood Friends will help to make the Boston Symphony-Berkshire relationship even closer, and put it on a year-round basis."

The council, which replaces the former Tanglewood Advisory Committee, will take charge of the annual Friends fund appeal.

Chairman of the new council is Robert C. Alsop of Stockbridge. Vice chairman is Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of Lenox and Washington, D.C.

Tanglewood Friends Council Has Organizational Session

LENOX — The formation of a new Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends was announced by Talcott M. Banks, recently elected president of the orchestra's board of trustees.

The announcement was made by Mr. Banks at the conclusion of the council's weekend organizational and planning sessions attended by the council's members and trustees and staff of the orchestra. The meetings were held in the Main House at Tanglewood.

Chairman

Chairman of the new council is Robert C. Alsop of Stockbridge. Mr. Alsop, 45, an attorney, is international counsel for Stanley Home Products in Westfield.

Vice chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends is Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of Lenox and Washington, D.C.

Other charter members of the council are:

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Berle of Lenox and New York, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner L. Brown of Richmond, Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mr. and Mrs. David T. Dana Jr. of Lenox, Mrs. George Edman of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Fromm of Chicago, Ill., Mr. and Mrs. John H. P. Gould of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. John Harding of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Hatch of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Amory Houghton Jr. of Corning, N.Y., and Walter Howard of Tyringham.

Also, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Howitt of New York and Lenox, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky of New York and Lenox, Karl Lipsky of New Marlboro, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Lord of Stockbridge, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. McCabe of Rensselaer, N.Y., Charles Meloun of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Miller of Pittsfield, Miss Margo Miller of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. George Mole of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Jeffrey Potter of Tyringham, Mr. and Mrs. George T. Sewall of South Lee, Mrs. John L. Senior of New York and Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. George Stedman of Loudonville, N.Y., Mr. and Mrs. Whitney S. Stoddard of Williamstown, Mr. and Mrs. Warren B. Syer of Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. George Wilde of Stockbridge and Mrs. C. D. Jackson of New York.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

OCT 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Strengthens Roots

LENOX — Formation of a Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends has been announced by Talcott M. Banks, recently elected president of the orchestra's board of trustees.

Link to Community

The announcement was made after a series of organizational sessions attended by council members, trustees and orchestra staff. The meetings were held at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

"The new council's purpose is to provide a closer link with the Berkshire community," Banks said, "and to plan and sustain a healthy future for the orchestra's Tanglewood activities.

"During the years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made Tanglewood its summer home, many of its members have bought homes here and established close ties. We hope the new Council of Tanglewood Friends will help to make the Boston Symphony - Berkshire relationship even closer, and put it on a year-round basis," he said.

Alsop Chairman

It also was announced that the council, which replaces the former Tanglewood Advisory Committee, will take charge of the annual fund appeal.

Chairman of the new council is Robert C. Alsop of Stockbridge. Alsop, 45, an attorney, is international counsel for Stanley Home Products of Westfield. A graduate of Harvard, and the University of Virginia Law School, his home was originally in the Berkshires, to which he returned in 1967.

Vice-chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends is Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of Lenox. Other charter members are: Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner L. Brown of Richmond, Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mr. and Mrs. David T. Dana, Jr. of Lenox, Mrs. George Edman of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Fromm of Chicago, Ill., Mr. and Mrs. John H. P. Gould of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. John Mason Harding of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Hatch of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Amory Houghton, Jr. of Corning, N. Y., Walter Howard of Tyringham, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Howitt of New York City and Lenox, and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky of New York, and Lenox.

Also: Karl Lipsky of New Marlboro, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Lord of Stockbridge, Mr. and Mrs. Frank McCabe of Rensselaer, N. Y., Charles Meloun of Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Miller of Pittsfield, Miss Margo Miller of Boston and Pittsfield, Mr. and Mrs. George E. Mole of Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. Jeffery Potter of Tyringham, Mr. and Mrs. George T. Sewall of South Lee, Mrs. John L. Senior of New York and Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. George Stedman of Loudonville, N. Y., Mr. and Mrs. Whitney S. Stoddard of Williamstown, Mr. and Mrs. Warren B. Syer of Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. George Wilde of Stockbridge and Mrs. C. D. Jackson of New York City.

On Tanglewood Planning Group

Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Miller of Pittsfield, Mass., are among the charter members of a new Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends. Miller is editor of The Register and vice president of the Torrington Register Publishing Corp.

The council replaces the former Tanglewood advisory committee and is designed to provide a closer link with the Berkshire community, plan and sustain a healthy future for the orchestra's Tanglewood activities.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

AUG 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,096

AUG 13 1968

Boston Symphony to Match Rockefeller Grant

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — A challenge grant of $125,000 over a three-year period has been offered on a matching basis to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Rockefeller Foundation. The grant will aid the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. Announcement of the grant, which requires The Friends Of Music at Tanglewood to raise $50,000 this year, was made at the same time that program details were announced for the Center's annual Tanglewood-On-Parade program by Erich Leinsdorf, who is both Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood-On-Parade which this year is Wednesday, August 14, is a day-long series of performances by students of the Berkshire Music Center and the related Tanglewood programs of Boston University and the New England Conservatory. It culminates in a gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, after which there traditionally is a colorful display of fireworks.

This year, performing artists from neighboring performing groups will also participate. Frank Langella, who co-starred with Anne Bancroft in the Berkshire Theatre Festival's recent premiere of William Gibson's "A Cry of Players," will narrate Prokofieff's "Peter And The Wolf," joining the combined orchestras under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

The Norman Walker Dance Company, representing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, will perform to Colgrass's "As Quiet As," a work recorded and extensively played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert will also include three Wagner excerpts: Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," the funeral music from "Goetterdammerung," and "The Ride of the Valkyries," the latter with voices.

Between 2 p.m., when the day's activities begin, and the gala concert at 8 p.m., there will be vocal and chamber music performed by students of the Berkshire Music Center, a composers forum, programs by the Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus, both of which are under the direction of the orchestra's Assistant Conductor, Charles Wilson, and performances and demonstrations by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra, dance and theatre workshops, and the New England Conservatory Seminars.

"A heartwarming package," Erich Leinsdorf called the joint announcement of the Rockefeller, Foundation Grant and the Tanglewood-On-Parade program. "Tanglewood - On - Parade is the one opportunity we have each year to put on display nearly all the multifaceted gifts of our young men and women, to display them in a single day so that the public can appreciate the scope of their study and accomplishment. Tanglewood-On-Parade is a program that always draws a large attendance and greatly benefits the Berkshire Music Center through The Friends of Music at Tanglewood. To be able to announce the generous grant from the Rockefeller Foundation at the same time, and to note that under its provisions it makes the public support of Tanglewood-On-Parade of even greater benefit to us is a genuine cause for celebration. We are deeply grateful."

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
CIRC. 11,[illegible]

OCT 16 1968 New England Newsclip

TABULATIONS AND EVALUATIONS

FRIDAY, JULY 26, 1968 THE SPRINGFIELD UNION

sight and sound

Tanglewood Is Checking Up

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

The powers behind the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood are not ones to rest on their laurels, as fragrant or prestigious as they may be after all these years of elegant concerts.

They are conducting a continuous random survey to gather information for a demographic profile of the Tanglewood audience.

The Objective

Let me quote a few words from Webster under the "demographic" entry: " . . . relating to the dynamic balance of a population especially with regard to density and capacity for expansion or decline."

Does that give us a hint of what they are up to? Yes. They are trying to discover scientifically if their long - standing notion of who goes to Tanglewood and where he comes from and what he is like is really true.

They want to know if they should change their advertising or promotion or procedure in order to retain Tanglewood's appeal to its audience.

At Each Gate

There are six gates at Tanglewood and at each this season is a counter who ticks off the entering music lovers according to a statistically "random" number which picks subjects for questioning.

The subject is then accompanied as he approaches his seat in the shed or spot on the lawn by a questioner with a list of 32 questions.

The questions seek to identify the listener according to where he is from and how long he is staying in the Tanglewood area, what sort of music listener he is in general, why he is attending this particular concert, what his attitudes are about the Tanglewood estate.

Facts Not Opinions

The questionnaire was designed by Harry Kraut, administrator of the Berkshire Music Center, and is intended, he says, to collect facts, not opinions.

It avoids opinions because recollections of impressions are hazy, says Harry, and because repliers to cultural questionnaires are likely to answer according to what kind of music lovers they would like to be rather than what kind they really are.

Harry says that the survey is reaching 250 of those who attend each of the season's 24 concerts and that the results will be kept secret.

Too bad. Some of the questions are interesting, such as: "Are you staying overnight? and, "Why did you come to Tanglewood this evening? . . . (check one) soloist, composer, conductor, orchestra, nice weather, pleasant scenery, someone brought me."

Probably we could draw some clever, fascinating false conclusions from all those statistics and make up some exciting, misleading stories from them.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,421
AUG 2 1968 New England Newsclip

222,293 Hear 1968 Concerts At Tanglewood

LENOX — The total attendance at Tanglewood's 1968 Berkshire Festival for all events for which attendance records were kept wss 222,293.

The figure includes the 24 Boston Symphony concerts, eight open rehearsals, pops, gala, and three contemporary trends concerts.

Attendance for the eight weekends only (24 BSO concerts plus eight open rehearsals) was 188,731.

In 1967, attendance at all events for which records were kept was 216,506. Attendance for the eight weekends only in 1967 was 185,551.

Conference Survey

Tanglewood Tops List As Tourist Attraction

Tanglewood is the most popular summer tourist attraction in Berkshire County, according to a survey of summer visitors made by the Berkshire Hills Conference.

"This may not sound like startling news," said John V. Geary, conference executive director, "but I am continually amazed by the number of people, including some who are in the tourist business, who downgrade the importance of Tanglewood to our economy."

The survey was conducted by mailing questionnaires to the 994 persons who made advance room reservations this past summer through the conference office. Geary said that an unusually high percentage of 358 questionnaires were returned.

Geary Cites Figures

"The most popular single attraction for those answering was Tanglewood," he reported. "Their answers show that 93 per cent attended at least one concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Forty-nine per cent said they attended performances at the area's summer theatres, and 47 per cent said they attended Jacob's Pillow."

Geary said that reports from conference members indicate that the summer tourist business was a record. He estimated that it was up 8 per cent over 1967 and 3 per cent above the previous record set in 1966.

He said the 994 advance reservations surpassed the previous record of 954 made in the summer of 1966 and was far ahead of the 1967 total of 775.

A majority of those answering the questionnaire indicated, according to Geary, that the two things they found of most benefit in deciding what to do in Berkshire County was the circle-tour map published by the conference and Berkshire Week, the summer Saturday supplement published by The Eagle.

Geary reported that a small percentage of those answering the survey complained about what they felt were exorbitantly high prices for motel rooms, especially on weekends.

"Although it is not within the jurisdiction of the conference to police room prices," he said, "we have looked into this situation in some detail this year and have found that, with only a few exceptions, the price for Berkshire bedrooms is within the norm found in other competitive vacation areas in New England and New York. The range is $16.80 to $37, and the average for a room at a motel with a swimming pool is $24 for weekends in the summer season."

Those answering the survey stayed here an average of 2¾ days and spent an average of $30 per day per person. Eight per cent of those answering came here in a two-person party. Fifty-three per cent were over 35 years old, and 73 per cent came from the New York metropolitan area.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
OCT 24 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Is Surveying Its Concert Audiences

In an effort to determine as much as possible about the varieties of people who visit Tanglewood each summer, the Berkshire Music Festival has begun a program to survey the audience at each concert.

Teams consisting of Tanglewood guides and students from the Berkshire Music Center have been approaching visitors with a 32-item questionnaire. The goal is to survey 250 visitors at each of the 24 regular symphony concerts, the eight open rehearsals, the three contemporary trends concerts, the Pops night and the Tanglewood-on-Parade gala. It is hoped that a total of 9,250 persons will be polled during the entire season.

"We make certain assumptions about the audience," said Marvin Schofer, the head of the Tanglewood press department, "based on long observation and a certain amount of research, and we'd like to know if our assumptions are borne out by a sampling of the audience, the results of which will be projected statistically."

The questionnaire asks about such subjects as home states, whether the subject came just to see friends, or to hear a special musical work, particular soloist or conductor, what his likes and dislikes about Tanglewood happen to be, his age, profession, and whether he has visited other festivals during the summer.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JUL 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Attendance 222,293

Tanglewood's 1968 Berkshire Festival in Lenox had an overall attendance of 222,293 persons — 6,000 greater than last season.

The attendance takes in 24 Boston Symphony concerts, eight open rehearsals, pops, gala, and three contemporary trends concerts.

Attendance for the eight weekend concerts of the Boston Symphony was 188,834 as compared to 185,551 a year ago. In 1967, attendance at all events was 216,506.

DEMOCRAT
HOLYOKE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,000
AUG 31 1968 New England Newsclip

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Tuesday, September 3, 1968

Attendance Up At Tanglewood For All Events

Total attendance at the 1968 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., for all events for which attendance records were kept was 222,293.

This figure includes the 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, eight open rehearsals, a pops concert, gala and three Contemporary Trends concerts.

Attendance for the eight weekends of the festival only (concerts and open rehearsals) was 188,734.

In 1967 attendance at all events was 216,506 and for the weekends only, 185,551.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,421
AUG 30 1969 New England Newsclip

sight and sound

Conglomerate Season Is Ended

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

Each of the seasons at Tanglewood seems to take on a special character that make it different from the others. Many factors are involved, even, sometimes, gossip.

Erich Leinsdorf's first season as director, 1963, was full of excitement and promise. Everyone, especially the members of the orchestra, was impressed by his energy and the lively plans he had for the orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center.

Air of Diffusion

The season just ended, his next to last, was pervaded by an air of indirection, of diffusion, partly because of his position as a lame-duck boss, and partly because the musical programs and the Music Center activities were more conglomerate than heretofore.

In Leinsdorf's first season, the programs were focused around Prokofieff, and several of his seldom-heard works were presented.

This season the programs had no discernable focal point, except the usual scheduling of the standard concert sources: Brahms, Beethoven and other regular romantics.

New Midweek Series

Even the innovations tended to be diffuse. The new, midweek series called Contemporary Trends offered jazz, folk music, Indian music and rock - n - roll in the well -founded belief that these disparate sounds are contributing to the work of contemporary so-called serious composers.

And the students in the Music Center division conducted by Boston University were offered courses involving the graphic arts as well as drama and dance.

The most startling contribution to the conglomerate idea, of course, was the production of "Elephant Steps," identified as an occult opera by its creators, Stanley Silverman and Richard Foreman, as part of the Festival of Contemporary American Music sponsored jointly by the Music Center and the Fromm Foundation.

Sidelights of Interest

"Elephant Steps" is an attempt to combine disparate materials from the performing and graphic arts using the technique currently called "mixed - media" and to deliberately insert discontinuity into the combination.

It probably was the most concentrated diffusion of both festivals, if I may be forgiven the paradox.

But before I use up all my space with idle fancies, let me call attention to two or three bsidelights of interest to me before I list a handful of the performances during the regular season which I found most impressive.

State Council Group

Several days each week there was a large group of youngsters gathered from remote regions of the state being introduced to the beauties of one of Berkshire County's most attractive meadows, Tanglewood, as well as the sort of music being made there.

Their visits were sponsored by the State Council of the Arts, an agency which ought to have more money, especially if it continues to use it for such worthy purposes.

The great, 6000-seat shed celebrated its 30th birthday Aug. 4. Although it is no longer the most attractive of its many summer-festival imitators, it is still the one to beat acoustically.

Best-Liked Programs

Erich Leinsdorf, the retiring conductor, was the focus of sentimental insterest because of the announcement, first, of his divorce early in the year (he has five children) and second, of his marriage early in August to Vera Graf, a violinist.

Now let me, after a quick check of the season's programs, list a few of the performances I liked best: Beverly Sills, soprano, July 6; Claude Frank, pianist, July 7; Joseph Silverstein, violinist, July 12 and Aug. 18; Jorge Bolet, July 26 (Liszt); Steinberg's conducting of Mahler, Aug. 4; Gina Bachauer, pianist, Aug. 9, 10 and 11; Leinsdorf's conducting of Brahms' Symphony No. 1, Aug. 25.

149

When Is a Festival Not a Festival?

By McLAREN HARRIS

The anticipation which greeted the facet of the so-called cultural explosion represented by the flowering of so many summer music festivals across the country has now become tinged with slight misgivings.

Summer festivals have essentially three attractions: most of them present music in a casual atmosphere, where concert-going may be combined with vacationing; many of them make available to outlying areas the cultural advantages enjoyed by cities during the winter season; and they provide summer employment for musicians who might otherwise suffer from only seasonal prosperity.

These are all good, healthy attributes. But there are festivals and festivals; beyond these characteristics the offerings differ widely, and upon such offerings often depends the success or failure of a festival beyond a season or two.

TWO FESTIVALS within our region provide an excellent opportunity for comparison — or contrast: the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, one of the oldest festivals in the country; and the Saratoga Performing Arts Festival a short distance across the New York state line, one of the newest. The differences between Tanglewood and Saratoga could hardly be greater.

Tanglewood was conceived and developed as a permanent summer home for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and around its core of 24 BSO concerts over eight weekends there exists a full-fledged summer music school for performers, the Berkshire Music Center, with its own orchestra; chamber ensembles from the Boston Symphony and the Music Center; guest artists; a week-long Contemporary Music Festival; and more. All activities are coordinated by central planning and authority which gives the Berkshire Festival both unity and breadth.

SARATOGA, on the hand, presents two prominent and entirely separate organizations — the New York Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra — each of which gives several performances a week during separate months (the ballet in July, the orchestra in August).

There are also many one-night engagements with guest performers ranging in variety from the De Pasquale String Quartet to Rowan and Martin's "Laff-In". No one organization pays any apparent attention to the others. There is little if any continuity even among Philadelphia Orchestra programs. It's simply a new show every night.

The press, some patrons and even a few promoters are beginning to complain that the Saratoga Festival lacks the personality, the purpose, the unity which an artistic institution should have. They are wondering, sometimes aloud, if the festival isn't primarily set up to give the orchestra year-round employment.

LOOKING at the Philadelphia's programs, one may indeed suspect that it has taken the path of least resistance. There is a Russian program; two Beethoven programs; a Rachmaninoff program; a "Three B's" program; a Rodgers and Hammerstein program.

And note the Tchaikovsky program: "Romeo and Juliet," the Violin Concerto, Overture "1812" and "Capriccio Italien." Rarely have I seen anything so completely unimaginative, so utterly pedestrian as that which the Philadelphia Orchestra has been feeding the people of New York for these past three years.

There is an opposite-side story in the Metropolitan Opera's short-lived sojourn to Newport, R.I. After a disappointing four-night stand of concert opera in 1966, when the weather was blamed for poor audiences, the Met poured every effort into making 1967 a success. The Verdi Festival looked at the composer from every angle through concerts, recitals, exhibits, films, seminars, demonstrations. It was a superb effort. And it failed.

WHY? Because Festival Field in Newport, necessarily the Met's headquarters, is totally unsuitable for serious-music presentation. Electronic amplification was for most the only means to hear; there is little physical attractiveness to the location; audiences listened under the threat of rain in an open, rambling amphitheater; and Newport itself is not the most easily-accessible place around.

Tanglewood, heaven knows, is not perfect. Warhorses still ride in herds now and then through the Music Shed. The prices, for admission to concerts and especially for lodging, can be frighteningly high. But as a music festival and instructional center at which objectives of entertainment and education are closely interwoven, the Berkshire Festival is a veritable marvel of planning, organization, variety and, gratifyingly often, artistic results.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JUL 14 1968 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 60,736

AUG 24 1968 New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

Dissatisfaction and Curiosity

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

HISTORY HAS a way of being unmindful of the calendar. Careers cross the turns of centuries; reigns and revolutions do not fit convenient pigeonholes and developments leading up to a culmination can be from a previous generation.

From that angle, therefore, it is difficult to place in time such composers as Richard Strauss, Mahler, Debussy, Ravel, Stravinsky, Schoenberg and others of that era. Instead of using the turn of the century as a benchmark, the dates of World War I might serve better. In any case, it is necessary to give and take a little here and a little there.

The current Tanglewood series, approached from that viewpoint, contained only one program of contemporary music and that was last night, although there were individual examples interpolated in several of the season's concerts. This is not particularly significant because on the same lot, but under different auspices, there was plenty of music to be heard which has been written within this last decade.

* * * *

THERE IS always an insistent demand that contemporary composers be given opportunities to have their works heard. This is not difficult to justify, although the amount of draff that must go through the mill to glean a scant percentage of wheat is always extremely high. This situation is not applicable only to music; it applies as well to literature and the theatre, and probably to the patent office, too.

Last night Aaron Copland was the conductor of a varied program of which all the composers but one are still alive. By far the greater percentage of the music heard in the 24 concerts of the season was from the 19th century. Of course there were the opening weeks of Bach, Mozart, Handel and Haydn, but with these exceptions in mind, the music world today thrives on the 19th century.

* * * *

A SURVEY of today's music shows that the art is in a state of revolt against the past as much as are its sister arts; as are college students and inhabitants of slums against the situations which tend to perpetuate conditions their fathers and grandfathers endured.

Dissatisfaction and Impatience have always been prime human motivating forces. And young people are Curious. In some cases, change can become progress. I steer clear here of social and civil matters. But, for the same reason that a hen crosses the road and a teenager tries cornsilk behind the barn, more mature students want to learn and hear what sounds come from instruments when they are utilized in unconventional ways and combinations or from sources and instruments not now employed.

* * * *

MUSIC HAS recently gone through, and is going through, periods which have not been so clearly identified as the various experiments in painting of the same era. We probably should no more restrain the hen and admonish the teen-ager than we should ridicule the efforts of men dissatisfied with the status quo of music—no matter how strange and new to us their music may sound.

Men climb mountains, descend to the bottom of the ocean, let themselves be launched into space and go to all manner of extremes out of a spirit of adventure and a desire to find new or better ways of doing old things or seeking problems to conquer of which we as yet know nothing.

* * * *

THERE IS a faction in music which contends that old-fashioned music, that is, music of the 19th century and before, has exhausted the scale. This group points to the sequel of Wagner's school—Richard Strauss, early Schoenberg and Mahler, who is credited with having made "anguish excruciating."

And so we now have music which has about as much sentiment and emotion as Mondrian or George Moore. We have no reason to deplore change. Years ago we went to the Berkshire Museum to see a Bougereau; to our Pittsfield City Hall Park to see the Union soldier and to Lenox center to see a Union officer. There would certainly be protests if it were suggested that the granite soldiers should now be junked and imaginative but discarded motors or machines be used to replace them. Stravinsky, when he became an American citizen, thought it would be a gesture of deep patriotism if he dolled up our national anthem a bit. He was nearly ridden off the dock at Ellis Island.

How long can Tanglewood or any other concert series hope to attract audiences with 19th century music?

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,229

AUG 24 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Soundings Of Change

By Dan Webster

Patriot Ledger Correspondent

LENOX — The air is clear and the atmosphere serene at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony Orchestra goes through its routine of rehearsal and performance, its players relaxed beside the intense and shaggy students at the Berkshire Music Center. Things look much as they have for years.

But Tanglewood is not the same and very near that serene surface there is a bubbling sense of impending change, maybe even revolution.

The obvious reason is the scheduled change of music directors, but to anyone walking around the manicured grounds at Tanglewood, that change will contribute to the status quo, not to any revolution. William Steinberg, the 70-year-old conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will add the BSO to his duties after next season. Passed over in 1961 when Erich Leinsdorf was appointed in Boston, Steinberg will guide the BSO for three years at least. His role has been clarified by BSO officers.

Planning Ahead

Thomas D. Perry Jr., the symphony's manager, said "Obviously we will have to be thinking about a successor to Steinberg. We are delighted to have him: we wanted someone who would maintain the orchestra and for this he will be excellent. He is a master. We need his kind of genius now because we are rethinking the whole role of the symphony in our time and we may very well get lost in the woods.

"We wonder if the symphony can go on doing what it has been doing for generations, and if it is the central musical institution in American cities — and it is — we wonder if it doesn't have to adapt itself to contemporary life."

Perry noted that Tanglewood was the scene this summer of concerts by innovative rock groups and singers, a series entitled "Contemporary Trends." In urging this series, Gunther Schuller, head of Tanglewood's Contemporary Music activities, said that audiences and musicians have been exposed to music from many cultures and that "an interesting process of cross-breeding with so-called serious music has developed."

New Crowd

The concerts brought a large and new audience and, as Perry noted with some relief, an orderly, young audience there for the message as well as the medium. The idea may be repeated next summer if, Perry stressed, the best innovators are available. "We are not going to present the best we can get; we will present the best or nothing at all, but this too is something that needs a lot of thought.

"This is a very confused and interesting time. We have a lot of thinking to do about the Symphony, not just as an institution of 106 men, but as an entity. We have to think about the Symphony's role in education, we have to decide about its role in television. Television straight and television crazy. And we must know what its role will be in facing mixed media, in electronics, in rock, if you will.

"We think the Symphony must find a position in the developments that are taking place. I'm fascinated by the possibilities of mixed media. Some of the young people here at Tanglewood are showing us things that take your breath away. I think the symphony — as an institution — must get into the things that are happening.

"It's been terribly stimulating for us to sit at the table here with the young people in the Berkshire Music Center. They challenge every aspect of the symphony's existence — and they are such dammed good musicians, too.

Thinking Changes

"We don't even know what a music director should be. Will the music director of the future be a conductor trained in the usual way? Will he even be a musician? Maybe he'll be a manager who can run up a balance sheet and sell tickets or maybe he'll be a man trained in communications, in theater. I don't know.

"But if we are to have an orchestra that is anything but a museum, we must find answers to these questions. This inability to justify the symphony's traditional role is what keeps bothering Leonard Bernstein and it keeps bothering us, too. We may find it impossible to adapt the symphony to all that's going on around us, but if that happens we will have failed to meet our responsibilities.

As he spoke, the BSO was playing the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 5 under Sixten Ehrling's baton.

"We can play that until we're black in the face," Perry said, "but we will be missing half the world."

So Steinberg will move in to maintain stability while the Boston Symphony Orchestra tries to find a direction as it nears the end of its first hundred years.

GUNTHER SCHULLER
. . . a musical modern 149.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf Marries Secretly

BOSTON (UPI)—Erich Leinsdorf didn't remain a bachelor very long.

The handsome musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has married violinist Vera Graf—but the ceremonies earlier this month in Albany, N. Y., were not disclosed until Monday.

The private ceremony was performed by Judge Harold Segal on Aug. 5.

Leinsdorf, 45, and Miss Graf, 33, each previously had been married and divorced. His divorce was announced on April 30.

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the end of the Berkshire Music Festival season at Lenox Sunday afternoon, a spokesman for the orchestra reported.

Leinsdorf has five children by his first wife, who now is employed on the staff of Beth Israel Hospital in Boston.

Miss Graf played for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups, but not with the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf will retire as musical director of the orchestra next August. He has not announced future plans.

He succeeded Charles Munch as conductor in September 1962.

ERICH LEINSDORF

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,912 SUN. 129,006

AUG 27 1968

Local Ceremony Kept Hush

Boston's Conductor Wed

Boston Symphony Orchestra director Erich Leinsdorf and violinist Vera Graf were quietly married in Albany civil ceremony, Aug. 5 — so quietly in fact that the word didn't leak until Monday night.

Leinsdorf, 56, and Miss Graf, 33, were married before Judge Harold Segal here. Segal said Monday night that he "had no idea why they chose me."

But, Judge Segal said, the couple had sought and were granted a waiver of the 24-hour waiting period by the Albany office of the State Supreme Court. "He said he had a perfromance that night," the judge explained "that's why they were in a hurry."

Both, Leinsdorf and Miss Graf had been married before. Leinsdorf's marriage to Anne Frohnknecht ended last April. They had five children.

Had His Critics

Never known for being impulsive, Leinsdorf was often termed "rigid" by his critics. He was also called overly intellectual in his approach to music.

However, Judge Segal disclosed that he and Miss Graf showed up at the judge's office with only one witness (two are necessary for a marriage ceremony), and the judge's secretary, Mrs. Nona Ring, had to be pressed into service.

ERICH LEINSDORF

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the last of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival season performances at Tanglewood, Sunday afternoon. Leinsdorf will retire after next year's summer season. He has not disclosed his future plans.

Leinsdorf succeeded Charles Munch as the orchestra's conductor in Sept. 1962.

Restored Wagner

He is perhaps best known for bringing Wagner to the Boston orchestra — an orchestra which played less Wagner probably than any symphony orchestra in the country. He had said when he took charge in 1962 that he did not want a "Boston sound," but rather looked forward to numerous Boston sounds.

His success has been apparent as his work had brought bravos from critics and audiences.

Judge Segal said that he didn't have the slightest idea who he was about to marry Aug. 5.

"I recognized him from televi-shows," the judge said.

Leinsdorf's bride played violin for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups. She has not, however, worked with the Boston Symphony.

Miss Graf had no children by her first marriage.

Leinsdorf, a native of Vienna, Austria, announced in December, he will resign in August 1969, from the Boston Symphony because of a "heavy workload."

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Tuesday, August 27, 1968

Leinsdorf and Violinist To Hear Wedding Bells

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has married Vera Graf, a violin soloist it was announced yesterday.

Leinsdorf is 56 and his bride 33. His 28-year marriags to his first wife was ended by divorce in Juarez, Mexico, April 30. They have five children.

Miss Graf, also divorced, has no children.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony conductor ends bachelor life

BOSTON (UPI)—Erich Leinsdorf didn't remain a bachelor very long.

The handsome musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has married violinist Vera Graf—but the ceremonies earlier this month in Albany, N.Y., were not disclosed until Monday.

The private ceremony was performed by Judge Harold Segal on Aug. 5.

Leinsdorf, 56, and Miss Graf, 33, each previously had been married and divorced. His divorce was announced on April 30.

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the end of the Berkshire Music Festival season at Lenox Sunday afternoon, a spokesman for the orchestra reported.

Leinsdorf has five children by his first wife, who now is employed on the staff of Beth Israel Hospital in Boston.

Miss Graf played for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups, but not with the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf will retire as musical director of the orchestra next August. He has not announced future plans. He succeeded Charles Munch as conductor in September, 1962.

The news of his marriage came in a telegram to news media here from a New York public relations firm.

Nuptials Announced

B Eagle Tues 8/27

Leinsdorf, Lady Violinist Making Music Together

BOSTON (UPI)—Erich Leinsdorf didn't remain a bachelor very long.

The handsome musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has married violinst Vera Graf—but the ceremonies earlier this month in Albany, N.Y., were not disclosed until Monday.

The private ceremony was performed by Judge Harold Segal on Aug. 5.

Leinsdorf, 56, and Miss Graf, 33, each previously had been married and divorced. His divorce was announced on April 30.

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the end of the Berkshire Music Festival season at Lenox Sunday afternoon, a spokesman for the orchestra reported.

Leinsdorf has five children by his first wife, who now is employed on the staff of Beth Israel Hospital in Boston.

Miss Graf played for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups, but not with the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf will retire as musical director of the orchestra next August. He has not announced future plans. He succeeded Charles Munch as conductor in September, 1962.

The news of his marriage came in a telegram to news media here from a New York public relations firm.

149.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,850

AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf Marries Secretly

BOSTON (UPI)—Erich Leinsdorf didn't remain a bachelor very long.

The handsome musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has married violinist Vera Graf—but the ceremonies earlier this month in Albany, N. Y., were not disclosed until Monday.

The private ceremony was performed by Judge Harold Segal on Aug. 5.

Leinsdorf, 45, and Miss Graf, 33, each previously had been married and divorced. His divorce was announced on April 30.

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the end of the Berkshire Music Festival season at Lenox Sunday afternoon, a spokesman for the orchestra reported.

Leinsdorf has five children by his first wife, who now is employed on the staff of Beth Israel Hospital in Boston.

Miss Graf played for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups, but not with the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf will retire as musical director of the orchestra next August. He has not announced future plans.

He succeeded Charles Munch as conductor in September, 1962.

ERICH LEINSDORF

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

AUG 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony conductor ends bachelor life

BOSTON (UPI)—Erich Leinsdorf didn't remain a bachelor very long.

The handsome musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has married violinist Vera Graf—but the ceremonies earlier this month in Albany, N.Y., were not disclosed until Monday.

The private ceremony was performed by Judge Harold Segal on Aug. 5.

Leinsdorf, 56, and Miss Graf, 33, each previously had been married and divorced. His divorce was announced on April 30.

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the end of the Berkshire Music Festival season at Lenox Sunday afternoon, a spokesman for the orchestra reported.

Leinsdorf has five children by his first wife, who now is employed on the staff of Beth Israel Hospital in Boston.

Miss Graf played for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups, but not with the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf will retire as musical director of the orchestra next August. He has not announced future plans. He succeeded Charles Munch as conductor in September, 1962.

The news of his marriage came in a telegram to news media here from a New York public relations firm.

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Tuesday, August 27, 1968

Leinsdorf and Violinist To Hear Wedding Bells

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has married Vera Graf, a violin soloist it was announced yesterday.

Leinsdorf is 56 and his bride 33. His 28-year marriags to his first wife was ended by divorce in Juarez, Mexico, April 30. They have five children.

Miss Graf, also divorced, has no children.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 64,912 SUN. 129,006

AUG 27 1968 Buffalo

Local Ceremony Kept Hush

Boston's Conductor Wed

Boston Symphony Orchestra director Erich Leinsdorf and violinist Vera Graf were quietly married in Albany civil ceremony, Aug. 5 — so quietly in fact that the word didn't leak until Monday night.

Leinsdorf, 56, and Miss Graf, 33, were married before Judge Harold Segal here. Segal said Monday night that he "had no idea why they chose me."

But, Judge Segal said, the couple had sought and were granted a waiver of the 24-hour waiting period by the Albany office of the State Supreme Court. "He said he had a perfromance that night," the judge explained "that's why they were in a hurry."

Both, Leinsdorf and Miss Graf had been married before. Leinsdorf's marriage to Anne Frohnknecht ended last April. They had five children.

Had His Critics

Never known for being impulsive, Leinsdorf was often termed "rigid" by his critics. He was also called overly intellectual in his approach to music.

However, Judge Segal disclosed that he and Miss Graf showed up at the judge's office with only one witness (two are necessary for a marriage ceremony), and the judge's secretary, Mrs. Nona Ring, had to be pressed into service.

ERICH LEINSDORF

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the last of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival season performances at Tanglewood, Sunday afternoon. Leinsdorf will retire after next year's summer season. He has not disclosed his future plans.

Leinsdorf succeeded Charles Munch as the orchestra's conductor in Sept. 1962.

Restored Wagner

He is perhaps best known for bringing Wagner to the Boston orchestra — an orchestra which played less Wagner probably than any symphony orchestra in the country. He had said when he took charge in 1962 that he did not want a "Boston sound," but rather looked forward to numerous Boston sounds.

His success has been apparent as his work had brought bravos from critics and audiences.

Judge Segal said that he didn't have the slightest idea who he was about to marry Aug. 5.

"I recognized him from televi-shows," the judge said.

Leinsdorf's bride played violin for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups. She has not, however, worked with the Boston Symphony.

Miss Graf had no children by her first marriage.

Leinsdorf, a native of Vienna, Austria, announced in December, he will resign in August 1969, from the Boston Symphony because of a "heavy workload."

Nuptials Announced

B Eagle Tues 8/27

Leinsdorf, Lady Violinist Making Music Together

BOSTON (UPI)—Erich Leinsdorf didn't remain a bachelor very long.

The handsome musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has married violinst Vera Graf—but the ceremonies earlier this month in Albany, N.Y., were not disclosed until Monday.

The private ceremony was performed by Judge Harold Segal on Aug. 5.

Leinsdorf, 56, and Miss Graf, 33, each previously had been married and divorced. His divorce was announced on April 30.

The couple left for an undisclosed location following the end of the Berkshire Music Festival season at Lenox Sunday afternoon, a spokesman for the orchestra reported.

Leinsdorf has five children by his first wife, who now is employed on the staff of Beth Israel Hospital in Boston.

Miss Graf played for the American Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Opera Orchestra and has appeared as solo violinist with other groups, but not with the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf will retire as musical director of the orchestra next August. He has not announced future plans. He succeeded Charles Munch as conductor in September, 1962.

The news of his marriage came in a telegram to news media here from a New York public relations firm.

150.

Tanglewood's Maestro of the Camera

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — No one has viewed the story of Tanglewood so intimately as Heinz Weissenstein, official photographer of the Berkshire Music Festival.

For 30 of its 31 years, everything about Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has passed before his sharp eye and camera.

Weissenstein is a devout listener to music but admits that he doesn't know much about it.

He knows a lot about musicians. They are his favorite photographic subjects.

Five Presidents

That's saying a great deal because Weissenstein has focused his camera on some of the most famous personalities of our times. They include the last five presidents of the United States and heads of state from many foreign countries.

Most of these were photographed in New York City where he maintains a studio during the winter.

Weissenstein's approach to his musical subjects is a personal matter. It isn't just a matter of taking a picture for publication.

"Character in the face is much more important than the profession," he explains.

"Personality and activity are the publicity angle," he adds. "My aim isn't to just make a pretty face at the moment. I must know something about the person and see what I can tell from what he's doing at the moment."

He recently photographed pianist Gina Bachauer at Tanglewood.

Large Person

She's a rather large person. Action pictures of Mme. Bachauer at the piano make dramatic publicity shots.

"What I wanted to capture was Mme. Bachauer's fleeting smile, her graciousness, dignity and warmth," he says.

Heinz doesn't always succeed and he's frank to admit it.

"I know what I want from my subject," he says. "If I can't get it in one or three dozen tries, it's a lost cause."

Heinz took dozens of pictures of the late Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony and founder of the Berkshire Music Festival.

He missed the greatest picture of all.

Weissenstein had been summoned to Koussevitzky's home, Seranak, near Tanglewood's 220 acres, to take some new pictures of the famed conductor.

A Message

On his way, he was stopped by a young man and asked if he would deliver a message to the conductor.

The young man showed him the letter. It was more of a poem that began, "Dear Father."

"I saw no harm in it so I put it in my pocket. After I'd set up my equipment on the Seranak patio, Koussevitzky came out and sat down. He'd pose stifly and order, 'Take It!' "

"I realized that I'd have to make him relax," Heinz says, "so I talked about many subjects. Nothing seemed to work. Then I thought of the letter amd handed it to him. Koussy read it, got up and walked to the edge of the patio overlooking the hills.

"Tears were streaming down his face. He threw out his arms and exclaimed, 'My children!' "

"What a picture it would expected that I wasn't have made. But it was so unready," Weissenstein said ruefully.

Heinz had two interesting subjects recently in New York. They were politicians and asked Weissenstein to make some vote-getting photographs.

"One of them lost the electon," he said with a chuckle, "but it wasn't my fault. My

For the other one's pictures pictures were beautiful."

Weissenstein had to get to New York's city hall before the staff arrived. The candidate wanted to be pictured coming down the city hall steps.

"He had to walk down those steps about 25 times before I got the right picture. He was rigid and had an artificial smile He won the election."

Who are his best subjects?

Famous Ones

"The really famous ones," he says. "They are cooperative. Some of the infamous ones don't stand still long enough for me to do my work well."

Weissenstein sums it up with this philosophy: "When you have too much to do, you always have time for someting else. Those who have little to do, don't have time for anything."

A classic example of complete cooperation was his first important client, Eleanor Roosevelt.

In 1941, he was to report to her New York apartment to take some special pictures.

"I shook for a whole day before," he recalled.

Vase of Roses

"When I arrived at 8 a.m., Mrs. Roosevelt was already at her desk. The first thing I did was knock over a vase of roses. She helped to clean it up. When I finished my work, she walked with me to the elevator and insisted on staying until the elevator door closed."

HEINZ WEISSENSTEIN

Weissenstein's early life in Germany would make a Hollywood thriller.

As a child at Holzminden, his home near Hamburg, he read instructions for building a photographer's dark room. He built one. Then his older brother was given a simple folding camera as a Bar Mitzvah gift and he let Heinz use it occasionally.

His first pictures were of rose bushes and candids of people.

"I wanted to perpetuate things," he explains. "There was nothing commercial about it."

Bank Official

Weissenstein was expected to follow the family profession and he did. He settled in Leipzig and became vice president of the Ivriah Cooperative Bank.

He couldn't get photography out of his system. He studied part time at a photography school in Hamburg and a chemical laboratory in Berlin.

Up to that point, photography was a hobby.

He also became a leader in the Jewish Youth Movement

"I was acceptable to the regime," he explains, "whereas some of the childen's parents were not acceptable."

In 1938, he was called to the Gestapo office and was gruffly told that his "passport was ready."

Stop and Go

Sensing the danger, he ments to come two the United ments to come tm the United States on a visitor's visa. His intention was to continue to Brazil or the Philippines.

A friend of his had moved recently into his Leipzig room.

Before Weissenstein reached this country, the friend was arrested and sent to the Dachau concentration camp.

"It may have been a case of mistaken identity," Heinz believes.

His mother was killed in the Auschwitz concentration camp.

Weissenstein had his visa extended and went to Cuba for a week in 1941. He re-entered the United States, applied for citizenship and became a citizen in 1946.

"I was completely helpless when I first came to this country," he recalls. "I couldn't speak English and had to rely on my friends."

He arrived here with the clothes on his back and a five dollar bill. He had his camera over his shoulder.

"I brought it along as an investment," he says. "It was the only thing I could wear."

Heinz got his start in New York as a door-to-door salesman taking pictures.

One of his first acquaintances was Joe Kruger who operated Camp Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. During his first seven summers as official Berkshire Festival photographer, he also taught photography at the camp.

Weissenstein's wife Charlotte and their four sons live in the main gate house at Wheatleigh in Lenox, formerly the sumptuous home of the Countess de Heredia.

In New York, Whitestone also means the official photographer for the New York Philharmonic, American Symphony Orchestra, B'nai B'rith in the Metropolitan Council, New York City area, and official photographer for Topps Major League All-Star Rookie team.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
AUG 25 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
AUG 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Photographer Weissenstein Is Marking His Thirtieth Year in the Berkshires

In 30 years as photographer in the Berkshires, Heinz Weissenstein has become as familiar a face at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood as the many familiar faces he has photographed. Whenever a photograph is to be taken, Heinz Weissenstein, as official photographer, is there with his Rollei or Leica, capturing the event on film.

His collection of music world negatives is extensive, ranging all over the musical personalities spectrum. It includes Mitropoulos, Bernstein, Walter, Koussevitzky, Munch, Leinsdorf, Stokowski, Ormandy, Steinberg, Copeland, Cliburn, Serkin, Rubinstein, Cassals and many others.

After arriving here as a young man in 1938, having fled from Nazi Germany with little more than the clothes he was wearing and a camera, Weissenstein survived by going door to door in Manhattan taking pictures of children "for peanuts." He toiled tirelessly at his trade and finally met Joe Kruger, who operated Camp Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. He offered Weissenstein a job.

The young photographer was quick to accept and eventually taught photography for seven summers at Mahkeenac. He says he fell in love with the area. He vowed one day he would buy a house in the Berkshires, and in 1949 purchased the main gate house at Wheatleigh from the estate of Countess de Heredia.

Heinz Weissenstein

In addition to being official photographer at Tanglewood, Weissenstein also serves in the same capacity for the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the American Symphony Orchestra. Not a man to be limited to one area, he has also served for 30 years as photographer for B'nai B'rith in the Metropolitan Council, New York City area, and as official photographer for the Topps Major League All-Star Rookie team.

Photographed Five Presidents

His pictures have appeared regularly in publications ranging from Opera News to Sporting News to Automotive News, and in between those have been Time, Life, Newsweek, newspapers throughout the country, and even in publications in Russia, Egypt and China. The credit line "Whitestone Photo" (which is Weissenstein translated into English) is familiar to all those who have been the subjects of his camera.

His subjects have included five presidents of the United States: Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson. Other heads of state to appear before his camera have been Queen Elizabeth of Great Britain, President Tubman of Liberia, Levi Eshkol, David Ben Gurion and President Shazar of Israel.

Except for their summers at Tanglewood, Weissenstein, his wife, Charlotte, and three of their four sons, Peter, Robert and David, live on New York's West Side. Their oldest son, Herbert, has been working for the past year with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on a grant from the Ford Foundation.

150.

Tanglewood's Maestro of the Camera

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — No one has viewed the story of Tanglewood so intimately as Heinz Weissenstein, official photographer of the Berkshire Music Festival.

For 30 of its 31 years, everything about Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has passed before his sharp eye and camera.

Weissenstein is a devout listener to music but admits that he doesn't know much about it.

He knows a lot about musicians. They are his favorite photographic subjects.

Five Presidents

That's saying a great deal because Weissenstein has focused his camera on some of the most famous personalities of our times. They include the last five presidents of the United States and heads of state from many foreign countries.

Most of these were photographed in New York City where he maintains a studio during the winter.

Weissenstein's approach to his musical subjects is a personal matter. It isn't just a matter of taking a picture for publication.

"Character in the face is much more important than the profession," he explains.

"Personality and activity are the publicity angle," he adds. "My aim isn't to just make a pretty face at the moment. I must know something about the person and see what I can tell from what he's doing at the moment."

He recently photographed pianist Gina Bachauer at Tanglewood.

Large Person

She's a rather large person. Action pictures of Mme. Bachauer at the piano make dramatic publicity shots.

"What I wanted to capture was Mme. Bachauer's fleeting smile, her graciousness, dignity and warmth," he says.

Heinz doesn't always succeed and he's frank to admit it.

"I know what I want from my subject," he says. "If I can't get it in one or three dozen tries, it's a lost cause."

Heinz took dozens of pictures of the late Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony and founder of the Berkshire Music Festival.

He missed the greatest picture of all.

Weissenstein had been summoned to Koussevitzky's home, Seranak, near Tanglewood's 220 acres, to take some new pictures of the famed conductor.

A Message

On his way, he was stopped by a young man and asked if he would deliver a message to the conductor.

The young man showed him the letter. It was more of a poem that began, "Dear Father."

"I saw no harm in it so I put it in my pocket. After I'd set up my equipment on the Seranak patio, Koussevitzky came out and sat down. He'd pose stifly and order, 'Take It!' "

"I realized that I'd have to make him relax," Heinz says, "so I talked about many subjects. Nothing seemed to work. Then I thought of the letter amd handed it to him. Koussy read it, got up and walked to the edge of the patio overlooking the hills.

"Tears were streaming down his face. He threw out his arms and exclaimed, 'My children!' "

"What a picture it would expected that I wasn't have made. But it was so unready," Weissenstein said ruefully.

Heinz had two interesting subjects recently in New York. They were politicians and asked Weissenstein to make some vote-getting photographs.

"One of them lost the electon," he said with a chuckle, "but it wasn't my fault. My For the other one's pictures pictures were beautiful."

Weissenstein had to get to New York's city hall before the staff arrived. The candidate wanted to be pictured coming down the city hall steps.

"He had to walk down those steps about 25 times before I got the right picture. He was rigid and had an artificial smile He won the election."

Who are his best subjects?

Famous Ones

"The really famous ones," he says. "They are cooperative. Some of the infamous ones don't stand still long enough for me to do my work well."

Weissenstein sums it up with this philosophy: "When you have too much to do, you always have time for someting else. Those who have little to do, don't have time for anything."

A classic example of complete cooperation was his first important client, Eleanor Roosevelt.

In 1941, he was to report to her New York apartment to take some special pictures.

"I shook for a whole day before," he recalled.

Vase of Roses

"When I arrived at 8 a.m., Mrs. Roosevelt was already at her desk. The first thing I did was knock over a vase of roses. She helped to clean it up. When I finished my work, she walked with me to the elevator and insisted on staying until the elevator door closed."

HEINZ WEISSENSTEIN

Weissenstein's early life in Germany would make a Hollywood thriller.

As a child at Holzminden, his home near Hamburg, he read instructions for building a photographer's dark room. He built one. Then his older brother was given a simple folding camera as a Bar Mitzvah gift and he let Heinz use it occasionally.

His first pictures were of rose bushes and candids of people.

"I wanted to perpetuate things," he explains. "There was nothing commercial about it."

Bank Official

Weissenstein was expected to follow the family profession and he did. He settled in Leipzig and became vice president of the Ivriah Cooperative Bank.

He couldn't get photography out of his system. He studied part time at a photography school in Hamburg and a chemical laboratory in Berlin.

Up to that point, photography was a hobby.

He also became a leader in the Jewish Youth Movement

"I was acceptable to the regime," he explains, "whereas some of the childen's parents were not acceptable."

In 1938, he was called to the Gestapo office and was gruffly told that his "passport was ready."

Stop and Go

Sensing the danger, he ments to come two the United ments to come tm the United States on a visitor's visa. His intention was to continue to Brazil or the Philippines.

A friend of his had moved recently into his Leipzig room.

Before Weissenstein reached this country, the friend was arrested and sent to the Dachau concentration camp.

"It may have been a case of mistaken identity," Heinz believes.

His mother was killed in the Auschwitz concentration camp.

Weissenstein had his visa extended and went to Cuba for a week in 1941. He re-entered the United States, applied for citizenship and became a citizen in 1946.

"I was completely helpless when I first came to this country," he recalls. "I couldn't speak English and had to rely on my friends."

He arrived here with the clothes on his back and a five dollar bill. He had his camera over his shoulder.

"I brought it along as an investment," he says. "It was the only thing I could wear."

Heinz got his start in New York as a door-to-door salesman taking pictures.

One of his first acquaintances was Joe Kruger who operated Camp Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. During his first seven summers as official Berkshire Festival photographer, he also taught photography at the camp.

Weissenstein's wife Charlotte and their four sons live in the main gate house at Wheatleigh in Lenox, formerly the sumptuous home of the Countess de Heredia.

In New York, Whitestone also means the official photographer for the New York Philharmonic, American Symphony Orchestra, B'nai B'rith in the Metropolitan Council, New York City area, and official photographer for Topps Major League All-Star Rookie team.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIR. 177,515
AUG 25 1968
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIR. 29,900
AUG 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Photographer Weissenstein Is Marking His Thirtieth Year in the Berkshires

In 30 years as photographer in the Berkshires, Heinz Weissenstein has become as familiar a face at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood as the many familiar faces he has photographed. Whenever a photograph is to be taken, Heinz Weissenstein, as official photographer, is there with his Rollei or Leica, capturing the event on film.

His collection of music world negatives is extensive, ranging all over the musical personalities spectrum. It includes Mitropoulos, Bernstein, Walter, Koussevitzky, Munch, Leinsdorf, Stokowski, Ormandy, Steinberg, Copeland, Cliburn, Serkin, Rubinstein, Cassals and many others.

After arriving here as a young man in 1938, having fled from Nazi Germany with little more than the clothes he was wearing and a camera, Weissenstein survived by going door to door in Manhattan taking pictures of children "for peanuts." He toiled tirelessly at his trade and finally met Joe Kruger, who operated Camp Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. He offered Weissenstein a job.

The young photographer was quick to accept and eventually taught photography for seven summers at Mahkeenac. He says he fell in love with the area. He vowed one day he would buy a house in the Berkshires, and in 1949 purchased the main gate house at Wheatleigh from the estate of Countess de Heredia.

Heinz Weissenstein

In addition to being official photographer at Tanglewood, Weissenstein also serves in the same capacity for the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the American Symphony Orchestra. Not a man to be limited to one area, he has also served for 30 years as photographer for B'nai B'rith in the Metropolitan Council, New York City area, and as official photographer for the Topps Major League All-Star Rookie team.

Photographed Five Presidents

His pictures have appeared regularly in publications ranging from Opera News to Sporting News to Automotive News, and in between those have been Time, Life, Newsweek, newspapers throughout the country, and even in publications in Russia, Egypt and China. The credit line "Whitestone Photo" (which is Weissenstein translated into English) is familiar to all those who have been the subjects of his camera.

His subjects have included five presidents of the United States: Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson. Other heads of state to appear before his camera have been Queen Elizabeth of Great Britain, President Tubman of Liberia, Levi Eshkol, David Ben Gurion and President Shazar of Israel.

Except for their summers at Tanglewood, Weissenstein, his wife, Charlotte, and three of their four sons, Peter, Robert and David, live on New York's West Side. Their oldest son, Herbert, has been working for the past year with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on a grant from the Ford Foundation.

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND